WIth this one word may the shamelessnesse of certaine ungodly men bee confuted, which slander vs with saying that we destroy good works, and doe draw men away from the following of them, when we say that they are not justified by works: nor doe deserve salvation: and againe, that we make too easie a way to righteousnesse, when we teach that it lieth in the free forgivenesse of sinnes, and that we doe by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much enclined thereto alreadie. These slanders (I say) are with that one word sufficiently confuted: yet I will briefely answer to them both. They alleage that by the justification of faith, good workes are destroied. I leave unspoken, what manner of men bee these zealous lovers of good workes which doe so backebite us. Let them have licence as freely to raile as they doe licentiously infect the whole world with the filthinesse of their life. They faine that they bee grieved, that when Faith is so gloriously advanced, workes are driven downe out of their place. What if they bee more raised up, and stablished? For neither doe wee dreame of a faith void of good works, nor a justification, that is without them. This onely is the difference, that when wee confesse that faith and good workes doe necessarily hang together, yet wee set justification in faith, not in workes. For what reason wee doe so, wee have in readinesse easily to declare, if we doe but turne to Christ unto whom our faith is directed, and from whom it receiveth her whole strength. Why therefore are we justified by faith? because by faith we take hold of the righteousnesse of Christ, by which alone we are reconciled to God. But this thou canst not take hold of, but that thou must also therewithall take hold of sanctification. For hee was given to us, for righteousnesse, wisdome, sanctification, and redemption. Therefore Christ justifieth none whom he doth not also sanctifie. For these benefits are coupled together with a perpetuall and unseparable knot, that whom he enlightneth with his wisdome, them he redeemeth: whom he redeemeth he justifieth: whom hee justifieth he sanctifieth. But for as much as our question is onely of righteousnesse and sanctifying, let us stay upon these. Wee may put difference betweene them, yet Christ containeth them both unseparably in himselfe. Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteousnesse in Christ? Thou must first possesse Christ: and thou canst not possesse him, but that thou must bee made partaker of his sanctification: because he cannot be torne in peeces. Sith therefore the Lord doth grant us these benefits to be enjoyed none otherwise, than in giving himselfe, he giveth them both together, the one never without the other. So appeareth how true it is, that we are justified not without works, and yet not by works: because in the partaking of Christ, whereby we are justified, is no lesse contained sanctification than righteousnesse. 1 Cor.1.30.

2. That

2. That also is most false, that the mindes of men are withdrawne from the affection of weldoing, when we take from them the opinion of meriting. Here by the way the readers must be warned, that they foolishly reason from reward to merit, as I shall afterward more plainely declare: namely, because they know not this principle, that God is no lesse liberall when he assigneth reward to workes, than when he giveth power to doe well. But this I had rather deferre to the place fit for it. Now it shall be enough to touch how weake their objection is: which shall be done two wayes. For first whereas they say that there shall be no care of well framing of life, but when hope of reward is set before them: they erre quite from the truth. For if this onely be intended when men serve God, that they looke to reward as let out to hire or sell their labours to him, they little prevaile: for God will be freely worshipped, freely loved: he (I say) alloweth that worshipper, which when all hope of receiving reward is cut off, yet ceaseth not to worship him. Moreover, if men be to be pricked forward, no man can put sharper spurres unto them, than those that are taken of the end of our redemption and calling: such as the word of God spurreth men withall, when it teacheth, that it is too wicked unthankfulnesse, not mutually to love him againe which first loved us: that by the blood of Christ our consciences are cleansed from dead workes to serve the living God: that it is a hainous sacrilege, if being once cleansed, we defile our selves with new filthinesse, and prophane that holy blood: that wee are delivered from the hands of our enemies, that wee may without feare serve him in holinesse and righteousnesse before him all the dales of our life: that we are made free from sinne, that we may with a free spirit follow righteousnesse: that our old man is crucified, that wee may rise againe into newnesse of life: againe, that if we be dead with Christ (as becommeth his members) we must seeke those things that are above, and must in the world bee waifaring men from home, that we may long toward heaven where is our treasure: that the grace of God hath appeared to this end, that forsaking all ungodlinesse and worldly desires, we may live soberly, holily, and godlily in this world, looking for the blessed hope and the appearing of the glorie of the great God and Saviour: therefore that we are not appointed that we should stirre up wrath to our selves, but that we may obtaine salvation by Christ: that we are the temples of the holy Ghost, which is not lawfull to be defiled: that we are not darknesse, but light in the Lord, which must walke as children of light, that we are not called to uncleannesse, but to holinesse: because this is the will of God, our sanctification, that we abstaine from unlawfull desires: that our calling is holie, that the same is not fulfilled but with pureneſſe of life: that wee are for this purpose delivered from sinne, that we should obey to righteousnesse. Can we bee pricked forward to charitie with any more lively argument than that of John, that we should mutually love one another as God hath loved us? that herein his children doe differ from the children of the divell, the children of light from the children of darknesse, because they abide in love? Againe with that argument of Paul, that wee if wee cleave to Christ, are the members of one body, which is meet to bee holpen one of another with mutuall duties? Can wee bee more strongly provoked to holinesse than when we heare againe of John, that all they that have this hope, do sanctifie themselves, because their God is holy? Againe of the mouth of Paul: that having the promise of adoption, we should cleanse our selves from all the defiling of the flesh and spirit? then when we heare Christ setting forth himselfe for an example unto us that wee should follow his steps.

Neither in the affection of well doing hereby could men be taught that the good which they doe, merited: but the reward which they shall receive for doing: the scripture hath other motions than this when it provoketh unto good workes.

3. *And these few things I have set forth for a taste: For if I should entend to goe through all, I should be driven to make a long volume. The Apostles are all full of encouragements, exhortations and rebukings, whereby they may instruct the man of God to everie good worke, and that without any mention of merit. But rather they fetch their chiefe exhortations from this, that our salvation standeth upon the onely mercy of God and upon no merit of ours. As Paul, after that hee hath in a whole Epistle discoursed that there is no hope of life for us but in the righteousnesse of Christ, when he commeth downe to morall exhortations, hee beseecheth them by that mercie of God which hee hath vouchsafed to extend to us. And truly this one cause ought to have beene sufficient, that God may be glorified in us. But if any bee not so vehemently vehemently moved with the glory of God, yet the remembrance of his benefits ought to have beene moſt ſufficient to ſtirre up ſuch men to doe well. But theſe men, which do peradventure with thruſting in of merits, beat out ſome ſervile and conſtrained obediences of the law, doe falſly ſay that we have nothing whereby we may exhort men to good workes, becauſe we goe not the ſame way to worke. As though God were much delighted with ſuch obediences which proteſteth that he loveth a cheerefull giver, and forbiddeth any thing to bee given as it were of heavineſſe or of neceſſity. Neither doe I ſpeake this for that I doe either refuſe or deſpiſe that kinde of exhortation, which the Scripture oftentimes uſeth, that it may leave no meane unattempted every way to ſtir up our mindes. For it rehearſeth the reward which God will render to every man according to his works. But I deny that this is the onely thing, yea or the chiefe among many. And then I grant not that wee ought to take beginning thereat. Moreover I affirme that it maketh nothing to the ſetting up of ſuch merits as theſe men boaſt of, as we ſhall hereafter ſee. Laſt of all I ſay that it is to no profitable uſe, unleſſe this doctrine have firſt taken place, that wee are juſtified by the onely merit of Chriſt, which is conceived by faith but by no merits of our workes, becauſe none can be fit to the endevour of holineſſe, unleſſe they have firſt digeſted this doctrine. Which thing alſo the Prophet very well ſignifieth, when he thus ſpeaketh to God: With thee is mercy that thou maieſt be feared. For he ſheweth that there is no worſhipping of God, but when his mercy is acknowledged, vpon which alone it is both founded and ſtabliſhed. Which is very worthy to be noted, that we may know not onely that the beginning of worſhipping God aright is the affiance of his mercy, but alſo that the feare of God (which the Papiſts will have to be meritorious) cannot have the name of merit, becauſe it is grounded upon the pardon and forgiveneſſe of ſinnes.

To teach that God doth freely pardon ſinners is no allurement unto ſinne.

4. But it is a moſt vaine ſlander, that men are allured to ſinne, when wee affirme the free forgiveneſſe of ſins, in which we ſay that righteouſneſſe conſiſteth. For, we ſay that it is of ſo great value, that it can with no good of ours be recompenſed, and that therefore it ſhould never be obtained, unleſſe it were freely given. Moreover, that it is to us indeed freely given, but not ſo to Chriſt which bought it ſo deerely, namely with his owne moſt holy bloud, beſide which, there was no price of valew enough that might be paid to the judgement of God. When men are taught theſe things, they are put in minde that it is no thanke to them that the ſame moſt holy bloud is not ſhed ſo oft as they ſin. Furthermore we learne, that our filthineſſe is ſuch as is never waſhed away but with the fountaine of this moſt pure bloud. Ought not they that heare theſe things, to conceive a greater horrour of ſin, than if it were ſaid that it is wiped away with the ſprinkling of good workes? And if they have any thing of God, how can they but dread being once cleanſed, to wallow themſelves againe in the mire, as much as in them lyeth to trouble and infect the pureneſſe of this fountaine? I have waſhed my feete, (ſaith the faithfull ſoule in Salomon) how ſhall I againe defile them? Now it is evident, whether ſort doe both more abaſe the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, and doe more make vile the dignity of righteouſneſſe. They babble that God is appeaſed with their owne trifling ſatisfaction, that is, their dung: We affirme that the guiltineſſe of ſinne is more grievous than can be Purged with ſo light trifles: that the diſpleaſure of God is more heavy then can be releaſed with theſe ſatisfactions of no value, and that therefore this is the prerogative of the only bloud of Chriſt. They ſay that righteouſneſſe (if it faile at any time) is reſtored and repaired by ſatisfactory works: we thinke it more precious than that it can be matched with any recompence of works, and that therefore for the reſtoring thereof wee muſt flie to the onely mercy of God. As for the reſt of thoſe things that pertaine to the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, let them be ſought out of the next Chapter.

Cant. 5. 3.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

The agreement of the promiſes of the Law and the Goſpell.

Juſtification by faith alone doth not make the NOw let us alſo goe through the other arguments wherewith Sathan by the ſouldiers of his guard, goeth about either to overthrow or batter the juſtification of faith. This I thinke wee have already wrung from the ſlaunderers, that they can no more more charge us as enemies of good works. For, iuſtification is taken away, from good workes, not that no good workes ſhould be done, or that thoſe which bee done ſhould be denied to be good, but that we ſhould not put affiance in them, nor glory in them, nor aſcribe ſalvation unto them. For this is our affiance, this is our glory, and the only author of our ſalvation, that Chriſt the Sonne of God is ours, and we likewiſe are in him the ſonnes of God, and heires of the heavenly kingdome, being called by the goodneſſe of God, not by our owne worthineſſe into the hope of eternall bleſſedneſſe. But becauſe they doe beſide theſe aſſaile us, as we have ſaid, with other engines, goe to, let us goe forward in beating away theſe alſo. Firſt they come backe to the promiſes of the law, which the Lord did ſet forth to the keepers of his law: and they aske whether we will have them to be utterly void or effectuall. Becauſe it were an abſurditie and to be corned to ſay that they are void, they take it for confeſſed that they are of ſome effectualneſſe. Hereupon they reaſon that wee are not juſtified by onely Faith. For thus ſaith the Lord: and it ſhall be, if thou ſhalt heare theſe commandements and judgements, and ſhalt keepe them and doe them, the Lord alſo ſhall keepe with thee his covenant and mercy which he hath ſworne to thy fathers, he ſhall love thee and multiply thee, and bleſſe thee, &c. Againe, if yee ſhall well direct your waies and your endevours, if ye walke not after ſtrange Gods, if ye do judgement betweene man and man, and goe not backe into malice, I will walke in the middeſt of you. I will not recite a thouſand peeces of the ſame ſort, which ſith they nothing differ in ſenſe, ſhall bee declared by the ſolution of theſe. In ſumme, Moſes teſtifieth that in the law is ſet forth bleſſing and curſe, death and life. Thus therefore they reaſon, that either this bleſſing is made idle and fruitleſſe, or that juſtification is not of Faith alone. We have already before ſhewed, how if we ſticke faſt in the law, over us being deſtitute of all bleſſing, hangeth onely curſe which is threatned to all tranſgreſſors. For the Lord promiſeth nothing but to the perfect keepers of his law, ſuch as there is none found. This therefore remaineth, that all mankinde is by the law accuſed, and ſubject to curſe and the wrath of God: from which that they may bee looſed, they muſt needs goe out of the power of the law, and be as it were brought into liberty from the bondage thereof: not that carnall libertie which ſhould withdraw us from the keeping of the law, ſhould allure us to thinke all things lawfull and to ſuffer our luſt, as it were the ſtaies being broken and with looſe reines, to runne at riot: but the ſpirituall liberty, which may comfort and raiſe up a diſmaied and overthrowne conſcience, ſhewing it to be free from the curſe and damnation wherewith the Law held it downe bound and faſt tied. This deliverance from the ſubjection of the Law, and Manumiſſion (as I may call it) wee obtaine when by Faith wee take hold of the mercy of God in Chriſt, whereby wee are certified and aſſured of the righteouſneſſe of ſinnes, with the feeling whereof the law did pricke and bite us.

Deut. 7. 12.

Jer. 7. 3. & 23.

Deut. 11. 26.

2. By this reaſon even the promiſes that were offred us in the law ſhould bee all uneffectuall and void, unleſſe the goodneſſe of God by the Goſpell did helpe. For, this condition that we keepe the whole law, upon which the promiſes hang, and whereby alone they are to be performed, ſhall never be fulfilled. And the Lord ſo helpeth, not by leaving part of righteouſneſſe in our workes, and ſupplying part by his mercifull bearing with us, but when he ſetteth onely Chriſt for the fulfilling of righteouſneſſe. For the Apoſtle, when he had before ſaid that hee and other Jewes beleeved in Jeſus Chriſt, knowing that man is not juſtified by the workes of the law, addeth a reaſon: not that they ſhould bee holpen to fulneſſe of righteouſneſſe by the faith of Chriſt, but by it ſhould bee juſtified not by the workes of the law. If the faithfull remove from the Law into faith, that they may in Faith finde righteouſneſſe which they ſee to be abſent from the law: truly they forſake the righteouſneſſe of the law. Therefore now let him that liſt, amplifie the rewardings which are ſaid to bee prepared for the keeper of the law, ſo that hee therewithall conſider that it commeth to paſſe by our perverſneſſe, that wee feele no fruit thereof till wee have obtained an other righteouſneſſe of Faith. So David when hee made mention of the rewarding which the Lord hath prepared for his ſervants, by and by deſcendeth to the reknowledging of ſinnes, whereby that ſame rewarding is made void. Alſo in the xix. Pſalme, hee glorioufly setteth forth the benefits of the law, but hee by and by crieth out: Who shall understand his faults? Lord cleanse me from my secret faults? This place altogether agreeth with the place before, where when he had said that all the waies of the Lord are goodnesse and truth to them that feare him, he addeth: For thy names sake Lord, thou shalt be mercifull to my perversnesse, for it is much. So ought we also to reknowledge, that there is indeede the good will of God set forth unto us in the law, if we might deserve it by workes, but that the same never commeth to us by the deserving of workes.

Leu. 18.
Rom. 10. 5.

3 How then? are they given that they should vanish away without fruit? I have even now already protested that the same is not my meaning, I say verily that they utter not their effectualnes towards us, so long as they have respect to the merit of works, and that therefore if they be considered in themselves, they be after a certaine manner abolished. If the Apostle teacheth that this noble promise: I have given you commandements, which who so shall doe shall live in them, is of no valew if we stand still in it, and shall never a whit more profit than if it had not beene given at all: because it belongeth not even to the most holy servants of God, which are all far from the fulfilling of the law, but are compassed about with many transgressions. But when the promises of the Gospell are put in place of them, which doe offer free forgiveneſſe of sinnes, they bring to passe that not onely wee our selves be acceptable to God, but that our workes also have their thanke: and not this onely that the Lord accepteth them, but also extendeth to them the blessings which were by covenant due to the keeping of the law. I grant therefore, that those things which the Lord hath promised in his law to the followers of righteousnesse and holinesse, are rendered to the workes of the faithfull: but in this rendering the cause is alwaies to bee considered that powreth grace to workes. Now causes we see that there be three. The first is, that God turning away his sight from the workes of his servants, which alway deserve rather reproch than praise, embraceth them in Christ, and by the onely meane of Faith reconcileth them to himselfe without the meane of workes. The second, that of his fatherly kindnesse and tender mercifulneſſe, he lifteth up works to so great honour, not weighing the worthinesse of them, that he accounteth them of some value. The third, that he receiveth the very same workes with pardon, not imputing the imperfection, where-with they all being defiled should otherwise be rather reckoned among sins than vertues. And hereby appeareth how much the Sophisters have beene deceived, which thought they had gaily escaped all absurdities, when they said that workes doe not of their owne inward goodnesse availe to deserve salvation, but by forme of the covenant, because the Lord hath of his liberality so much esteemed them. But in the meane time they considered not, how far those works which they would have to be meritorious, were from the condition of the promises, unlesse there went before both justification grounded upon onely faith, and the forgiveneſſe of sins, by which even the good workes themselves have neede to bee wiped from spots. Therefore of three causes of Gods liberality, by which it is brought to passe that the workes of the faithfull are acceptable, they noted but one, and suppressed two, yea and those the principall.

The Testimonie of Peter and example of Cornelius perversly alleaged to prove that the mercy of God towards men is procured by some worthines of their owne.
Act. 10. 34.

4 These alleadge the saying of Peter, which Luke rehearseth in the Actes: I finde in truth that God is not an accepter of persons: but in every nation hee that doth righteousnesse is acceptable to him. And hereupon they gather that which seemeth to be undoubted, that if a man doth by right endevours get himselfe the favour of God, it is not the beneficiall gift of God alone that he obtaineth salvation: yea that God doth so of his mercy helpe a sinner, that he is by workes bowed to mercy. But you can in no wise make the Scriptures agree together, unlesse you note a double accepting of man with God. For, such as man is by nature, God findeth nothing in him whereby hee may bee inclined to mercy, but onely misery. If therefore it be certaine that man is naked and needy of all goodnesse, and on the other full stuffed and loaden with all kindes of evils, when God first receiveth them: for what quality, I pray you, shall wee say that hee is worthy of the heavenly calling? Away therefore with the vaine imagining of merits, where God so evidently setteth out his free mercifullneſſe. For, that which in the same place is said by the voice of the Angels to Cornelius, that his prayers and almes had ascended into the sight of God, is by these men most lewdly wrested that man by endevour of good workes is prepared to receive the grace of God. For it must needs bee that Cornelius was already enlightned with the spirit of wisdome, sith hee was endued with true wisdome, namely with the feare of God: that he was sanctified with the same spirit, sith he was a follower of righteousnesse, which the Apostle teacheth to be a most certaine fruit thereof. All these things therefore which are said to have pleased God in him, he hath of his grace, so farre is it off that he did by his owne endevour prepare himselfe to receive it. Truely there cannot one fillable of the scripture bee brought forth, that agreeth not with this doctrine, that there is none other cause for God to accept man unto him, but because he seeth that man should be every way lost, if he be left to himselfe: but because he will not have him lost, he useth his owne mercy in delivering him. Now we see how this accepting hath not regard to the righteousnesse of man, but is a meere token of the goodnesse of God toward men being miserable and most unworthie of so great a benefit. Gal. 5. 6.

5 But after that the Lord hath brought man out of the bottomlesse depth of destruction, and severed him to himselfe by grace of adoption: because he hath new begotten him & newly formed him into a new life, he now embraceth him, as a new creature with the gifts of his spirit. This is that accepting whereof Peter maketh mention, by which the faithfull are after their vocation allured of God even in respect also of works: for the Lord cannot but love and kisse those good things which he worketh in them by his spirit. But this is alway to be remembred, that they are none otherwise acceptable to God in respect of works, but in as much as for their cause & for their sakes, whatsoever good workes hee hath given them in increasing of his liberality, hee also vouchsafeth to accept. For whence have they good workes, but because the Lord, as hee hath chosen them for vessels unto honour, so will garnish them with true godlinesse? Whereby also are they accounted good, as though there were nothing wanting in them, but because the kinde Father tenderly graunteth pardon to those deformities and spots that cleave to them? Summarily, he signifieth nothing else in this place, but that to God his children are acceptable and lovely, in whom he seeth the markes and features of his owne face. For wee have in another place taught that regeneration is a repairing of the image of God in us. For as much as therefore whersoever the Lord beholdeth his owne face, hee both worthily loveth it and hath it in honour: it is not without cause said, that the life of the faithfull being framed to holinesse and righteousnesse pleaseth him, but because the godly being clothed with mortall flesh, are yet sinners, and their good workes are but begun and savouring of the faultinesse of the flesh: he cannot bee favourable neither to those nor to these: unlesse he more embrace them in Christ than in themselves. After this manner are those places to be taken, which testifie that God is kinde and mercifull to the followers of righteousnesse. Moses said to the Israelites. The Lord thy God keepeth covenant, to a thousand generations: which sentence was afterward used of the people for a common manner of speech. So Salomon in his solemne prayer, saith, Lord God of Israel, which keepest covenant and mercy to thy servants which walke before thee in their whole heart. The same words are also repeated of Nehemias. For, as in all the covenants of his mercy, the Lord likewise on their behalfes requireth of his servants uprightnesse and holinesse of life, that his goodnesse should not be made a mockerie, and that no man swelling with vaine rejoycing by reason thereof should blesse his owne soule, walking in the meane time in the perverseneſse of his owne heart: so his will is by this way to keepe in their duty them that are admitted into the communion of the covenant: yet nevertheless the covenant it selfe is both made at the beginning free, and perpetually remaineth such. After this manner, David when he glorieth that here was rendred to him reward of the cleanenesse of his hands, yet omitteth not that fountaine which I have spoken of, that hee was drawne out of the wombe, because God loved him: where he so setteth out the goodnesse of his cause, that he abateth nothing from the free mercy which goeth before all gifts, whereof it is the beginning.

The good works of faithfull men acceptable unto God howbeit not because they are worthy to be accepted, but for that the mercie of God loving their persons embraceth their workes, their unworthinesse notwithstanding.

Deut. 7. 9.

1 King. 8. 23.

Nehem. 1. 5. Deut. 29. 18.

6 And here by the way it shall bee profitable to touch what these formes of speaking doe differ from the promises of the law. I call promises of the law, not those which are each where commonly written in the bookes of Moses: (forasmuch as

The vertuous actions of faithfull men are assurances of their rewards, and tokens that they are in the fauour of God, but no cauſes for the worthines wher of God ſhould favour them.

in them alſo are found many promiſes of the Goſpell) but thoſe which properly belong to the miniſterie of the law. Such promiſes, by what name ſoever you liſt to call them, doe declare that there is reward ready vpon condition if thou doe that which is commanded thee. But when it is ſaid, that the Lord keepeth the covenant of mercy to them which love him, therin is rather ſhewed what manner of men be his ſervants which have faithfully received covenant, than the cauſe is expreſſed why the Lord ſhould doe good to them. Now this is the manner of ſhewing it. As the Lord vouchſafeth to grant us the grace of eternall life, to this end that he ſhould be loved, feared, and honored of us: ſo whatſoever promiſes there are of his mercie in the Scriptures, they are rightfully directed to this end that we ſhould reverence and worſhip the Author of the benefites. So oft therefore as we heare that he doth good to them that keepe his law, let us remember that the children of God are there ſignified by the dutie which ought to be continuall in them: that we are for this cauſe adopted, that we ſhould honor him for our father. Therfore leaſt we ſhould diſherit our ſelves from the right adoption, we muſt alway indevour to this whereunto our calling tendeth. But let us againe keepe this in minde, that the accompliſhment of the mercie of God hangeth not upon the workes of the faithfull: but that he therfore fulfilleth the promiſe of ſalvation to them which anſwer to their calling in uprightneſſe of life, becauſe in them he acknowledgeth the naturall tokens of his children which are ruled with his Spirit unto good. Hereunto let that be referred which is in the xv. Pſalme ſpoken of the Citizens of the Church, Lord who ſhall dwell in thy tabernacle, and who ſhall reſt in thy holy hill? The innocent in hands and of a cleane heart, &c. Againe in Eſay, who ſhall dwell with deuouring fire? He that doth righteouſneſſe, he that ſpeaketh right things, &c. For, there isnot deſcribed the ſtay whereupon the faithfull may ſtand before the Lord, but the manner wherwith the moſt mercifull Father bringeth them into his fellowſhip, and therein defendeth and ſtrengthneth them. For becauſe hee abhorreth ſinne, he loueth righteouſneſſe, whom he ioyneth to himſelfe, them he clenſeth with his ſpirit, that he may make them of like faſhion to himſelfe and his kingdome. Therefore if the queſtion be of the firſt cauſe, whereby the entry is made open to the holy ones into the kingdome of God, from whence they haue that they may ſtand faſt and abide in it, we haue this anſwer readie, becauſe the Lord by his mercie both hath once adopted them, and perpetually defendeth them. But if the queſtion be of the manner, then we muſt come downe to regeneration and the fruites thereof, which are rehearſed in that Pſalme

In what ſenſe the commandements of God are called righteouſneſſe.

7 But there ſeemeth to be much more hardneſſe in theſe places, which doe both garniſh good works with the title of righteouſneſſe, and affirmeth that man is iuſtified by them. Of the firſt ſort there be very many places where the obſerving of the commandements are called iuſtifications or righteouſneſſes, of the other ſorte, that is an example which is in Moſes. This ſhall be our righteouſneſſe, if we keepe all theſe commandements. And if thou take exception, and ſay that this is a promiſe of the law which being knit to a condition impoſſible, proueth nothing. There be other of which you cannot make the ſame anſwer, as this: And that ſhall be to thee for righteouſneſſe before the Lord to redeliuer to the poore man his pledge. Againe, that which the Prophet ſaith, that that zeale in revenging the ſhame of Iſrael, was imputed to Phinus for righteouſneſſe. Therfore the Phariſees of our time thinke that here they haue a large matter to triumph upon. For when we ſay, that when the righeouſneſſe of Faith is ſet up, the iuſtification of workes giveth place, by the ſame right they make this argument: if righteouſneſſe be of works, then it is falſe that we are juſtified by Faith onely. Though I grant that the commandements of the law are called righteouſneſſes: it is no maruell: for they are ſo indeede. Howbeit wee muſt warne the Readers that the Grecians haue not fitly tranſlated the Hebrue word Hucmi, Dekaiomata, righteouſneſſe for commandements. But for the word, I willingly releaſe my quarell. For neither doe wee deny this to the Law of God, that it containeth perfect righteouſneſſe. For although, becauſe wee are debtors of all the things that it commandeth, therefore even when wee have performed full obedience thereof, we are unprofitable ſervants: yet becauſe the Lord vouchſafed to grant it the honour of righteouſneſſe,

we take not away that which hee hath given. Therefore we willingly confeſſe that the full obedience of the law is righteouſneſſe, that the keeping of every commandement is a part of righteouſneſſe, if ſo bee that the whole ſumme of righteouſneſſe were had in the other parts alſo. But wee deny that there is any where any ſuch forme of righteouſneſſe. And therefore wee take away the righteouſneſſe of the law, not for that it is maimed and unperfect of it ſelfe, but for that by reaſon of the weakeneſſe of our fleſh it is no where ſeene. But the Scripture not onely calleth ſimply the commandements of the Lords righteouſneſſes: but it alſo giveth this name to the workes of the holy ones: As when it reporteth that Zachary and his wife walked in the righteouſneſſes of the Lord: truely when it ſo ſpeaketh it weigheth workes rather by the nature of the law, than by their owne proper ſtate. Howbeit here againe is that to bee noted, which I even now ſaid, that of the negligence of the Greeke tranſlator is not a law to be made. But foraſmuch as Luke would alter nothing in the received tranſlation, I will alſo not ſtrive about it. For God hath commanded theſe things that are in the law to men for righteouſneſſe: but this righteouſneſſe we performe not but in keeping the whole law: for by every tranſgreſſion it is broken. Whereas therefore the law doth nothing but preſcribe righteouſneſſe: if we have reſpect to it, all the ſeverall commandements thereof are righteouſneſſe: if wee have reſpect to men of whom they are done, they doe not obtaine the praiſe of righteouſneſſe by one worke, being treſpaſſers in many, and by that ſame worke which is ever partly faulty by reaſon of imperfections. Luke 1. 6.

8 But now I come to the ſecond kinde, in which is the chiefe hardneſſe. Paul hath nothing more ſtrong to prove the righteouſneſſe of faith: than that which is written of Abraham, that his faith was imputed to him for righteouſneſſe. Sith therefore it is ſaid that the act done by Phinees was imputed to him for righteouſneſſe: what Paul affirmeth of faith, the ſame may we alſo conclude of works. Wherupon our adverſaries, as though they had won the victory, determine that wee are indeed not iuſtified without faith, but that we are alſo not iuſtified by it alone, and that workes accompliſh our righteouſneſſe. Therefore here I beſeech the godly, that if they know that the true rule of righteouſneſſe is to be taken out of the Scripture onely, they will religiouſly and earneſtly weigh with me, how the Scripture may without cavillations bee rightly made to agree with it ſelfe. For aſmuch as Paul knew that the iuſtification of faith is the refuge for them that are deſtitute of their owne righteouſneſſe, he doth boldly conclude that all they that are juſtified by faith, are excluded from the righteouſneſſe of workes. But ſith it is certaine that the juſtification of faith is common to all the faithfull, he doth thereof with like boldneſſe conclude that no man is juſtified by workes, but rather contrariwiſe that men are juſtified without any helpe of workes. But it is one thing to diſpute of what value workes are by themſelves, and another thing what account is to be made of them after the ſtabliſhing of the righteouſneſſe of faith. If wee ſhould ſet a price upon workes according to their worthineſſe, we ſay that they are unworthy to come into the ſight of God: and therfore that man hath no workes whereof he may glory before God: then, that being ſpoiled of all helpe of workes, he is juſtified by onely faith. Now we define righteouſneſſe thus, that a ſinner being received into the communion of Chriſt, is by his grace reconciled to God, when being cleanſed with his bloud he obteyneth forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, and being clothed with his righteouſneſſe as with his owne, hee ſtandeth aſſured before the heavenly judgement ſeat. When the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes is ſet before, the good workes which follow have now another valuation then after their owne deſerving: becauſe whatſoever is in them unperfect, is covered with the perfection of Chriſt: whatſoever ſpots or filthineſſe there is, it is wiped away with his cleanneſſe, that it may not come into the examination of the judgement of God. Therefore when the guiltineſſe of all treſpaſſes is blotted out, whereby men are hindered that they can bring forth nothing acceptable to God, and when the fault of imperfection is buried, which is wont alſo to defile good workes: the good workes which the faithfull doe, are counted righteous, or (which is all one) are imputed for righteouſneſſe. In what ſenſe man is ſaid to be juſt by workes, and the act of Phineas to have beene imputed unto righteouſneſſe. Gen. 4. 4. Pſal. 106. 31.

9 Now if any man object this againſt me to aſſoyle the righteouſneſſe of faith, firſt

It commeth of the righteousnes which is by faith without works that the works of faithfull men are accounted righteous.
Job.4.18.

I will aske whether a man be counted righteous for one or two holy workes, being in the rest of the workes of his life a trespasser of the law. This is more than an absurdity. Then I will aske if he be counted righteous for many good workes, if he be in any part found guilty. This also he shall not bee so bold to affirme, when the penall ordinance of the law crieth out against it, and proclaimeth all them accursed which have not fulfilled all the commandements of the law to the uttermost. Moreover, I will goe further and aske, whether there be any worke that deserveth to bee accused of no uncleanneſſe or imperfection. And how could there bee any such before those eies, to whom even the very starres are not cleane enough, nor the Angels righteous enough? So shall he be compelled to grant that their is no good worke which is not so defiled with transgressions adjoyned with it, and with the corruptneſſe of it selfe, that it cannot have the honour of righteousneſſe. Now if it bee certaine that it proceedeth from the righteousneſſe of faith, that workes which are otherwise impure, uncleane, and but halfe workes, not worthy of the sight of God, much lesse of his love, are imputed to righteousneſſe, why doe they with boasting of the righteousneſſe of workes destroy the iustification of faith, whereas if this iustification were not, they should in vaine boast of that righteousneſſe? Will they make a vipers birth: For thereto tend the saying of the ungodly men. They cannot deny that the iustification of faith is the beginning, foundation, cause, matter, and substance of the righteousneſſe of workes: yet they conclude that man is not iustified by faith, because good workes also are accounted for righteousneſſe. Therefore let us passe these follies and confesse as the truth is, that if the righteousneſſe of workes of what sort soever it be accounted, hangeth upon the justification of faith, it is by this not onely nothing minished but also confirmed, namely, whereby the strength thereof appeareth more mighty. Neither yet let us thinke that workes are so commended after free justification, that they also afterward come into the place of justifiyng a man, or doe part the office betweene them and faith. For unleſſe the justification remaine alway whole, the uncleanneſſe of workes shall be uncovered. And it is no absurdity, that a man is so justified by faith, that not onely hee himselfe is righteous, but also his workes are esteemed righteous, above their worthineſſe.

Not onely we but our workes also justified by faith in Christ: and therefore the righteousneſſe of workes alsoing both under and after the righteousneſſe of faith.

10. After this manner wee will grant in workes not onely a righteousneſſe in part (as our adversaries themselves would have) but also that it is allowed of God, as if it were a perfect and full righteousneſſe. But if we remember upon what foundation it is upholden, all the difficulty shall be dissolved. For then and not till then it beginneth to be an acceptable worke, when it is received with pardon. Now whence commeth pardon, but because God beholdeth both us and all our things in Christ? Therefore as wee, when we are graffed into Christ, doe therefore appeare righteous before God, because our wickednesses are covered with his innocency, so our workes are and be taken for righteous, because whatsoever faultineſſe is otherwise in them, being buried in the cleanneſſe of Christ, it is not imputed. So wee may rightfully say, that by onely Faith, not onely we, but also our works are justified. Now if this righteousneſſe of works of what sort soever it be, hangeth upon Faith and free iustification, and is made of it: it ought to bee included under it, and to bee set under it as the effect under the cause thereof, as I may so call it: so farre is it off that it ought to be raised up either to destroy or darken it. So Paul to drive men to confesse that our blessednesse consisteth of the mercy of God, not of workes, chiefly enforceth that saying of David. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is he to whom the Lord hath not imputed sinne. If any man doe thrust into the contrary innumerable sayings wherein blessednesse seemeth to bee given to workes, as are these: Blessed is the man which feareth the Lord, which hath pity on the poore, which hath not walked in the counsell of the wicked, which beareth temptation: Blessed are they which keepe judgement, the undefiled, the poore in Spirit, the meeke, the mercifull, &c. They shall not make but that it shall be true which Paul saith: For because those things that are there commended are never so in man, that he is therefore allowed of God, it followeth that man is alway miserable, unleſſe he be delivered from misery by forgiveneſſe of sinnes. For asmuch as therefore all the kindes of blessednesse which are extolled extolled in the Scriptures, doe fall downe void, ſo that man receiveth fruit of none of them, till he have obtained bleſſedneſſe by forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, which may afterward make place for them: it followeth that this is not only the higheſt and the chiefe, but alſo the onely bleſſedneſſe: unleſſe peradventure you will have that it be weakened of thoſe which conſiſt in it alone. Now there is much leſſe reaſon why the calling of men righteous ſhould trouble us, which is commonly given to the faithfull. I grant verily that they are called righteous of the holineſſe of life: but foraſmuch as they rather endevour to the following of righteouſneſſe, than doe fulfill righteouſneſſe it ſelfe, it is meete that this righteouſneſſe ſuch as it is, give place to the juſtification of Faith, from whence it hath that which it is.

S. Iames maketh nothing againſt juſtification by faith alone without workes. For he ſpeaketh not of ſuch a faith as is meant by S. Paul in delivering this doctrine.

11 But they ſay that wee have yet more buſineſſe with Iames, namely which with open voice fighteth againſt us. For hee teacheth both that Abraham was juſtified by workes, and alſo that all wee are juſtified by workes, not by faith onely, what then? will they draw Paul to fight with Iames? If they hold Iames for a miniſter of Chriſt, his ſaying muſt bee ſo taken that it diſagree not from Chriſt ſpeaking by the mouth of Paul: The holy Ghoſt affirmeth by the mouth of Paul, that Abraham obtained righteouſneſſe by Faith not by workes: and wee alſo doe teach that all are juſtified by Faith without the workes of the law. The ſame holy Ghoſt teacheth by Iames that both Abrahams righteouſneſſe and ours conſiſteth of workes, not of onely Faith. It is certaine that the holy Ghoſt fighteth not with himſelfe. What agreement ſhall there be therefore of theſe two? It is enough for the adverſaries, if they plucke the righteouſneſſe of Faith which we would have to be faſtened with moſt deepe rootes: but to render to conſciences their quietneſſe, they have no great care. Whereby verily you may ſee that they gnaw the juſtification of faith, but in the meane time do appoint no marke of righteouſneſſe where conſciences may ſtay. Therefore let them triumph as they liſt, ſo that they may boaſt of no other victory than that they have taken away all certainty of righteouſneſſe. And this wretched victory they ſhall obtaine, where the light of truth being quenched, the Lord ſhall ſuffer them to overſpread the darkeneſſe of lies. But whereſoever the truth of God ſhall ſtand, they ſhall nothing prevaile. I deny therefore that the ſaying of Iames which they ſtill continually hold up againſt us as it were the ſhield of Achilles, doth any thing at all make for them. That this may bee made plaine, firſt wee muſt looke at the marke that the Apoſtle ſhooteth at: and then wee muſt note where they be deceived. Becauſe there were then many (which miſchiefe is wont to be continuall in the Church) which openly bewrayed their infidelity, in neglecting and omitting all the proper workes of the faithfull, and yet ceaſed not to boaſt of the falſe name of faith: Iames doth here mocke the fooliſh boldneſſe of ſuch men. Therefore it is not his purpoſe in any point to diminiſh the force of true faith, but to ſhew how fondly thoſe triflers did challenge ſo much the vaine image of it, that being contented herewith, they careleſly ranne diſſolutely abroad into all licentiouſneſſe of vices. This ground being conceived, it ſhall bee eaſie to perceive where our adverſaries doe miſſe. For they fall into two deceits in the word, the one in the name of faith, the other in the word of juſtifying. Whereas the Apoſtle nameth faith a vaine opinion far diſtant from the truth of faith, it is ſpoken by way of granting, which is no derogation to the matter: which he ſheweth at the beginning in theſe words. What profiteth it, my brethren, if any man ſay that he hath faith, and hath no workes? Hee doth not ſay, if any have faith without workes, but if any man boaſt. More plainely as alſo he ſpeaketh a litte after, where he in mockery maketh it worſe than the devils knowledge: laſt of all, when he calleth it dead. But by the definition you may ſufficiently perceive what hee meaneth. Thou beleeveſt (ſaith he) that there is a God. Truely if nothing be contained in this faith but to beleeve that there is a God, it is now no marvell if it doe not juſtifie. And when this is taken from it, let us not thinke that any thing is abated from the chriſtian faith, the nature whereof is far otherwiſe. For after what manner doth true faith juſtifie us, but when it conjoyneth us with Chriſt, that being made one with him we may enjoy the partaking of his righteouſneſſe? It doth not therefore juſtifie us by this, that it conceiveth a knowledge of the being of God, but by this, that it reſteth upon the aſſurednes of the mercy of God.

Neither doth S. Iames use the word Iustification, as S Paul doth, but in a meaning far different: S. Paul meaning thereby the imputation of righteousnesse and S. Iames the declaration of that righteousnes by works, which without workes was imputed.

12. We have not yet the worke, unlesse wee examine also the other deceit in the word, forasmuch as James setteth part of justification in works. If you will make James agreeing both with the rest of the Scriptures, and with himselfe, you must of necessitie take the word of justifying in another signification than it is taken in Paul. For Paul saith that we are justified, when the remembrance of our unrighteousnesse being blotted out, we are accounted righteous. If James had meant of that taking, he had wrongfully alleaged that out of Moses: Abraham beleeved God, &c. For hee thus framed it together. Abraham by workes obteined righteousnesse, because hee sticked not at the commandement of God to offer up his sonne. And so the scripture was fulfilled, which saith, that he beleeved God, and it was imputed to him for righteousnesse. If it be an absurditie, that the effect is before his cause, either Moses doth in that place falsely testifie, that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousnesse: or he deserved not righteousnesse by that obedience which he shewed in offering up of Isaac. Abraham was justified by his faith, When Ismael was not yet conceived, which was now growne past childhood before that Isaac was borne. How therefore shall we say, that he got to himselfe righteousnesse by obedience which followed long afterward? Wherefore either James did wrongfully misturne the order (which it is a wickednesse to thinke) or he meant not to say that he was justified, as though he deserved to bee accounted righteous. How then? Truly it appeareth that hee speaketh of the declaration of righteousnesse and not the imputation: as if he had said: Who so are righteous by true faith they doe prove their righteousnesse with obedience and good workes, not with a bare and image-like visor of faith. In summe, he disputeth not by what meane wee are justified, but he requireth of the faithfull a working righteousnesse. And as Paul affirmeth that men be justified without the helpe of works: so James doth here suffer them to be accounted righteous which want good workes. The considering of this end, shall deliver us out of all doubt. For our adversaries are hereby chiefly deceived, that they think that James defineth the maner of justifying, whereas he travelleth about nothing but to overthrow their perverse carelesnesse, which did vainely pretend faith to excuse their despising of good works. Therefore into how many waies soever they wrest the words of James, they shall wring out nothing but two sentences: that a vaine bodilesse shew of faith doth not justifie, and that a faithfull man not contented with such an imaginative shew, doth declare his righteousnesse by good workes.

That the doers of the law are justified and not the bare hearers helpeth nothing to the overthrow of justification by faith alone. Rom. 2. 13.

13. As for that which they alleage out of Paul, the same meaning, that the doers of the law, not the hearers, are justified, it nothing helpeth them. I will not escape away with the solution of Ambrose, that, that is therefore spoken because the fulfilling of the law is faith in Christ. For I see that it is but a meere starting hole, which nothing needeth where there is a broad way open. There the Apostle throweth downe the Jewes from foolish confidence, which boasted themselves of the onely knowledge of the law, when in the meane time they were the greatest despisers of it. Therefore that they should not stand so much in their owne conceit for the bare knowledge of the law, he warneth them, that if righteousnes be sought out of the law, not the knowledge but the observing of it is required. We verily make no doubt of this that the righteousnes of the law standeth in works: nor yet of this also, that the righteousnesse consisteth in the worthinesse and merits of workes. But it is not yet proved, that we are justified by workes, unlesse they bring forth some man that hath fulfilled the law. And that Paul meant none otherwise, the hanging together of the text shall bee a sufficient testimonie. After that he had generally condemned the Gentiles and the Jewes of unrighteousnes, then he descended to the particular shewing of it, and saith, that they which sinned without the Law, doe perish without the law: which is spoken of the Gentiles, but they which have sinned in the law, are iudged by the law: which pertaineth to the Jewes. Now because they winking at their owne trespassings proudly gloried of the onely law: hee adjoyneth that which most fitly agreed, that the law was not therefore made, that men should bee made righteous by only hearing of the voice thereof: but then and not till then when they obeyed, as if he should say: Seekest thou righteousnesse in the law: alleage not the hearing of it, which of it selfe is of small importance, but bring works, by which thou maist declare that the law was not set for thee in vaine.

vaine. Of theſe workes becauſe they were all deſtitute, it followed that they were ſpoiled of the glorying of the law. Therefore we muſt of the meaning of Paul rather frame a contrary argument. The righteouſneſſe of the law conſiſteth in the perfection of workes. No man can boaſt that he hath by works ſatisfied the law. Therefore there is no righteouſneſſe by the law.

The proteſtations which faithfull men do make of their innocency in the ſight of God are no arguments that they ſuppoſed themſelves thereby juſtified before him.

14. Now they alleadge alſo theſe places, wherein the faithfull do boldly offer their righteouſneſſe to the judgement of God to be examined, and require that ſentence be given of them according to it. Of which ſort are theſe: Iudge me O Lord according to my righteouſneſſe, and according to my innocency, which are in me. Againe, heare my righteouſneſſe, O God: Thou haſt proved my heart, and haſt viſited it in the night, and there was no wickedneſſe found in me. Againe, the Lord ſhall render to me according to my righteouſneſſe, and hee ſhall recompence me according to the cleanneſſe of my hands. Becauſe I have kept the waies of the Lord, and have not wickedly departed from my God. And I ſhall bee unſpotted, and ſhall keepe mee from my iniquity. Againe, Iudge me, Lord, becauſe I have walked in mine innocency. I have not ſit with lying men: I will not enter in with them that doe wicked things. Deſtroy not my ſoule with the ungodly, my life with men of bloud in whoſe hands are iniquities: whoſe right hand is filled with gifts. But I have walked innocently. I have above ſpoken of the affiance which the holy ones doe ſeeme ſimply to take to themſelves of works. As for theſe teſtimonies that wee have here alleaged, they ſhall not much accomber us if they bee underſtood according to their compaſſe, or (as they commonly call it) their circumſtance. Now the ſame is double. For neither would they have them to be wholly examined that they ſhould bee either condemned or acquitted according to the continuall courſe of their whole life: But they bring into judgement a ſpeciall cauſe to be debated. Neither doe they claime to themſelves righteouſneſſe in reſpect of the perfection of God, but by compariſon of naughty and wicked men. Firſt when the juſtifying of man is intreated of, it is not onely required that hee have a good cauſe in ſome particular matter, but a certaine perpetuall agreement of righteouſneſſe in his whole life. But the holy ones, when they call upon the judgement of God to approve their innocency, doe not offer themſelves free from all guiltineſſe and in every behalfe faultleſſe: but verily when they have faſtened their affiance of ſalvation in his goodneſſe onely, yet truſting hee is the revenger of the poore afflicted againſt right and equity, they commend to him the cauſe wherein the innocent are oppreſſed. But when they ſet their adverſaries with them before the judgement ſeat of God, they boaſt not of ſuch an innocency as ſhall anſwer to the pureneſſe of God if it be ſeverely ſearched, but becauſe in compariſon of the malice, obſtinacy, ſubtlety, and wickedneſſe of their adverſaries, they know that their plaineneſſe, righteouſneſſe, ſimplicity, and cleanneſſe is knowne and pleaſing to God: they feare not to call upon him to bee judge betweene themſelves and them. So when David ſaid to Saul: The Lord render to every man according to his righteouſneſſe and truth: he meant not that the Lord ſhould examine by himſelfe and reward every man according to his deſervings, but he tooke the Lord to witneſſe, how great his innocency was in compariſon of the wickedneſſe of Saul. And Paul himſelfe, when he boaſteth with his glorying that he hath a good witneſſe of conſcience, that hee hath travelled with ſimplicity and uprightneſſe in the Church of God, meaneth not that he ſtandeth upon ſuch glorying before God, but being compelled with the ſlanders of the wicked, he defendeth his faithfull and honeſt dealing, which he knew to be pleaſing to the mercifull kindneſſe of God, againſt all evill ſpeaking of men whatſoever it be. For we ſee what he ſaith in another place, that he knoweth no evill by himſelfe, but that he is not thereby juſtified, namely, becauſe he knew that the judgement of God farre ſurmounteth the bleare-eyed ſight of men. Howſoever therefore the Godly doe defend their innocency againſt the hypocriſie of the ungodly, by the witneſſing and judgement of God: yet when they have to doe with God alone, they all cry out with one mouth: If thou marke iniquity, Lord, Lord, who ſhall abide it? Enter not into judgement with thy ſervants: becauſe every one that liveth ſhall not be juſtified in thy ſight: and diſtruſting their owne workes, they gladly ſing, Thy goodneſſe is better than life.

15 There

15 There are also other places not unlike to these before, in which a man may yet tarry. Salomon saith, that hee which walketh upin his uprightnesse, is righteous. Againe, That in the path of righteousnesse is life. and that in the same is not death. After which manner Ezechiel reporteth that hee shall live that doth judgement and righteousnesse. None of these doe we either deny or darken. But let there come forth one of the sonnes of Adam with such an uprightnesse. If there be none, either they must perish at the sight of God, or flee to the sanctuary of mercy. Neither doe wee in the meane time deny but that to the faithfull their uprightnesse, though it be but halfe and unperfect, is a step toward immortality. But whence commeth that but because whom the Lord hath taken into the covenant of grace, he searcheth not their workes according to their deservings, but kisseth them with fatherly kindenesse? Whereby wee doe not onely understand that which the schoolemen doe teach, that workes have their value of the accepting grace. For they meane that workes which are otherwise insufficient to purchase righteousnesse by the covenant of the law, are by the accepting of God advanced to the value of equality. But I say that they being defiled both with other trespassings and with their owne spots, are of no other valew at all, than insomuch as the Lord tenderly granteth pardon to both: that is to say, giveth free righteousnesse to man. Neither are here those praiers of the Apostle seasonably thrust in place, where he wisheth so great perfection to the faithfull, that they may be faultlesse and unblameable in the day of the Lord: These words indeed the Celestines did in old time turmoile, to affirme a perfection of righteousnesse in this life. But which wee thinke to be sufficient, we answer briefly after Augustine, that all the godly ought indeed to endevour toward this marke, that they may one day appeare spotlesse and faultlesse before the face of God: but because the best and most excellent manner of this life is nothing but a going forward, we shall then and not till then attaine to this marke, when being unclothed of this flesh of sinne, we shall fully cleave to the Lord. Yet will I not stiffely strive with him which will give the title of perfection to the holy ones, so that hee also limit the same with the words of Augustine himselfe. When (saith he) we will call the vertue of the holy ones, perfect: to the same perfection also belongeth the acknowledging of imperfection both in truth & humility.

Mans righteousnesse neither is life worthily promised if we unde standing it given thereunto not for merit but of mercy: neither is perfection justly attributed unto saints if a part thereof be the feruent acknowledging of their imperfection.

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

That of the reward, the righteousnesse of works is ill gathered.

NOw let us passe over those sayings which affirme, that God will render to every man according to his works: of which sort are these. Every man shall beare away that which hee hath done in the body, either good or evill. Glory and honour to him that worketh good: trouble and distresse upon every soule of him that worketh evill. And they which have done good things, shall goe into the resurrection of life: they which have done evill, into the resurrection of judgement. Come ye blessed of my father: I have hungred and ye gave me meat: I have thirsted, and ye gave me drinke, &c. And with them let us also joyne these sayings, which call eternall life the reward of works. Of which sort are these. The rendring of the hands of a man shall be restored to him. Hee that feareth the commandement shall bee rewarded. Be glad and rejoyce behold your reward is plentifull in heaven. Every man shall receive reward according to his labour. Where it is said that God shall render to every man according to his works, the same is easily assoyled. For that manner of speaking doth rather shew the order of following, than the cause. But it is out of doubt, that the Lord doth accomplish our salvation by these degrees of his mercy, when those whom he hath chosen he calleth to him: those whom he hath called hee justifieth: those whom hee hath justified, he glorifieth. Although therefore he doe by his onely mercy receive them that be his into life, yet because hee bringeth them into the possession thereof by the race of good workes, that he may fulfill his worke in them by such order as hee hath appointed: it is no marvell if it be said that they be crowned according to their works, by which without doubt they are prepared to receive the crowne of immortality. Yea, and after this manner manner it is fitly ſaid that they worke their owne ſalvation, when in applying themſelves to good workes, they practiſe themſelves toward eternall life: namely as in another place they are commanded to worke the meat which periſheth not, when by beleeving in Chriſt they get to themſelves life: and yet it is by and by afterward added: Which the ſonne of man ſhall give you. Whereby appeareth that the word of Working is not ſet as contrary to grace, but it is referred to endevour: and therefore it followeth not, that either the faithfull are themſelves authours of their owne ſalvation or that the ſame proceedeth from their works. How then? So ſoone as they are taken into the fellowſhip of Chriſt, by knowledge of the Goſpell, and the enlightening of the holy Ghoſt, eternall life is begun in them. Now the ſame good worke which God hath begun in them, muſt alſo bee made perfect untill the day of the Lord Jeſu. And it is made perfect, when reſembling the heavenly father in righteouſneſſe and holineſſe, they prove themſelves to be his children not ſwarved out of kinde.

John 6.27.

2. There is no cauſe why wee ſhould of the name of reward gather an argument that our workes are the cauſe of ſalvation, Firſt let this bee determined in our hearts, that the kingdome of heaven is not a reward of ſervants, but an inheritance of children, which they onely ſhall enjoy, that are adopted of the Lord to bee his children: and for no other cauſe, but for this adoption. For, the ſonne of the bond-woman ſhall not bee heire, but the ſonne of the free-woman. And in the very ſame places, in which the holy Ghoſt promiſeth to workes eternall glorie for reward, in expreſſing the inheritance by name, hee ſheweth that it commeth from elſewhere. So Chriſt rehearſeth works, which he recompenſeth with the rewarding of heaven, when he calleth the elect to the poſſeſſion thereof: but he therewithall adjoyneth that it muſt bee poſſeſſed by right of inheritance. So Paul biddeth ſervants, which doe their dutie faithfully, to hope for reward of the Lord: but he addeth of inheritance. We ſee how they doe as it were by expreſſe words provide that we impute not eternall bleſſednеſſe to workes, but to the adoption of God. Why therefore doe they therewithall together make mention of works? This queſtion ſhall be made plaine with one example of Scripture. Before the birth of Iſaac, there was promiſed to Abraham a ſeed in which all the nations of the earth ſhould be bleſſed: and a multiplying of his ſeed, which ſhould match the ſtarres of the skie, and the ſands of the ſea, and other like. In many yeeres afterward, Abraham, as he was commanded by the oracle, prepared himſelfe to offer up his ſonne in ſacrifice. When hee had performed this obedience, hee received a promiſe. I have ſworne by my ſelfe (ſaith the Lord) becauſe thou haſt done this thing, and haſt not ſpared thine owne onely begotten ſonne, I will bleſſe thee, and multiply thy ſeed as the ſtarres of the skie, and the ſands of the ſea: thy ſeed ſhall poſſeſſe the gates of their enemies, and all the nations of the earth ſhall be bleſſed in thy ſeed, becauſe thou haſt obeyed my voyce. What heare wee? Hath Abraham by his obedience deſerved the bleſſing, the promiſe whereof hee had received before that the commandement was given? Heere verily wee have it without circumſtances ſhewed, that the Lord rewardeth the workes of the faithfull with thoſe benefits which he had alreadie given them before that the works were thought of, having yet no cauſe why he ſhould doe good to them but his owne mercie.

The rewarding of works with ſalvation doth not argue theſe works to be the cauſe of that ſalvation wherewith they are rewarded, more than Abrahams obedience in offering his ſon a cauſe of that bleſſing whereof he had the promiſe before he obeyed.

3. Yet doth the Lord not deceive nor mocke us when he ſaith, that hee rendreth for reward to works the ſame thing which he had before works freely given. For, becauſe he will have us to be exerciſed with good works, to thinke upon the delivery or enjoying (as I may ſo call it) of theſe things which hee hath promiſed, and to runne through them to the bleſſed hope ſet before us in heaven, the fruit of the promiſes is alſo rightly aſſigned to them, to the ripeneſſe whereof they doe not bring us. The Apoſtle very fitly expreſſed both theſe points, when hee ſaid that the Coloſſians apply themſelves to the duties of charity, for the hope which is laid up for them in heaven, of which they had before heard by the word of the true ſpeaking Goſpell. For when hee ſaith that they knew by the Goſpell, that there was hope laid up for them in heaven, hee declareth that the ſame is by Chriſt onely, not underpropped with any workes. Wherewith accordeth that ſaying of Peter, that the godly are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto the ſalvation which is readie to bee manifeſtly ſhewed at at the time appointed for it. When he ſilth that they labour for it, he ſignifieth that the faithfull muſt run all the time of their life, that they may attaine to it. But leſt we ſhould thinke that the reward which the Lord promiſeth us, is reduced to the meaſure of merit, hee did put forth a parable, in which hee made himſelfe a houſholder, which ſent all them that he met, to the trimming of his Vineyard, ſome at the firſt houre of the day, ſome at the ſecond, ſome at the third, yea and ſome at the 11. At evening hee paid to every one equall wages. The expoſition of which parable, that ſame old writer whatſoever he was, whoſe booke is carried abroad under the name of Ambroſe of the calling of the Gentiles, hath briefly and truly ſet out. I will uſe rather his words than mine owne. The Lord (ſaith he) by the rule of this compariſon hath ſtabliſhed the diverſitie of manifold calling, belonging to one grace: where without doubt they which being let into the vineyard at the 11. houre, are made equal with them that had wrought the whole day, doe repreſent the eſtate of them, whom for the advancing of the excellencie of grace, the tender kindneſſe of the Lord hath rewarded at the waining of the day, and at the ending of their life: not paying wages for their labour, but pouring out the riches of his goodneſſe upon them whom hee hath choſen without workes, that even they alſo which have ſwet in great labour, and have received no more than the laſt, may underſtand that they have received a gift of grace not a reward of workes. Laſt of all, this alſo is worthie to bee noted in theſe places, where eternall life is called the reward of workes, that is not ſimply taken for the communicating which wee have with God to bleſſed immortalitie, when hee embraceth with fatherly good will in Chriſt: but for the poſſeſſing or enjoying (as they call it of bleſſedneſſe, as alſo the verie words of Chriſt doe ſound, In time to come life everlaſting. And in another place, Come and poſſeſſe the kingdome, &c. After this manner Paul calleth adoption, the revealing of the adoption which ſhall bee made in the reſurrection: and afterward expoundeth it the redemption of our bodie. Otherwiſe as eſtranging from God is eternall death, ſo when man is received of God into favour, that hee may enjoy the communicating of him and be made one with him, he is received from death to life: which is done by the beneficiall meane of adoption onely. And if, as they are wont, they ſtifly enforce the reward of workes, wee may turne againſt them that ſaying of Peter that eternall life is the reward of faith.

4. Therefore let us not thinke, that the holy Ghoſt doth with ſuch promiſe ſet forth the worthineſſe of our works, as if they deſerved ſuch reward. For the Scripture leaveth nothing to us, whereof wee may be advanced in the ſight of God. But rather it wholly endevoureth to beate downe our arrogancie, to humble us, to throw us downe, and altogether to breake us in peeces. But our weakeneſſe is ſo ſuccoured, which otherwiſe would by and by ſlip and fall downe, unleſſe it did ſuſtaine it ſelfe with this expectation, and mitigate her tedious griefes with comfort. Firſt how hard it is for a man to forſake and denie not onely all his things, but alſo himſelfe, let every man conſider for himſelfe. And yet with this introduction Chriſt traineth his ſchollers, that is, all the godly. Then throughout all their life he ſo inſtructeth them under the diſcipline of the croſſe, that they may not ſet their heart either to the deſire or confidence of preſent good things. Briefely hee ſo handleth them for the moſt part that which way ſoever they turne their eies throughout the whole wideneſſe of the world, they have on every ſide nothing but deſperation preſent before them: ſo that Paul ſaith, that we are more miſerable than all men if our hope bee onely in this world. That they ſhould not faint in theſe ſo great diſtreſſes, the Lord is preſent with them, which putteth them in mind to lift up their head higher, to caſt their eies further, that they finde with him the bleſſedneſſe which they ſee not in the world. This bleſſedneſſe he calleth, reward, wages, recompence, not weighing the merit of workes, but ſignifying that it is a recompenſing to their troubles, ſufferings, ſlanders, &c. Wherefore nothing withſtandeth, but that wee may after the example of the Scripture, call eternall life a rewarding, becauſe in it the Lord receiveth his from labours into reſt, from affliction into proſperous and happie ſtate, from ſorrow into gladneſſe, from povertie into flowing wealth, from ſhame into glorie, and changeth all the evils which they have ſuffered for greater good things. So it ſhall alſo bee no inconvenience, if wee thinke

Rewards are ſet before us, not to the end we ſhould glorie in our works, but leſt we ſhould faint in the midſt of our trials.

1 Cor. 15. 19.

holineſſe of life to be a way, not which openeth an entry into the glory of the heavenly kingdome, but whereby the elect are led of their God into the diſcloſing of it: for as much as this is his good will to glorifie them whom he hath ſanctified. Onely let us not imagine a correlation of merit and reward, wherein the Sophiſters do fondly ſticke faſt, becauſe they conſider not this end which wee ſet forth. But how unorderly is it, when the Lord calleth us to one end, for us to looke to another? Nothing is more evident, than that reward is promiſed to good workes, to releeve the weakeneſſe of our fleſh with ſome comfort, not to puffe up our mindes with glorie. Whoſoever therefore doth thereby gather the merit of works, or doth in one balance weigh worke with reward, he erreth farre from the right marke of God. Rom. 8. 30.

5. Wherefore when the Scripture ſaith that God the juſt Judge will one day render to his a crowne of righteouſneſſe, I doe not onely take exception with Auguſtine, and ſay: To whom ſhould he being a juſt judge, render a crowne, if hee had not being a mercifull father given grace? and how ſhould there bee righteouſneſſe, unleſſe grace went before which juſtifieth the unrighteous? How ſhould theſe due things bee rendered, unleſſe theſe undue things were firſt given? But alſo I adde another thing. How ſhould he impute righteouſneſſe to our workes, unleſſe his tender mercifulneſſe, did hide the unrighteouſneſſe that is in them? How ſhould he judge them worthie of reward, unleſſe he did by immeaſurable bountifulneſſe take away that which is worthie of puniſhment? For hee is wont to call eternall life, grace: becauſe it is rendered to the free gifts of God when it is repaied to works. But the Scripture doth further humble us, and therewithall raiſe us up. For beſides this that it forbiddeth us to glorie in works, becauſe they are the free gifts of God, it therewithall teacheth that they are alwaies defiled with ſome dregs, that they cannot ſatisfie God, if they bee examined by the rule of his judgement: but leaſt our courage ſhould faint, it teacheth that they pleaſe by onely pardon. But although Auguſtine ſpeaketh ſomewhat otherwiſe than we doe: yet that he doth not ſo diſagree in the matter, ſhall appeare by his words in his third booke to Boniface. Where when he had compared two men together, the one of a life even miraculouſly holie and perfect, the other honeſt in deed and of uncorrupt manners, but not ſo perfect but that much wanteth in him: at the laſt hee concludeth thus. Even this man which in manners ſeemeth much inferiour, by reaſon of the true faith in God whereof hee liveth and according to which hee accuſeth himſelfe in all his offences, in all his good works praiſeth God, giving to himſelfe the ſhame, and to him glorie, and taking from himſelfe both the pardon of ſinne, and the love of weldoings, when he is to bee delivered out of this life, hee paſſeth into the fellowſhip of Chriſt. Wherefore, but becauſe of faith? Which although it ſave no man without works, (for it is it, which worketh by love, not a reprobate faith) yet by it alſo ſinnes are releaſed, becauſe the righteous man liveth of faith: but without it even the ſame which ſeeme good works are turned into ſinnes. Heere verily he doth plainely confeſſe that which we ſo much travell to prove, that the righteouſneſſe of good works hangeth hereupon that they are by pardon allowe d of God.

God as a juſt judge ſhall render a crowne to our righteouſnes but not unleſſe he doe firſt grant unto our unrighteouſneſſe a gracious pardon.

Heb. 2. 4.

6. A very neere ſenſe to the places above recited, have theſe: Make to your ſelves friends of the Mammon of wickedneſſe, that when you ſhall faile, they may receive you into everlaſting tabernacles. Command the rich men of this world not to bee proudly minded, nor to truſt in uncertaine riches but in the living God, to doe well, to become rich in good works, to lay up in ſtore for themſelves a good foundation againſt the time to come, that they may obtaine eternall life. For good workes are compared to the riches, which wee may enjoy in the bleſſednes of eternall life. I anſwer, that we ſhall never come to the true underſtanding of them, unleſſe we turne our eies to the marke whereunto the holy Ghoſt directeth his words. If it bee true which Chriſt ſaith that our mind abideth there where our treaſure is, as the children of the world are wont to bee earneſtly bent to the getting of thoſe things which ſerve for the delights of this preſent life: ſo the faithfull muſt looke ſith they have learned that this life ſhall by and by vaniſh away like a dreame, that they ſend thoſe things which they would enjoy thither where they ſhall have perfect life. We muſt therefore do as they do which purpoſe to remove into any place, where they have choſen to reſt their whole life.

By ſerving God we doe eternally enrich our ſelves not that our ſervice is worthy as much as once to be regarded, but that his mercie ſuffereth not his ſervants to looſe their labors
Luk. 16. 9.
1 Tim. 6. 17.

They ſend their goods before, and doe not miſcontentedly want them for a time: becauſe they thinke themſelves ſo much more happie, how much more goods they have, where they ſhall tarrie long. If we beleeve that heaven is our countrey, it behooveth us rather to ſend away our riches thither, than to keepe them heere where wee muſt loſe them with ſudden removing. But how ſhall we ſend them thither? If we communicate to the neceſſities of the poore: to whom whatſoever is given, the Lord accounteth it given to himſelfe. Whereupon commeth that notable promiſe, He that giveth to the poore, lendeth for gaine to the Lord. Againe, he that liberally ſoweth, ſhall liberally reape. For thoſe things are delivered into the hand of the Lord to keepe, which are beſtowed upon our brethren by the dutie of charitie. He, as he is a faithfull keeper of that which is delivered to him, will one day reſtore it with plentiful gaine. Are then our dutifull doings of ſo great value with God, that they be as riches laid up in ſtore for us in his hand? Who ſhall feare ſo to ſay, when the Scripture doth ſo oft and plainely witneſſe it? But if any man will leape from the meere goodneſſe of God to the worthineſſe of works, he ſhalbe nothing holpen by theſe teſtimonies to the ſtabliſhing of his errour. For you can gather nothing rightly thereof but the meere inclination of Gods tenderneſſe toward us: For as much as to encourage us to well doing although the ſervices which we doe to him are not worthie of ſo much as his only looking upon them, yet he ſuffereth none of them to be loſt.

Matth. 5.40. Prov. 19.17. 2 Cor. 9.6.

This doctrine not ſhaken by the Apoſtle, either when he teacheth that afflictions are ſent that they which are afflicted may be accounted worthy of a kingdome, nor when he denieth that God is ſo unrighteous to forget the good we doe for his ſake.

7. But they more enforce the words of the Apoſtle, which when hee comforteth the Theſſalonians in troubles, teacheth that the ſame are ſent to them, that they may be accounted worthie of the kingdome of God, for which they ſuffer. For (ſaith hee) it is righteous with God, to render trouble to them that trouble you: but to you, reſt with us when the Lord Jeſus ſhall bee ſhewed from heaven. But the authour of the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes ſaith, God is not unrighteous, that hee ſhould forget your worke, and the love which you have ſhewed in his name, for that you have miniſtred to the Saints. To the firſt place I anſwer, that there is no worthineſſe of merits ſpoken of: but becauſe God the Father willeth that we whom he hath choſen to bee his children, ſhould be made like to Chriſt his firſt begotten ſonne: as it behooved that hee ſhould firſt ſuffer, and then enter into the glorie appointed for him: ſo muſt wee alſo by many tribulations enter into the kingdome of heaven. Therefore when wee ſuffer tribulations for the name of Chriſt, there are as it were certaine markes printed upon us, wherewith God uſeth to marke the ſheepe of his flocke. After this manner therefore wee are accounted worthie of the kingdome of God, becauſe wee beare in our body the markes of our Lord and maſter which are the ſignes of the children of God. To this purpoſe make theſe ſayings: That we beare about in our body the mortification of Jeſus Chriſt that his life may be ſhewed in us: That wee bee faſhioned like to his ſufferings, that wee may come to the likeneſſe of his reſurrection from the dead. The reaſon which is adjoyned ſerveth not to proove any worthineſſe, but to confirme the hope of the kingdome of God: as if hee had ſaid, As it agreeth with the juſt judgement of God to take vengeance of your enemies for the vexations that they have done o you: ſo agreeth it alſo to give to you releaſe and reſt from vexations. The other place, which teacheth that it ſo becommeth the righteouſneſſe of God not to forget the obedience of them that be his, that it declareth it to be in a manner unrighteous if he ſhould forget them, hath this meaning: God to quicken our ſlothfulneſſe, hath given us aſſurance that the labour ſhall not be in vaine which we ſhall take for his glory. Let us alway remember that this promiſe, as all other ſhould bring us no profit, unleſſe the free covenant of mercy went before, whereupon the whole aſſuredneſſe of our ſalvation ſhould reſt. But ſtanding upon that covenant, wee ought aſſuredly to truſt, there ſhall alſo not want reward of the liberalitie of God to our works howſoever they bee unworthie. The Apoſtle to confirme us in that expectation, affirmeth that God is not unrighteous, but will ſtand to his promiſe once made. Therefore this righteouſneſſe is rather referred to the truth of Gods promiſe, than to his juſtice of rendring due. According to which meaning there is a notable ſaying of Auguſtine, which as the holy man ſticketh not to rehearſe often as notable, ſo I thinke it not unworthie that wee ſhould continually remember it. The Lord (ſaith hee) is faithfull, which hath made himſelfe debtor to us, not by receiving any thing of us, but by promiſing all things to us.

8. There are alſo alleaged theſe ſayings of Paul, If I have all faith, ſo that I remove mountaines out of their place, but have not charity, I am nothing. Againe, Now there remaine hope, faith, and charitie, but the greateſt among theſe is charitie. Againe, Above all things have charitie, which is the bond of perfection. By the firſt two places our Phariſees affirme that wee are rather juſtified by charity than by faith, namely by the cheifer vertue as they ſay. But this fond argument is eaſily wiped away. For wee have in another place alreadie declared, that thoſe things which are ſpoken in the firſt place pertaine nothing to true faith. The other place wee alſo expound of true faith, than which he ſaith that charitie is greater: not that it is more meritorious, but becauſe it is more fruitful, becauſe it extendeth further, becauſe it ſerveth moe, becauſe it remaineth alway in force, whereas the uſe of faith continueth but for a time. If we have regard to excellencie, the love of God ſhould worthily have the chiefe place, of which Paul here ſpeaketh not. For hee enforceth this thing onely that we ſhould with mutuall charitie edifie one another in the Lord, but let us imagine that charitie doth every where excell faith: yet what man of ſound judgement, yea, or of ſound braine, will gather hereof that it doth more juſtifie? The power of juſtifying which faith hath, conſiſteth not in the worthineſſe of the worke. Our juſtification ſtandeth upon the onely mercy of God and the deſerving of Chriſt, which juſtification when faith taketh hold of it, is ſaid to juſtifie. Now if you aske your adverſaries in what ſenſe they aſſigne juſtification to charitie, they will anſwer that becauſe it is a dutifull doing acceptable to God, therefore by the deſerving thereof righteouſneſſe is imputed to us by the acceptation of the goodneſſe of God. Here you ſee how well the argument proceedeth. We ſay that faith juſtifieth, not becauſe by the worthineſſe of it ſelfe it deſerveth righteouſneſſe to us, but becauſe it is an inſtrument by which we freely obtaine the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt. Theſe men, omitting the mercy of God, and paſſing over Chriſt (where the ſum of righteouſneſſe ſtandeth) do affirme that we are juſtified by the benefit of charitie becauſe it excelleth above faith: even as if a man ſhould reaſon that a king is fitter to make a ſhooe than is a ſhoomaker, becauſe he is an infinit way more excellent. This onely argument is a plaine example that all the Sorbonicall ſchooles doe not ſo much as taſte with the uttermoſt part of their lips what the juſtification of faith is. But if any wrangler do yet carp and aske, why in ſo ſmall diſtance of place wee take the name of faith in Paul ſo diverſely: I have a weighty cauſe of this expoſition. For ſith thoſe gifts which Paul rehearſeth are after a certaine manner under faith and hope, becauſe they pertaine to the knowledge of God, he comprehendeth them all by way of recapitulation under the name of faith and hope: as if hee ſhould ſay, both prophecie, and tongues, and the grace and knowledge of interpretation tend to this marke to leade us to the knowledge of God. And wee know God in this life none otherwiſe but by hope and faith. Therfore when I name faith & hope, I comprehend all theſe things together. And ſo there remaine theſe three, Hope, Faith, Charitie: that is to ſay, how great diverſitie of gifts ſoever there be, they are all referred to theſe. Among theſe the chiefe is Charitie, &c. Out of the third place they gather, If Charitie bee the bond of perfection, then it is alſo the bond of righteouſneſſe, which is nothing elſe but perfection. Firſt, to ſpeake nothing how Paul there calleth perfection, when the members of the Church well ſet in order doe cleave together, and to grant that wee are by charitie made perfect before God: yet what new thing bring they forth? For I will alway on the contrary ſide take exception and ſay that wee never come to this perfection unleſſe we fulfill all the parts of charitie, and thereupon I will gather, that ſith all men are moſt far from the fulfilling of charitie, therefore all hope of perfection is cut off from them.

9. I will not goe through all the teſtimonies which at this day the fooliſh Sorboniſts raſhly ſnatch out of the Scriptures, as they firſt come to hand, and doe throw them againſt us. For, ſome of them are ſo worthie to be laughed at, that I my ſelfe alſo cannot rehearſe them, unleſſe I would worthily be counted fond. Therefore I will make an end, when I ſhall have declared the ſaying of Chriſt, wherewith they marvellouſly pleaſe themſelves. For, to the Lawyer which asked him what was neceſſarie to ſalvation,

The advancement of Charitie is no diſgrace to the doctrine of juſtification by faith.
1 Cor. 13.
Col. 3. 14.

* Nothing contrary hereunto taught by Chriſt in ſaying to a doctor of the law ſwelling with a vaine conſcience of his works, If thou wilt enter into life keepe the commandements. Mat. 19. 17.

ſalvation, hee anſwered: if thou wilt enter into life keepe the commandements. What would we more (ſay they) when we are commanded by the Authour of grace himſelfe to get the kingdome of God by the keeping of his commandements? As though, forſooth it were not certaine, that Chriſt tempered his anſwers to them with whom hee ſaw that he had to doe. Here a doctor of the Law asketh of the meane to obtaine bleſſednesse, and not that only, but with doing of what thing men may attain unto it. Both the perſon of him that ſpake and the queſtion it ſelfe led the Lord ſo to anſwer. The Lawyer being filled with the perſwaſion of the righteouſnes of the Law, was blinde in confidence of workes. Againe, he ſought nothing elſe but what were the works of righteouſneſſe, by which ſalvation is gotten. Therefore he is worthily ſent to the law, in which there is a perfect mirrour of righteouſneſſe. We alſo do with a loud voice pronounce that the commandements muſt be kept, if life be ſought in works. And this doctrine is neceſſarie to bee knowne of Chriſtians. For how ſhould they flee to Chriſt if they did not acknowledge that they are fallen from the way of life into the headlong downe-fall of death? But how ſhould they underſtand how farre they have ſtraied from the way of life, unleſſe they firſt underſtand what is that way of life? For then they are taught that the ſanctuarie to recover ſalvation is in Chriſt, when they ſee how great difference there is between their life and the righteouſnes of God, which is contained in the keeping of the Law. The ſumme is this, that if ſalvation be ſought in works, we muſt keepe the commandements by which we are inſtructed to perfect righteouſnes. But we muſt not ſticke faſt here, unleſſe we will faint in our midde courſe: for none of us is able to keepe the commandements. Sith therefore we are excluded from the righteouſneſſe of the law, we muſt of neceſſitie reſort to another helpe, namely to the faith of Chriſt. Wherfore as here the Lord calleth backe the doctor of the law, whom he knew to ſwel with vaine confidence of works, to the law, wherby he may learne that he is a ſinner ſubject to dreadfull judgement of eternall death: ſo in other places without making mention of the law, he comforteth other that are alreadie humbled with ſuch knowledge, with promiſe of grace, as, Come to mee all yee that labour and are loaden, and I will refreſh you, and yee ſhall finde reſt for your ſoules.

Mat. 11. 39.

Neither is faith by it owne worthineſſe, of force to make us righteous, nor good works to juſtifie becauſe evill are to condemne.

Joh. 6. 29.

10. At the laſt when they are weary of wreſting the Scripture, they fall to ſubtleties and Sophiſticall arguments. They cavill upon this that faith is in ſome places called a worke, and thereupon they gather that we doe wrongfully ſet Faith as contrarie to works. As though forſooth Faith in that it is an obeying of the will of God, doth with her owne deſervings procure unto us righteouſneſſe, and not rather becauſe by imbracing the mercy of God, it ſealeth in our hearts the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt offered to us of it in the preaching of the Goſpell. The readers ſhall pardon me if I doe not tarry upon confuting of ſuch follies, for they themſelves without any aſſault of other, are ſufficiently overthrowne with their owne feebleneſſe. But I will by the way confute one objection which ſeemeth to have ſome ſhew of reaſon, leſt it ſhould trouble ſome that are not ſo well practiſed. Sith common reaſon teacheth that of contraries is all one rule, and all particular ſinnes are imputed to us for unrighteouſneſſe, they ſay it is meete that to all particular good works be given the praiſe of righteouſneſſe. They doe not ſatisfie me which anſwer, that the damnation of men properly proceedeth from onely unbeleefe, not from particular ſinnes. I doe indeed agree to them, that unbeleefe is the fountaine and roote of all evils. For it is the firſt departing from God, after which doe follow the particular treſpaſſings againſt the law. But whereas they ſeeme to ſet one ſelfe-ſame reaſon of good and evill works in weighing of righteouſnes or unrighteouſneſſe, therein I am compelled to diſagree from them. For the righteouſneſſe of works is the perfect obedience of the law. Therefore thou canſt not bee righteous by works, unleſſe thou doe follow it as a ſtreight line in the whole continuall courſe of thy life. From it ſo ſoone as thou haſt ſwarved thou art fallen into unrighteouſneſſe. Hereby appeareth that righteouſneſſe commeth not of one or a few works, but of an unſwarving and unwearied obſerving of the will of God. But the rule of judging unrighteouſneſſe is moſt contrarie. For he that hath committed fornication, or hath ſtollen, is by one offence guiltie of death, becauſe hee hath offended againſt the majeſtie of God. Therefore theſe our ſubtle arguers doe ſtumble, for that they marke not this ſaying of

James

James, that he which sinneth in one, is made guiltie of all, because hee that hath forbidden to kill, hath also forbidden to steale, &c. Therefore it ought to seeme no absurditie, when we say that death is the just reward of every sinne, because they are everie one worthy of the just displeasure and vengeance of God. But thou shalt reason foolishly, if on the contrary side thou gather that by one good work, man may be reconciled to God, which with many sinnes deserveth his wrath. Jam. 2. 10.

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER.

Of Christian liberty.

The necessity of handling the question that concerneth christian libertie.

NOw we must entreat of Christian libertie: the declaration whereof hee must not omit, whose purpose is to comprehend in an abridgement the summe of the doctrine of the Gospel. For it is a thing principally necessarie, and without the knowledge whereof consciences dare in a manner enterprise nothing without doubting they stumble and start backe in many things, they alway stagger and tremble: but especially it is an appendant of justification, and availeth not a little to the understanding of the strength thereof. Yea they that earnestly feare God, shall heereby receive an incomparable fruit of that doctrine which the wicked and Lucinianicall men doe pleasantly taunt with their scoffes, because in the spirituall darknesse wherewith they bee taken, every wanton railing is lawfull for them. Wherefore it shall now come forth in fit season: and it was profitable to defferre to this place the plainer discoursing of it (for wee have alreadie in divers places lightly touched it) because so soone as mention is brought in of Christian libertie, then either filthie lusts doe boile, or madde motions do rise, unlesse these wanton wits be timely met withall, which doe otherwise most naughtily corrupt the best things. For, some men by pretence of this libertie, shake off all obedience of God, and breake forth into an unbrideled licentiousnesse: and some men disdaine it, thinking that by it all moderation, order and choise of things is taken away. What should we here doe, being compassed in such narrow straites? Shall we bid Christian libertie farewell, and so cut off all fit occasion for such perils? But, as we have said, unlesse that bee fast holden, neither Christ, nor the truth of the Gospell, nor the inward peace of the soule is rightly knowne: Rather we must endevour that so necessarie a part of doctrine be not suppressed, and yet that in the meane time those fond objections may be met withall which are wont to rise thereupon.

The first part of Christian liberty the freedome from the bondage and tyranny of the law.

2. Christian libertie (as I thinke) consisteth in three parts. The first, that the consciences of the faithfull, when the affiance of their justification before God is to bee sought, may raise and advance themselves above the law, and forget the whole righteousnesse of the law. For sith the law (as we have already in another place declared) leaveth no man righteous; either we are excluded from all hope of justification, or wee must be loosed from the law, and so that there be no regard at all had of workes. For who so thinketh that he must bring somewhat, bee it never so little of good workes, to obtaine righteousnesse, hee cannot appoint any end or measure of them, but maketh himselfe debtor to the law. Therefore taking away all mention of the Law, and laying aside all thinking upon works, we must embrace the onely mercie of God, when wee intreat of justification: and turning away our sight from our selves, wee must behold Christ alone. For there the question is not how wee be righteous: but how although we be unrighteous and unworthy, we bee taken for worthy. Of which thing if consciences will attaine any certaintie, they must give no place to the law. Neither can any man hereby gather that the Law is superfluous to the faithfull, whom it doth not therfore cease to teach, and exhort, and pricke forward to goodnesse, although before the judgement seat of God it hath no place in their consciences. For these two things as they are most divers, so must they bee well and diligently distinguished of us. The whole life of Christians ought to bee a certaine meditation of godlinesse, because they are called into sanctification. Heerein standeth the office of the law, that by putting them in minde of their dutie, it should stirre them up to the endevour of holinesse and innocencie. But when consciences are carefull how they may have God mercifull, what they shall answer, and upon what affiance they shall stand if they bee called called to his judgement, there is not to be reckoned what the law requireth, but onely Christ must be set forth for righteousnesse, which passeth all perfection of the law.

The libertie disputed of in the Epistle to the Galathians. Gal.3.13. & 5.1.

3. Upon this point hangeth almost all the argument of the Epistle to the Galathians. For, that they be fond expositors which teach that Paul there contendeth onely for the libertie of ceremonies, may be proved by the places of the arguments. Of which sort are these. That Christ was made a curse for us, that he might redeeme us from the curse of the law. Againe, Stand fast in the libertie wherewith Christ hath made you free, and be not againe entangled with the yoke of bondage. Behold, I Paul say, if yee be circumcised, Christ shall nothing profit you. And hee which is circumcised is debtor of the whole law. Christ is made idle to you whosoever yee be that are justified by the law: ye are fallen away from grace. Wherein truly is contained some higher thing than the libertie of ceremonies. I grant indeed that Paul there entreateth of ceremonies, because he contendeth with the false Apostles, which went about to bring againe into the Christian Church the old shadowes of the law which were abolished by the comming of Christ. But for the discussing of this question, there were higher places to bee disputed, in which the whole controversie stood. First because by those Jewish shadowes the brightnesse of the Gospell was darkened, he sheweth that wee have in Christ a full giving indeed of all those things which were shadowed by the ceremonies of Moses. Secondly, because these deceivers filled the people with a most naughty opinion, namely that this obedience availed to deserve the favour of God: Here he standeth much upon this point, that the faithfull should not thinke that they can by any workes of the law, much lesse by those little principles, obtaine righteousnesse before God. And therewithall he teacheth, that they are by the crosse of Christ free from the damnation of the law, which otherwise hangeth over all men, that they should with full assuredneſse rest in Christ alone. Which place properly pertaineth to this purpose. Last of all he maintaineth to the consciences of the faithfull their libertie, that they should not be bound with any religion in things not necessarie.

The second part of Christian libertie free and by the law unconstrained obedience.

4. The second part, which hangeth upon that former part, is that consciences obey the law, not as compelled by the necessitie of the law: but being free from the yoke of the law it selfe, of their owne accord they obey the will of God. For because they abide in perpetuall terrors, so long as they be under the dominion of the law, they shall never be with cheerefull readinesse framed to the obedience of God, unlesse they first have this libertie given them. By an example wee shall both more briefly, and more plainly perceive what these things meane. The commandement of the law is, that we love our God with all our heart, with all our soule, and with all our strengths. That this may be done, our soule must first be made void of all other sense and thought, our heart must be clensed of all desires, all our strengths must bee gathered up and drawne together to this only purpose. They which have gone most far before other in the way of the Lord, are yet very far from this marke. For though they love God with their mind, and with sincere affection of heart, yet they have still a great part of their heart and soule possessed with the desires of the flesh, by which they are drawne backe and staied from going forward with hastie course to God. They doe indeed travell forward with great endevour: but the flesh partly feebleth their strengths, and partly draweth them to it selfe. What shall they here doe, when they feele that they doe nothing lesse than performe the law? They will, they covet, they endevour, but nothing with such perfection as ought to be. If thou looke upon the law, they see that whatsoever worke they attempt or purpose, is accursed. Neither is there any cause why any man should deceive himselfe with gathering that the work is therefore not altogether evill, because it is unperfect: and therefore that God doth nevertheleſse accept that good which is in it. For, the law requiring perfect love, condemneth all imperfection, unlesse the rigour of it be mitigated. Therefore his workes should fall to nought which he would have to seeme partly good: and he shall finde that it is a transgression of the law, even in this because it is unperfect.

Deut.6.5.

5. Loe, how all our works are subject to the curse of the law, if they bee measured by the rule of the law. But how should then unhappie soules cheerefully apply themselves to worke, for which they might not trust that they could get any thing but curse?

On

On the other ſide, if being delivered from this ſevere exacting of the law, or rather from the whole rigour of the law, they heare that they be called of God with fatherly gentleneſſe: they will merily and with great cheerefulneſſe anſwer his calling and follow his guiding. In a ſumme, they which are bound to the yoke of the law, are like to bond-ſervants, to whom are appointed by their lords certaine taskes of worke for every day. Theſe ſervants thinke that they have done nothing, nor dare come in the ſight of their Lords, unleſſe they have performed that full taske of their workes. But children, which are more liberally and more freeman-like handeled of their fathers, ſticke not to preſent to them their begun and halfe unperfect workes, yea and thoſe having ſome fault, truſting that they will accept their obedience and willingneſſe of minde, although they have not exactly done ſo much as their good will was to doe. So muſt we be, as we may have ſure affiance, that our obediences ſhal be allowed of our moſt kind father, how little ſoever, and how rude and unperfect ſoever they be. As alſo he aſſureth to us by the Prophet: I will ſpare them (ſaith he) as the father is wont to ſpare his ſon that ſerveth him. Where this word Spare, is ſet for to beare withall, or gently to winke at faults, for as much as he alſo maketh mention of ſervice. And this affiance is not a little neceſſarie for us, without which we ſhall goe about all things in vaine. For God accounteth himſelfe to be worſhipped with no worke of ours but which is truly done of us for the worſhipping of him. But how can that be done among theſe terrors, where it is doubted whether God be offended or worſhipped without our worke?

Men freed from the exactions of the law are as children ſweetly wone unto cheerfull obedience by the fatherly gentleneſſe wherewith they know that God hath promiſed to intreat them.

Mal. 3. 17.

6. And that is the cauſe why the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes, referreth all the good works which are read of in the holy fathers, to faith, and weigheth them only by faith. Touching this liberty there is a place in the Epiſtle to the Romanes, where Paul reaſoneth that ſinne ought not to have dominion over us, becauſe we are not under the law, but under grace. For when hee had exhorted the faithfull that ſin ſhould not reigne in their mortall bodies, and that they ſhould not give their members to bee weapons of wickedneſſe to ſinne, but ſhould dedicate themſelves to God, as they that are alive from the dead, and their members, weapons of righteouſneſſe to God: and whereas they might on the other ſide object that they do yet carry with them the fleſh full of luſts, and that ſinne dwelleth in them, hee adjoyneth that comfort by the liberty of the law, as if he ſhould ſay. Though they doe not yet througly feele ſinne deſtroyed and that righteouſneſſe yet liveth not in them, yet there is no cauſe why they ſhould feare and be diſcouraged as though hee had beene alway diſpleaſed with them for the remnants of ſinne, foraſmuch as they are by grace made free from the law, that their workes ſhould not bee examined by the rules of the law. As for them that gather that we may ſin becauſe we are not under the law, let them know that this liberty pertaineth nothing to them, the end whereof is to encourage us to good.

The liberty which we have in the ſtate of grace a ſpeciall encouragement to ſtrive that we be not overruled with ſin.
Rom. 11. 2.
Rom. 6. 12.

7. The third part is, that we be bound with no conſcience before God of outward things which are by themſelves indifferent, but that we may indifferently ſometime uſe them, and ſometime leave them unuſed. And the knowledge of this liberty alſo is very neceſſary for us, for if it ſhall be abſent, there ſhall bee no quiet to our conſciences, no end of ſuperſtitions. Many at this day doe thinke us fond to move diſputation about the free eating of fleſh, about the free uſe of daies, and garments, and ſuch other ſmall trifles as they indeed thinke them: but there is more weight in them than is commonly thought. For when conſciences have once caſt themſelves into the ſnare, they enter into a long and cumborſome way, from whence they can afterward finde no eaſie way to get out. If a man begin to doubt whether hee may occupie linnen in ſheets, ſhirts, handkerchiefes, and napkings, neither will he be out of doubt whether hee may uſe hempe, and at the laſt he will alſo fall in doubt of matters, for he will weigh with himſelfe whether he cannot ſup without napkins, whether he may not be without handkerchiefes. If any man thinke dainty meat to be unlawfull, at length he ſhall not with quietneſſe before the Lord eate either brown-bread or common meats, when hee remembreth that he may yet ſuſtaine his body with baſer food. If he doubt of pleaſant wine, afterward he will not drinke dead wine with good peace of conſcience, laſt of all he will not bee ſo bold to touch ſweeter and cleanner water than other. Finally, at the length he will come to this point, to thinke it unlawfull (as the common ſaying is) to tread upon upon a straw lying a crosse For here is begun no light strife, but this is in question, whether God will have us to use these or those things, whose will ought to guide all our counsels and doings. Heereby some must needs bee carried with desperation into a confuse devouring pit: some must, despising God, and casting away his feare, make themselves away through destruction when they have no ready way: For whosoever are entangled with such doubting, which way soever they turne themselves, they see every where present offence of conscience.

We cannot with thankefulnesse unto God enjoy the use of outward things, unlesse the knowledge of our libertie remove all scruple of conscience and trouble of mind from us. Rom. 14. 14.

8. I know (saith Paul) that nothing is common (meaning by common, unholy) but who so thinketh any thing common, to him it is common. In which words he maketh all outward things subject to our libertie, provided alway that our minds have the assurance of the libertie before God. But if any superstitious opinion cast into us any doubt, those things which of their owne nature were cleane, are defiled to us. Wherefore he addeth: blessed is he that judgeth not himselfe in that which he alloweth. But he that judgeth, if he eate, is condemned, because he eateth not of faith. And that which is not of faith, is sinne. Among such narrow straits, who so nevertheless with carelessly venturing on all things shew themselves bolder, doe they not as much turne themselves away from God? But they which are throughly peirced with some feare of God, when they themselves also are compelled to doe many things against their conscience, are discouraged and doe fall downe with feare. All that are such, doe receive none of the gifts of God with thanksgiving, by which alone yet Paul testifieth that they all are sanctified to our use: I meane the thanksgiving that proceedeth from a heart that acknowledgeth the liberalitie and goodnesse of God in his gifts. For many of them indeed doe understand that those are the benefits of God which they use, and they praise God in his workes: but sith they are not perswaded that they are given to themselves, how should they thanke God as the giver of them? Thus in a summe we see, whereto this libertie tendeth, namely that we should use the gifts of God to such use as he hath given them unto us, without any scruple of conscience, without any trouble of minde, by which confidence our soules may both have peace with him, and acknowledge his liberalitie toward us. For heere are comprehended all ceremonies that are at libertie to be observed, that our consciences should not be bound with any necessitie to keepe them, but should remember that the use of them is by Gods benefit subject to themselves unto edification.

The use and abuse of the doctrine which concerneth Christian liberty.

9. But it is diligently to be noted, that Christian libertie is in all the parts of it a spirituall thing, the whole strength, whereof consisteth in appeasing fearefull consciences before God, if either they be unquieted, or carefull for the forgivenesse of sinnes, or if they be pensive, whether our imperfect workes and defiled with the faults of our flesh doe please God, or if they be troubled about the use of indifferent things. Wherefore they doe wrongfully expound it, which either doe make it a cloake for their owne desires, that they may abuse the gifts of God o their owne lust, or which doe thinke that there is no liberty but that which is used before men, and therefore in using it have no regard of the weake brethren. In the first kinde, men doe at this day much offend. There is almost no man which may by his ability of wealth be sumptuous, which delighteth not in excessive gorgiousnesse, in furniture of bankets, in apparell of body, in building of houses, which hath not a will to excell other in all kind of statelinesse: which doth not marvellously flatter himselfe in his fineneſse. And all these things are defended under the pretence of Christian liberty. They say that they are things indifferent, I grant, so that a man indifferently use them. But when they are too greedily coveted, when they are proudly boasted, when they are wastfully spent, it is certaine that those things which otherwise were of themselves lawfull, are by these faults defiled. This saying of Paul, doth very well put difference betweene things indifferent. All things are cleane to the cleane: but to the defiled and unbeleeving nothing is cleane, because their minde and conscience is defiled. For why are accursed the rich men, they which have their comfort, which are satisfied with meat, which doe now laugh, which sleepe in beds of Ivory, which joyne land to land, whose bankets have Lute, Harpe, Taber, and Wine? Verily both Ivory, and Gold, and riches are the good creatures of God, permitted yea and appointed by the providence of God for men to use. Neither is it

Tit. 1. 15. Luk. 6. 24. Amos 6. 1. Esay 5. 8.

any where forbidden either to laugh, or to be satisfied with meat, or to joyne new possessions to their owne old possessions or of their ancesters, or to be delighted with musicall melody, or to drinke wine. This is true indeed. But when they have plenty of things, to wallow in delights, to glut themselves, to make their wit and minde drunke with present pleasures and alway to gape for new, these doings are most farre from the lawfull use of the gifts of God. Therefore let them take away immeasurable desire, let them take away immeasurable wasting, let them take away vanitie and arrogance, that they may with a pure conscience purely use the gifts of God. When the minde shall be framed to this sobriety, they shall have a rule of the lawfull use. On the other side let this moderation be wanting, even base and common delicates are too much. For this is truly said; that oftentimes in freese and course cloth dwelleth a purple heart, and sometime under silke and purple, lieth simple humility. Let every man in his degree so live either poorely, or meanely, or plentifully, that they all remember that they are fed of God to live, not to be riotous: and let them thinke, that this is the law of Christian liberty: if they have learned with Paul to bee contented with those things which they presently have: if they can skill both to bee humble and to excell: if they bee taught in all places and in all things to bee both full and hungry, to have plenty and to suffer want. Philip. 4.

13. Herein also many men doe erre, because as though their liberty should not bee sound and safe unlesse it had men witnesses of it, they doe undiscreetly and unwisely use it. By which unseasonable using they many times offend the weake brethren. You may see at this day some, which thinke that their liberty cannot stand, unlesse they take possession of it by eating of flesh on Friday. I blame not that they eat: but this false opinion must be driven out of their mindes. For they ought to thinke that by their liberty they obtaine no new thing in the sight of men but before GOD, and that it standeth as well in abstaining as in using. If they understand that it maketh no matter before GOD, whether they eat flesh or egges, whether they weare red or blacke garments, that is enough. The conscience is now free, to which the benefit of such liberty was due. Therefore although they doe afterward abstaine all their life long from flesh and weare alway but one colour, yet they are no lesse free. Yea therefore because they are free, they doe with a free conscience abstaine. But they doe most hurtfully offend because they nothing regard the weakenesse of their brethren, which wee ought so to beare with, that we rashly commit nothing with offence of them. But sometime also it behooveth that our liberty bee set forth before men. And this I grant. But there is a measure most heedfully to be kept, that we cast not away the care of the weake of whom the Lord hath so earnestly given us charge. Vndiscreet and unseasonable using of liberty.

11. I will in this place therefore speake somewhat of offences, in what difference they are to be taken, which are to be avoided, and which to be neglected: whereupon we may afterward determine what place there is for our libertie among men. I like well that common division, which teacheth that there is of offences one sort given, another taken: forasmuch as it both hath a plaine testimony of the Scripture, and doth not unfitly expresse that which it meaneth. If thou doe any thing by unseasonable lightnesse, or wantonnesse, or rashnesse, not in order, not in fit place, whereby the ignorant and weake are offended, that same may be called an offence given by thee: because it came to passe by thy fault that such offence was stirred up. And it is alway called an offence given in any thing, the fault whereof came from the doer of the thing it selfe. It is called an offence taken, when a thing which is otherwise not evilly done nor out of time is by evill will or by some wrongfull malitiousnesse of minde drawne to occasion of offence. For in this case was not offence given, but these wrongfull construers doe without cause take one. With that first kind of offence none are offended but the weake? but with this second kinde sowre natures and Pharisaicall scornefull heads are offended. Wherefore wee shall call the one the offence of the weake: the other of the Pharisees: and we shall so temper the use of our liberty, that it ought to give place to the ignorance of the weake brethren, but in no wise to the rigorousnesse of the Pharisees. For what is to be yeelded to weakenesse, Paul sheweth in very many places. Beare (saith he) with the weake in Faith. Againe, Let us not hereafter judge one another, but this rather, Of offences rising unto others in the use of our liberty. Rom 14. 1. & 13.

rather let there not be laid before our brother any offence or occasion of falling: and many other sayings to the same intent, which are more fit to be read in the place it selfe, than to be here rehearsed. The summe is, that we which are strong should beare with the weakenesse of our brethren, and not please our selves, but everie one of us please his neighbour unto good for edifying. In another place, But see that your libertie bee not in any wise an offence to them that are weake, Againe, Eate ye all things that are sold in the shambles, asking no question for conscience: of your conscience (I say) not another mans. Finally bee yee such, that yee give no offence, neither to the Jewes nor to the Greekes, nor to the Church of God. Also in another place. Yee are called, brethren, into libertie: onely give not your libertie to bee an occasion to the flesh, but by charitie serve ye one another. Thus it is. Our libertie is not given toward our weake neighbours, whose servants charity maketh us in all things: but rather, that having peace with God in our mindes, wee may also live peaceably among men. As for the offence of the Pharisees, how much it is to bee regarded, wee learne by the words of the Lord, whereby hee biddeth them to bee let alone, because they are blinde, and guides of the blinde. The disciples had warned him, that the Pharisees, were offended with his sayings: he answered that they were to be neglected, and the offending of them not to be cared for.

12. But yet still the matter hangeth doubtfull, unlesse we know who are to bee taken for weake, and who for Pharisees: which difference being taken away, I see not among offences what use at all of libertie remaineth, which might never be used without great danger. But it seemeth to mee that Paul hath most plainely declared both by doctrine and by examples, how far our libertie is either to be tempered or to be defended though with offences. When he tooke Timothie into his companie, hee circumcised him: but he could not be brought to circumcise Titus. Here were divers doings, and no change of purpose or of mind: namely in circumcising Timothy, when hee was free from all men, he made himselfe a servant to all men: and he was made to the Jewes, as a Iew, that he might winne the Jewes: to them that were under the law, as if hee himselfe were under the law, that hee might win them which were under law: all things to all men, that he might save many, as he writeth in another place. Thus we have a right moderation of liberty, if it may be indifferently restrained with some profit. What hee had respect unto, when he stoutly refused to circumcise Titus, hee himselfe testifieth, writing thus: But neither was Titus, which was with me, although hee was a Grecian, compelled to be circumcised, because of the false brethren which were come in by the way, which had privily crept in, to espy our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage, to whom we gave not place by subjection so much as for a time, that the truth of the Gospell might continue with you. There is also a time when we must of necessity defend our liberty, if the same bee in weake consciences endangered by the unjust exactings of false Apostles. Wee must in every thing study to preserve charity, and have regard to the edifying of our neighbour. All things (saith he) are lawfull for me, but not all things are expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things doe not edifie. Let no man seeke that which is his owne, but that which is anothers. There is nothing now plainer by this rule, then that wee must use our liberty, if it may turne to the edifying of our neighbour: but if it be not so expedient for our neighbour, then we must forbeare it. There bee some which counterfeit the wisdome of Paul in forbearing of liberty, while they doe nothing lesse than apply the same to the duties of charity. For so that they may provide for their owne quietnesse, they wish all mention of liberty to be buried, whereas it is no lesse behovefull for our neighbours, sometime to use libertie for their benefit and edification, than in fit place to restraine it for their commodity. But it is the part of a godly man to thinke, that free power in outward things is therefore granted him, that he may be the freer to all duties of charity.

Gal. 2. 4.
1 Cor. 10. 23.

Intolerable halting covered with pretence of not offending the weake.

13. But whatsoever I have spoken of avoiding of offences, my meaning is that it be referred to meane and indifferent things. For those things that are necessary to bee done, are not to be left undone for feare of any offence. For as our liberty is to bee submitted to charity, so charity it selfe likewise ought to be under the pureness of faith.

Verily

Verily heere alſo ought to bee had regard of charitie, but ſo farre as to the altars, that is that for our neighbours ſake we offend not God. Their intemperance is not to bee allowed, which doe nothing but with troubleſome turmoiling, and which had rather raſhly to rend all things, than leiſurely to rip them. Neither yet are they to be harkened to, which when they be leaders of men into a thouſand ſorts of ungodlineſſe, yet doe faigne that they muſt behave themſelves ſo that they bee none offence to their neighbors. As though they doe not in the meane edifie the conſciences of their neighbours to evill, ſpecially whereas they ſticke faſt in the ſame mire without any hope of getting out. And the pleaſant men forſooth, whether their neighbour bee to bee inſtructed with doctrine or example of life, ſay that hee muſt be fed with milke, whom they fill with moſt evill and poyſonous opinions. Paul reporteth that hee fed the Corinthians with drinking of milke: but if Popiſh Maſſe had then beene among them, would he have ſacrificed to give them the drinke of milke? No: For milke is not poyſon. Therefore they lie in ſaying that they feed them whom under a ſhew of flattering allurements they cruelly kill. But, granting that ſuch diſſembling is for a time to be allowed, how long yet will they feed their children with milke? For if they never grow bigger, that they may at the leaſt be able to beare ſome light meate, it is certaine that they were never brought up with milke. There are two reaſons that moove mee why I doe not now more ſharply contend with them: firſt, becauſe their follies are ſcarcely worthie to be confuted, ſith they worthily ſeeme filthie in the ſight of all men that have their ſound wit: ſecondly, becauſe I have ſufficiently done it in peculiar bookes, I will not now doe a thing alreadie done. Only let the readers remember this, that with whatſoever offences Satan and the world goe about to turne us away from the ordinances of God, or to ſtay us from following that which he appointeth, yet we muſt nevertheleſſe goe earneſtly forward: and then, that whatſoever dangers hang upon it, yet is it not at our libertie to ſwarve one haire breadth from the commandement of the ſame God, neither is it lawful by any pretence to attempt any thing but that which he giveth us leave. 1 Cor. 3.2.

14. Now therefore ſith faithfull conſciences, having received ſuch prerogative of libertie as we have above ſet forth, have by the benefit of Chriſt obtained this that they be not entangled with any ſnares of obſervations in thoſe things in which the Lord willed that they ſhould be at libertie: wee conclude that they are exempt from all power of men. For it is unmeete, that either Chriſt ſhould loſe the thanke of his ſo great liberalitie, or conſciences their profit. Neither ought wee to thinke it a ſlight matter, which we ſee to have coſt Chriſt ſo deere: namely which hee valued not with gold or ſilver, but with his owne blood: ſo that Paul ſticketh not to ſay, that his death is made void, if we yeeld our ſoules into ſubjection to men. For he travelleth about nothing elſe in certaine Chapters of the Epiſtle to the Galathians, but to ſhew that Chriſt is darkned or rather deſtroyed to us, unleſſe our conſciences ſtand faſt in their libertie, which verily they have loſt if they may at the will of men bee ſnared with the bonds of lawes and ordinances. But as it is a thing moſt worthie to bee knowne, ſo it needeth a longer and plainer declaration. For ſo ſoone as any word is ſpoken of the abrogating of the ordinances of men, by and by great troubles are raiſed up partly by ſeditious men, partly by ſlanderers, as though the whole obedience of men were at once taken away and overthrowne.

1 Pet. 1.18. Gal. 5.1. & 4.

15. Therefore that none of us may ſtumble at this ſtone, firſt let us conſider, that there are two ſorts of governement in man: the one ſpirituall, whereby the conſcience is framed to godlineſſe and to the worſhip of God: the other civill, whereby man is trained to the duties of humanitie and civility which are to bee kept among men. They are commonly by not unfit names called the Spirituall and Temporall juriſdiction, whereby is ſignified, that the firſt of the two formes of government pertaineth to the life of the Soule, and the latter is occupied in the things of this preſent life: not only in feeding and clothing, but in ſetting forth of lawes whereby a man may ſpend his life among men holily, honeſtly, and ſoberly. For, that firſt kinde hath place in the inward minde, this latter kinde ordereth onely the outward behaviours. The one wee may call the ſpirituall kingdome, the other the civill kingdome. But theſe two, as wee have divided them, muſt be either of them alway ſeverally conſidered by themſelves, and when the one is in considering, wee must withdraw and turne away our mindes from the thinking upon the other. For there are in man as it were two worlds, which both divers Kings and divers Lawes may governe. By this putting of difference shall come to passe, that that which the Gospell teacheth of the spirituall liberty, we shall not wrongfully draw to the civill order, as though Christians were according to the outward government lesse subject to the lawes of men, because their consciences are at liberty before God: as though they were therefore exempt from all bondage of the flesh, because they are free according to the spirit. Againe, because even in those ordinances which seeme to pertaine to the spirituall kingdome, there may be some errour; we must also put difference betweene these, which are to be taken for lawfull as agreeable to the word of God, and on the other side which ought not to have place among the godly. Of the Civill governement there shall bee elsewhere place to speake. Also of the Ecclesiasticall lawes I omit to speake at this time, because a more full entreating of it shall bee fit for the fourth booke, where we shall speake of the power of the Church. But of this discourse, let this be the conclusion, The question being (as I have said) of it selfe not very darke or entangled, doth for this cause accumber many, because they doe not subtilly enough put difference betweene the outward court as they call it, and the court of conscience. Moreouer this encreaseth the difficultie, that Paul teacheth, that the magistrate ought to be obeied, not onely for feare of punishment, but for conscience. Whereupon followeth that consciences are also bound by the civill lawes. If it were so, all should come to naught which wee both have spoken and shall speake of the spirituall governement. For the loosing of this knot, first it is good to know what is conscience. And the definition thereof is to bee fetched from the derivation of the word. For, as when men doe with minde and understanding conceive the knowledge of things, they are thereby said (Scire) to know, whereupon also is derived the name of Science: Knowledge: so when they have a feeling of the judgement of God, as a witnesse joyned with them, which doth not suffer them to hide their sinnes but that they be drawne accused to the judgement seate of God, that same feeling is called Conscience. For it is a certaine meane betweene God and man, because it suffereth not man to suppresse in himselfe that which hee knoweth but pursueth him so far till it bring him to guiltinesse This is it which Paul meaneth, where he saith that conscience doth together witnesse with men, when their thoughts doe accuse or acquit them in the judgement of God. A simple knowledge might remaine as enclosed within man. Therefore this feeling which presenteth man to the judgement of God, is as it were a keeper joyned to man, to mark and espie all his secrets, that nothing may remaine buried in darkenesse. Whereupon also commeth that old Proverbe, Conscience is a thousand witnesses. And for the same reason Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience for the quietnesse of minde, when being perswaded of the grace of Christ, wee doe without feare present our selves before God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, setteth to have no more conscience of sinne, insteed of, to be deliverd or acquited that sinne may no more accuse us.

In what sort the conscience is bound or free.

16. Therefore as worke, have respect to men, so conscience is referred to God, so that a good conscience is no thing else but the inward pureneſſe of the heart. In which sense Paul writeth that charity is the fulfilling of the law out of a pure conscience and faith not fained. Afterward also in the same chapter he sheweth how much it differeth from understanding, saying that some had suffered shipwracke from the faith, because they had forsaken a good Conscience. For in these words he signifieth it is a lively affection to worship God, and a syncere endevour to live holily and godlily. Sometime indeed it extendeth also to men, as in Luke where the same Paul protesteth that he endevoured himselfe to walke with a good conscience toward God and men. But this was therefore said, because the fruits of a good conscience doe flow and come even to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God onely, as I have already said. Hereby it commeth to passe that the law is said to binde the conscience, which simply bindeth a man without respect of men, or without having any consideration of them. As for example: God commandeth not onely to keepe the minde chaste and pure from all lust, but also forbiddeth all manner of filthinesse of words and outward outward wantonneſſe whatſoever it be. To the keeping of this law my conſcience is ſubject although there lived not one man in the world, So hee that behaveth himſelfe intemperately, not only ſinneth in this that he giveth an evill example to the brethren, but alſo hath his conſcience bound with guiltineſſe before God. In things that are of themſelves meane, there is another conſideration. For we ought to abſtaine from them if they breed any offence, but the conſcience ſtill being free. So Paul ſpeaketh of fleſh conſecrate to Idols. If any (ſaith he) moove any doubt, touch it not for conſcience ſake: I ſay for conſcience, not thine but the others. A faithfull man ſhould ſinne, which being firſt warned ſhould nevertheleſſe eate ſuch fleſh. But howſoever in reſpect of his brother, it is neceſſarie for him to abſtaine as it is preſcribed of God, yet hee ceaſeth not to keepe ſtill the libertie of conſcience. Thus wee ſee how this law binding the outward worke, leaveth the conſcience unbound. 1 Cor. 10. 28.

THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER.

Of Prayer, which is the chiefe exerciſe of faith, and whereby we daily receive the benefits of God.

Our owne emptineſſe and the fulneſſe of all riches laid up in Chriſt ſhould allure us unto prayer.

OF theſe things that have beene hitherto ſpoken, wee plainly perceive how needy and void man is of all good things, and how hee wanteth all helps of ſalvation. Wherefore if he ſeeke for releeſes, whereby he may ſuccour his needineſſe, hee muſt goe out of himſelfe and get them elſe where. This is afterward declared unto us, that the Lord doth of his own free will and liberality give himſelfe to us in his Chriſt, in whom he offereth us in ſtead of our miſerie, all felicitie, in ſteed of our need, wealthineſſe, in whom hee openeth to us the heavenly treaſures: that our whole faith ſhould behold his beloved Sonne, that upon him our whole expectation ſhould hang, in him our whole hope ſhould ſticke and reſt. This verily is the ſecret and hidden Philoſophie, which cannot be wrung out with Logicall arguments: but they learne it whoſe eyes God hath opened that they may ſee light in his light. But ſince that wee are taught by faith to acknowledge that whatſoever wee have need of, whatſoever wanteth in us, the ſame is in God and in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, namely in whom the Lord willed the whole fulneſſe of his largeſſe to reſt, that from thence wee ſhould all draw as out of a moſt plentifull fountaine: now it remaineth that wee ſeeke in him, and with prayers crave of him that which we have learned to be in him. Otherwiſe to know God to bee the Lord and giver of all good things, which allureth us to pray to him, and not to goe to him and pray to him: ſhould ſo nothing profit us, that it ſhould be all one as if a man ſhould neglect a treaſure ſhewed him buried and digged in the ground. Therefore the Apoſtle to ſhew that true faith cannot be idle from calling upon God, hath ſet this order: that as of the Goſpell ſpringeth faith, ſo by it our hearts are framed to call upon the name of God. And this is the ſame thing which he had a little before ſaid, that the ſpirit of adoption, which ſealeth in our hearts the witneſſe of the Goſpell, raiſeth up our ſpirits that they dare ſhew forth their deſires to God, ſtirre up unſpeakeable gronings, and cry with confidence Abba Father. It is meete therefore that this laſt point, becauſe it was before but onely ſpoken of by the way and as it were lightly touched, ſhould now be more largely intreated of. Rom. 8. 26.

By prayer we are both enriched with grace, and in diſtreſſes quieted.

2. This therefore we get by the benefit of prayer, that wee attaine to thoſe riches which are laid up for us with the heavenly father. For there is a certaine communicating of men with God, whereby they entring into the ſanctuarie of heaven, doe in his owne preſence call to him touching his promiſes; that the ſame thing which they beleeved him affirming onely in word not to bee vaine, they may when need ſo requireth finde in experience. Therefore wee ſee that there is nothing ſet forth to us to be looked for at the hand of the Lord, which wee are not alſo commanded to crave with prayers: ſo true it is that by prayers are digged up the treaſures, which our faith hath looked upon being ſhewed to it by the Goſpell of the Lord. Now how neceſſarie and how many waies profitable this exerciſe of prayer is, it can by no words bee ſufficiently declared. Undoubtedly it is not without cauſe that the heavenly father teſtifieth, that the onely fortreſſe of ſalvation is in the calling upon his name, namely whereby we call to us the preſence both of his providence, by which hee watcheth to take care of our matters: and of his power, by which hee ſuſtaineth us being weake and in a manner fainting: and of his goodneſſe, by which hee reciveth us into favour being miſerably loaden with ſinnes: finally whereby wee call him all whole, to give himſelfe preſent to us. Hereby groweth ſingular reſt and quietneſſe to our conſciences. For when wee have diſcloſed to the Lord the neceſſitie which diſtreſſed us, wee largely reſt though it were but in this onely that none of our evils is hidden from him, whom we are perſwaded both to be moſt well willing toward us, and moſt able to provide well for us.

It is not a needleſſe thing to pray even for thoſe things which before we pray, we know that God is purpoſed to beſtow.

3. But (will ſome man ſay) did not he know without any to put him in minde of it, both in what part we be diſtreſſed, and what is expedient for us: ſo that it may ſeeme after a certaine manner ſuperfluous, that he ſhould bee troubled with our prayers, as though he winked or ſlept, untill he were awaked with our voyce? But they which ſo reaſon, marke not to what end the Lord hath inſtructed them that bee his to pray: for he ordeined it not ſo much for his owne cauſe as rather for ours. Hee willeth in deed as right it is, that his due be rendred to him, when they acknowledge to come from him whatſoever men require or doe perceive to make for their profit, and doe teſtifie the ſame with wiſhings. But the profit alſo of this ſacrifice wherewith he is worſhipped, commeth to us. Therefore how much more boldly the holy fathers glorioufly talked both to themſelves and others of the benefits of God, ſo much the more ſharply they were pricked forward to pray. The onely example of Elias ſhall bee enough for us, which being ſure of the counſell of God, after that hee not raſhly had promiſed raine to Achab, yet buſily prayeth betweene his knees, and ſendeth his ſervant ſeven times to eſpie it: not for that hee did diſcredit the oracle of God, but becauſe he knew that it was his dutie, leaſt his faith ſhould wax drowſie and ſluggiſh, to lay up his deſires with God. Wherefore although while we lie ſenſeleſſe and ſo dull that we perceive not our owne miſeries, he waketh and watcheth for us, and ſometime alſo helpeth us undeſired, yet it much behoveth us, that he be continually called upon of us, that our heart may bee enflamed with earneſt and fervent deſire to ſeeke, love, and worſhip him, while we accuſtome our ſelves in every neceſſitie to flee to him as to our ſhoote-anchor. Againe, that no deſire and no wiſh at all may enter into our minde, whereof we ſhould be aſhamed to make him witneſſe, while wee learne to preſent our wiſhes, yea and to poure out our whole heart before his eies. Then that wee may bee framed to receive all his benefits with true thankefulneſſe of minde, yea and with outward thankſgiving, of which wee are put in minde by our prayer that they come to us from his hand. Moreover, that when we have obtained that which wee deſired, being perſwaded that hee hath anſwerd to our prayers, wee may bee thereby the more fervently caried to thinke upon his kindneſſe, and therewithall embrace with greater pleaſure thoſe things which we acknowledge to have been obteined by prayer. Laſt of all, that very uſe and experience may according to the meaſure of our weakeneſſe, aſſure our minds of his providence when wee underſtand that he not onely promiſeth that he will never faile us, and that he doth of his owne accord open us the entrie to call to him in the very point of neceſſity, but alſo hath his hand alway ſtretched out to help them that be his, and that he doth not feed them with words, but defendeth them with preſent help. For theſe cauſes, the moſt kind Father, although hee never ſleepeth or is ſluggiſh, yet oftentimes maketh a ſhew as though hee ſlept and were ſluggiſh, that ſo he may exerciſe us, which are otherwiſe ſlothfull and ſluggiſh to come to him, to aske of him, to require him to our owne great benefit. Therefore they doe too fooliſhly, which to call away the mindes of men from prayer, babble that the providence of God, which maketh for the ſafe keeping of all things, is in vaine wearied without callings upon him: Whereas the Lord contrariwiſe not in vaine teſtifieth that he is nigh to all them that call upon his name in the truth. And of none other ſort is that which other doe triflingly ſay, that it is ſuperfluous to aske thoſe things which the Lord is of his owne will readie to give: whereas even the very ſame things which flow to us from his owne free liberalitie, hee will have us acknowledge to bee granted to our prayers. Which thing that notable ſentence of the Pſalme doth teſtifie, wherewherewith many like sayings doe accord. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his eares unto their prayers. Which saying so setteth out the providence of God, bent of his owne accord to provide for the safety of the godly, that yet he omitteth not the exercise of faith, whereby slothfulnesse is wiped from the minds of men. The eyes of God therefore doe wake, that he may succour the necessity of the blinde: but he will againe on our behalfes heare our groanings, that hee may the better prove his love toward us. And so both are true, that the watchmen of Israel sleepeth not, nor slumbereth, and yet that he sitteth still as having forgotten us when he seeth us dull and dumbe. Psal 34.16. Psal.121.8.

4. Now to frame prayer rightly and well, let this be the first rule, that wee be no otherwise framed in minde and heart, than becommeth them that enter in to talke with God. Which verily we shall attaine as touching the minde, if the same being free from fleshly cares and thoughts, wherewith it may be called away or withdrawne from the right and well beholding of God, doe not onely bend it selfe wholly to prayer, but also so much as is possible be lifted up and carried above it selfe. Neither doe I here require a minde so at liberty, that it be pricked and nipped with no care, whereas contrariwise the ferventnesse of prayer must by such carefulnesse be kindled in us (as we see that the holy servants of God doe sometime declare great torments, much more carefulnesses, when they say they utter to the Lord a bewailing voice out of the deepe depth, and out of the middest of the jawes of death.) But I say that all strange and forren cares must be driven away, wherewith the minde it selfe wandring hither and thither, is carried about, and being drawne out of heaven, is pressed downe to the earth. I meane by this that it must be lifted up above it selfe, that it may not bring into the sight of God any of those things which our blinde and fooliſh reason is wont to imagine, nor may hold it selfe bound within the compasse of her owne vanity, but rise up to pureneſſe worthy for God. The first rule of framing rightly our prayers is to void our cogitations as much as may be from all fleshly and earthly cares.

5. Both these things are specially worthy to be noted, that whosoever prepareth himselfe to pray, should thereto apply all his senses and endevours, and not (as men are wont) be diversly drawne with wandering thoughts: because there is nothing more contrary to the reverence of God, than such lightnesse which is a witnesse of too wanton licentiousnesse, and loose from all feare. In which thing we must so much more earnestly labour as we finde it more hard. For no man can be bent so to pray, but that he shall feele many by thoughts to creepe upon him, either to breake off, or by some bowing and swarving to hinder the course of his prayer. But here let us call to minde, how great an unworthinesse it is, when God receiveth us unto familiar talke with him, to abuse his so great gentlenesse, with mingling holy and prophane things together, when the reverence of him holdeth not our minds fast bound unto him: but as if wee talked with some meane man, we doe in the middest of our prayer, forsaking him, leape hither and thither. Let us therefore know that none doe rightly and well prepare themselves to prayer, but they whom the Majestie of God pierceth, that they come to it uncumbred of earthly cares and affections. And that is meant by the ceremony of lifting up of hands, that men should remember that they be farre distant from God, unlesse they lift up their senses on high. As also it is said in the Psalme. To thee have I lifted up my soule. And the Scripture oftentimes useth this manner of speech, to lift up prayer: that they which desire to be heard of God, should not sit still in their dregs. Let this bee the summe: that how much more liberally God dealeth with us, gently alluring us to unload our cares into his bosome, so much lesse excusable are we, unlesse his so excellent and uncomparable benefit doe with us over-weigh all other things, and draw us unto it selfe, that we may earnestly apply our endevours and senses to pray: which cannot bee done unlesse our minde by strong wrastling with the hinderances doe rise up above them. Another point wee have set forth, that wee aske no more than God giveth leave. For though he biddeth us to powre out our hearts, yet he doth indifferently give loose reines to fooliſh and froward affections: and when he promiseth that he will doe according to the will of the godly, he proceedeth not to so tender bearing with them, that he submitteth himselfe to their will. But in both these points men doe commonly much offend. For not only the most part of men The preparation of the minde unto prayer is a thing of great both weight and difficulty. Psal 25.14.

Psal.62.9. presume without shame, without reverence, to speake to God for their follies, and shamelesly to present to his throne whatsoever liked them in their dreame: but also so great foolishnesse or senslesse dulnesse possesseth them, that they dare thrust into the hearing of God, even all their most filthy desires, whereof they would bee greatly ashamed to make men privie. Some prophane men have laughed to scorne, yea and detested this boldnesse, yet the vice it selfe hath alwayes reigned. And hereby it came to passe that ambitious men have chosen Jupiter to bee their Patron: covetous men, Mercury: the desirous of learning, Appollo and Minerva: warriers, Mars: and lecherous people, Venus. Like as at this day (as I have even now touched) men doe in prayers grant more licence to their unlawfull desires, than when they sportingly talke with their egals. But God suffereth not his gentlenesse to bee so mocked: but claiming to himselfe his right, maketh our prayers subject to his authority, and restraineth them witha bridle. Therefore we must keepe fast this saying of John; This is our affiance, 1 Joh.5.14. that if we aske any thing according to his will, he heareth us. But for as much as our abilities are farre from being sufficient to performe so great perfection, we must seeke a remedy to helpe us. As we ought to bend the sight of our minde to God, so the affection of the heart ought also to follow to the same end. But both doe stay farre beneath it, yea rather doe faint and faile, or be carried a contrary way. Wherefore God to succour this weaknesse, in our prayers giveth the spirit to be our Schoolemaster, to instruct us what is right, and to governe our affections. For, because we know not what we ought to pray as we ought, the spirit commeth to our succour, and maketh intercession for us Rom.8.26. with unspeakable groanes, not that it indeed either prayeth or groaneth, but stirreth up in us affiance, desires, and sighings, which the strength of nature were not able to conceive. And not without cause Paul calleth them unspeakable groanings which so the faithfull send forth by the guiding of the spirit, because they which are truly exercised in prayers, are not ignorant that they be so holden in perplexity with blinde cares, that they scarcely finde what is profitable for them to speake: yea, while they goe about to utter stammering words they sticke fast incumbred. Whereupon it followeth, that the gift of praying rightly is a sigular gift. These things are not spoken to this purpose, that we favouring our owne slothfulnesse, should give over the charge of praying to the spirit of God, and lie dull in that carelesnesse, to which we are too much inclined (as there are heard the wicked sayings of some, that we must lie negligently gaping to wait untill hee prevent our mindes occupied elsewhere) but rather that we loathing our owne slothfulnesse and sluggishnesse, should crave such helpe of 2 Cor.14.26. the Spirit. Neither doth Paul, when he biddeth us to pray in spirit, therefore cease to exhort us to wakefulnesse: meaning that the instinct of the spirit so useth his force to frame our prayers, that it nothing hindereth or slacketh our owne endevour: because God will in this behalfe prove how effectually faith moveth our hearts.

A second rule for direction of praier in the sense and feeling of our owne wants.

6. Let also another law be, that in praying we alway feele our owne want, and that earnestly thinking how we stand in need of those things that we aske, we joyne with our prayer an earnest yea fervent affection to obtaine. For many doe slightly for manner sake receite prayers after a prescribed forme, as though they rendred a certaine taske to God: and although they confesse that this is a necessary remedie for their evils, because it is to their destruction to be without the helpe of God which they crave: yet it appeareth that they doe this duty for custome, forasmuch as in the meane time their minds are cold, and doe not weigh what they aske. The generall and confuse feeling indeed of their necessitie leadeth them hereunto: but it doth not stirre them as it were in a present case to aske releefe of their need. Now what thinke we to be more hatefull and more detestable to God than this faining, when a man asketh forgivenesse of sinnes, in the meane time either thinking that he is not a sinner, or not thinking upon this, that he is a sinner, even wherewith God himselfe is plainly mocked? But of such perversnesse (as I have said) mankinde is full, that for manners sake they many times aske many things of God, which they certainly judge that without his liberalitie to come unto them from some other where, or that they have them already remaining with them. The fault of some other seemeth to bee lighter, and yet not tolerable, that they which have onely conceived this principle, that that we must sacrifice to God with prayers, doe mumble up prayers without any musing of minde upon them. But the godly must principally take heed, that they never come into the sight of God to aske any thing, but because they doe both boile with earnest affection of heart, and doe therewithall desire to obtaine it of him. Yea, and also though in those things which we aske onely to the glory of God, we seeme not at the first sight to provide for her owne necessitie, yet the same ought to be asked with no lesse ferventnesse and vehementnesse of desire. As, when we pray that his name be hallowed, we must (as I may so speake) fervently hunger and thirst for that hallowing.

7. If any men object, that we are not alway driven with the like necessity to pray, I grant the same indeed: and this difference is profitably taught us of James: Is any man heavie among you? Let him pray. Who so is merry, let him sing. Therefore even common feeling teacheth us, that because we are too slothfull, therefore as the matter requireth, we are the more sharply pricked forward of God to pray earnestly. And this David calleth the fit time, because (as he teacheth in many other places) how much more hardly troubles, discommodities, feares, and other kinde of tentations doe presse us, so much freer accesse is open for us, as though God did call us unto him. But yet no lesse true is that saying of Paul, that we must at all times: because howsoever things prosperously flow according to our hearts desire, and matter of mirth doth compasse us on every side, yet there is no minute of time wherein our need doth not exhort us to pray. If a man hath abundance of wine and wheat; yet sith he cannot enjoy one morsell of bread, but by the continuall grace of God, whole Cellers and Barnes full shall be no let why he should not crave daily bread. Now if we call to minde how many dangers doe every moment hang over us, the very feare it selfe will teach us that wee have no time free from prayer. But this we may better perceive in spirituall things. For when shall so many sinnes, whereof we know our selves guilty, suffer us to sit still without care, and not in humblewise crave pardon both of the faults and of the paine? When doe tentations grant us truce, so that wee need not to haste unto helpe? Moreover the desire of the Kingdome and glory of God ought so to plucke us to it selfe, not by fits, but continually, that it should alway be fit time for us. Therefore not without cause we are so often commanded to pray continually. I doe not yet speake of perseverance in prayer, whereof mention shall be made hereafter: but when the Scripture warneth us that we ought to pray continually, it accuseth our slothfulnesse, because we doe not perceive how necessary this care and diligence is for us. By this rule all hypocrisie and craftinesse of lying to God is debarred, yea, driven farre away from prayer. God promiseth that he will be neare to all them that call upon him in truth, and hee pronounceth that they shall finde him which seeke him with their whole heart. But they aspire not thither which please themselves in their owne filthinesse. Therfore a right prayer requireth repentance. Whereupon this is commonly said in Scriptures, that God heareth not wicked doers, and that their prayers are accursed, like as their sacrifices also be: because it is rightfull that they finde the eares of God shut, which doe locke up their owne hearts, and that they should not finde God easie to bow, which doe with their owne hardnesse provoke his stiffenesse. In Esay he threatneth after this manner. When ye shall mutliply your prayers, I will not heare you: for your hands are full of bloud. Againe in Jeremie: I have cried, and they have refused to heare: they shall likewise cry, and I will not heare: because he taketh it for a most high dishonour, that wicked men should boast of his covenant, which do in all their life defile his holy name. Wherefore in Esay he complaineth, that when the Jewes come neare to him with their lips, their heart is farre from him. He speaketh not this of onely prayer, but affirmeth that he abhorreth feigning in all the parts of worshipping him. To which purpose maketh that saying of James. Ye aske, and receive not: because ye aske ill, that yee may spend it upon your pleasures. It is true indeed (as we shall againe shew a little hereafter) that the prayers of the godly, which they powre out, doe not rest upon their owne worthinesse: yet is not that admonition of John superfluous, if we aske any thing, we shall receive it of him, because we keepe his commandements: forasmuch as an evill conscience shutteth the gate against us. Whereupon followeth that none doe rightly pray, nor are heard, but the pure worshippers of God. Therefore whosoever prepareth himselfe

Although there be no time wherein prayer needeth not, yet at sometime we see a speciall necessity thereof, but reape no benefit thereby at any time without a loathing of our owne filthinesse which cannot be in us but by repentance.

himſelfe to pray, let him be loathfull to himſelfe in his owne evils, and (which cannot be done without repentance) let him put on the perſon and minde of a begger.

The third rule of prayer is the unfained humbling and abaſing of our ſelves.

8. Hereunto let the third rule be joyned, that whoſoever preſenteth himſelfe before God to pray, ſhould forſake all thinking of his owne glory, put off all opinion of worthineſſe, and finally give over all truſt of himſelfe, giving, in the abaſing of himſelfe, the glory wholly to God: leſt if we take any thing, be it never ſo little, to our ſelves, we doe with our owne ſwelling fall away from his face. Of this ſubmiſſion which throweth downe all height, we have often examples in the ſervants of God: among whom the holier that every one is, ſo much the more he is throwne downe when he commeth into the ſight of the Lord. So Daniel, whom the Lord himſelfe commended with ſo great title of praiſe, ſaid: We powre not out our prayers before thee in our righteouſneſſes, but in thy great mercy. Heare us Lord, Lord be mercifull to us: Heare us, and doe theſe things that we aske, for thine owne ſake: becauſe thy name is called upon over the people, and over thy holy place. Neither doth he by a crooked figure (as men ſometime ſpeake) mingle himſelfe with the multitude as one of the people, but rather ſeverally confeſſeth his owne guiltineſſe, and humbly fleeth to the ſanctuary of forgiveneſſe, as he expreſly ſaith: When I confeſſed my ſinnes, and the ſinnes of the people. And this humbleneſſe David alſo ſetteth out with his owne example, when he ſaith, Enter not into judgement with thy ſervant, becauſe in thy ſight every one that liveth ſhall not be juſtified. In ſuch manner Eſay prayeth: Loe thou art angry becauſe we have ſinned, the world is founded in thy wayes, therfore we ſhall be ſaved: And we have beene all filled with uncleanneſſe, and all our righteouſneſſe as a defiled cloth: And we have all withered away as a leafe, and our iniquities doe ſcatter us abroad as the winde: and there is none that calleth upon thy name, that raiſeth up himſelfe to take hold of thee: becauſe thou haſt hid thy face from us, and haſt made us to pine away in the hand of our wickedneſſe. Now therfore O Lord, thou art our father, we are clay, thou art our faſhioner, and we are the worke of thy hand. Bee not angry O Lord, neither remember wickedneſſe for ever. Behold, looke upon us, we are all thy people. Loe, how they ſtand upon no affiance at all, but upon this onely, that thinking upon this, that they be gods, they deſpaire not that he will have care of them. Likewiſe Jeremie; If our iniquities anſwer againſt us, deale thou for thy names ſake. For it is both moſt truly and moſt holy written, of whomſoever it be, which being written by an unknowne authour, is fathered upon the Prophet Baruch: A ſoule heavie and deſolate for the greatneſſe of evill, crooked and weake, a hungry ſoule, and fainting eyes, give glory to thee O Lord. Not according to the righteouſneſſes of our fathers doe we powre our prayers in thy ſight, and aske mercy before thy face O Lord our God: but becauſe thou art mercifull, have mercy upon us, becauſe we have ſinned before thee.

The preface of our prayer muſt be the humble acknowledgement of ſinnes.

9. Finally the beginning, and alſo the preparing of praying rightly, is craving of pardon, with an humble and plaine confeſſion of fault. For neither is it to be hoped, that even the holieſt man my obtaine any thing of God, untill he be freely reconciled to him: neither is it poſſible that God may be favourable to any but them whom he pardoneth. Wherefore it is no marvell if the faithfull doe with this key open to themſelves the doore to pray. Which we learne out of many places of the Pſalmes. For David when he asked another thing, ſaith: Remember not the ſinnes of my youth, remember me according to thy mercy, for thy goodneſſes ſake O Lord. Againe, looke upon my affliction and my labour, and forgive all my ſinnes. Where we alſo ſee that it is not enough, if we every ſeverall day doe call our ſelves to account for our new ſinnes, if we doe not alſo remember thoſe ſins which might ſeeme to have beene long agoe forgotten. For the ſame Prophet in another place, having confeſſed one hainous offence by this occaſion, returneth even to his mothers wombe wherein he had gathered the infection: not to make the fault ſeeme leſſe by the corruption of nature, but that heaping together the ſinnes of his whole life, how much more rigorous he is in condemning himſelfe, ſo much more eaſie he may finde God to intreat. But although the holy ones doe not alway in expreſſe words aske forgiveneſſe of ſinne, yet if we diligently weigh their prayers which the Scripture rehearſeth, we ſhall eaſily finde that which I ſay, that they gathered a minde to pray, of the onely mercy of God, and ſo alway tooke their begionning at appeasing him: because if everie man examine his owne conscience, so far is he from being bolde to open his eares familiarlie with God, that he trembleth at every comming toward him, except that he standeth upon trust of mercie and pardon. There is also another speciall confession, where they aske release of paines, that they also pray to have their sinnes forgiven: because it were an absurditie to will that the effect be taken away while the cause abideth. For we must beware that God be favourable unto us, before that he testifie his favour with outward signes; because both he himselfe will keepe this order, and it should little profit us to have him beneficiall, unlesse our conscience feeling him appeased should throughly make him lovely unto us. Which we are also taught by the answer of Christ. For when hee had decreed to heale the man sicke of the Palsey, he said, Thy sins are forgiven thee: lifting up our mindes thereby to that which is chiefly to bee wished, that God doth first receive us into favour, and then shew forth the fruit of reconciliation in helping us. But beside that speciall confession of present guiltinesse, whereby the faithfull make supplication to obtaine pardon of every speciall fault and paine, that generall preface, which procureth favour to praiers, is never to be omitted, unlesse they be grounded upon the free mercie of God, they shall never obtaine any thing of God. Whereunto may bee referred that saying of John: If we confesse our sinnes, hee is faithfull and righteous to forgive us and cleanse us from all iniquitie. For which cause it behooved prayers in the time of the law to bee hallowed with expiation of blood, that they might be acceptable, and that so the people should be put in minde that they are unworthie of so great a prerogative of honour, till being clensed from their defilings they should of the onely mercie of God conceive affiance to pray.

1 John 1.9.

10. But whereas the holy ones seeme sometime for the entreating of God to alleage the helpe of their owne righteousnes (as when David saith:) Keepe my soule, because I am good. Againe Ezechias: Remember Lord I beseech thee, that I have walked before thee in truth, and have done good in thine eies, by such formes of speaking they meane nothing else than by their verie regeneration to testifie themselves to bee the servants and children of God, to whom he himselfe pronounceth that hee will bee mercifull. He teacheth by the Prophet (as we have already seene) that his eies are upon the righteous, and his eares unto their praiers. Againe by the Apostle, that wee shall obtaine whatsoever we aske, if wee keepe his commandements. In which sayings hee doth not value praier by the worthinesse of workes: but his will is so to stablish their affiance, whose owne conscience well assureth them of an unfained uprightnesse and innocencie, such as all the faithfull ought to be. For the same is taken out of the very truth of God, which the blinde man that had his sight restored, saith in John, that God heareth not sinners: if wee understand sinners after the common use of the Scripture, for such as without all desire of righteousnesse doe altogether sleepe and rest upon their sinnes: forasmuch as no heart can ever breake forth into unfained calling upon God which doth not also aspire to godlinesse. Therefore with such promises accord the praiers of the holy ones, wherein they make mention of their owne pureness or innocency that they may feele that to bee given them, which is to be looked for of all the servants of God. Againe it is then commonly found that they use this kind of praier, when they doe in the presence of the Lord compare themselves with their enemies, from whose unjust dealing they wished themselves to bee delivered by his hand. In this comparison it is no marvell if they brought forth their righteousnesse, and simplicity of heart to move him the rather by the rightfulnesse of their cause to helpe them. This therefore we take not away from the godly heart of a good man, but that he may use the pureness of his conscience before the Lord, to strengthen himselfe in the promises wherewith the Lord comforteth and upholdeth his true worshippers: but our meaning is, that the trust of obtaining stand upon the onely mercy of God, laying away all thinking of their owne deserving.

Prayer is fruitlesse where there is not an unfained assuring unto godlines, such as David and Ezechias mention in their praying, as warranted thereby that they could not pray in vaine

11. The fourth rule is, that being so throwne downe and subdued with true humility, wee should nevertheless with certaine hope of obtaining be encouraged to pray. These bee things indeed contrary in shew to joyne with the feeling of the just vengeance of Gods sure affiance of favour: which things doe yet very well agree together,

The fourth rule of praier is courage grounded upon certaine hope and trust to obtaine the thing we pray for.

if the onely goodnesse of God raise us up being oppressed with our owne evils. For as we have before taught that repentance and faith are knit as companions together with an unseparable bond: of which yet the one afraieth us, the other cheareth us: so in praiers they must mutually meete together: And this agreement David expresseth in few words: I (saith he) will in the multitude of thy goodnesse enter into thy house: I will worship in the Temple of thy holinesse with feare. Under the goodnesse of God he comprehendeth faith, in the meane time not excluding feare: because not onely his majesty driveth us to reverence, but also our owne unworthinesse holdeth us in feare forgetting all pride and assuredneſse. But I meane not such affiance, which should stroke the minde losed from all feeling of carefulnesse with a sweet and full quietnesse. For, to rest so peaceably is the doing of them which having all things flowing as they would wish it, are touched with no care, are kindled with no desire, doe swell with no feare. And it is a very good spurre to the holy ones to call upon God, when being distressed with their owne necessity, they are vexed with most great unquietnesse, and are almost dismaid in themselves, till faith come in fit time to their succours, because in such distresses the goodnesse of God so shineth to them, that they doe indeed grone being wearied with weight of present evils, they are also in paine and grieved with feare of greater: yet being so upholden by it, they both releeve and comfort the hardnesse of bearing them, and doe hope for escape and deliverance. Therefore the praier of a godly man must arise out of both affections, must also containe and shew both: namely to grone for present evils, and to be carefully afraid of new, and yet therewithall to flie to God, not doubting that he is ready to reach his helping hand. For God is marvellously provoked to wrath by our distrustfulnesse, if wee aske of him the benefits which we hope not to obtaine. Therefore there is nothing more agreeable with the nature of praiers, than that this law be prescribed and appointed to them, that they breake not forth rashly, but follow faith going before them. To this principle Christ calleth us all with this saying: I say unto you, whatsoever things ye require, beleeve that ye shall receive them, and they shall happen to you. The same also he confirmeth in another place. Whatsoever ye aske in praier beleeving, ye shall receive. Wherewith agreeth Iames, saying, If any need wisdome, let him aske it of him which giveth to all men freely, and upbraideth not: but let him aske in faith not doubting. Wherein setting doubting as contrarie to faith, he doth most fitly expresse the nature of it. And no lesse is that to be noted which he addeth, that they obtaine nothing which call upon God in wavering and doubt, and doe not determine in their hearts whether they shall bee heard or no. Whom hee also compareth to waves which are diversly tossed and driven about of the winde. Whereupon in another place he calleth a right praier, the prayer of faith. Againe when God so oft affirmeth that he will give to every one according to his faith, he signifieth that we obtaine nothing without faith. Finally it is faith that obtaineth whatsoever is granted by praier. This is meant by that notable saying of Paul, which the foolish men doe take no heed unto. How shall any man call upon him, in whom hee hath not beleeved? But who shall beleeve, unlesse he have heard? But faith commeth of hearing, and hearing of the word of God. For conveighing by degrees the beginning of praier from faith, he plainly affirmeth that God cannot be sincerely called upon of any other, than them to whom by the preaching of the Gospell his mercifulnesse and gentlenesse hath beene made knowne, and familiarly declared.

Psal. 5. 8.

Mat. 11. 24. Mat. 21. 22.

Jam. 5. 15.

Rom. 10. 14.

It is a thing not absurd but most necessarie, that they which call upon God have an assured confidence in his favour, and a stedfast feeling of his good will.

12. This necessity our adversaries doe not thinke upon. Therefore when wee bid the faithfull to hold with assured confidence of minde that God is favourable and beareth good will to them, they thinke that we speake a most great absurditie. But if they had any use of true praier, they would truly understand that God cannot bee rightly called upon without that stedfast feeling of Gods good will. Sith no man can well perceive the force of faith, but he which by experience feeleth it in his heart: what may a man profit by disputing with such men which doe openly shew, that they never had any thing but a vaine imagination? For of what force, and how necessarie is that assuredneſse which we require, is chiefly learned by invocation. Which who so seeth not, he bewraieth that he hath a very dull conscience. Let us therefore, leaving this kinde of blinde men, sticke fast in that saying of Paul, that God cannot bee called upon of any other other, but them that know his mercie by the Gospell, and are surely perswaded that it is ready for them. For what manner of saying should this be? O Lord, I am verily in doubt whether thou wilt heare me: but because I am distressed with carefulnesse, I flee to thee, that thou maist helpe me if I be worthy. This was not the wonted manner of all the holy ones, whose praiers we read in the Scriptures. Neither hath the holy Ghost thus taught us by the Apostle, which biddeth us to goe to the heavenlie throne with confidence, that we may obtaine grace, and when in another place he teacheth that wee have boldnesse and accesse in confidence by the faith of Christ. Wee must therefore hold fast with both hands this assurednesse to obtaine what we aske (sith both the Lord with his owne voice so commandeth us, and all the holy ones teach it by their example) if we will pray with fruit. For, that onely praier is pleasing to God which springeth out of such a presumption of faith (as I may so call it) and is grounded upon a dreadlesse certaintie of faith. He might have been content with the bare name of faith, but he not onely added confidence, but also furnished the same with libertie or boldnesse, by this marke to put difference betweene us and unbeleevers, which doe indeed also pray to God as we doe, but at adventure. For which reason the whole Church praieth in the Psalme: Let thy mercie be upon us, as we put our trust in thee. The same condition is also spoken of in another place by the Prophet: In what day I shall cry, this I know that God is with me. Againe, In the morning I will direct my selfe to thee, and I will watch. For of these words we gather, that praiers are in vaine cast into the aire, unlesse hope be adjoyned, from whence as out of a watch tower we may quietly waite for the Lord. Wherewith agreeth the order of Pauls exhortation. For before that hee move the faithfull to pray in spirit at all times with wakefulnesse and diligence, hee first of all biddeth them to take the shield of Faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. Now let the Readers here call to remembrance that which I have before said, that faith is not overthrown where it is joyned with acknowledging of our miserie, needinesse, and filthinesse. For with how heavie weight soever of evill doings the faithfull feele themselves to be overloaden or grieved, and that they bee not onely void of all things which may procure favour with God, but also that they bee burdened with many offences which may worthilie make him dreadfull to them: yet they cease not to present themselves, neither doth this feeling make them so afraid but that they still resort to him, forasmuch as there is no other way to come to him. For prayer was not ordeined, whereby we should arrogantly advance our selves before God, or esteeme at great value any thing of our owne, but whereby confessing our guiltinesse, wee would bewaile our miseries to him, as children doe familiarly open their complaints to their parents. But rather the unmeasurable heape of our evils ought to be full of spurres or pricks to pricke us forward to pray. As also the Prophet teacheth us by his example, saying: Heale my soule, because I have sinned against thee, I grant indeed that in such sayings should be deadly prickings unlesse God did helpe: but the most good father of his incomparable tender kindnesse hath brought remedie in fit season, whereby appeasing all trouble, asswaging all cares, wiping away feares, he might gently allure us to him, yea, and taking away all doubts (much more all stops) he might make us an easie way.

13. And first when he commandeth us to pray, hee doth by the very same commandement accuse us of wicked obstinacie, unlesse wee obey him. Nothing could bee more precisely commanded, than that which is in the Psalme: Call upon me in the day of trouble. But forasmuch as among all the duties of godlinesse, the Scripture commendeth none more often, I need not to tarrie longer upon this point. Aske (saith our master) and ye shall receive, knocke, it shall be opened to you. Howbeit heere is also with the commandement joyned a promise as it is necessary. For though all men confesse that the commandement ought to bee obeyed, yet the most part would flee from God, when he calleth, unlesse he promised that he would be easie to bee intreated, yea and would offer himselfe. These two things being stablished, it is certaine that whosoever make delaies that they come not straight to God, are not onely rebellious and disobedient, but also are proved guiltie of infidelitie, because they distrust the promises. Which is so much more to be noted, because hypocrites under the colour of humilitie and and modestie doe as well proudly despise the commandement of God, as discredit his gentle calling, yea and defraud him of the chiefe part of his worship. For after that he hath refused sacrifices, in which all that times holinesse seemed to stand, he declareth that this is the chiefe thing and most precious to him above all other, to be called upon in the day of need. Therefore where hee requireth his owne, and encourageth us to cheerefulnesse of obeying, there are none so gay colours of doubting that may excuse us. Wherefore how many testimonies are commonly found in the Scriptures whereby we are commanded to call upon God, so many standards are set up before our eies to put affiance into us. It were rashnesse to rush into the sight of God, unlesse hee did prevent us with calling us. Therefore he openeth us the way with his owne voice saying: Zach. 13. 9. I will say to them, Yee are my people: and they shall say to me, thou art our God. We see how he preventeth them that worship him, and willeth them to follow him, and therefore it is not to be feared that this should not be a very sweet melodie which hee tuneth, Specially let this notable title of God come in our minde, whereupon if we stay we shall easily passe over all stops. Thou God that heares prayer, even to thee shall all flesh come. Psal. 65. 3. For what is more lovely or more alluring, than that God be garnished with this title, which may ascertaine us that nothing is more proper to his nature, than to grant the desire of humble suters? Hereby the Prophet gathereth that the gate standeth open not onely to a few, but to all men; because he speaketh even to all in this saying: Psal. 50. 15. Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorifie me. According to this rule David laieth for himselfe that a promise was given him, that he may obtaine what he asketh: 2 Sam. 7. 27. Thou Lord hast revealed into the eare of thy servant: therefore thy servant hath found his heart to pray. Whereupon we gather that he was fearefull, saving in so much as the promise had encouraged him. So in another place hee armeth himselfe with this generall doctrine. Psal. 145. 19. He will doe the will of them that feare him. Yea and this we may note in the Psalmes, that as it were breaking his course of praying, he passeth over sometime to the power of God, sometime to his goodnesse, sometime to the truth of his promises. It might seeme that David by unseasonable thrusting in of these sentences made mangled praiers: but the faithfull know by use and experience that ferventnesse fainteth, unlesse they put new nourishments unto it, and therefore in praying, the meditation both of the nature of God, and of his word is not superfluous. And so by the example of David: let it not grieve us to thrust in such things as may refresh fainting hearts with new lively strength.

Our sluggishnesse notwithstanding so many so effectuall motives unto this heavenly exercise.

14. And it is wonderfull that with so great sweetnesse of promises we are either but coldly or almost not at all moved, that a great part of men wandering about by compasses had rather leaving the fountaine of living waters, to dig for themselves drie pits, than to embrace the liberality of God freely offered. An invincible tower is the name of the Lord (saith Salomon) to it the righteous man shall flee, and he shall bee saved. Prov. 18. 10. And Ioel, after that hee had prophecied of that horrible destruction which was at hand, addeth this notable sentence. Whosoever calleth upon the name of the Lord, shall be safe: which sentence we know to pertaine properly to the course of the Gospel. Ioel 2. 32. Scarcely every hundreth man is moved to goe forward to meete God. Hee himselfe crieth by Esay: Yee shall call upon me, and I will heare you, yea, before that yee crie, I will answer you. Esa. 65. 24. And the same honour also in another place he vouchafeth to give in common to the whole Church, as it belongeth to all the members of Christ. He hath cried to me, I will heare him, I am in trouble with him, that I may deliver him. Psal. 91. 15. Neither yet (as I have already said) it is my purpose to reckon up all the places, but to choose out the chiefe, by which wee may take a taste how kindely God allureth us unto him, and with how strait bonds our unthankfulnesse is bound, when among so sharpe prickings our sluggishnesse still maketh delay. Wherefore also let these sayings also sound in our eares: Psal. 145. The Lord is nigh to all them that call upon him, that call upon him in truth: also these sayings which we have alleaged out of Esay and Ioel, by which God affirmeth that he is heedfull to heare prayers, yea and is delighted as with a sacrifice of sweet savour, when we cast our cares upon him. This singular fruit wee receive of the promises of God, when wee make our praiers not doubtingly and fearefully: but trusting upon his word, whose majestie would otherwise make us afraid, wee dare call call upon him by the name of Father, for as much as he vouchsafeth to put this moſt ſweete name into our mouthes. It remaineth that we having ſuch allurements ſhould know that we have thereby matter enough to obtaine our prayers: for as much as our prayers ſtand upon no merit of our owne, but all their worthineſſe and hope of obtaining are grounded upon the promiſes of God, and hang upon them: ſo that it needeth none other underpropping, nor looketh upward hither or thither. Therefore we muſt determine in our mindes, that although we excell not in like holineſſe as is prayſed in the holie Fathers, Prophets, and Apoſtles, yet becauſe the commandement of prayer is common to us, and faith is alſo common, if we reſt upon the word of God, in this right we are fellowes with them. For God (as we have before ſhewed) promiſing that he will be gentle, and mercifull to all, giveth cauſe of hope to all, even the moſt miſerable, that they ſhall obtaine what they aske. And therefore the generall formes are to be noted, from which no man (as they ſay) from the firſt to the laſt is excluded: onely let there be preſent a pureneſſe of heart, miſliking of our ſelves, humilitie, and faith: let not our hypocriſie unholilie abuſe the name of God with deceitfull calling upon it: the moſt good father will not put backe them, whom he not only exhorteth to come to him, but alſo moveth them by all the meanes that he can. Hereupon commeth the manner of praying of David which I have even now rehearſed. Loe thou haſt promiſed, Lord, to thy ſervant: for this cauſe thy ſervant at this day gathereth courage, and hath found what prayer he might make before thee. Now therefore O Lord God, thou art God, and thy words ſhall be true. Thou haſt ſpoken to thy ſervant of theſe benefits: begin therefore, and doe them. As alſo in another place, Performe to thy ſervant according to thy word. And all the Iſraelites together, ſo oft as they arme themſelves with remembrance of the covenant, doe ſufficiently declare that we ſhould not pray fearefully, whereas the Lord ſo appointeth. And herein they followed the examples of the Fathers, ſpecially of Jacob, which after that he had confeſſed that he was unworthie of ſo many mercies which he had received at the hand of God, yet he ſaieth that he is encouraged to require greater things, becauſe God had promiſed that he would doe them. But whatſoever colours the unbeleevers doe pretend, when they flee not to God ſo oft as neceſſitie preſſeth them, when they ſeeke not him nor crave his help, they doe as much defraud him of his due honour; as if they made to themſelves new gods and idols: for by this meane they denie that he is to them the authour of all good things. On the other ſide, there is nothing ſtronger to deliver the godly from all doubt, than to be armed with this thought, that no ſtop ought to ſtay them while they obey the commandement of God, which pronounceth that nothing is more pleaſing to him than obedience. Heere againe that which I ſaid before more clearly appeareth, that a dreadleſſe ſpirit to pray agreeth well with feare, reverence, and carefulneſſe: and that it is no abſurditie to ſay that God raiſeth up the overthrowne. After this manner thoſe formes of ſpeech agree well together which in ſeeming are contrarie. Jeremie and Daniel ſay that they throw downe prayers before God. In another place Jeremie ſaith: Let our prayer fall downe in the ſight of God, that he may have mercie on the remnant of his people. On the other ſide, the faithfull are oftentimes ſaid to lift up prayer. So ſpeaketh Ezechias, requiring the Prophet to make interceſſion for him. And David deſireth that his prayer may aſcend as incenſe. For although they being perſwaded of the fatherly love of God, cheerefully commit themſelves into his faithfull keeping, and doubt not to crave the helpe which he freely promiſeth: yet doth not an idle carefulneſſe lift them up, as though they had caſt away ſhame, but they aſcend ſo upward by degrees of promiſes, that they ſtill remaine humble ſuppliants in the abaſement of themſelves.

15 * Here are queſtions objected more than one. For the Scripture reporteth that the Lord granted certaine deſires which yet brake forth of a minde not quiet nor well framed. Verily for a juſt cauſe: Joatham had avowed the inhabitants of Sichem, to the deſtruction which afterward came upon them: but yet God kindled with ferventneſſe of anger and vengeance following his execration ſeemeth to allow will tempered violent paſſions. Such heat alſo carried Sampſon when he ſaid, Strengthen me O God, that I may take vengeance of the uncircumciſed. For though there were ſome peece of good zeale mingled with it: yet a hote, and therefore faultie greedineſſe of vengeance did beare rule therein. God granted it. Whereupon it ſeemeth that it may be gathered, that although the praiers be not framed according to the preſcribed rule of the word, yet they obtaine their effect. I anſwere firſt that a generall law is not taken away by ſingular examples: againe, that ſometime ſpeciall motions have beene put into a few men, whereby it came to paſſe that there was another conſideration of them than of the common people. For the anſwere of Chriſt is to be noted, when the Diſciples did undiſcretly deſire to counterfait the example of Elias, that they knew not with what Spirit they were endued. But we muſt goe yet further, and ſay that the praiers doe not alway pleaſe God which he graunteth: but that, ſo much as ſerveth for example that is by cleare praiſe made plaine which the Scripture teacheth, namely that he ſuccoureth the miſerable, heareth the gronings of them which being unjuſtly troubled doe crave his helpe: that therefore hee executeth his judgements, when the complaints of the poore riſe up to him, although they be unworthie to obtaine any thing be it never ſo little. For how oft hath he taken vengeance of the cruelties, robberies, violence, filthy luſtes, and other wicked doings of the ungodly, ſubduing their boldneſſe and rage, and alſo overthrowing their tyrannous power, teſtified that he helpeth the unworthily oppreſſed, which yet did beate the aire with praying to an uncertaine Godhead? And one Pſalme plainely teacheth that the prayers want not effect, which yet doe not pearce into heaven by faith. For he gathereth together thoſe prayers which neceſſitie wringeth no leſſe out of the unbeleevers than out of the godly by the verie feeling of nature: to which yet he proveth by the effect, that God is favourable. Is it becauſe he doth with ſuch gentleneſſe teſtifie that they be pleaſing to him? No. But to enlarge or to ſet out his mercie by this circumſtance, for that even to unbeleevers their prayers are not denied: and then the more to pricke forward his true worſhippers to pray, when they ſee that prophane wailings ſometime want not their effect. Yet there is no cauſe why the faithfull ſhould ſwarve from the law laid upon them by God, or ſhould envie the unbeleevers, as though they had gotten ſome great gaine, when they obtained their deſire. After this manner wee have ſaid, that the Lord was bowed with the Repentance of Achab, that he might ſhew by this example how eaſie he is to entreat toward his elect, when true turning is brought to appeaſe him. Therefore in the Pſalme he blameth the Jewes, that they having by experience proved him ſo eaſie to grant their prayers, yet within a little after returned to the ſtubbornneſſe of their nature. Which alſo plainely appeareth by the hiſtorie of the Judges: namely that ſo oft as they wept, although their teares were deceitfull, yet they were delivered out of the hands of their enemies. As therefore the Lord indifferently bringeth forth his Sunne upon the good and the evill: ſo doth he alſo not deſpiſe their weepings, whoſe cauſe is righteous and their miſeries worthie of helpe. In the meane time he no more heareth theſe to ſalvation, than heerein miniſtreth foode to the deſpiſers of his goodneſſe. The queſtion ſeemeth to be ſomewhat harder of Abraham and Samuel: of whom the one being warranted by no word of God, prayed for the Sodomites: the other againſt a manifeſt forbidding prayed for Saul. Likewiſe is it of Jeremie which praied that the Citie might not be deſtroyed. For though their requeſtes were denied, yet it ſeemeth hard to take faith from them. But this ſolution ſhall (as I truſt) ſatisfie ſober readers: that they being inſtructed with the generall principles, whereby God commandeth them to be mercifull even alſo to the unworthie, were not altogether without faith, although in a ſpeciall caſe their opinion deceived them. Auguſtine writeth wiſely in a certaine place. How (ſaith he) doe the holy ones pray by faith, to aske of God contrarie to that which he hath decreed? Even becauſe they pray according to his will: not that hidden and unchangeable will, but the will which he inſpireth into them, that he may heare them after another manner: as he wiſely maketh difference. This is well ſaid: becauſe after his incomprehenſible counſell he ſo tempereth the ſucceſſes of things, that the praiers of the holy ones be not voide which are wrapped both with faith and error together. Neither yet ought this more to availe to be an example to follow, than it excuſeth the holy ones themſelves, whom I denie not to have paſſed meaſure. Wherefore where appeareth no certaine promiſe, we muſt aske of God with a condition adjoyned.

To

To which purpose serveth that saying of David. Watch to the judgement which thou hast commanded: because he telleth that he was warranted by a speciall oracle to aske a temporall benefit. Psal. 7. 7.

16 This also it is profitable to note, that those things which I have spoken of the fower rules of right praier, are not so exactly required with extreame rigour, that God refuseth the prayers in which he shall not finde either perfect faith or perfect repentance together with a ferventnesse of zeale and well ordered requestes. We have said that although prayer be a familiar talke of the godly with God, yet wee must keepe a reverence and modestie, that we give not loose reines to all requestes whatsoever they be, and that we desire no more, than God giveth leave: and then, least the majestie of God should grow in contempt with us, that wee must lift up our mindes upward to a pure and undefiled worshipping of him. This no man hath ever performed with such pureness as it ought to be. For (to speake nothing of the common sort) how many complaintes of David doe savour of untemperance: not that hee meant of purpose to quarrell with God, or carpe against his judgements: but because hee fainting for weakness, found no other better comfort, than to cast his sorrowes into his bosome. Yea and God beareth with our childish speech and pardoneth our ignorance, so oft as any thing unadvisedly escapeth us: as truely without this tender bearing, there should be no libertie of praying. But although Davids minde was to submit himselfe wholly to the will of God, and he prayed with no lesse patience than desire to obtaine: yet there arise yea boile out sometimes troublous affections, which are much disagreeing from the first rule that wee have set. Specially wee may perceive by the conclusion of the xxxix. Psalme, with how great vehemencie of sorrow that holy man was carried away, that he could not keepe measure. Cease (saith he) from me, till I goe away and be not. A man would say that he like a desperate man desireth nothing else but that the hand of God ceassing, he might rot in his evils. Hee saith it not for that he with an avowed minde runneth into such outrage, or (as the reprobate are woont) would have God to depart from him: but onely he complaineth that the wrath of GOD is too heavie for him to beare. In these tentations also there fall out oftentimes requestes not well framed according to the rule of the word of God, and in which the holie Ones doe not sufficiently weigh what is lawfull and expedient. Whatsoever praiers are spotted with these faults, they deserve to be refused: yet if the holie Ones doe bewaile, correct themselves, and by and by come to themselves againe, God pardoneth them. So they offend also in the second rule, because they are oftentimes driven to wrastle with their owne coldnesse, and their neede and miserie doth not sharpely enough pricke them to pray earnestly. And oftentimes it happeneth that their mindes doe slip aside, and in a manner wander away into vanitie. Therefore in this behalfe also there is neede of pardon, least our faint, or unperfect, or broken and wandering praiers have a deniall. This God hath naturally planted in the mindes of men, that prayers are not perfect but with mindes lifted upward. Hereupon came the ceremonie of lifting up of hands, as we have before said, which hath been used in all ages and nations, as yet it is in use. But how many a one is there, which when he lifteth up his hands doth not in his owne conscience finde himselfe dull, because his heart resteth upon the ground? As touching the asking of forgivenesse of sinnes, although none of the faithfull doe overpasse it, yet they which are truly exercised in prayers doe feele that they bring scarcely the tenth part of that sacrifice, of which David speaketh. An acceptable sacrifice to God is a troubled Spirit: a broken and humble heart O God thou wilt not despise. Psal. 51. 19. So there is alway a double pardon to be asked, both because they know themselves guiltie in consciences of many faultes, with feeling whereof they are not yet so touched, that they mislike themselves so much as they ought: and also that, so much as it is given them to profit in repentance and in the feare of God, they being throwen downe with just sorrow for their offences, should pray to escape the punishment of the Judge. Chiefly the feeblenes or imperfection of faith corrupteth the praiers of the faithful, unles the tender mercy of God did helpe them. But it is no marvel that God pardoneth this default, which doth oftentimes exercise them that be his with sharp instructions, as if he should of purpose quench their faith. This is a most hard tentation, when the faithfull are compelled to cry: How long wilt thou be angry upon the praier of thy ſervant? as though the very praiers made God more angry. So when Jeremy ſaieth: The Lord hath ſhut out my praier, it is no doubt that he was ſhaken with a violent pang of trouble. Innumerable ſuch examples are commonly found in the Scriptures, by which appeareth that the Faith of the holy Ones was oftentimes mingled and toſſed with doubtings, that in beleeving and hoping they bewraied yet ſome unfaithfulneſſe: but becauſe they come not ſo far as it is to be wiſhed, they ought to indevour ſo much the more that their faults being amended, they may daily come neerer to the perfect rule of praying, and in the meane time to feele in how great a depth of evils they be drowned, which even in the very remedies doe get to themſelves new diſeaſes: ſith there is no praier, which the Lord doth not worthily loath, unleſſe he winke at the ſpots wherwith they are all beſprinkled. I rehearſe not theſe things to this end that the Faithfull ſhould careleſly pardon themſelves any thing, but that in ſharply chaſtiſing themſelves they ſhould travell to overcome theſe ſtops, and although Satan labour to ſtop up all the waies, that he may keepe them from praying, yet nevertheleſſe they ſhould breake through, being certainely perſwaded, that although they be not uncombred of all hinderances, yet their indevours doe pleaſe God, and their praiers are allowed of him, ſo that they travaile and bend themſelves thitherward, whither they doe not by and by attaine.

That the conſcience of our own imbecillitie diſcourage us not too much, we are to releeve our ſelves in praier with the mediation of Chriſt Ieſus beſides whoſe name no other by way of interceſſion ſhould be mentioned in our prayers.

1 Tim. 1. 5.
1 John 2. 1.
Heb. 4. 15.

17 But for aſmuch as there is no man worthy to preſent himſelfe to God, and to come into his ſight: the heavenly Father himſelfe to deliver us both from ſhame and feare which ſhould have throwne downe all our courages, hath given to us his Sonne Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, to be an Advocate and Mediatour with him for us, by whoſe leading we may boldly come to him, truſting that we have ſuch an interceſſor, nothing ſhall be denied us which we aske in his name, as nothing can be denied him of the Father. And hereunto muſt be all referred whatſoever we have heretofore taught concerning Faith: becauſe as the promiſe ſetteth out unto us Chriſt for our Mediatour, ſo unleſſe our hope of obtaining ſtay upon him, it taketh from it ſelfe the benefit of praying. For ſo ſoone as the terrible majeſtie of God commeth in our minde it is impoſſible but that we ſhould tremble for feare, and the acknowledging of our owne unworthineſſe ſhould drive us far away, till Chriſt come meane betweene us and him, which may change the throne and dreadfull glory into the throne of grace: as alſo the Apoſtle teacheth that we may be bold to appeare with all confidence which ſhall obtaine mercy and finde grace in helpe comming in fit ſeaſon. And as there is a law ſet that we ſhould call upon God like as there is a promiſe given, that they ſhall be heard which call upon him: ſo are we peculiarly commanded to call upon him in the name of Chriſt, and we have a promiſe ſet forth, that we ſhall obtaine that which we ſhall aske in his name. Hitherto (ſaith he) ye have not asked any thing in my name: aske and ye ſhall receive. In that day ye ſhall aske in my name, and whatſoever ye aske, I will doe that the father may be glohified in the ſon. Hereby it is plaine without controverſie, that they which call upon God in any other name than of Chriſt, do ſtubbornly breake his commandements, and regard his will as nothing, and that they have no promiſe to obtaine any thing. For (as Paul ſaith) all the promiſes of God are in Chriſt, yea and Amen, that is to ſay, they are confirmed and fulfilled.

Exod. 28. 9. & 10. 21.

18 And the circumſtance of the time is diligently to be marked, where Chriſt commandeth his diſciples to flee to interceſſion to him after that he is gone up into heaven. In that hower (ſaith he) ye ſhall aske in my name. It is certaine that even from the beginning none were heard that praied, but by meane of the Mediatour. For this reaſon the Lord had ordained in the law, that the Prieſt alone entering into the ſanctuary, ſhould beare upon his ſhoulders the names of the tribes of Iſrael, and as many precious ſtones before his breaſt: but the people ſhould ſtand a far off in the porch, and from thence ſhould joyne their praiers with the Prieſt. Yea and the ſacrifice availed hereto, that the praiers ſhould be made ſure and of force. Therefore that ſhadowiſh ceremony of the law taught that wee are all ſhut out from the face of God, and that therefore wee neede a Mediatour, which may appeare in our name, and may beare us upon his ſhoulders, and hold us faſt bound to his breaſt, that wee may be heard in his perſon:

perſon: then that by ſprinkling of bloud our praiers are cleanſed, which (as wee have alreadie ſaid) are never voide of filthineſſe. And we ſee that the holie ones, when they deſired to obtaine any thing, grounded their hope upon ſacrifices, becauſe they knew them to bee the ſtabliſhings of all requeſts. Let him remember thy offering (ſaith David) and make thy burnt offering fatte. Hereupon is gathered that God hath beene from the beginning appeaſed by the interceſſion of Chriſt, to receive the praiers of the godly. Why then doth Chriſt appoint a new heire, when his Diſciples ſhall beginne to pray in his name, but becauſe this grace, as it is at this day more glorious, ſo deſerveth more commendation with us. And in this ſame ſenſe hee had ſaid a little before. Hitherto yee have not asked any thing in my name, now aske. Not that they underſtood nothing at all of the office of the Mediatour (whereas all the Jewes were inſtructed in the principles) but becauſe they had not yet clearely knowne that Chriſt by his aſcending into heaven ſhould be a ſurer patrone of the Church than he was before. Therefore to comfort their griefe of his abſence without ſome ſpeciall fruit, he claimeth to himſelfe the office of an advocate, and teacheth that they have hitherto wanted the chiefe benefit, which it ſhall bee granted them to enjoy, when being aided by his mediation, they ſhall more freely call upon GOD: As the Apoſtle ſaith that his new way is dedicate in his bloud. And ſo much leſſe excuſable is our frowardneſſe, unleſſe wee doe with both armes (as the ſaying is) embrace ſo ineſtimable benefit, which is properly appointed for us. Heb. 10, 20.

19. Now whereas he is the onely way, and the onely entrie by which it is granted us to come in unto God: who ſo doe ſwarve from this way and forſake this entrie, for them there remaineth no way nor entry to God: there is nothing left in his throne but wrath, judgement, and terrour. Finally ſith the Father hath marked him for our head, and guide, they which doe in any wiſe ſwarve or goe away from him, doe labour as much as in them lieth to race out and disfigure the marke which God hath imprinted. So Chriſt is ſet to be the onely Mediator, by whoſe interceſſion the Father may be made to us favourable and eaſie to be entreated. Howbeit in the meane time the holy ones have their interceſſions left to them, whereby they doe mutually commend the ſafetie one of another to God, of which the Apoſtle maketh mention: but thoſe bee ſuch as hang upon that one onely interceſſion: ſo far is it off, that they miniſh any thing of it. For as they ſpring out of the affection of love, wherewith wee embrace one another, as the members of one bodie: ſo they are alſo referred to the unitie of the head. Sith therefore they alſo are made in the name of Chriſt, what doe they elſe but teſtifie that no man can bee holpen by any prayers at all, but with the interceſſion of Chriſt? And as Chriſt with his interceſſion withſtandeth not, but that in the Church we may with praiers be advocates one for another: ſo let this remaine certaine, that all the interceſſors of the whole church ought to be directed to that onely one. Yea and for this cauſe we ought ſpeciallie to beware of unthankfulneſſe, becauſe God pardoning our unworthineſſe, doth not onely give leave to every one of us to pray for himſelfe, but alſo admitteth us to bee entreaters one for another. For, where God appointeth advocates for his Church which deſerve worthily to bee rejected if they pray privately every one for himſelfe: what a pride were it to abuſe this libertie to darken the honour of Chriſt.

The interceſſion of Chriſt withſtandeth not but that we may bee advocates one for another: ſo that we know that the force of our mutuall praiers dependeth wholly upon him without whom it were in vaine to intreat either for others or for our ſelves. 1 Tit. 2. 1.

20. Now it is a meere trifling, which the Sophiſters babble, that Chriſt is the Mediator of redemption, but the faithfull are Mediators of interceſſion. As though Chriſt having performed a Mediation for a time, hath given to his ſervants that eternall Mediatourſhip which ſhall never die. Full curteouſly forſooth they handle him, that cut away ſo little a portion of honour from him. But the Scripture ſaith farre otherwiſe, with the ſimplicitie whereof a good man ought to bee contented, leaving theſe deceivers. For where John ſaith, that if any doe ſinne, we have an advocate with the Father Chriſt Jeſus: doth he meane that he was once in olde time a patrone for us, and not rather aſſigned to him an everlaſting interceſſion? How ſay wee to this that Paul alſo affirmeth, that hee ſitteth at the right hand of God the father and maketh interceſſion for us? And when in another place hee calleth him the onely Mediatour of God and men: meaneth hee not of prayers, of which hee had a little before made mention? For when he had before ſaid that interceſſion muſt bee made for all men: for proofe of that saying, he by and by addeth; that of all men there is one God and one Mediator. And none otherwise doth Augustine expound it, when he saith thus: Christian men do mutually commend themselves in their praiers. But hee for whom none maketh intercession, but hee for all, he is the true and onely Mediatour. Paul the Apostle, though he were a principall member under the head (yet because he was a member of the body of Christ, and knew that the greatest and truest Priest of the Church entred, not by a figure, into the inward places of the vaile, to the holy of holy places, but by expresse and stedfast truth into the innermost places of heaven, to a holinesse not shadowish but eternall) commendeth himselfe also to the prayers of the faithfull. Neither doth hee make himselfe a Mediatour between the people and God, but prayeth that all the members of the body of Christ should mutually pray for him: because the members are carefull one for another: and if one member suffer, the other suffer with it. And that so the mutuall praiers one for another of all the members yet travelling in earth may ascend to the head which is gone before into heaven, in whom is appeasement for our sinnes. For if Paul were a Mediatour, the other Apostles should also bee Mediatours: and if there were many Mediatours, then neither should Pauls owne reason stand fast, in which he had said, For there is one God, one Mediatour of one God and men, the man Christ, in whom wee also are one if wee keepe the unitie of faith in the bond of peace. Againe in another place. But if thou seeke for a Priest, hee is above the heavens, where he maketh intercession for thee, which in earth died for thee. Yet doe wee not dreame that he falleth downe at the Fathers knees and in humble wise entreateth for us: but we understand with the Apostle, that he so appeareth before the face of God, that the vertue of his death availeth to be a perpetuall intercession for us: yet so that being entred into the sanctuary of heaven, unto the end of the ages of the world, he alone carrieth to God the praiers of the people abiding a far off in the porch.

In Psal. 94.

No Saint hath entry unto God but by Christ: and therefore we cannot without injurie unto him, make them our intercessors.

21. As touching the Saints, which being dead in the flesh doe live in Christ, if wee give any prayer at all to them, let us not dreame that they themselves have any other way of asking than Christ, which onely is the way, or that their praiers bee acceptable to God in any other name. Therefore sith the Scripture calleth us backe from all to Christ onely: sith the heavenly fathers Will is to gather together all in him: it was a point of too much dulnesse, I will not say madnesse, so to desire to make for our selves an entry by them, that wee should bee led away from him without whom even they themselves have no entry open. But, that this hath beene usually done in certaine ages past, and that it is at this day done wheresoever Papistry reigneth, who can deny? Their merits are from time to time thrust in, to obtaine the good will of God: and for the most part, Christ being passed over, God is praied to by their names. Is not this, I beseech you, to convey away to them the office of that onely intercession, which we have affirmed to belong to Christ alone? Againe, what Angell or Devill ever revealed to any man any one syllable of this their intercession which these men faine? For in the Scripture is nothing of it. What is the reason therefore of inventing it? Truly when the wit of man so seeketh for it selfe succours, wherewith we are not certified by the word of God, it plainly bewraieth his owne distrustfulnesse. If wee appeale to all their consciences that are delighted with the intercession of Saints, wee shall finde that the same commeth from no other ground, but because they are grieved with carefulnesse, as though Christ were in this behalfe either too weake or too rigorous. By which doubtfulnesse first they dishonour Christ, and rob him of the title of onely Mediatour, which as it is given him of the Father for a singular prerogative, so ought not also to be conveyed away to any other. And in this very doing they darken the glory of his birth, they make void his crosse, finally whatsoever he hath done or suffered they spoile and defraud of the due praise thereof: for all tend to this end that hee may bee indeed and be accounted the onely Mediator. And therewith they cast away the goodnesse of God, which gave himselfe to be their Father. For he is not their father, unlesse they acknowledge Christ to be their brother. Which they utterly deny, unlesse they thinke that hee beareth a brotherly affection toward them, than which there can nothing bee more kinde or tender. Wherefore the Scripture offereth onely him to us, sendeth us to him, and staieth us in him. Hee (saith Ambrose) is our mouth, by which we ſpeake to the Father: our eye, by which wee ſee the Father: our right hand, by which we offer us to the Father, otherwiſe than by whoſe interceſſion neither wee nor all the Saints have any thing with God. If they anſwer that the common prayers which they make in Churches, are ended with this concluſion adjoyned, Through Chriſt our Lord: this is a trifling ſhift: becauſe the interceſſion of Chriſt is no leſſe prophaned when it is mingled with the prayers and merits of dead men, than if it were utterly omitted and only dead men were in our mouth. Againe, in all their Letanies, Hymnes, and Proſes, where no honour is left ungiven to dead Saints, there is no mention of Chriſt.

Lib. de Iſa. & anima.

22. But their fooliſh dulneſſe proceeded ſo farre, that here wee have the nature of ſuperſtition expreſſed, which when it hath once ſhaken off the bridle, is wont to make no end of running aſtray. For after that men once begun to looke to their interceſſion of Saints, by little and little there was given to every one his ſpeciall doing, that according to the diverſitie of buſineſſe, ſometime one and ſometime another ſhould bee called upon to be interceſſor: then they tooke to themſelves every one his peculiar Saint, into whoſe faith they committed themſelves as it were to the keeping of ſafeguarding gods. And not only (wherewith the Prophet in the old time reproched Iſrael) gods were ſet up according to the number of Cities, but even to the number of perſons. But ſith the Saints referre their deſires to the only will of God, and behold it and reſt upon it: he thinketh fooliſhly, and fleſhly, yea and ſlanderouſly of them, which aſſigneth to them any other prayer, than whereby they pray for the comming of the kingdome of God: from which that is moſt farre diſtant which they faigne to them, that every one is with private affection more partially bent to his owne worſhippers. At length many abſtained not from horrible ſacriledge, in calling now upon them not as helpers but as principall rulers of their ſalvation. Loe whereunto fooliſh men doe fall when they wander out of their true ſtanding, that is, the word of God. I ſpeake not of the groſſer monſtrouſneſſes of ungodlineſſe, wherein although they bee abhominable to God, Angels, and men, they are not yet aſhamed nor wearie of them; They falling downe before the image or picture of Barbara Catherine, and ſuch other, doe mumble Pater noſter, Our father. This madneſſe the Paſtors doe ſo not care to heale or reſtraine, that being allured with the ſweet ſavour of gaine they allow it with rejoycing at it. But although they turne from themſelves the blame of ſo hainous an offence, yet by what colour will they defend this that Loy or Medard are prayed unto, to looke downe upon and helpe their ſervants from heaven? that the holy Virgin is prayed unto, to command her ſonne to doe that which they aske? In the old time it was forbidden in the Councell at Carthage, that at the altar no direct prayer ſhould bee made to Saints. And it is likely that when the holy men could not altogether ſuppreſſe the force of the naughtie cuſtome, yet they added at leaſt this reſtraint that the publike prayers ſhould not be corrupted with this forme: Saint Peter pray for us. But how much further hath their diveliſh importunacie ranged, which ſticke not to give away to dead men that which properly belongeth onely to God and Chriſt?

How farre ſuperſtition hath gone in prayer unto Saints.

Ier. 2 18. & 11. 13

23. But whereas they travell to bring to paſſe that ſuch interceſſion may ſeeme to be grounded upon the authority of Scripture, therein they labour in vaine. We reade oftentimes (ſay they) of the prayers of Angels: and not that onely: but it is ſaid that the prayers of the faithfull are by their hands carried into the ſight of God. But if they liſt to compare holy men departed out of this preſent life, to Angels: they ſhould prove that they are miniſtring ſpirits, to whom is committed the miniſterie to looke to our ſafetie, to whom the charge is given to keepe us in all our waies, to goe about us, to admoniſh and counſell us, to watch for us: all which things are given to Angels, but not to them. How wrongfully they wrap up dead holy men with Angels, appeareth largely by ſo many divers offices, whereby the Scripture putteth difference betweene ſome and otherſome. No man dare execute the office of an advocate before an earthly judge, unleſſe he be admitted; from whence then have wormes ſo great libertie, to thruſt unto God thoſe for patrons, to whom it is not read that the office is enjoyned? Gods will was to appoint the Angels to looke unto our ſafetie, wherefore they doe both frequent holy aſſemblies, and the Church is a ſtage to them, wherein they wonder at the the diverse and manifold wisdome of God. Who so convey away to other that which is peculiar to them, verily they confound and pervert the order set by God, which ought to have beene inviolable. With like handsomenesse they proceede in alleadging other testimonies. God said to Ieremy: If Moses and Samuel should stand before mee, my soule is not to this people. How (say they) could he have spoken thus of dead men, unlesse he knew that they made intercession for the living? But I on the contrary side gather thus, that sith thereby appeareth that neither Moses nor Samuel made intercession of the people of Israel, there was then no intercession at all of dead men. For which of the Saints is to bee thought to be carefull for the safety of the people, when Moses ceaseth, which in this behalfe farre surpassed all other when he lived. But if they follow such sleight subtleties, to say that the dead make intercession for the living, because the Lord said, if they should make intercession: I will much more colourably reason in this manner: In the extreame necessity of the people Moses made not intercession, of whom it is said, if hee shall make intercession. Therefore it is likely that none other maketh intercession, sith they are all so farre from the gentlenesse, goodnesse, and fatherly carefulnesse of Moses. This forsooth they get with cavilling, that they be wounded with the same weapons, wherewith they thought themselves gaily fenced. But it is very fond that a simple sentence should so bee wrested, because the Lord pronounceth onely that he will not spare the offences of the people, although they had seene Moses to be their patron, or Samuel, to whose prayers hee had shewed himselfe so tender. Which sense is most cleerely gathered out of a like place of Ezechiel. If (saith the Lord these three men were in the city, Noe, Daniel, and Iob, they shall not deliver their sons and daughters in their righteousnesse: but they shall deliver onely there owne soules. Where it is no doubt that he meant if two of them should happen to revive againe, for the third was then alive, namely Daniel, who (as it is knowne) did in the first flourishing of his youth shew an incomparable example of godlinesse: let us then leave them whom the Scripture plainly sheweth to have ended their course. Therefore Paul, when he speaketh of David, teacheth not that hee doth with prayers helpe his posterity, but onely that he served his owne time.

A third argument for intercession of Saints answered.

24. They answer againe: shall we then take from them all prayer of charity, which in the whole course of their life breathed nothing but charity and mercy? Verily as I will not curiously search what they doe, or what they muse upon: so it is not likely that they are carried about hither and thither with divers and particular requests: but rather that they doe with a staied and unmoved Will, long for the kingdome of God, which standeth no lesse in the destruction of the wicked, than in the salvation of the godly. If this bee true, it is no doubt that their charity is contained in the communion of the body of Christ, and extendeth no further, than the nature of that communion beareth. but now though I grant they pray in this manner for us, yet they doe not therefore depart from their owne quietnesse, to be diversly drawne into earthly cares: and muchlesse must wee therefore by and by call upon them. Neither doth it thereby follow that they must so doe, because men which live in earth may commend one another in their prayer. For this doing deserveth for nourishing of charity among them, when they doe as it were part and mutually take upon them their necessities among themselves. And this they doe by the commandement of the Lord, and are not without a promise, which two things, have alway the chiefe place in prayer. All such considerations are farre from the dead, whom when the Lord hath conveyed from our company, hee hath left to us no enterchange of doings with them, nor to them with us, so farre as we may gather by conjectures. But if any man alleadge, that it is impossible but that they must keepe the same charity toward us, as they bee joyned in one faith with us: yet who hath revealed that they have so long eares to reach to our voices? and so pearcing eies to watch our necessities? They prate in their shadowes I wot not what of the brightnesse of the countenance of God extending his beames upon them, in which as in a mirror they may from on high behold the matters of men beneath. But to affirme that, especially with such boldnesse as they dare, what is it else but to go about by the drunken dreames of our owne braine, without his word to pearce and breake into the hidden judgements of God, and to tread the Scripture under feet which ſo oft pronounceth that the wiſedome of the fleſh is enemie to the wiſedome of God, which wholy condemneth the vanitie of our naturall wit, which willeth all our reaſon to be throwne downe, and the onely will of God to be looked unto of us. Rom. 8. 6.

25 The other teſtimonies of Scripture which they bring to defend this their lie, they moſt naughtily wreſt. But Jacob (ſaid they) prayeth that his name and the name of his Fathers Abraham and Iſaac be called upon over his poſteritie. Firſt let us ſee what forme of calling upon this is among the Iſraelites. For they call not upon their Fathers to help them: but they beſeech God to remember his ſervants Abraham, Iſaac & Jacob. Therefore their example maketh nothing for them that ſpeake to the Saints themſelves. But becauſe thoſe blocks (ſuch is their dulneſſe) neither underſtand what it is to call upon the name of Jacob, nor why it is to be called upon, it is no marvell if in the very forme alſo they ſo childiſhly ſtumble. This manner of ſpeech is not ſeldome found in the Scriptures. For Eſay ſaith that the name of the men is called upon over the women, when they have them as their husbands under whoſe charge and defence they live. Therefore the calling upon of the name of Abraham upon the Iſraelites, ſtandeth in this when they convey their pedegree from him, and do with ſolemne memorie honor him for their author and parent. Neither doth Jacob this becauſe he is carefull for the enlarging of the renowne of his name: but for as much as he knew that the whole bleſſedneſſe of his poſteritie conſiſted in the inheritance of the covenant which God had made with him: he wiſhed that that which he ſeeth ſhould be the chiefe of all good things to them, that they be accounted in his kinred: For, that is nothing els but to convey to them the ſucceſſion of the covenant. They againe when they bring ſuch remembrance into their prayers, doe not flee to the interceſſions of dead men: but doe put the Lord in mind of his covenant, whereby the moſt kind father hath promiſed that he will be favorable and beneficiall to them for Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacobs ſake. How little the holie Ones did otherwiſe leane upon the merits of their father, the common ſaying of the Church in the Prophet teſtifieth, Thou art our Father, and Abraham knew us not, and Iſrael was ignorant of us. Thou Lord art our Father, and our redeemer. And when they ſay thus, they adde therewithall, Returne O Lord for thy ſervants ſakes: yet thinking upon no interceſſion, but bending their mind to the benefit of the covenant. But now ſith we have the Lord Jeſus, in whoſe hand the eternall covenant of mercie is not onlie made; but alſo confirmed to us: whoſe name ſhould we rather uſe in our prayers? And becauſe theſe good maſters will have the Patriarches to be by theſe words made interceſſours, I would faine know of them why in ſo great a rout Abraham the Father of the Church hath no place at all among them. Out of what ſinke they fetch their advocates, it is not vnknowne. Let them anſwere me, how fit it is that Abraham, whom God preferred above all other, and whom he advanced to the higheſt degree of honour, ſhould be neglected and ſuppreſſed. Verily when it was evident that ſuch uſe was unknowne to the old Church, they thought good for hiding of the newneſſe to ſpeake nothing of the old Fathers: as though the diverſitie of names excuſed the new and forged manner. But whereas ſome object that God is prayed unto, to have mercie on the people for Davids ſake, it doth ſo nothing at all make for defence of their errour, that it is a moſt ſtrong proofe for the confutation thereof. For if we conſider what perſon David did beare: he is ſevered from all the aſſembly of the Saints, that God ſhould ſtabliſh the covenant which he hath made in his hand. So both the covenant is rather conſidered than the man and under a figure the onely interceſſion of Chriſt is affirmed. For it is certaine that that which belonged only to David, in ſo much as he was the image of Chriſt, accordeth not with any other.

26 But this forſooth moveth ſome, that it is oftentimes read that the prayers of Saints have beene heard. Why ſo? Even becauſe they prayed. They truſted in thee (ſaith the Prophet) and they were ſaved: they cried, and they were not confounded. Therefore let us alſo pray as they did, that we may be heard as they were. But theſe men, otherwiſe than they ought, doe wrongfullie reaſon, that none ſhall be heard but they that have once beene heard. How much better doth James ſay? Elias (ſaith he) was a man like to us: and he prayed with prayer that it ſhould not raine, and it rained not upon the earth in three yeeres and ſixe moneths. Againe he prayed, and the heaven heaven gave raine, and the earth gave her fruite. What? doth he gather any singular prerogative of Elias, to which we ought to flee? No. But he teacheth what is the continuall strength of godly and pure prayer, to exhort us likewise to pray. For we doe niggardlie construe the readinesse and gentlenesse of God in hearing them, unlesse we be by such experiences confirmed into a more sure affiance of his promises, in which he promiseth that his eare shall be inclined not to one, or two, nor yet to a few, but to all that call upon his name. And so much lesse excusable is this foolishnesse, because they seeme as it were of set purpose to despise so many admonitions of Scripture. David was oft delivered by the power of God. Was it that he should draw that power to himselfe, that we should be delivered by his helpe? He himselfe affirmeth farre otherwise: The righteous looke for me, till thou render to me. Againe, The righteous shall see, and they shall rejoyce, and trust in the Lord. Behold, this poore man hath cried to God, and he hath answered him: There be in the Psalmes many such prayers, in which to crave that which he requireth, he mooveth God by this manner, that the righteous be not made ashamed, but many by his example be raised up to hope well. Let us now be contented with this one example. Therefore every holie one shall pray to thee in fit time. Which place I have so much the more willingly rehearsed, because the lewd babblers which doe let out to hire the service of their waged tongue have not beene ashamed to alleage it to prove the intercession of the dead. As though David meant any thing else, than to shew the fruite that shall come of the mercifulnesse and gentlenesse of God, when he shall be heard. And in this kind we must learne, that the experience of the grace of God, as well toward our selves as other, is no slender help to confirme the credit of his promises. I have unrehearsed many places, where David setteth before himselfe the benefits of God for matter of confidence, because the readers of the Psalmes shall commonly finde them without seeking. This selfe same thing had Jacob before taught by his owne example: I am unworthie of all thy mercies, and of the truth which thou hast performed to thy servant. I with my staffe have passed over this Jordane, and now I come forth with two bands. He alleageth indeed the promise, but not alone: but he also joyneth the effect, that he may the more couragiously in time to come trust that God will be the same toward him. For he is not like to mortall men, which are weary of their liberalitie, or whose abilitie is wasted: but he is to be weighed by his owne nature, as David wisely doth, where he saith, Thou hast redeemed me, O God that speakest truth. After that he hath given to God the praises of his salvation, he addeth that he is a true speaker: because unlesse he were continually like himselfe, there could not be gathered of his benefits a sufficiently strong reason of affiance and calling upon him. But when we know that so oft as he helpeth us, he sheweth an example and proofe of his goodnesse, we neede not to feare that our hope shall be put to shame or disappoint us.

Psal. 141. 8. Psal. 51. 8. Psal. 34. 7. Psal. 31. 6. Gen. 38. 10. Psal. 31. 6.

The directing of prayers unto Saints departed is the offering of injurie unto God, and of disgrace unto Christs intercession, which by the mutuall prayers of Saints as yet living, is not prejudiced. Psal. 44. 21.

27 Let this be the summe. Whereas the Scripture setteth out this unto us for the cheefe point in the worshipping of God, (as refusing all sacrifices, he requireth of us this dutie of godlinesse) prayer is not without manifest sacrilege directed to other. Wherefore also it is said in the Psalme, If we stretch forth our hands to a strange God, shall not God require these things? Againe, whereas God will not be called upon but of Faith, and expresly commandeth prayers to be framed according to the rule of his word: finally whereas Faith founded upon the Word is the mother of right prayer: so soone as we swarue from the word, our prayer must needs be corrupted. But it is already shewed, that if the whole Scripture be sought, this honour is therein challenged to God only. As touching the office of intercession, we have also shewed that it is peculiar to Christ, and that there is no prayer acceptable to God, but which that Mediator halloweth. And though the faithfull doe one for another offer prayers to God for their brethren, we have shewed that this abateth nothing from the only intercession of Christ: because they altogether standing upon it doe commend both themselves and other to God. Moreover we have taught that this is unfitly drawne to dead men, to whom we never read that it hath been commanded that they should pray for us. The Scripture doth oftentimes exhort us to mutuall doings of his duty one for another: but of dead men there is not so much as one syllable: yea and James joyning these two things together, together, that we ſhould confeſſe our ſelves, among our ſelves, and mutually pray one for another, doth ſecretly exclude dead men. Therfore to condemne this error, this one reaſon ſufficeth, that the beginning of praying rightly, ſpringeth out of faith, and that faith commeth of the hearing of the word of God, where is no mention of the fained interceſſion, becauſe ſuperſtition hath raſhly gotten to it ſelfe patrones which were not given them of God. For whereas the Scripture is full of many formes of praier, there is no example found of this patroneſhip, without which in the Papacy they beleeve that there is no praier. Moreover it is certaine that this ſuperſtition hath growne of diſtruſtfulneſſe either becauſe they were not content with Chriſt to be their interceſſor, or have altogether robbed him of his praiſe. And this latter point is eaſily prooved by their ſhameleſneſſe: becauſe they have no other ſtronger argument to proove that we have neede of the interceſſion of Saints, than when they obiect that we are unworthy of familiar acceſſe to God. Which we indeed grant to be moſt true: but thereupon we gather, that they leave nothing to Chriſt, which eſteeme his interceſſion nothing worth, unleſſe there be adjoyned Gorge, Hippolite, or ſuch other viſors. James 5.8.

28 But although praier properly ſignifieth onely wiſhes and petitions: yet there is ſo great affinitie betweene petition and thankſgiving, that they may be fitly comprehended both under one name. For, theſe ſpeciall ſorts which Paul rehearſeth, fall under the firſt part of this diviſion. With asking and craving we powre forth our deſires before God, requiring as well thoſe things that ſeeme to ſpread abroad his glory and ſet forth his name, as the benefits that are profitable to our uſe. With giving of thankes, we doe with due praiſe magnifie his good doings toward us, acknowledging to be received of his liberalitie whatſoever good things doe come to us. Therefore David comprehended theſe two parts together, ſaying: Call upon me in the day of neceſſitie: I will deliver thee, and thou ſhalt glorifie me. The Scripture not in vaine commandeth us to uſe both. For we have ſaid in another place, that our needineſſe is ſo great, and the experience it ſelfe crieth out that we are on every ſide pinched and preſſed with ſo many and ſo great diſtreſſes, that all have cauſe enough why they ſhould both ſigh to God, and in humble wiſe call upon him. For though they be free from adverſities, yet the guiltineſſe of their wicked doings, and their innumerable aſſaults of tentations ought to pricke forward the moſt holy to aske remedy. But in the ſacrifice of praiſe and thankſgiving there can be no interruption without hainous ſinne, foraſmuch as God ceaſeth not to heap upon diverſe men diverſe benefits to drive us though we be ſlacke and ſlow, to thankfulneſſe. Finally ſo great and ſo plenteous largeſſe of his benefits doth in a manner overwhelme us: there are ſo many and ſo great miracles of his ſeene on every ſide which way ſoever thou turne thee, that we never want ground and matter of praiſe and thankſgiving. And that theſe things may be ſomewhat plainelier declared ſith all our hopes and wealth ſtand in God (which we have before ſufficiently proved) that neither we nor all our things can be in proſperitie but by his bleſſing: we muſt continually commit our ſelves and all our things to him. Then whatſoever we purpoſe, ſpeake, or doe, let us purpoſe, ſpeake, and doe under his hand and will, finally under the hope of his helpe. For, all are pronounced accurſed of God, which deviſe or determine any purpoſes upon truſt of themſelves or of any other, which without his will, and without calling upon him doe enterpriſe or attempt to begin any thing. And whereas we have diverſe times already ſaid, that he is duely honoured when he is acknowledged the author of all good things: thereupon followeth that all thoſe things are ſo to be received at his hand, that we yeeld continuall thankes for them: and that there is no other right way for us to uſe his benefits, which flow and proceed from his liberalitie to no other end, but that we ſhould be continually buſied in confeſſing his praiſe and giving of thankes. For Paul, when he teſtifieth that they are ſanctified by the word and praier, doth therewithall ſignifie that they are not holy and cleane to us without the word and praier, underſtanding by the Word, faith by figure. Therefore David ſaith very well, when having received the liberalitie of the Lord, he declareth that there is given him into his mouth a new ſong: wherby verily he ſignifieth that it is a malicious ſilence, if we paſſe over any of his benefits without praiſe: ſith he ſo oft giveth us matter to ſay good of him, as he doth good to us. As alſo Eſaie ſetting out the ſingular

In which sense David saith in another place, Lord open thou my lips, and my mouth shall shew forth thy praise. Likewise Ezechias and Jonas testifie that this shall be to them the end of their deliverance, to celebrate the goodnesse of God with songs in the temple. The same law David prescribeth to all the godly: What shall I repay to the Lord (saith he) for all the things that he hath bestowed upon me? I will take the cup of salvation, and will call upon the name of the Lord. And the same law the Church followeth in another Psalme; Save us our God, that wee may confesse to thy name, and glorie in thy praise. Againe, he hath looked unto the praier of the solitary, and he hath not despised their praiers. This shall be written to the generation that shall follow, and the people created shall praise the Lord, that they may declare his name in him, and his praise in Hierusalem. Yea so oft as the faithfull beseech God to doe for his names sake: as they professe themselves unworthy to obtaine any thing in their owne name, so they binde themselves to give thankes, and they promise that this shall be to them the

So Osee speaking of the redemption to come of the Church, saith: Take away iniquitie O God, and lift up good: and we will pay the calves of our lips. And the benefits of God doe not onely claime to themselves the praise of the tongue, but also doe naturally procure love. I have loved (saith David) because the Lord hath heard the voice of my praier.

Psal.116.1. Psal.18.1. Againe, in another place, rehearsing the helpes which he had felt, he saith: I will love thee O God my strength: Neither shall the praises ever please God, which shall not flow out of this sweetnesse of love. Yea and also we must hold fast this saying of Phil.4.6. Paul, that all praiers are wrongfull and faulty to which is not adjoyned giving of thankes. For thus he saith, in all praier and beseeching with thanksgiving let your petitions be knowen with God. For sith restinesse, tediousnesse, impatience, bitternesse of griefe, and feare doe move many in praying to murmure, hee commandeth that our affections be so tempered, that the faithfull ere they have obtained that which they desire, should nevertheless cheerefully bless God. If this knot ought to have place in things in a manner contrary, with so much more holy a band doth God binde us to sing

Heb.13.15. his praises, so oft as he maketh us to enjoy our requests. But as we have taught that our praiers are hallowed by the intercession of Christ, which otherwise should be uncleane: so the Apostle, where he commandeth us to offer a sacrifice of praise by Christ, putting in minde that we have not a mouth cleane enough to praise the name of God, unlesse the Priesthood of Christ become the meane. Whereupon we gather, that men have beene monstrously bewitched in the papacy, where the greater part marvelleth

1 Thess.5.13. that Christ is called an Advocate. This is the cause why Paul commandeth both to pray and to give thankes without ceasing: namely for that he willeth that with so great continuing as may be, at every time in every place, in all matters and businesses, the praiers of all men should be lifted up to God, which may both looke for all things at his hand, and yeeld to him the praise of all things, as he offereth us continuall matter to praise and pray.

Order for assiduity of praier both private and publike in the Church.

29 But this continuall diligence of praying, although it specially concerne the proper and private praiers of every man, yet somewhat also pertaineth to the publike praiers of the Church. But those can neither be continuall, nor ought otherwise to be done than according to the politike order that shall by common consent bee agreed upon among all. I graunt the same in deede. For therefore certaine houres are set and appointed, as indifferent with God, so necessarie for the uses of men, that the com-

1.Cor.15.40. moditie of all men may be provided for, and all things (according to the saying of Paul) may bee comelily and orderly done in the Church. But this maketh nothing to the contrarie, but that every Church ought both from time to time to stirre up it selfe to often use of praiers, and when it is admonished by any great necessitie, to be fervent with most earnest endevour. As for perseverance which hath a great affinitie with continuall diligence, there shall bee a fit place to speake of it about the end. Now these make nothing for the much babbling which Christ willed that we should be forbidden.

Mat.6.7. For he forbiddeth not to continue long, nor oft, nor with much affection in prayers, but that we should not trust that we may wring any thing out of God, by dulling his eares with much babling talke, as if he were to be perſwaded after the manner of men. For wee know that Hypocrites, becauſe they doe not conſider that they have to doe with God, doe no leſſe make a pompous ſhew in their prayers than in triumph. For, the Phariſee which thanked God that hee was not like to other men, without doubt rejoyced at himſelfe in the eyes of men, as if he would by prayer ſeeke to get a fame of holineſſe. Hereupon came that much babling, which at this day upon a like cauſe is uſed in the Papacy: while ſome doe vainely ſpend the time in repeating the ſame prayers, and otherſome doe ſet out themſelves among the people with a long heape of words. Sith this babling childiſhly mocketh God, it is no marvell that it is forbidden out of the Church, to the end that nothing ſhould there bee uſed but earneſt and proceeding from the bottome of the heart. Of a neere kinde and like to this corruption is there another, which Chriſt condemneth with this, namely that hypocrites for boaſting ſake doe ſeeke to have many witneſſes, and doe rather occupie the market place to pray in, than their prayers ſhould want the praiſe of the world. But whereas wee have already ſhewed that this is the marke that prayer ſhooteth at, that our miudes may bee carryed upward to God, both to confeſſion of prayſe, and to craving of helpe: thereby wee may underſtand that the chiefe duties thereof doe ſtand in the minde and the heart, or rather that prayer it ſelfe is properly an affection of the inward heart, which is powred forth and laid open before God the ſearcher of hearts. Wherefore (as it is already ſaid) the heavenly Schoolemaſter, when he minded to ſet out the beſt rule of praying, commanded us to goe into the chamber, and there the doore being ſhut to pray to our Father which is in ſecret, that our Father which is in ſecret may heare us. For when he hath drawne them away from the example of hypocrites, which with ambitious boaſting ſhew of prayers ſought the favour of men; hee therewithall addeth what is better, namely, to enter into our chamber, and there to pray the doore being ſhut. In which words (as I expound them) he willed us to ſeeke ſolitary being which may helpe us to deſcend and to enter throughly with our whole thought in our heart, promiſing to the affections of our heart that God ſhall bee neere us, whoſe temples our bodies ought to bee. For he meant not to deny but that it is expedient alſo to pray in other places: but hee ſheweth that prayer is a certaine ſecret thing, which both is chiefly placed in the ſoule, and requireth the quiet thereof farre from all troubles of cares. Not without cauſe therefore the Lord himſelfe alſo, when hee was diſpoſed to apply himſelfe more earneſtly to prayer conveyed himſelfe into ſome ſolitary place farre from the troubleſome company of men: but to teach us by his example that theſe helpes are not to be deſpiſed, by which our minde being too ſlipperie of it ſelfe is more bent to earneſt applying of prayer. But in the meane time even as he in the middeſt of the multitude of men abſtained not from praying, if occaſion at any time ſo ſerved: ſo ſhould wee in all places where need ſhall be, lift up pure hands. Finally, thus it is to be holden, that whoſoever refuſeth to pray in the holy aſſembly of the godly, he knoweth not what it is to pray a part, or in ſolitarineſſe, or at home. Againe, that hee that neglecteth to pray alone or privately how diligently ſoever he haunt publike aſſemblies, doth there make but vaine prayers: becauſe hee giveth more to the opinion of men than to the ſecret judgement of God, in the meane time, that the common prayers of the Church ſhould not grow into the contempt, God in old time garniſhed them with glorious titles, ſpecially where hee called the temple the houſe of prayer. For, by this ſaying hee both taught that the chiefe part of the worſhipping of him is the duty of prayer: and that to the end that the faithfull ſhould with one conſent exerciſe themſelves in it, the temple was ſet up as a ſtandard for them. There was alſo added a notable promiſe: There abideth for thee, O God, praiſe in Sion: and to thee the vow ſhall bee paid. By which words the ptophet telleth us, that the prayers of the Church are never void: becauſe the Lord alway miniſtreth to his people matter to ſing upon with joy. But although the ſhadowes of the law are ceaſed: yet becauſe the Lords will was by this ceremony to nouriſh among us alſo the unity of faith, it is no doubt that the ſame promiſe belongeth to us, which both Chriſt hath ſtabliſhed with his owne mouth, and Paul teacheth that it is of force for ever.

Churches ordained to be houses of prayer.

34 Now as the Lord by his word commanded the faithfull to use common prayer: so there must be common temples appointed for the using of them: where who so refuse to communicate their prayer with the people of God, there is no cause why they should abuse this pretence, that they enter into their chamber that they may obey the commandement of the Lord. For hee that promiseth that hee will doe whatsoever two or three shall aske being gathered together in his name, testifieth that he despiseth not prayers openly made: so that boasting and seeking of Glory of men be absent, so that unfained and true affection bee present which dwelleth in the secret of the heart. If this be the right use of temples (as truely it is) wee must againe beware that neither (as they have begun in certaine ages past to be accounted) we take them for the proper dwelling places of God from whence he may more neerely bend his eare unto us? nor faine to them I wot not what secret holynesse, which may make our prayer more holy before God. For sith wee our selves bee the true temples of God, we must pray in our selves if we will call upon God in his owne holy temple. As for that grossenesse, let us which have a commandement to call upon the Lord in spirit and truth without difference of place, leave it to the Iewes or the Gentiles. There was indeed a Temple in old time by the commandement of God for offering of prayers and sacrifices, but that was at such time as the truth lay hid figured under such shadowes, which being now lively expressed unto us doth not suffer us to sticke in any materiall temple. Neither was the temple given to the Iewes themselves with this condition, that they should inclose the presence of God, within the wals thereof, but whereby they might be exercised to behold the image of the true temple. Therefore they, which in any part thought that God dwelled in temples made with hands, were sharpely rebuked of Esay and Stephen.

The sound of the voice without the inward feeling of the heart in prayer availeth not.

31 Here moreover it is more than evident, that neither voice nor song, if they be used in prayer, have any force, or doe any whit profit before God, unlesse they proceed from the deepe affection of the heart. But rather they provoke his wrath against us, if they come onely from the lips and out of the throate: forasmuch as that is to abuse his holy name, and to make a mockery of his majesty: as wee gather out of the words of Esay, which although they extend further, yet pertaine also to reprove this fault. This people (saith he) commeth neere to me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips: but their heart is farre from me: and they have feared me with the commandement and doctrine of men. Therefore behold I will make in this people a miracle great and to bee wondred at. For, wisdome shall perish from their wise men, and the prudence of the Elders shall vanish away. Neither yet doe we here condemne voice or singing, but rather doe highly commend them, so that they accompany the affection of the minde. For so they exercise the minde and hold it intentive in thinking upon God, which as it is slippery and rolling, easily slacketh and is diversly drawne unlesse it be stayed with divers helpes. Moreover whereas the glory of God ought after a certaine manner to shine in all the parts of the body, it specially behooveth that the tongue be applyed and avowed to this service both in singing and in speaking, which is properly created to shew forth and display the praise of God: But the chiefe use of the tongue is in publike prayers, which are made in the assembly of the godly: which tend to this end, that wee may all with one common voice, and as it were with one mouth together glorifie God whom we worship with one spirit and one faith: and that openly, that all men mutually, every one of his brother, may receive the confession of Faith, to the example whereof they may be both allured and stirred.

Esay 9 13. Mat.15.8.

The use of singing in the Church.

1 Cor.14.13.

32 As for the use of singing in Churches (that I may touch this also by the way) it is certaine that it is not onely most ancient: but that it was also in use among the Apostles, we may gather by these words of Paul. I will sing in Spirit, I will sing also in minde. Againe to the Colossians: Teaching and admonishing you, mutually in Hymnes Psalmes and spirituall songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord. For in the first place he teacheth that we should sing with voice and heart: in the other he commandeth spirituall songs, wherewith the godly doe mutually edifie themselves. Yet that it was not universall, Augustine testifieth, which reporteth that in the time of Ambrose the Church of Millan first began to sing, when while Justina the mother of Valentinian, cruelly cruelly raged against the true faith, the people more used watching than they were wont: and that afterward the other westerne Churches followed. For hee had a little before said, that this manner came from the Esterne Churches. He telleth also in his second bookes of Retractations that it was in his time received in Africa. One Hilarie (saith he) a ruler did in every place whersoever he could, with malicious blaming raile at the maner which then began to bee at Carthage, that the Hymnes at the altar should be pronounced out of the booke of Psalmes, either before the oblation, or when that which had beene offered was distributed to the people. Him I answered at the commandement of my brethren. And truely if songs be tempered to that gravity which becommeth the presence of God and Angels, it both procureth dignity and grace to the holy actions, and much availeth to stirre up the mindes to true affection and ferventnesse of praying. But wee must diligently beware that our eares be not more heedfully bent to the note, than our mindes to the spirituall sense of the words. With which perill Augustine in a certaine place saith that hee was so moved, that he sometime wished that the manner which Athanasius kept should bee established, which commanded that the Reader should sound his words with so small a bowing of his voice, that it should be liker to one that readeth than to one that singeth. But when he remembred how much profit hee himselfe had received by singing, he inclined to the other side. Therefore using this moderation, there is no doubt that it is a most holy and profitable ordinance As on the other side what songs soever are framed onely to sweetnesse and delight of the eares, they both become not the majesty of the Church, and cannot but highly displease God.

Confess. li. 10. cap. 33.

33 Whereby it also plainely appeareth that common prayers are to be spoken not in Greeke among Latine men, not in Latine among Frenchmen or Englishmen (as it hath heretofore beene each where commonly done) but in the peoples mother tongue, which commonly may bee understood of the whole assembly: forasmuch as it ought to bee done to the edifying of the whole Church, which receive no fruit at all of a sound not understanded. But they which have no regard neither of charity nor of humanity, should at least have beene somewhat moved with the authority of Paul, whose words are nothing doubtfull. If thou blesse (saith hee) in spirit, how shall hee that filleth the place of an unlearned man answer Amen to thy blessing, sith he knoweth not what thou sayest? For thou indeed givest thanks, but the other is not edified. Who therefore can sufficiently wonder at the unbrideled licentiousnesse of the Papists, which the Apostle so openly crying out against it, feare not to roare out in a strange tongue most babling prairers, in which they themselves sometime understand not one syllable, nor would have other folkes to understand it? But Paul teacheth that we ought to doe otherwise. How hen; I will pray (saith he) with spirit, I will pray also with minde: I will sing with spirit: I will sing also with minde: signifying by the name of spirit, the singular gifts of tongues which many being endued with, abused it, when they severed it from the minde, that is from understanding. But this we must altogether thinke, that it is by no meanes possible neither in publike nor in private prayer, but that the tongue without the heart must highly displease God. Moreover we must thinke that the minde ought to be kindled with ferventnesse of thought, that it may farre surmount all that the tongue may expresse with utterance. Finally that the tongue is not necessary at all for private prayer, but so far as the inward feeling either is not able to suffice to inkindle it selfe, or the vehemencie of inkindling violently carrieth the worke of the tongue along with it. For though very good prayers sometime be without voice, yet oftentimes betideth, that when the affection of the minde is fervent, both the tongue breaketh forth into voice, and the other members into gesturing without excessive shew. Hereupon came the muttering of Hanna, and such a like thing all the holy ones alway feele in themselves, when they burst out into broken and unperfect voyces. As for the gestures of the body which are wont to be used in prayer (as kneeling and uncovering of the head) they are exercises by which we endevour to rise up to a greater reverencing of God.

Publike prayer in what tongue and with what gesture to be made.

34 * Now we must learne not onely a more certaine rule, but also the very forme of praying: namely the same, which the heavenly father hath taught us by his beloved sonne: wherein we may acknowledge his unmeasurable goodnesse and kindenesse. For beside this hee warneth and exhorteth us to seeke him in all our necessity (as children are wont to flie to their fathers defence, so oft as they be troubled with any distresse) because hee saw that we did not sufficiently perceive this, how slender our poverty was, what were meete to be asked, and what were for our profit: hee provided also for this our ignorance, and what our capacity wanted, he supplyed and furnished of his owne. For he hath prescribed to us a forme wherein he hath as in a Table set out whatsoever we may desire of him, whatsoever availeth for our profit, and whatsoever is necessary to aske. Of which his gentlenesse wee receive a great fruit of comfort that we understand that wee aske no inconvenient thing, no unseeming or unfit thing, finally nothing that is not acceptable to him, sith wee aske in a manner after his owne mouth.

Alcib. vel de voto. When Plato saw the folly of men in making requests to God, which being granted, it many times befell much to their owne hurt: he pronounced that this is the best manner of praying taken out of the old Poet. King Iupiter give unto us the best things both when we aske them, and when wee doe not aske them, but command evill things to be away from us even when we aske them. And verily the heathen man is wise in this, that hee judgeth how perillous it is to aske of the Lord that which our owne desire moveth us to: and therwithall he bewrayeth our unhappy case, that we cannot once open our mouthes before God without danger, unlesse the spirit doe instruct us to a right rule of praying.

Rom. 8. 6. And insomuch greater estimation this priviledge is worthy to be had of us, sith the onely begotten Sonne of God ministreth words into our mouth which may deliver our minde from all doubtings.

The devision of the Lords prayer into parts. 35 This whether you call it forme or rule of praying is made of sixe petitions. For, the cause why I agree not to them that devide it into seven parts, is this, that by putting in this adversitive word (But) it seemeth that the Evangelist meant to joyne these two peeces together, as if hee had said: Suffer us not to be oppressed with tentation, but rather helpe our weaknesse, and deliver us, that we faint not. The old writers also thinke on our side, so that now that which is in Matthew added in the seventh place, is by way of declaration to be joyned to the sixt petition. But although the whole prayer is such that in every part of it regard is specially to be had of the glory of God, yet the three first petitions are peculiarly appointed to Gods Glory, which alone wee ought in them to looke unto without any respect (as they say) of our owne profit. The other three have care of us, and are properly assigned to aske those things that are for our profit. And when wee pray that the name of God be hallowed: because God will prove whether hee bee loved and honoured of us freely or for hope of reward, we must then thinke nothing of our owne commodity, but his glory must be set before us, which alone wee must behold with fixed eyes: and no otherwise ought wee to bee minded in the other prayers of this sort. And even this turneth to our great profit that when it is sanctified as we pray, it is also likewise made our sanctification. But our eyes (as it is said) must winke and after a certaine manner be blinde at such profit, so as they may not once looke at it: that if all hope of our private benefit were cut off, yet wee should not cease to wish and pray for this sanctification and other things which pertaine to the glory of God. As it is seene in the examples of Moses and Paul, to whom it was not grievous to turne away their mindes and eyes from themselves, and with vehement and inflamed zeale to wish their owne destruction, that though it were with their owne losse they might advance the glory and kingdome of God. On the other side when we pray that our daily bread be given us: although we wish that which is for our owne commodity, yet here also we ought chiefly to seeke the glory of God, so that we should not aske it unlesse it might turne to his glory. Now let us come to the declaring of the Prayer it selfe.

Aug. in Enchi. ad Laur. cap. 116. Chrisost oper. imperf. Exod. 32. 32. Rom. 9. 3.

Our Father which art in heaven.

A comfort unto Christians that they may call God their Father. 36 First in the very entry we meete with this which we said before, that all prayer ought none otherwise to bee offered of us to God in the name of Christ, as it can by no other name be made acceptable unto him. For since we call him Father, truely we alleadge for us the name of Christ. For by what boldnesse might any man call God

Father:

Father? who should burst forth into so great rashnesse, to take to himselfe the honour of the Sonne of God, unlesse we were adopted the children of grace in Christ? Which being the true Sonne, is given of him to us to be our brother: that that which he hath proper by nature, may by the benefit of adoption bee made ours, if we doe with sure Faith embrace so great bountifulnesse. As Iohn saith, that power is given to them which beleeve in the name of the onely begotten Sonne of God, that they also may bee made the children of God. Therefore he both calleth himselfe our Father, and will be so called of us, by this sweetnesse of name delivering us from all distrust, sith there can no where be found any greater affection of love than in a Father. Therefore hee could by no surer example testifie his unmeasurable deare love towards us than by this that wee are named the Sonnes of God. But his love is so much greater and more excellent toward us than all love of our parents, as hee passeth all men in goodnesse and mercy: that if all the Fathers that are in the earth, having shaken off all feeling of Fatherly naturallnesse, would forsake their children, yet he will never faile us, because he cannot deny himselfe. For we have his promise, if you being evill can give good gifts to your children, how much more can your Father which is in heaven? Againe in the Prophet, Can a mother forget her children? Though she forget them, yet I will not forget thee. If we be his children: then as a childe cannot give himselfe into the tuition of a stranger and forraine man, unlesse he complaine either of the cruelty or poverty of his Father? so wee cannot seeke succours from elsewhere than from him alone, unlesse we reproach him with poverty and want of ability, or with cruell or too extreame rigorousnesse.

Iohn 1.12. 1 Iohn 3.1. Psal.27.10. Esay 63.16. 2 Tim.2.13. Mat.7.11. Esay 39.15.

37 Neither let us alleadge that we are worthily made fearefull with conscience of sinnes, which may make a Father be he never so mercifull and kinde, daily to be displeased. For if among men the sonne can with no better Advocate plead his cause to his Father, and by no better meane get and recover his favour being lost, than if hee himselfe humbly and lowly, acknowledging his fault, doe beseech his fathers mercy (for then the fatherly bowels cannot hide themselves but must bee moved at such prayers) what shall that father of mercy doe, and the God of all comfort? shall not hee rather heare the teares and groanings of his children intreating for themselves (specially sith he doth call and exhort us to doe so) than any other intercessions whatsoever they be to the succour whereof they do so fearefully flee, not without some shew of despaire, because they distrust of the kindenesse and mercifulnesse of their father? This overflowing plenty of fatherly kindnesse hee depainteth and setteth out unto vs in the parable, where the Father lovingly embraceth the sonne that had estranged himselfe from him, that had riotously wasted his substance, that had every way grievously offended against him, and hee tarrieth not till he doe with words crave pardon, but hee himselfe preventeth him, knoweth him a farre off returning, of his owne will goeth to meete him, comforteth him and receiveth him into favour. For, setting out in a man this example of so great gentlenesse, he minded to teach us how much more plentifull kindenesse we ought to looke for at his hand, who is not onely a Father, but also the best and most mercifull of all fathers, howsoever wee bee unkinde, rebellious and naughty children so that yet wee cast our selves upon his mercy. And that he might make it to bee more assuredly beleeved, that he is such a Father to us, if we be Christians: he willed not onely to bee called Father, but also by expresse name Our Father: as if wee might thus talke with, O Father which hast so great naturall kindenesse toward thy children, so great easinesse to pardon, wee thy children call to thee and pray to thee, being assured and fully perswaded, that thou beerest no other affection to us than fatherly howsoever wee bee unworthy of such a father. But because the small capacities of our heart conceive not so great unmeasurablenesse of favour, not onely Christ is to us a pledge and earnest of our adoption, but also he giveth us the spirit for witnesse of the same adoption, through whom we may with a free and lowd voice crie Abba, Father. so oft therefore as any delay shall withstand us, let us remember to aske of him, that correcting our fearefullnesse he will set before us that spirit of couragiousnesse to bee our guide to pray boldly.

What the name of a Father doth import and teach

2 Cor.1.3. Luk.15.20. Gal.4.6.

38 Whereas wee are not so taught that every one should severally call him his owne father, but rather that we should all in common together call him Our Father: thereby we are put in minde, how great affection of brotherly love ought to be among us, which are altogether by one same right of mercy and liberality, the children of such a father. For wee have one common Father, from whom commeth whatsoever good thing may betide unto us, there ought to bee nothing severall among us, which we are not ready with great cheerefulnesse of minde to communicate one to another, so much as need requireth. Now if wee bee so desirous, as we ought to be, to reach our hand and helpe one to another, there is nothing wherein wee may more profit our brethren, then to commend them to the care and providence of the most good father, who being well pleased and favouring, nothing at all can be wanted. And verily even this same we owe to our father. For as hee that truly and heartily loveth any father of household, doth also embrace his whole household, with love and good will: likewise what love and affection we beare to this heavenly Father, we must shew toward his people, his household and his inheritance, which he hath so honoured, that he hath called it the fulnesse of his onely begotten Sonne. Let a Christian man therefore frame his prayers by this rule, that they be common, and may comprehend all them that be brethren in Christ with him: and not onely those whom hee presently seeth and knoweth to bee such, but all men that live upon earth: of whom, what God hath determined, it is out of our knowledge: saving that it is no lesse godly than naturall to wish the best to them, and hope the best of them. Howbeit we ought with a certaine singular affection to beare a speciall inclination to them of the household of Faith, whom the Apostle hath in every thing peculiarly commended unto us. In a summe, All our prayers ought to be so made, that they have respect to that community which our Lord hath stablished in his kingdome and his house.

When wee call God our Father, the holy fellowship which we have one with another is commended, and we admonished to pray for others not onely for our selves.

Mat. 23. 9.

Ephe. 1. 14.

Gal. 6. 10.

The conceiving of prayer in common is no hinderance to the private and particuler commending of our owne, or our brethrens affaires unto God.

39 Yet this withstandeth not, but that wee may specially pray both for our selves and for certaine other: so that yet our minde depart not from having an eye to this community, nor once swarve from it, but apply all things unto it. For though they be singularly spoken in forme, yet because they are directed to that marke, they cease not to be common. All this may easily be understood by a like example, The commandement of God is generall, to relieve the neede of all poore: and yet they obey this commandement which to this end doe helpe their poverty, whom they know or see to be in neede, although they passe over many whom they see to be pressed with no lesse necessity: either because they cannot know all, or bee not able to helpe all. After this manner they also doe not against the will of God, which having regard unto, and thinking upon this common fellowship of the Church, doe make such particular prayers, by which they doe with a common minde in particular words, commend to God themselves or other, whose necessity God willed to be more neerely knowne to them. Howbeit all things are not like in prayer and in bestowing of goods. For, the liberality of giving cannot be used but toward them whose neede wee have perceived: but with praier wee may helpe even them that are most strange and most unknowne to vs, by how great a space of ground soever they be distant from us. This is done by the general forme of prayer, wherein all the children of God are contained, among whom they also are. Hereto we may apply that which Paul exhorteth the faithfull of his time, that they lift upevery where pure hands, without strife: because when hee warneth them that strife shutteth the gate against prayers, he willeth them with one minde to lay their petitions in common together.

1 Tim. 2. 8.

How God is said to be in heaven, and a triple use this doctrine hath.

40 It is added, that he is in heaven. Whereupon it is not by and by to bee gathered that he is bound fast inclosed and compassed with the circle of heaven, as within certaine barres. For Salomon also confesseth that the heaven of heavens cannot containe him. And hee himselfe saith by the prophet, that heaven is his seat, and the earth his footstoole. Whereby verily hee signifieth that hee is not limited in any certaine coast, but is spread abroad throughout all things. But because our minde (such is the grossenesse of it,) could not otherwise conceive his unspeakeable glory, it is signified to us by the heaven, than which there can nothing come under our sight more ample or fuller of majesty. Sith therefore whersoever our senses comprehend any thing, there they use to fasten it: God is set out of all place, that when we will seeke him, we ſhould be raiſed up above all ſenſe both of body and ſoule. Againe by this manner of ſpeaking he is lifted above all chance of corruption and change: finally it is ſignified that he comprehendeth and conteineth the whole world and governeth it with his power. Wherefore this is all one as if he had beene called of infinite greatneſſe or height, of incomprehenſible ſubſtance, of unmeaſurable power, of everlaſting immortality. But while we have this, we muſt lift up our minde higher when God is ſpoken of, that we dreame not any earthly or fleſhly thing of him, that wee meaſure him not by our ſmall proportions, nor draw his will to the rule of affections. And therewithall is to be raiſed up our affiance in him, by whoſe providence and power we underſtand heaven and earth to be governed. Let this be the ſumme, that under the name of Father is ſet before us that God which hath in his owne image appeared to us, that he may be called upon with aſſured Faith: and that the familiar name of Father is not onely applyed to ſtabliſh affiance, but alſo availeth to hold faſt our mindes that they bee not drawne to doubtfull or faigned Gods, but ſhould from the onely begotten ſonne climbe up to the onely Father of Angels & of the Church: then, that becauſe his ſeat is placed in heaven, we are by the governance of the world put in minde that not without cauſe wee come to him, which with preſent care commeth of his owne will to meete us. Who ſo come to God (ſaith the Apoſtle) they muſt firſt beleive that there is a God, then that he is a rewarder to all them that ſeeke him. Both theſe things Chriſt affirmeth to be proper to his father, that our faith may be ſtayed in him: then, that we may bee certainely perſwaded that hee is not careleſſe of our ſafety: becauſe he vouchſafeth even to us to extend his providence: with which introductions Paul prepareth us to pray rightly. For before that he biddeth our petitions to be opened before God, he ſaith thus. Be ye carefull for nothing: the Lord is at hand. Whereby appeareth that they doubtfully and with perplexity toſſe their prayers in their minde which have not this well ſetled in them, that the eie of God is upon the righteous.

Phil.4.6.

41 The firſt petition is, That the name of God bee hallowed, the neede whereof is joyned with our great ſhame. For what is more ſhamefull than that the glory of God ſhould be partly by our unthankefulneſſe, partly by our maliciouſneſſe darkened: and (ſo much as in it lyeth) by our boldneſſe and furious ſtubborneneſſe, utterly blotted out. Though all the wicked would burſt themſelves with their wilfulneſſe full of ſacriledge, yet the holineſſe of the name of God glorioufly ſhineth. And not without cauſe the Prophet crieth out, As thy name O God, ſo is thy praiſe into all the ends of the earth. For whereſoever the name of God is knowne, it cannot bee but that his ſtrength, power, goodneſſe, wiſedome, righteouſneſſe, mercy, and truth muſt ſhew forth themſelves, which may draw us into admiration of him, and ſtirre us up to publiſh his praiſe. Sith therefore the holineſſe of God is ſo ſhamefully taken from him in earth, if we be not able to reſcue it, we be at the leaſt commanded to take care of it in our prayers. The ſumme is, that we wiſh the honour to be given to God, which he is worthy to have, that men never ſpeake or thinke of him without moſt high reverence: whereunto is contrary the unholy abuſing, which hath alway beene too common in the world, as at this day alſo it rangeth abroad. And hereupon commeth the neceſſity of this petition, which if there lived in us any godlineſſe, though it were but a little, ought to have beene ſuperfluous. But if the name of God have his holineſſe ſafe, when being ſevered from all other, it breatheth out nothing but glorie, here we are commanded not onely to pray that God will deliver that holy name from all contempt and diſhonour, but alſo that he will ſubdue all mankinde to the reverence of it. Now whereas God diſcloſeth himſelfe to us, partly by doctrine, and partly by workes, hee is no otherwiſe ſanctified of us, than if wee give to him in both behalfes that which is his, and ſo embrace whatſoever ſhall come from him: and that his ſeverity have no leſſe praiſe among us than his mercifullneſſe, for as much as he hath in the manifold diverſity of his workes imprinted markes of his glory, which may worthily draw out of all tongues a confeſſion of his praiſe. So ſhall it come to paſſe that the Scripture ſhall have full authority with us, and that no good ſucceſſe ſhall hinder the bleſſing which God deſerveth in the whole courſe of the governing of the word. Againe, the petition alſo tendeth to this purpoſe, that all ungodlineſſe which defileth this holy name, may be deſtroyed and taken away: that whatſoever whatsoever things doe darken and diminish this sanctifying, as well slaunders as mockings, may be driven away: and when God subdueth all sacriledges, his glory may thereby more and more shine abroad.

The parts and processe of the kingdome of God amongst men: which is the second petition.

42. The second petition is, that the kingdome of God may come: which although it containe no new thing, yet not without cause severed from the first: because if we consider our owne drowsinesse in a thing greatest of all other, it is profitable that the thing which ought of it selfe to have beene most well knowne, be with many wordes oft beaten into us. Therefore after that wee have beene commanded to pray to God to bring into subjection, and at length utterly to destroy whatsoever spotteth his holy name: now is added a like and in a manner the same request, that his kingdome come. But although wee have already set forth the definition of his kingdome, yet I now briefly rehearse, that God reigneth when men as well with forsaking of themselves, as with despising of the world and of the earthly life, doe so yeeld themselves to his righteousnesse, that they aspire to the heavenly life. Therefore there are two parts of this kingdome: the one that God correct with the power of his Spirit all corrupt desires of the flesh, which doe by multitudes make warre against him: the other that he frame all our senses to the obedience of his government, Therefore none doe keepe right order in this prayer, but they which begin at themselves, that is to say, that they be cleansed from all corruptions which trouble the quiet state of the kingdome of God, and infect the pureneſſe thereof. Now because the word of God is like a kingly scepter, we are here commanded to pray he will subdue the mindes and hearts of all men to willing obedience of it. Which is done, when with the secret instinct of his Spirit he uttereth the effectuall force of his word, that it may bee advanced in such degree as it is worthy. Afterward wee must come downe to the wicked which doe obstinately and with desperate rage resist his authority. God therefore setteth up his kingdome by humbling the whole world: but that in diverse manners: because he tameth the wantonnesses of some, and of other some he breaketh the untamed pride. This is daily to be wished that it be done, that it may please God to gather to himselfe Churches out of all the coastes of the world: to enlarge and encrease them in number, to enrich them with his gifts, to stablish right order in them: on the other side to overthrow all the enemies of pure doctrine and religion, to scatter abroad their counsels, to cast downe their enterprises. Whereby appeareth that the endevour of daily proceeding is not in vaine commanded us: because the matters of men, are never in so good case, that filthinesse being shaken away and cleansed, full pureneſſe flourisheth and is in lively force. But the fullnesse of it is deferred unto the last comming of Christ, when Paul teacheth that God shall be all in all. And so this prayer ought to withdraw us from all the corruptions of the world, which doe sever us from God that his kingdome should not flourish in us, and also to kindle our endevour to mortifie the flesh, finally to instruct us to the bearing of the crosse: forasmuch as God will in this wise have his kingdome spread abroad. Neither ought we to take it miscontentedly that the outward man be destroyed, so that the inward man be renewed. For this is the nature of the kingdome of God, when wee submit our selves to the righteousnesse thereof, to make us partakers of his glory. This is done when brightly setting forth his light and truth with alway new encreases, whereby the darkenesse and lies of Satan and his kingdome may vanish away, bee destroyed and perish, hee defendeth them that bee his, with the helpe of his Spirit, directeth them to uprightnesse, and strengtheneth them to continuance: but overthroweth the wicked conspiracies of his enemies, shaketh abroad their treasons and deceits, preventeth their malice, and beateth downe their stubbornesse, till at length hee kill Antichrist with the Spirit of his mouth and destroy all ungodlinesse with the brightnesse of his comming.

1 Cor. 15. 28.

Our requesting in the third petition that the will of God may be obeyed is a renouncing of our owne carnall wills and desires.

43 The third petition is, That the will of God bee done in earth, as it is in heaven. Which although it hangeth upon his kingdome, and cannot bee severed from it, is not in vaine added severally, for our grossenes, which doth not easily or by and by conceive what it is that God raigne in the world. It shall therefore be no absurdity if this be taken by way of plainer exposition: that God shall then be king in the world when all things shall submit themselves to his will. Now here is not meant of his secret will whereby hee governeth all things and directeth them to their end. For though Satan and men are troublesomely carryed against him, yet hee can by his incomprehensible counsell not onely turne aside their violent motions, but also drive them into order that he may doe by them that which he hath purposed. But here is spoken of another will of God, namely that, whereunto answereth willing obedience: and therefore the heaven is by name compared with the earth: because the Angels, as it is said in the Psalme, doe willingly obey God and are diligently bent to doe his commandements. Wee are therefore commanded to wish that as in heaven nothing is done but by the becke of God, and the Angels are quietly framed to all uprightnesse: so the earth, all stubbornesse and perverseneſſe being quenched, may be subject to such government. And when we require this, we renounce the desires of our owne flesh: because whosoever doth not resigne and yeeld his affections to God, he doth as much as in him lieth set himselfe against him, forasmuch as nothing commeth out of us but faulty. And wee are againe by this prayer framed to the forsaking of our selves, that God may governe us after his will: and not that onely, but that hee may also create in us new mindes, and new hearts, our old being brought to nought: that wee may feele in our selves none other motion of desire than a meere consent with his will: summarily that wee may will nothing of our selves, but that his Spirit may governe our hearts, by whom inwardly teaching us wee may learne to love those things that please him, and to hate those things that displease him. Whereupon this also followeth, that whatsoever affections fight against his will, hee make them vaine and void. Loe here bee the first three chiefe points of this prayer, in asking whereof wee ought to have the onely glory of God before our eies, leaving this respect of our selves, and having no regard to any of our owne profit, which although it come hereof largely unto us, yet we ought not here to seeke it. But albeit all these things, though we never thinke of them, nor wish them, nor aske them, must nevertheless come to passe in their due time, yet wee must wish them and require them. And the to doe is no small profit for our travaile, that we may so testifie and professe our selves to bee the servants and children of God, as much as in us lieth endevouring and being truely and throughly given to set forth his honour, which is due to him being both a Lord and a Father. Who so therefore doe not with affection and zeale of advancing the glory of God, pray that the name of God be hallowed, that his kingdome come, that his will be done: they are not to bee accounted among the children and servants of God: and as all these things shall be done against their wils, so they shall turne to their confusion and destruction.

Psal. 103. 20.

44 Now followeth the second part of the prayer, in which we come downe to our owne commodities: not that bidding farewell to the Glory of God (which as Paul witnesseth, is to bee regarded even in meat and drinke) we should seeke onely what is profitable for our selves: but we have already given warning that there is this difference, that God peculiarly claiming three petitions to himselfe, doth draw us to himselfe wholly, that hee may in this wise prove our godlinesse. Then hee granteth us also to have an eye to our owne commodities, but with this condition, that wee aske nothing for our selves but to this end that whatsoever benefits hee bestoweth upon us, they may set forth his glory: forasmuch as nothing is more rightfull than that we live and dye to him. But in this petition we aske of God generally all things which the use of the body needeth under the elements of this world, not onely wherewith wee may bee fed and clothed, but also whatsoever hee foreseeth to be profitable for us, that we may eate our bread in peace. By which prayer we briefly yeeld our selves unto his care, and commit us to his providence, that hee may feed, cherish, and preserve us. For the most good Father disdaineth not to receive also our body into his faithfull safegard and keeping, to exercise our faith in these small things, when wee looke for all things at his hands, even to a crumme of bread and a droppe of water. For whereas it is come to passe I wote not how by our iniquity, that wee bee mooved and vexed with greater care of the flesh than of the soule: many which dare trust to God for their soule, are yet carefull for their flesh, are yet in doubt what they shall eate, and wherewith they shall bee clothed: and if they have not plentie of wine, wheate, and oyle a forehand, they tremble for feare. So much more doe wee esteeme the shadow of this this life which lasteth but a moment, than that everlasting immortality. But who so trusting to God have once cast away that carefulnesse for the provision of the flesh, doe also by and by looke for salvation and everlasting life at his hand, which are greater things. It is therefore no small exercise of faith, to hope for those things of God which otherwise doe so much hold us in care: and wee have not smally profited, when wee have put off this unbeleevingnesse which sticketh fast within the bones almost of all men. As for that which some doe here teach of transubstantiall bread, it seemeth but smally to agree with the meaning of Christ: yea, but if we did not even in this fraile life give to God the office of a nourishing Father, our prayer should be unperfect. The reason which they bring is too much prophane: that it is not meete that the children of God, which ought to bee spirituall, should not onely cast their minde to earthly cares, but also wrap God therein with them. As though his blessing and fatherly favour doth not also appeare in the sustenance of our life, or as though it were written in vaine that 1 Tim. 4. 8. godlinesse hath promises not onely of the life to come, but also of this present life. But although the forgivenesse of sinnes is of much greater value than the sustenances of the body, yet Christ hath set the inferiour thing in the first place, to the intent to lift us up by degrees to the other two petitions which doe properly belong to the heavenly life,

Levit. 6. 20. wherein he had regard to our grossenesse. We are commanded to aske Our bread, that we should be content with the quantity which our heavenly father vouchsafeth to give to us, and should not seeke for gaine by unlawfull crafty meanes. In the meane time wee must learne that it is made Ours by Title of gift, because neither our diligence, nor our travaile, nor our hands (as it is said in Moses) doe by themselves get us any thing, unlesse the blessing of God bee present: yea the plenty of the bread should nothing at all profit us, unlesse it were by God turned into nourishment. And therefore this liberality of God is no lesse necessary for the rich than for the poore: because having their cellers and their barnes full, they should yet faint for drienesse and emptinesse, unlesse they did by his grace enjoy their bread. The word This Day, or every day as it is in the other Evangelist, and also the adjective Daily, doe bridle the too much greedinesse of fraile things, wherewith wee are wont to burne out of measure, and whereunto are joyned other evils: for if we have plentifull abundance, we doe gloriously power it out upon pleasure, delights, boasting, and other kinds of riotous excesse. Therefore we are commanded to aske onely so much as is enough for our necessity, and as it were from day to day, with this affiance, that when our heavenly Father hath fed us this day, he will also not faile us to morrow. Therefore how great plenty of things soever doe flow unto us, yea when our barnes be stuffed and our cellars full: yet we ought alway to aske our daily bread: because wee must certainely beleeve that all substance is nothing, but insomuch as the Lord doth by powring out of his blessing with continuall encrease make it fruitfull: and that the very same substance that is in our hand, is not our owne, but insomuch as hee doth every houre give us a portion and grant us the use of it. This whereas the pride of men doth most hardly suffer it selfe to bee perswaded: the Lord
Deut. 8. 3. testifieth that hee hath shewed a singular example thereof for all ages, when he fed his Matth. 3. 4. people with Manna in the wildernesse, to teach us that man liveth not by bread onely, but rather in the word that commeth out of his mouth. Whereby is declared, that it is his power alone by which our life and strengthes are sustained, although he doth minister it unto us under bodily instruments. As he is wont also to teach us by the contrary example, when hee so oft as hee will, breaketh the strength and (as he calleth it) the staffe Levit. 26. 26 of bread, that men eating may pine with hunger, and drinking may be dryed up with thirst. But who so not being contented with dayly bread, but with unbridled greedinesse are gaping for endlesse store, or who so being full with their aboundance, and careless by reason of the heape of their riches, doe nevertheless sue to God with this prayer, they doe nothing else but mocke him. For, the first sort of such men aske that which they would not obtaine, yea that which they most of all abhor, that is, to have onely daily bread, and so much as in them lyeth they dissemblingly hide from God the affection of their covetousnesse: whereas true prayer ought to poure out before him the very whole minde it selfe, and whatsoever inwardly lyeth hidden. But the other sort doe aske that which they looke not for at his hand, namely that which they thinke that they have with themſelves. In this that it is called Ours, the bountifullneſſe of God (as we have ſaid) ſo much more appeareth, which maketh That ours, that is by no right due to us. Yet that expoſition is not to be rejected which I have alſo touched, that by our bread is meant that which is earned with rightfull and harmeleſſe travell, and not gotten with deceits and extortions: becauſe that is alway other mens which we get to our ſelves with any ill doing. Whereas wee pray that it be given us, thereby it ſignified that it is the onely and free gift of God, from whence ſoever it come to us, yea when it ſhall moſt of all ſeeme to be gotten by our owne policy and travaile, and earned with our owne hands: forasmuch as it commeth to paſſe by his onely bleſſing that our labours proſper well.

45 Now followeth. Forgive us our debts: in which petition and the next following, Chriſt hath briefly contained whatſoever maketh for the heavenly life: as in theſe two parts ſtandeth the ſpirituall covenant which God hath made for the ſalvation of his Church, I will write my lawes in their hearts, and I will be merciſull to their iniquity. Here Chriſt beginneth the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes: after this, he will by and by adjoyne the ſecond grace, that God defend us with the power of his Spirit, and ſuſtaine us with his helpe, that we may ſtand unovercome againſt all tentations. And ſinnes hee calleth debts, becauſe we are debt-bound to pay the penalty of them, and were by no meanes able to ſatisfie it, unleſſe wee are acquitted by this forgiveneſſe. Which pardon is of his free mercy, when hee himſelfe liberally wipeth out theſe debts, taking no payment of us, but with his owne mercy ſatisfying himſelfe in Chriſt, which hath once given himſelfe for recompence. Therefore who ſo truſt that God ſhall bee ſatisfied by their owne or other mens merits, and that with ſuch ſatisfactions the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes is recompenced and redeemed, they have no part of communicating of this free forgiveneſſe: and when they call upon God in this manner, they doe nothing but ſubſcribe to their owne accuſation, yea and ſeale their owne condemnation with their owne witneſſe. For they confeſſe themſelves debtors, unleſſe they bee acquitted by the benefit of forgiveneſſe, which yet they doe not receive, but rather refuſe, when they thruſt unto God their owne merits and ſatisfactions. For, ſo they doe not beſeech his mercy but do appeale to his judgement. As for them that dreame of a perfection in themſelves, which taketh away need to crave pardon, let them have ſuch diſciples whom the itching of their eares driveth to errors: ſo that it bee certaine that ſo many diſciples as they get, are taken away from Chriſt: for as much as he inſtructing alſo to confeſſe their guiltineſſe, receiveth none but ſinners: not for that hee cheriſheth ſinnes with flatterings, but becauſe he knew that the faithfull are never throughly unclothed of the vices of their fleſh, but that they alway remaine ſubject to the judgement of God. It is indeed to bee wiſhed, yea and to bee earneſtly endevoured, that wee having performed all the parts of our duty, may truely rejoyce before God that wee are cleane from all ſpot: but for as much as it pleaſeth God by little and little to make againe his image in us, that there alway remaineth ſome infection in our fleſh, the remedy ought not to have beene deſpiſed. If Chriſt by the authority given to him of his Father, commandeth us throughout the whole courſe of our life, to flee to craving of pardon of our guiltineſſe: who ſhall be able to ſuffer theſe new maſters, which goe about with this imagined ghoſt of perfect innocency to dazle the eies of the ſimple, to make them to truſt that they may be made free from all fault? Which, as Iohn witneſſeth, is nothing elſe but to make God a lyer. And with all one worke theſe lewd men by cancelling one article do teare in ſunder and by that meane doe weaken from the very foundation the whole covenant of God, wherein we have ſhewed that our ſalvation is contained: ſo as they be not onely robbers of God, becauſe they ſever thoſe things ſo conjoyned, but alſo wicked and cruell becauſe they overwhelme poore ſoules with diſpaire: and traitours to themſelves and other, that be like them, becauſe they bring themſelves into ſlothfullneſſe directly contrary to the mercy of God. But whereas ſome object, that in wiſhing the comming of the kingdome of God, wee doe alſo aske the putting away of ſinne: that is too childiſh, becauſe in the firſt table of this prayer is ſet forth unto us moſt high perfection, but in this part is ſet forth our weakneſſe. So theſe two things doe fitly agree together, that in a ſpring toward the marke we deſpiſe not the remedies which our neceſſities

The fifth petition wherein our ſins are confeſſed to be debts, our imperfections acknowledged during the terme of this preſent life, a profeſſion made of our owne willingneſſe to void out our hearts of all revengefull cogitations towards them that have privately injuried us. ſities requireth. Finally, we pray that we may be forgiven as we our ſelves doe forgive our debtors, that is, as we doe forgive and pardon all of whomſoever we have beene in any thing offended, either unjuſtly handled in deed, or reprochfully uſed in word. Not that it lyeth in us to pardon the guiltineſſe of the fault and offence which pertaineth to God alone: but this is our forgiving, of our owne willingneſſe to lay away out of our minde wrath, hatred, and deſire of revengement, and with voluntary forgetfullnes to tread under foote the remembrance of injuries. Wherefore wee may not aske forgiveneſſe of ſinnes at the hand of God, if wee doe not alſo forgive their offences toward us which either doe or have done us wrong. But if wee keepe any hatreds in our hearts, and purpoſe any revengements, and imagine by what occaſion we may not hurt, yea, and if wee doe not indevour to come into favour againe with our enemies, and doe deſerve well of them with all kinde of friendly doings, and to win them unto us: we doe by this prayer beſeech God that hee doe not forgive us. For we require that he grant to us the ſame forgiveneſſe which wee grant to other. But this is to pray that hee grant it not to us, unleſſe wee grant it to them. Whoſo therefore bee ſuch, what doe they obtaine by their prayer but a more grievous judgement? Laſt of all it is to bee noted, that this condition that hee forgive us as we forgive our debtors, is not therefore added for that we deſerve his forgiveneſſe by the forgiveneſſe which wee grant to other, as if that cauſe of forgiveneſſe to us were there expreſſed: but by this word partly the Lords will was to comfort the weakeneſſe of our Faith, for hee added this as a ſigne whereby we may bee aſſured that hee hath as ſurely granted to us forgiveneſſe of our ſinnes, as wee ſurely know in our conſcience that wee have granted the ſame to other, if our minde bee void and cleanſed of all hatred, envy, and revengement, and partly by this as it were by a marke, hee wipeth them out of the number of his children that they may not bee bold to call upon him as their Father, which being headlong haſty to revenge, and hardly entreated to pardon, doe uſe ſtiffely continuing enmities, and doe cheeriſh in themſelves the ſame diſpleaſure toward other which they pray to be turned from themſelves. Which is alſo in Luke expreſly ſpoken in the words of Chriſt.

The ſixt petition of aid and ſuccour againſt the power of thoſe weapons which provoking unto evill we are not able of our ſelves to withſtand. Iam.1.2.& 14. Mat.4.1. & 3.

46 The ſixt petition (as we have ſaid) anſwereth to the promiſe of ingraving the law of God in our hearts. But becauſe we doe not without continuall warefare and hard and great ſtrivings to obey God, we doe here pray to bee furniſhed with ſuch weapons and defended with ſuch ſuccour, that wee may bee able to get the victory: whereby wee are warned that we ſtand in neede not only of the grace of the ſpirit, which may ſoften, bow, and direct our heart to the obedience of God, but alſo of his helpe, whereby hee may make us invincible againſt both all the traiterous entrappings and violent conflicts of Satan, But now oftentimes there are many and divers ſorts. For, both the perverſe thoughts of minde provoking us to treſpaſſing againſt the law, which either our owne luſt doth miniſter unto us, or the devill ſtirreth up, are tentations: and all thoſe things which of their owne nature are not evill, yet by the craft of the devill are made tentations, when they are ſo ſet before our eies, that by the occaſion of them wee bee drawne away or doe ſwarve from God. And theſe tentations are either on the right hand or on the left. On the right hand, as riches, power, honours, which commonly doe with their gliſtering and ſhew of good, ſo dazle the ſight of men, and catch them with the baited hooke of their flatterings, that being intrapped with ſuch deceits, or drunke with ſuch ſweetneſſe, they may forget their God. On the left hand as poverty, reproches, deſpiſings, troubles, and ſuch other: that they being grieved with the bitterneſſe and hardneſſe thereof may be utterly diſcouraged, caſt away Faith and hope, and finally be altogether eſtranged from God. To theſe tentations of both ſorts, which fight with us either being kindled in us by our owne luſt, or being ſet againſt us by the craft of Satan, we pray to our heavenly Father that hee ſuffer us not to yeeld: but rather that hee uphold us and raiſe us up with his hand, that being ſtrong by his ſtrength wee may ſtand faſt againſt all the aſſaults of the malicious enemy, whatſoever thoughts hee put into our minde: then, that whatſoever is ſet before us on either ſide, wee may turne it to good, that we neither bee puffed up with proſperity, nor throwne downe with adverſity. Neither yet doe wee here require that we may ſeele no tentations at all, with which we have great need to be ſtirred up, pricked, and pinched, leaſt by too much reſt we grow dull. For not in vaine did David wiſh to be tempted: and not without cauſe, the Lord daily tempteth his elect, chaſtiſing them by ſhame, poverty, trouble, and other kindes of Croſſe. But God tempteth after one manner, and Satan after another: Satan, to deſtroy, damne, confound, and throw downe headlong: but God, that by proving them that be his, he may have a triall of their unfainedneſſe, and by exerciſing them may confirme their ſtrength, to mortifie, purge by fire, and ſeare their fleſh, which unleſſe it were in this wiſe reſtrained, would wax wanton, and would wildly outrage above meaſure. Moreover Sathan aſſaileth men unarmed and unready, that he may oppreſſe them unware: God even with tempting worketh the effect, that they which be his may patiently beare whatſoever he ſendeth upon them. By the name of the Evill, whether we underſtand the Devill or ſinne, it maketh little matter. Satan indeed himſelfe is the enemy that lieth in waite for our life: but with ſinne he is armed to deſtroy us. This therfore is our requeſt, that we may not be overcome or overwhelmed with any tentations, but may by the power of the Lord ſtand ſtrong againſt all contrary powers wherewith we are aſſailed: which is, not to yeeld us vanquiſhed to tentations, that being received into his keeping and charge, and being ſafe by his protection: we may endure unovercome over ſinne, death, the gates of hell, and the whole kingdome of the devill: which is to be delivered from evill. Where it is alſo to be diligently marked, that it is above our ſtrength to match with the divell ſo great a warrier, and to beare his force and violence. Otherwiſe we ſhould but vainly, or as it were in mockage aske that which we had already in our ſelves. Surely, they which prepare them to ſuch a battell with truſt of themſelves, doe not ſufficiently underſtand with how fierce and well armed an enemy they have to doe. Now we pray to be delivered from his power, as out of the mouth of a mad and raging lion, whereas we ſhould be torne in peeces with his teeth and pawes, and ſwallowed with his throate, unleſſe the Lord doe deliver us out of the middeſt of death: yet therewithall knowing this, that if the Lord ſhall ſtand by us, and fight for us when we are overthrowne, we ſhall in his ſtrength ſhew ſtrength. Let other truſt as they liſt to their owne abilities & ſtrengths of free will, which they thinke that they have of themſelves: but let it ſuffice us that we ſtand and are ſtrong by the onely ſtrength of God. But this praier containeth more than at the firſt ſight it beareth in ſhew. For if the Spirit of God be our ſtrength to fight out our combate with Satan, we ſhall not be able to get the victorie untill we being filled with that Spirit ſhall have put off all the weakneſſe of our fleſh. When therefore wee pray to be delivered from Satan and the Divell, we pray to be from time to time enriched with new encreaſes of the grace of God, till being fully ſtoffed with them, we may triumph over all evill. It ſeemeth hard and rough to ſome, that we crave of God that he leade us not into tentation, for as much as it is contrary to his nature to tempt, as James witneſſeth. But this queſtion is already partly aſſoiled, where wee ſaid that our owne luſt is properly the cauſe of all the tentations wherewith we are overcome, and therefore worthily beareth the blame thereof. Neither doth James meane any thing elſe, but that the faultes are without cauſe and wrongfully laid upon God, which we are driven to impute to our ſelves, becauſe we know our ſelves in our conſcience guilty of them. But this withſtandeth not, but that God may when it pleaſeth him, make us bond to Satan, caſt us away into a reprobate ſenſe, and to filthy luſts, and ſo lead us into tentation by his judgement which is righteous indeed but yet oftentimes ſecret: for as much as the cauſe of it is often hid from men, which is yet certainly knowne with him. Whereupon is gathered that this is no unfit manner of ſpeaking, if we be perſwaded that hee doth not without cauſe ſo oft threaten, that when the reprobate ſhall be ſtricken with blindneſſe and hardneſſe of heart, theſe ſhall be ſure tokens of his vengeance.

Jam.1.13.

47 Theſe three petitions, wherewith we do peculiarly commend us and our things to God, doe evidently ſhew this which we have before ſaid, that the praiers of Chriſtians ought to be common and to tend to the common edifying of the church, and to the encreaſe of the communion of the faithfull. For there doth not every man pray

* That which is added in the Lords praier, concerning his kingdome, power and glory to whom we pray, giveth us both boldnes to aske and great trust to obtaine that we pray for.

to have any thing privately given, but all in common together doe pray for Our bread, for forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, that we may not be led into tentation, that we may be delivered from evill. There is furthermore adjoyned a cauſe why we have both ſo great boldneſſe to aske, and ſo great truſt to obtaine: which although it be not in the Latin copies, yet it agreeth more fitly in this place than that it ſhould ſeeme worthy to be omitted, namely that this is the kingdome, and the power, and the glory for ever. This is the perfect and quiet reſt of our ſoule. For if our praiers were to be commended to God by their owne worthineſſe, who ſhould be ſo bold, as once to open his mouth before him? Now howſoever wee be moſt miſerable, howſoever moſt unworthy of all men, howſoever voide of all commendation: yet we ſhall never want cauſe to pray, and never be deſtitute of confidence: foraſmuch as our Father cannot have his kingdome, power and glory taken away from him. At the end is added Amen, whereby is expreſſed our ferventneſſe of deſire to obtaine thoſe things that we have asked of God, and our hope is confirmed that all ſuch things are already obtained and ſhall ſurely be given us becauſe they are promiſed by God, which cannot deceive. And this agreeth with that manner of prayer which we have here before rehearſed, Doe it Lord for thy names ſake, not for our ſakes or our righteouſneſſe: whereby the holy ones doe not onely expreſſe the end of their praiers, but alſo confeſſe that they are unworthy to obtaine unleſſe God fetch the cauſe from himſelfe, and that their truſt to ſpeed commeth of the only nature of God.

The perfection of the Lords prayer, and the danger of preſuming to crave things without the compaſſe thereof.
Eſay 11. 2.
See Auguſt. Of prayer to Proba.

48 Thus have wee whatſoever wee ought yea or in any wiſe may aske of God, ſet forth in this forme, and as it were a rule of praying taught by the beſt Schoolemaſter Chriſt, whom the Lord hath ſet over us to be our teacher, and whom alone hee hath willed to be harkened unto. For hee both alway hath beene his eternal Iwiſdome, and being made man, is given to men the Angell of great counſell. And this praier is in all points, ſo fully perfect, that whatſoever forreine or ſtrange thing is added which cannot bee referred to it, it is ungodly and unworthy to be allowed of God. For in this ſumme hee hath ſet forth, what is meete for him, what is pleaſing to him, what is neceſſarie for us: finally what hee will grant. Wherefore who ſo dare goe further, and to aske any thing of God beſide theſe, firſt they will adde of their owne to the wiſedome of God (which cannot be done without made blaſphemy) then they hold not themſelves under the will of God, but deſpiſing it doe with greedineſſe wander further: finally they ſhall never obtaine any thing, foraſmuch as they praie without faith. And there is no doubt that all ſuch praiers are made without faith, becauſe here wanteth the word of God, upon which unleſſe faith be grounded, can in no wiſe ſtand. But they which forſaking the maſters rule, doe follow their owne deſires, are not onely without the word of God, but alſo ſo much as they be able with their whole endevour are againſt it. Therefore Tertullian no leſſe fitly than truly hath called this a lawfull praier, ſecretly ſignifying that all other are lawleſſe and unlawfull.

De fuga in perſecut.

Our requeſts when we pray are not tied to the words and ſyllables, but to thoſe things which are contained within the compaſſe of the Lords praier.

49 We would not have theſe things ſo taken as though wee were ſo bound with this forme of praier, that we may not change a word or a ſyllable. For there are each where read many praiers in the Scripture, farre differing from this in words, yet written by the ſame Spirit, and which are at this day profitable to be uſed of us. Many are continually put into the mouthes of the faithfull by the ſame Spirit, which in likeneſſe of words doe not ſo much agree. This onely is our meaning in ſo teaching, that no man ſhould ſeeke, looke for, or aske any other thing at all than that which is ſummarily comprehended in this praier, and which though it moſt differ in words, yet differeth not in ſenſe. Like as it is certaine that all the praiers which are found in the Scriptures, and which doe come out of godly hearts, are applied to this, ſo verily none can any where be found, which may match, much leſſe paſſe, the perfectneſſe of this praier. Heere is nothing left out, that might be thought upon to the praiſes of God, nothing that ought to come into the minde of man for his owne profits: and the ſame ſo fully that all hope is worthily taken away from all men to attempt to make any better. In ſumme, let us remember that this is the doctrine of the wiſdome of God, which hath taught what he willed, and willed what was needfull.

50 But although we have above ſaid, that we ought alway to breath upward with mindes lifted up to God, and to pray without ceaſing: yet foraſmuch as ſuch is our weakneſſe, as needeth to be upholden with many helpes: ſuch is our dulneſſe, as needeth to be pricked forward with many ſpurs: it is good that everie one of us appoint to himſelfe privately certaine houres which may not paſſe away without praier, and which may have the whole affections of our minde throughly buſied to that purpoſe: as, when we riſe in the morning, before that we go to our daies worke, when we ſit downe to meate, when we have beene fed by the bleſſing of God, when we take us to reſt. Only let this not be a ſuperſtitious obſerving of houres, by which, as praying a taske to God, we may thinke our ſelves diſcharged for the other houres: but a training of our weakneſſe, whereby it may ſo be exerciſed and from time to time ſtirred up. Specially we ought carefully to looke that ſo oft as either we our ſelves are in diſtreſſe, or we ſee other to be in diſtreſſe with any hardneſſe of adverſitie, we run ſtraight way to him, not with feete but with harts: then, that we ſuffer not any proſperitie of our owne or other mens, to paſſe but that we teſtifie that we acknowledge it to be his with praiſe and thankſgiving. Finally, this is diligently to be obſerved in all praier, that we goe not about to binde God to certaine circumſtances, nor to appoint to him, what he ſhall doe, at what time, in what place, and in what manner: as by this praier we are taught to make to him no law, nor to appoint to him any condition, but to leave to his will that thoſe things which he will doe, he may doe in what manner, at what time, and in what place it pleaſeth him. Wherefore ere we make any praier for our ſelves, we firſt pray that his will be done: where we do already ſubmit our will to his: with which when it is reſtrained as with a bridle put upon it, it may not preſume to bring God into rule, but make him the judge and governour of all her deſires.

The neceſſitie of prayer and of ſet times for that purpoſe.

51 If we doe with mindes framed to this obedience, ſuffer our ſelues to bee ruled with the lawes of Gods providence, we ſhall eaſily learne to continue in prayer, and with longing deſires patiently to waite for the Lord: being aſſured that although hee appeare not, yet he is alway preſent with us, and will when he ſeeth his time declare how not deafe eares he gave to the prayer, which in the eyes of men ſeemed to bee deſpiſed. And this ſhall be a moſt preſent comfort, that wee faint not and fall downe by deſpaire, if at any time God doe not anſwere at our firſt requeſtes. Like as they are woont to doe, which while they are carried with their ſudden heate, doe ſo call upon God, that if he come not to them at their firſt brunts and bring them preſent helpe, they by and by imagine him to be angrie and hatefully bent againſt them, and caſting away all hope of obtaining, doe ceaſe to call upon him. But rather deferring our hope with a well tempered evenneſſe of minde, let us goe forward in that perſeverance which is ſo much commended to us in the Scriptures. For in the Pſalmes wee may oftentimes ſee how David and other faithfull men, when they ſeeme in a manner wearied with praying, did beate the aire becauſe they threw away their words to God that heard them not, and yet they ceaſe not from praying: becauſe the word of God hath not his full authoritie maintained, unleſſe the credit thereof be ſet above all ſucceſſes of things. Moreover let us not tempt God and provoke him againſt us being wearied with our importunacie, which many uſe to doe, which doe nothing but indent with God upon a certaine condition, and binde him to the lawes of their covenanting, as though he were ſervant to their deſires: which if he doe not preſently obey, they diſdaine, they chafe, they carpe againſt him, they murmure, they turmoile. Therefore to ſuch oftentimes in his furor he being angrie graunted that, which to other in his mercie he being favourable denieth. An example hereof are the children of Iſrael, for whom it had beene better not to have beene heard of the Lord, than with fleſh to eate up his wrath.

Conſtancie and patience in praiers needfull.

Num. 11. 18.

52 But if yet at length after long looking for it, our ſenſe doe not perceive what we have prevailed with praying, and ſeeleth no fruit thereof: yet our faith ſhall aſſure us of that, which cannot be perceived by ſenſe, namely that we have obtained that which was expedient for us, for as much as the Lord doth ſo oft and ſo certainely take upon him that he will have care of our grieves, after that they have beene once laid in his boſome. And ſo he will make us to poſſeſſe abundance in povertie, comfort in affliction.

Our praiers not fruitleſſe though the fruit thereof be not alwaies ſenſible.

For howsoever all other things doe faile us, yet God will never faile us, which suffereth the waiting and patience of them that be his to be disappointed. He alone shall suffice us insteed of all things, for as much as he containeth in himselfe all good things, which he shall one day disclose unto us at the day of judgement when he shall plainly shew forth his kingdome. Beside this although God grant to us, yet he doth not alway answer according to the expresse forme of our request, but holding us after outward seeming in suspence, yet by a meane unknowne he sheweth that our praiers were not vaine. This is meant by the words of John, If we know that hee heareth us when we aske any thing of him, we know that we have the petitions which we aske of him. This seemeth a weake superfluousnesse of words: but it is a singularly profitable declaration, namely that God even when he doth not follow our desires, is yet gentle and favourable to our praiers, that the hope which resteth upon his word may never disappoint us. But with this patience the faithfull doe so farre neede to be sustained, that they should not long stand unlesse they did stay upon it. For the Lord doth by no light trials prove them that be his, and not tenderly doth exercise them: but oftentimes driveth them into the greatest extremities, and then they are driven thither he suffereth them long to stick fast in the mire, ere he gave them any tast of his sweetnesse: and, as Hanna saith, he slaieth, and quickeneth: he leadeth downe to the hels, and bringeth backe againe. What could they here doe but be discouraged, and fall headlong into dispaire: unlesse when they are in distresse and desolate and already halfe dead, this thought did raise them up, that God doth looke upon them, and that there shall be at hand an end of their evils. But howsoever they stand fast upon the assuredness of that hope, they cease not in the meane time to pray: because if there be not in praier a stedfastnesse of continuance, we nothing prevaile with praying.

THE XXJ. CHAPTER.

Of the eternall Election, whereby God hath predestinate some to salvation, and other some to destruction.

The necessitie of knowing the truth in the question of predestination that God may be glorified, our mindes both humbled and confirmed, and the danger of curious wading therein beyond the bounds of Scripture.

BUt now whereas the covenant of life is not equally preached to all men, and with them to whom it is preached it doth not either equally or continually finde like place: in this diversitie the wonderous depth of the judgement of God appeareth. For neither is it any doubt but that this diversitie also serveth the free choise of Gods eternall election. If it be evident that it is wrought by the will of God that salvation is freely offered to some, and othersome are debarred from comming to it: here by and by arise great and hard questions which cannot otherwise be discussed, than if the godly mindes have that certainly stablished which they ought to hold concerning election and Predestination. This is (as many thinke) a combersome question: because they thinke nothing to be lesse reasonable than of the common multitude of men some before ordained to salvation, othersome to destruction. But how they wrongfully encomber themselves, shall afterward be evident by the framing of the matter together. Beside that in the very same darknesse which maketh men afraid, not onely the profitableness of this doctrine, but also the most sweet fruit sheweth forth it selfe. We shall never be cleerely perswaded as we ought to be, that our salvation floweth out of the fountaine of the free mercy of God, till his eternall election bee knowne to us, which by this comparison brightly setteth forth the grace of God, that he doth not without difference adopt all into the hope of salvation, but giveth to some that which he denieth to other. How much the ignorance of this principle diminisheth of the glory of God, how much it withdraweth from the true humilitie, it is plaine to see. But Paul denieth that, that which is so necessary to bee knowne, is possible to bee knowne, unlesse God leaving altogether the respect of works doe chuse them whom hee hath determined with himselfe. In this time (saith hee) the remnants were saved according to the free election, If by grace, then not of workes: forasmuch as grace should then not be grace. If of works, then not of grace: for as much as worke

should now not be worke. It we must be brought backe to the beginning of election, that it may be certain that salvation commeth to us from no other where than from the meere liberality of God: they which will have this principle quenched, doe niggardly so much as in them lieth darken that which ought gloriously and with full mouth to have beene published, and they plucke up the very roote of humilitie. Paul, where the salvation of the remnant of the people is ascribed to free election, cleerely testifieth that onely then it is knowne that God doth by his meere good pleasure save whom he will, and not render reward which cannot be done. They which shut the gates, that none may be bold to come to the tasting of this doctrine, doe no lesse wrong to men than to God: because neither shall any other thing suffice to humble us as we ought to be, neither shall we otherwise feele from our heart how much we are bound to God. Neither yet is there any other where the upholding stay of sound affiance: as Christ himselfe teacheth, which to deliver us from all feare, and to make us unvanquishable among so many dangers, ambushes, and deadly battels, promiseth that whatsoever he hath received of his Father to keepe, shall be safe. Wherfore we gather that they shall with continuall trembling be miserable, whosoever they be that know not themselves to be the proper possession of God: and therefore that they doe very ill provide both for themselves and for all the faithfull, which being blind at these three profits which we have touched, would wish the whole founda i n of our salvation to be quite taken from among us. Moreover, heereby the Church appeareth unto us, which otherwise (as Bernard rightly teacheth) were not possible to be found, nor to be knowne among creatures: because both waies in marvellous wise it lieth hidden within the bosome of blessed predestinati n and within the Masse of miserable damnation. But ere I enter into the matter it selfe, I must beforehand in two sorts speake to two sorts of men. That the intreating of predestination, whereas of it selfe it is somewhat cumbersome, is made very doubtfull yea and dangerous, the curiousnesse of men is the cause: which can by no stops be restrained from wandring into forbidden compasses, and climbing up on high: which, if it may, will leave to God no secret which it will not search and turne over. Into this boldnesse and importunacy, forasmuch as we commonly see many to run headlong, and among those some that are otherwise not evill men: heere is fit occasion to warne them what is in this behalfe the due measure of their duie. First therfore let them remember, that when they enquire upon Predestination, they pearce into the secret closets of the wisdome of God: whereinto if any man doe carelesly and boldly breake in, he shall both not attaine wherewith to satisfie his curiousnesse, and he shall enter into a maze whereof he shall finde no way to get out againe. For neither is it meete that man should freely search those things which God hath willed to be hidden in himselfe, and to turne over from very eternity the height of wisdome, which he willed to be honoured and not be conceived, that by it also he might be marvellous unto us. Those secrets of his will which he hath determined to be opened unto us, he hath disclosed in his word: and he hath determined, so far as he foresaw to pertaine to us and to be profitable for us.

Ser. in Cant. 78.

2 We are come (saith Augustine) into the way of Faith, let us steadfastly hold it. It bringeth into the Kings chamber, in which all the treasures of knowledge and wisedome are hidden. For, the Lord himselfe Christ did not envy his excellent and most chosen disciples, when he said, I have many things to be said to you, but yee cannot beare them now. We must walke, we must profit, we must encrease, that our hearts may be able to conceive those things which now we cannot conceive. If the last day find us profiting, there we shall learne that which here we could not. If this thought be of force with us, that the word of the Lord is the onely way, that may lead us to search whatsoever is lawfull to be learned of him, that it is the onely light, which may give us light to see whatsoever we ought to see of him: it shall easily hold backe and restraine us from all rashnesse. For we shall know that so soone as we be gone out of the bounds of the world we run out of the way, and in darknesse, in which race we must needs oftentimes straie, slip, and stumble. First therefore let this be before our eies, that to covet any other knowledge of Predestination than that which is set forth by the word of God, is a point of no lesse madnesse than if a man have a will to goe by an unpassible Gods word the onely safe way to walke in, and the light to direct our walking in matters of so great hardnesse as this is.

Hom. in John 35.

John 8.26.

way, or to see in darknesse. Neither let us be ashamed, to be ignorant of somewhat in it wherein there is some learned ignorance. But rather let us willingly abstaine from the searching of that knowledge, whereof the excessive coveting is both foolish and perillous, yea and deadly. But if the wantonnesse of wit provoke us, it shall be profitable alway to set this against it, whereby it may be beaten backe, that as too much of honie is Pro.25.27. not good, so the searching of glorie doth not turne unto glorie to the curious. For there is good cause why we should be frayed away from that boldnes, which can do nothing but throw us downe headlong into ruine.

The doctrine of predestination not utterly to be shunned and buried in silence.

3 There be other which when they have a will to remedie this evill, do command all mention of Predestination to be in a manner buried, at the least they teach men to flee from every manner of questioning thereof as from a rocke. Although the moderation of these men be herein worthily to bee praised, that they judge, that mysteries should be tasted of with such sobrietie: yet because they descend too much beneath the meane: they little prevaile with the wit of man, which doth not lightlie suffer it selfe to be restrained. Therefore, that in this behalfe also we may keepe a right end, we must returne to the word of the Lord, in which we have a sure rule of understanding. For the Scripture is the schoole of the holy Ghost, in which as nothing is left out which is both necessarie and profitable to be knowne, so nothing is taught but that which is behovefull to learne. Whatsoever therefore is uttered in the Scripture concerning predestination, we must beware that we debar not the faithfull from it, least we should seeme either enviously to defraude them of the benefit of their God, or to blame and accuse the holy Ghost, who hath published those things which it is in any wise profitable to be suppressed. Let us (I say) give leave to a christian man, to open his minde and his eares to all the sayings of God which are directed to him; so that it be done with this temperance, that so soone as the Lord hath closed his holie mouth, he may also foreclose to himselfe all the way to enquire further. This shall be the best bond of sobrietie, if not onely in learning wee may follow the Lord going before us, but also when he maketh an end of teaching, we cease to will to learne. Neither is the danger which they feare of so great importance, that wee ought therefore to turne away our Pro.23.2. mindes from the oracles of God. Notable is the saying of Salomon, that the glorie of God is to conceale a word. But sith both godlinesse and common reason teacheth that this is not generally meant of everie thing, we must seeke a difference, least brutish ignorance should please us under colour of modestie and sobrietie. That difference is Deut.29.26. in few words plainly set out by Moses, To the Lord our God (saith he) belong his secrets: but to us and to our children he hath disclosed these things. For we see how he commendeth to the people the studie of the doctrine of the law, only by reason of the decree of God, because it pleased God to publish it: and how he withholdeth the people within those bounds, by this onely reason, because it is not lawfull for mortall men to thrust themselves into the secrets of God.

Predestination not therefore to be concealed because prophane men carp, or barke, or scoffe at it, as they doe also at other parts of christian doctrine which are not for that cause to be overpast.

4 Prophane men (I grant) doe in the matter of Predestination suddenly catch hold of somewhat which they may carpe, or cavill, or barke, or scoffe at. But if their waywardnesse doe fray us away from it, the chiefe articles of the faith must be kept secret, of which there is almost none which they or such as they be doe leave untouched with blasphemie. A froward wit will no lesse proudly outrage when he heareth that in the essence of God there are three persons, than if he heare that God foresaw what should become of man when he created him. Neither will they abstaine from laughing, when they shall understand that there is little more than five thousand yeares passed since the creation of the world: for they will aske why the power of God was so long idle and asleepe. Finally there can be nothing brought forth, which they will not scoffe at. For the restraining of these sacriledges, must we hold our peace of the Godhead of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost? or must we passe over in silence the creation of the world? Yea but the truth of God is both in this behalfe and every where mightier than that it need to feare the evill speaking of the wicked: as Augustine strongly maintaineth in his worke of the good of Perseverance. For we see that the false Apostles could not by defaming and slaundering the true doctrine of Paul, make him to be ashamed of it. But whereas they say that this whole disputation is perillous also for godly mindes, because it maketh againſt exhortations, becauſe it ſhaketh faith, becauſe it troubleth the hart it ſelfe: this is vaine. Auguſtine ſticketh not to confeſſe that for theſe cauſes he was wont to be blamed, for that he did too freely preach Predeſtination: but, as he had in readineſſe wherewithall, he largely confuteth them. But we, becauſe many and divers abſurdities are thruſt into this place, had rather to reſerve every one to be wiped away in place fit for it. Onely this I deſire generally to obtaine of them, that thoſe things which the Lord hath laid up in ſecret, we may not ſearch: thoſe things which he hath brought openly abroad, we may not neglect: leſt either on the one part we be condemned of vaine curioſitie, or on the other part, of unthankfulneſſe. For, this alſo is very well ſaid of Auguſtine, that we may ſafely follow the ſcripture, which as with a motherly pace goeth ſtoupingly, leſt it ſhould forſake our weakeneſſe. But who ſo are ſo wearie and ſo fearefull that they would have Predeſtination to be buried, leſt it ſhould trouble weake ſoules: with what colour, I beſeech you, will they cover their arrogancie, when they indirectly accuſe God of fooliſh unadviſedneſſe, as though he foreſaw not the danger, which they thinke themſelves to have wiſely met with? Whoſoever therefore travelleth to bring the doctrine of Predeſtination into miſliking, he openly ſaith evill of God: as though ſomewhat had unadviſedly ſlipped from him which is hurtfull to the Church.

De bono perſever. cap. 14.

Lib. 5. de Gen. ad lit.

5 Predeſtination whereby God adopteth ſome into the hope of life, and judgeth ſome to eternall death, no man that would be accompted godly dare ſimply denie: But they wrap it up with many cavillations, ſpecially they which make foreknowledge the cauſe of it. We indeede do ſay that they be both in God, but we ſay that the one is wrongfully made ſubject to the other. When we give foreknowledge to God, we meane that all things alway have beene and perpetually doe remaine under his eies, ſo that to his knowledge there is nothing to come or paſt, but all things are preſent, and ſo preſent that he doth not imagine onely by conceived formes (as thoſe things are preſent to us, whereof our mind holdeth faſt the remembrance) but he truly beholdeth and ſeeth them as ſet before him. And this foreknowledge extendeth to the whole compaſſe of the world and to all creatures. Predeſtination we call the eternall decree of God, whereby he had it determined with himſelfe what he would to become of every man. For all are not created to like eſtate: but to ſome eternall life, and to ſome eternall damnation is fore-appointed. Therefore as every man is created to the one or other end, ſo we ſay that he is predeſtinate either to life or to death. But this Predeſtination God hath not onely teſtified in every ſeverall perſon, but hath ſhewed in example thereof in the whole iſſue of Abraham, whereby might plainely appeare that it lyeth in his will what ſhall be the eſtate of every nation. When the Higheſt devided the nations, and ſevered the children of Adam, his part was the people of Iſrael, the cord of his inheritance. The ſeparation is before the eyes of all men: in the perſon of Abraham as in a die ſtocke one people is peculiarly choſen, all other being refuſed: but the cauſe appeareth not, ſaving that Moſes, to cut off all occaſion of glorying from poſteritie, teacheth that they excell onely by the free love of God. For he aſſigneth this to be the cauſe of their deliverance, for that God loved the Fathers, and chooſe their ſeed after them. More plainely in another Chapter: He was pleaſed in you to chooſe you, not becauſe you paſſed other nations in number, but becauſe he loved you. The ſame admonition is often repeated with him, Behold, to the Lord thy God belongeth the heaven, the earth, and whatſoever things are in it: and he hath pleaſed himſelfe onely in your Fathers, and hath loved them, and hath choſen you their ſeed. Againe in an other place ſanctification is commanded them, becauſe they are choſen to be a peculiar people. And againe in an other place, Love is affirmed to be the cauſe of protection. Which alſo the Faithfull doe declare with one voyce, ſaying: He hath choſen for us our inheritance, the glory of Iacob, whom he hath loved. For they do all impute to free love all the gifts wherewith they were garniſhed of God: not onely becauſe they knew that they themſelves had obtained them by no deſervings, but alſo that even the holy Patriarch was not endued with ſuch vertue, that he could purchaſe to himſelfe and his poſteritie ſo great a prerogative of honour. And, the more ſtrongly to tread downe all pride, he upbraided them that they have deſerved no ſuch thing, forasmuch

Deut.9.6. forasmuch as they are a stubborne and hard-necked people. And oftentimes the Prophets doe hatefully and bitterly by way of reproch cast the Iewes in the teeth with this election, because they had fowly departed from it. Whatsoever it be, now let them come forth which will binde the election of God either to the worthinesse of men, or to the merits of workes. When they see one nation to be preferred before all other, and when they heare that God was led with no respect to be more favourably bent to a few and unnoble, yea and froward and disobedient men: will they quarrell with him, because his will was to shew such an example of mercie? But they shall neither with their prattling voices hinder his worke, nor with throwing stones of taunts into heaven shall hit or hurt his righteousnesse, but rather they fall backe upon their owne heads. Moreover the Israelites are called backe to this principle of the free covenant, when either thanks are to be given to God, or their hope to be raised up against the time to come. He made us, and not we our selves, (saith the Prophet) his people and the sheepe of his pasture. The negative is not superfluous, which is added to exclude us, that they may know that of all the good things wherewith they excell, God is not onely the author, but fetched the cause thereof from himselfe, because there was nothing in them worthy of so great honour. Also he biddeth them to be contented with the meere good pleasure of Psal.105.6. God, in these words. The seede of Abraham are his servants: the children of Iacob his elect. And after that he hath rehearsed the continuall benefits of God as fruites of the election, at length he concluded, that he dealt so liberally because he remembred Psal.44.4. his covenant. With which doctrine agreeth the song of the whole Church, Thy right hand and the light of thy countenance gave the land to our Fathers, because thou wast pleased in them. But it is to be noted, that where mention is made of the land, it is a visible signe of the secret severing wherein the adoption is contained. To the same thank-

Esay 14.2. other meane benefits: in Esay the word of Electing is transferred to this, God shall have mercie on Iacob, and he shall yet choose out of Israel: because he signifying the time to come, saith that the gathering together of the remnant of the people which he seemed to have forsaken, shall be a signe of the stable and stedfast election, which once seemed to have beene fallen away. When also it is said in another place, I have chosen thee and have not cast thee away: he setteth out the continuall course of the notable liberalitie of his fatherly good will. And yet more plainly the Angell saith in Zacharie, Esay 41.9. Zach.3.12. God shall yet choose Ierusalem: as though in hardly chastning it, he had rejected it: or as though the exile were an interrupting of the election: which yet remaineth inviolable, although the signes thereof doe not alway appeare.

Of election and Predestination both generall & speciall.

6 There is to be added a second degree more narrowly restrained, or in which was seene a more speciall grace of God: when of the same kindred of Abraham God refused some, and other some by nourishing them in the church he shewed that he retained among his children. Ismael had at the beginning obtained equall degree with his brother Isaac, because the spirituall covenant had beene not lesse sealed in him by the signe of Circumcision. He is cut off, and then Esau: at the last an innumerable multitude and almost Israel. In Isaac was the seede called: the same calling endured in Iacob. Alike example God shewed in rejecting Saul: which thing is also gloriously set forth in the Psal.78.69. Psalme. He hath put backe the tribe of Ioseph, and the tribe of Ephraim he hath not chosen, but he hath chosen the tribe of Iuda. Which the holy historie diuers times repeateth, that the wonderfull secret of the grace may the better appeare in this change. Ismael, Esau, and such other, (I graunt) fell from the adoption by their owne fault and guiltinesse: because there was a condition adjoyned, that they should faithfully keepe the covenant of God, which they falsely brake. But this was yet a singular benefit of God, that hee vouchsafed to prefer them above the other Gentiles: as it is said in the Pſalme, He hath not ſo done to other nations, nor hath opened his judgements to them. Pſal 47 20.

But heere I have not without cauſe ſaid that there be two degrees to be noted: becauſe now in the choſing of the whole nation God ſhewed that he is in his owne meere liberalitie bound to no lawes: but he is free, ſo that equall portion of grace is not to be required at his hand: the unequalitie whereof ſheweth that it is truly of free gift. Therefore Malachie amplifieth the unthankfulneſſe of Iſrael, becauſe they being not onely choſen out of all mankinde, but alſo ſevered out of a holie houſe to be a peculiar people, doe unfaithfully and wickedly deſpiſe God ſo beneficiall a Father. Was not Eſau the brother of Jacob? (ſaith he) and yet Jacob I loved, but Eſau I hated. For, God Mal 1 2.
taketh it for confeſſed, that when either of them was borne of a holie Father, and ſucceſſour of the covenant, finally a branch of the holie roote: now the children of Jacob were more than commonly bound, which were taken into that dignitie. But when Eſau the firſt begotten being refuſed, their Father which was by nature inferior was made the heire, he proveth them doubly unthankfull, and complaineth that they were not holden with that double bond.

Election outward and inward, in the generall body of men outwardly elected ſundry, which inwardly are not elected in the Spirit.

7 Although it be already ſufficiently evident, that God doth by his ſecret counſell freely chooſe whom he will, rejecting other, yet his free election is hitherto but halfe ſhewed, till we come to all particular perſons, to whom God not onely offereth ſalvation, but ſo aſſigneth it, that the certaintie of the effect thereof is not in ſuſpenſe or doubtfull. For, theſe are accounted in that onely ſeede, whereof Paul maketh mention. For although the adoption was left in the hand of Abraham, yet becauſe many of his poſteritie were cut off as rotten members: that the election may be effectuall and truly ſtedfaſt, we muſt needs aſcend to the head, in whom the heavenly Father hath bound together his elect one with another, and hath knit them to himſelfe with a knot impoſſible to be looſed. So in the adoption of the kindred of Abraham, ſhined the liberall favour of God, which he denied to other men: yet in the members of Chriſt appeareth, a much more excellent ſtrength of grace, becauſe they being graffed into their head doe never fall away from ſalvation. Therefore Paul doth fitly reaſon out of the place of Malachie which I even now alleaged: that where God with making a covenant of eternall life calleth any people to himſelfe, there is in part a ſpeciall manner of election, that he doth not chooſe all effectually with common grace. Whereas it is ſaid, I have loved Jacob, this pertaineth to the whole iſſue of the Patriarch, which the Prophet there ſetteth in compariſon againſt the poſteritie of Eſau. Yet this withſtandeth not but that in the perſon of one man was ſet forth to us an example of the election, which cannot ſlip away, but muſt come to the marke that it tendeth to. Theſe Paul doth not vainely note to be called remnants: becauſe experience teacheth that of a great multitude many ſlide and vaniſh away, ſo that oftentimes there remaineth but a ſmall portion. But why the generall election of a people is not alway firme and ſtedfaſt, there is a reaſon offering it ſelfe in readineſſe: becauſe with whom God covenanteth he doth not by and by give to them the ſpirit of regeneration, by the power whereof they may continue in the covenant to the end: but the outward changing without the inward effectualneſſe of grace, which might be of force to hold them in, is a certaine meane thing betweene the forſaking of whole mankind, and the election of a ſmall number of the godly. The whole people of Iſrael was called the inheritance of God, of whom yet there were many ſtrangers. But becauſe God had not for nothing made covenant with them that he would be their Father and Redeemer, he rather hath reſpect to his owne free favour than to the unfaithfull falling away of many: by whom alſo his truth was not aboliſhed: becauſe where he reſerved any remnant, it appeared that his calling was without Repentance. For whereas God did from time to time chooſe unto himſelfe a Church rather out of the children of Abraham, than out of the prophane nations, he had regard to his covenant, which being broken of the whole multitude he reſtrained to a few, that it ſhould not utterly fall away. Finally the common adoption of the ſeede of Abraham was a certaine viſible image of a greater benefit, which God hath vouchſafed to graunt to a few out of many. This is the reaſon why Paul ſo diligently putteth difference betweene the children of Abraham according to the fleſh, and his ſpirituall children which were called after the example of

Iſaac,

Isaac. Not that it was a vaine and unfruitfull thing simply to be the child of Abraham, (which might not be said without dishonor of the covenant) but because the unchangeable counsell of God, whereby he hath predestinate whom he would, is by it selfe effectuall onely to this latter sort unto salvation. But I warne the readers that they bring not a foreconceived judgement on either side, till it appeare by the places of Scripture brought forth what is to be thought. That therefore which the Scripture cleerely sheweth, we say that God by eternall and unchangeable counsell hath once appointed whom in time to come he would take to salvation, and on the other side whom he would condemne to destruction. This course as touching the elect, we say to be grounded upon his free mercie without any respect of the worthinesse of man, but whom he appointeth to damnation, to them by his just indeed and irreprehensible, but also incomprehensible judgement, the entry of life is forecloſed. Now in the elect we set vocation to be the testimonie of election: and then justification to be another signe of the manifest shewing of it, till they come to glory wherein is the fulfilling of it. But as by vocation and election God maketh his elect: so by shutting out the reprobate either from the knowledge of his name or from the sanctification of his spirit, he doth as it were by these marks open what judgement abideth for them. I will heere passe over many fained inventions, which fooliſh men have forged to overthrow predestination. For they neede no confutation, which so soone as they are brought forth, doe largely bewray their owne falsenesse. I will tary only upon those, which either are in controversie among the learned, or which may bring any hardnesse to the simple, or which ungodlinesse with faire seeming shew pretendeth, to scoffe at the righteousnesse of God.

THE xxij. CHAPTER.

A confirmation of this doctrine by testimonies of the Scripture.

God was not moved with the foresight of mans merits to predestinate, neither is to be grudged at for preferring some, and passing by others, whom particularly and freely he hath chosen.

ALL these things which we have set are not without controversie among many, specially the free election of the faithfull: which yet cannot be weakened. For the common sort doe thinke that God, as he foreseeth that every mans deserving shall be, so maketh difference betweene men: that therefore whom he foreknoweth that they shall be not unworthy of his grace, them he adopteth into place of children: and whose natures he espieth that they will be bent to wickednesse and ungodlinesse, them he appointeth to the damnation of death. So by cloaking it with the veile of foreknowledge they doe not onely darken election, but faine that it hath beginning from elsewhere. And this opinion received of the common sort is not the opinion of the common sort alone: for in all ages it hath had great maintainers. Which I doe plainely confesse, to the intent that no man should trust that it shall much hurt our cause, if their names be objected against us. For, the truth of God herein is more certaine, than that it may be shaken: more cleare, than that it may be darkened with the authoritie of men. But some other neither exercised in the Scripture, nor worthie of any voice, doe raile at this doctrine with greater maliciousnesse, than that their forward pride ought to be suffered. Because God chosing some after his owne will, leaveth other some, they picke a quarrell against him. But if the thing it selfe be knowne for true, what shall they prevaile with brawling against God? We teach nothing but that which is approved by experience, that it was alway at libertie for God, to bestow his grace to whom he will. I will not enquire whereby the posteritie of Abraham excelled other, but by that vouchsafing, whereof there is found no cause elsewhere than in God. Let them answere why they be men rather then oxen or asses. When it was in the hand of God to make them dogs, he fashioned them after his owne image. Will they give leave to brute beasts to quarrell with God for their estate, as though the difference were unrighteous? Truly it is no more righteous, that they should enjoy the prerogative which they have obtained by no deservings, than for God diversly to deale abroade his benefits according to the measure of his owne judgement. If they skip over to persons, where the inequalitie is more hatefull to them, at the leſt at the example of Christ, they ought to be afraid to prate so bodly of so high a mysterie. He is conceived of the seed of David, a mortall man: by what vertues will they say that he deserved to be in the verie wombe made the head of Angels, the onely begotten ſonne of God, the image and glorie of the Father, the light, righteouſneſſe, and ſalvation of the world? This thing Auguſtine wiſely noted, that in the verie head of the Church is a moſt cleere mirrour of free election, leaſt it ſhould trouble us in the members: and that he was not by righteouſly living made the ſonne of God, but that hee had ſo great honour freely given him, that he might afterward make other partakers of his gifts. Heere if any man aske why other were not the ſame that he was, or why all wee are ſo farre diſtant from him, why all we be corrupt and hee pureneſſe: ſuch a man ſhall bewray not onely his madneſſe, but therewithall alſo his ſhameleſneſſe. But if they goe forward to labour to take from God the free power to chuſe and refuſe, let them alſo take away that which is given to Chriſt. Now it is worth the travaile to conſider what the Scripture pronounceth of everie one. Paul verily, when hee teacheth that we were choſen in Chriſt, taketh away all reſpect of our owne worthineſſe. For it is all one as if hee had ſaid: becauſe in the whole ſeede of Adam the heavenly father found nothing worthy of his election, hee turned his eies unto his Chriſt, to chuſe as it were members out of his bodie, them, whom he would take into the fellowſhip of life. Let this reaſon then be of force among the faithfull, that we were therefore adopted in Chriſt into the heavenly inheritance, becauſe in our ſelves we are not able to receive ſo great excellencie. Which alſo he touched in another place, when he exhorteth the Coloſſians to giving of thankes, for this that they were by God made fit to be partakers of the eſtate of the holie. If election goe before this grace of God that wee be made fit to obtaine the glorie of the life to come: what ſhall God himſelfe now finde in us whereby hee may bee moved to elect us? My meaning ſhall yet be more openly expreſſed by another ſaying of his. He hath choſen (ſaith he) ere the foundations of the world were laid, according to the good pleaſure of his will, that we might be holie, and unſpotted, and unreproveable in his ſight: where he ſetteth the good pleaſure of God againſt all our deſervings whatſoever they be.

2 That the proofe may be more ſtrong, it is worth the labour to note all the parts of that place, which being coupled together doe leave no doubt. Where he nameth the elect, it is no doubt that he ſpeaketh to the faithfull, as he alſo by and by afterward affirmeth. Wherefore they doe with too foule a gloſe abuſe that name, which wreſt it to the age wherein the Goſpell was firſt publiſhed. Where he ſaith that they were elect before the beginning of the world, he taketh away all reſpect of worthineſſe. For what reaſon of difference is there betweene them which yet were not, and thoſe which afterward ſhould in Adam be equall? Now if they be elect in Chriſt, it followeth that not onely every man is ſevered without himſelfe, but alſo one of them from another, foraſmuch as we ſee that not all are the members of Chriſt. That which is added, that they were elect that they might be holie, plainely confuteth the errour which deriveth election from foreknowledge, foraſmuch as Paul crieth out againſt it and ſaith that whatſoever vertue appeareth in men, it is the effect of election. Now if a higher cauſe be ſought, Paul anſwereth that God hath ſo predeſtinate, yea and that according to the good pleaſure of his will. In which words hee overthroweth whatſoever meanes of their election men doe imagine in themſelves. For he alſo teacheth that whatſoever things God giveth toward ſpirituall life, they flow out of this one fountaine, becauſe God hath choſen whom he would, and ere they were borne he had ſeverally laid up for them the grace which he vouchſafed to give them.

Speciall & free election without reſpect of merits going before or following after, demonſtrated out of S. Pauls words to the Epheſians.

3 But whereſoever this pleaſure of God reigneth, there no works come to bee conſidered. He doth not heere indeede purſue the compariſon of contraries, but it is to be underſtanded ſuch as he himſelfe declareth. He hath called us (ſaith he) with a holy calling, not according too ur works, but according to his purpoſe and the grace which is given of Chriſt before the times of the world. And wee have alreadie ſhewed that all doubt is taken away in this which followeth, that we might be holie and unſpotted. For if thou ſay, becauſe hee foreſaw that we ſhould be holie, therefore he choſe us, thou ſhalt pervert the order of Paul. Thus therefore thou maiſt ſafely gather. If hee choſe us that we might be holie: then he choſe us, not becauſe he foreſaw that wee would be ſuch. For theſe two things are contrarie the one to the other: that the godly have have it of election that they be holie, and that they come to it by meane of workes. Neither is their cavillation heere any thing worth to which they commonly flee, that the Lord doth not render the grace of election to any works going before, but yet granteth it to works to come. For when it is said that the faithfull were chosen, that they might be holie: therewithall is signified that the holinesse which was to come in them tooke beginning at election. And how shall this saying agree together, that those things which are derived from election gave cause to election? The same thing which he said he seemeth afterward to confirme more strongly, where he saith: Ephe 1.5. According to the purpose of his will which hee had purposed in himselfe. For, to say that God purposed in himselfe, is as much in effect as if it had been said, that without himselfe hee considered nothing whereof he had any regard in decreeing. Therefore hee by and by addeth, that the whole summe of our election tendeth to this end, that we shoud be to the prayse of the grace of God. Truly the grace of God deserveth not to be praysed alone in our election, unlesse our election be free. But free it shall not be, if God in electing his, doe consider what shall be the works of every one. Therefore we find that that which Christ said to his disciples, hath place universally among all the faithfull, John 15.16. Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you. Where he not onely excludeth deservings past, but also signifieth that they had nothing in themselves why they should be chosen, if he had not prevented them with his mercie. Like as this saying of Paul is also to be understood: Rom.11.35. Who first gave to him, and shall receive recompence? For hee meaneth to shew that the goodnesse of God so preventeth men, that it findeth nothing in them neither past nor to come, whereby he may be wonne to be favourable to them.

Our ſanctification the end wherevnto, not the cauſe wherefore we were choſen.

2. Tim. 1. 9.

Speciall and free election proved out of S. Paul to the Romanes. Rom.9.6.

4 Now to the Romanes, where he fetcheth this question further off, and followeth it more largely, he denieth that all they are Israelites, which are issued of Israel: because although by right of inheritance they were all blessed, yet the succession did not legally passe to them all. The beginning of this disputation proceeded of the pride and deceitfull glorying of the Jewish people. For when they claimed to themselves the name of the Church, they would have the credit of the Gospell to hang upon their will: as the Papists at this day would gladly with this fained colour thrust themselves into the place of God. Paul, although he grant that the offspring of Abraham is holie by reason of the covenant, yet affirmeth that the most part of them are strangers in it: and that not onely because they swarve out of kinde, so that of lawfull children they become bastards, but because the especiall election of God standeth above and reigneth in the highest top, which alone maketh the adoption thereof sure. If their owne godlinesse stablished some in the hope of salvation, and their owne falling away alone disherited othersome: Paul verily should both fondly and unconvenientlie lift up the readers even to the secret election. Now if the will of God (the cause whereof neither appeareth nor is to be sought, without himselfe) maketh the one sort differing from the other, so that not all the children of Israell be true Israelites, it is vainely fained that every mans estate hath beginning in himselfe. Then he further followeth the matter under the example of Jacob and Esau. For when they both were the sonnes of Abraham, both together enclosed in one mothers wombe, it was a monsterlike change that the honour of first birth was removed to Jacob, by which change Paul affirmeth that there was testified the election of the one, and the reprobation of the other. The originall and cause of it is enquired, which the teachers of foreknowledge will have to be set out in the vertues, and vices of men. For this is an easy short way with them, that God shewed in the person of Jacob, that hee choseth the worthy of his grace: and in the person of Esau, he refuseth them whom he foreseeth to be unworthy. Thus they say boldly. But what saith Paul? Rom.9.11. when they were not yet borne, and had not done any good or evill, that according to election, the purpose of God might abide, not of works, but of him that calleth, it is said: The elder shall serve the yonger: as it is written, Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated. If foreknowledge were of any force in this difference of the brethren, then verily mention were unfitlie made of the time. Let us graunt that Jacob was chosen, because he had worthinesse gotten by works to come: to what purpose should Paul say that he was not yet borne: And this now

ſhould be unadviſedly added, that hee had yet done no good: becauſe this ſhall be a readie anſwere, that nothing is hidden from God, and that ſo the godlineſſe of Jacob was preſent before him. If works doe win grace, they ſhould then worthily have had their price before that Jacob was borne, as if hee had beene growne to full age. But the Apoſtle goeth forward in undoing this knot, and teacheth that the adoption of Jacob was not made of works, but of the calling of God. In works hee enterlaceth not the time to come or time paſt: and then hee directly ſetteth them againſt the calling of God, meaning by ſtabliſhing of the one expreſly to overthrow the other: as if hee had ſaid, that it is to be conſidered what hath pleaſed God, not what men have brought of themſelves. Laſt of all it is certaine that by the words of election and Purpoſe, all cauſes whatſoever men are wont to faine elſewhere than in the ſecret counſell of God, are quite removed from this matter.

5 What colour will they bring to darken theſe things, who in election aſſigne ſome place to works either paſt or to come? For this is utterlie to mocke out that which the Apoſtle affirmeth, that the difference of the brethren hangeth not upon any conſideration of works, but vpon the meere calling of God, becauſe it was put betweene them when they were not yet borne. Neither had he beene ignorant of this their ſubtletie, if it had had any ſoundneſſe in it: but becauſe he very well knew, that God can foreſee no goodneſſe in man, but that which hee hath firſt determined by the benefit of his election to give him: he fleeth not to that unorderlie order, to ſet good works before the cauſe of themſelves. Thus have we by the words of the Apoſtle, that the ſalvation of the faithfull is founded upon the will of the onely election of God: and that the ſame favour is not gotten by works, but commeth of free calling. We have alſo as it were an image of that thing ſet before us. Eſau and Jacob are brethren, iſſuing both of the ſame parents, encloſed yet both in one wombe, not yet brought out into the world. In them all things are equall, yet of them the judgement of God is divers. For hee taketh the one and forſaketh the other. There was nothing but the onely firſt birth, by right whereof the one excelled the other. But this alſo being paſſed over, that thing is given to the yonger which is denied in the elder. Yea, and in other alſo God ſeemeth alway as of ſet purpoſe to have deſpiſed firſt birth, to cut off from the fleſh all matter of glorying, Refuſing Iſmael, he caſt his mind to Iſaac. Plucking backe Manaſſe, he more honoured Ephraim.

The doctrine is ſo cleare and the example ſo plaine which S. Paul produceth, that there is no place at all left to cavill.

6 If any man interrupt me with ſaying, that we muſt not by theſe inferiour and ſmall benefits determine of the ſumme of the life to come, that he which hath bin advanced to the honour of the firſt birth, ſhould therefore be reckoned to be adopted into the inheritance of heaven: (for there be ſome which ſpare not Paul himſelfe, as though in alleaging theſe teſtimonies he had wreſted the Scripture to a ſtrange ſenſe:) I anſwere as I have done here before, that the Apoſtle neither ſlipped by unadviſedneſſe, nor wilfully abuſed the teſtimonies of the Scripture. But he ſaw (which they cannot abide to conſider) that God minded by an earthly ſigne to declare the ſpirituall election of Jacob, which otherwiſe was hidden in his inacceſſible throne. For unleſſe wee referre the firſt birth granted to him unto the world to come, it ſhould be a vaine and fond forme of bleſſing whereby hee obtained nothing but manifold miſeries, diſcommodities, griefefull baniſhment, and many bitterneſſe of ſorrow and cares. Therefore when Paul ſaw without doubting, that God by outward bleſſing teſtified the bleſſing which hee had in his kingdome prepared ſpirituall and never decaying for his ſervant: hee doubted not for proofe of this ſpirituall bleſſing, to fetch an argument from that outward bleſſing. This alſo wee muſt remember that to the land of Canaan was adjoyned the pledge of the heavenly dwelling: ſo that it ought not at all to be doubted that Jacob was graffed with the Angels into the bodie of Chriſt, that hee might be partaker of the ſame life. Jacob therefore is choſen, when Eſau is rejected: and by the predeſtination of God is made different from him, from whom hee differed not in any deſervings. If you aske a cauſe, the Apoſtle rendreth this, becauſe it is ſaid to Moſes, I will have mercie upon whom I will have mercie, and I will vouchſafe to grant mercie to whomſoever I will vouchſafe to grant mercie. And what I beſeech you meaneth this? Verily, the Lord himſelfe moſt plainly pronounceth that men have in themselves no cause why he should doe good to them, but he fetcheth the cause from his owne mercy onely: and therefore that the salvation of his, is his owne worke. When God setteth thy salvation in himselfe alone, why wilt thou descend to thy selfe? When he appointeth to thee his mercie alone, why wilt thou run to thine own deservings? When he holdeth thy thought wholy in his mercifulnesse alone, why wilt thou turne part to the beholding of thine owne works? Therefore we must needs come to that lesser people, which Paul in another place said to have beene foreknowne to God: not in such sort as these men imagine, to foreknow out of an idle watch-toure the things that hee worketh not: but in such sense as it is oft read. For truly when Peter saith in Luke, that Christ was by the determinate counsell and foreknowledge of God appointed to death: hee doth not bring God as a looker on, but the author of our salvation. So the same Peter also, where he saith that the faithfull to whom he wrot were chosen according to the foreknowledge of God, properly expresseth that secret predestination whereby God hath marked for his children whom he would. And the word Purpose, which he joyneth for a divers word, expressing all one thing, for as much as it doth every where signifie a stedfast determination as they commonly call it, undoubtedly teacheth that God when he is authour of our salvation goeth not out of himselfe. In which sense hee saith in the same Chapter that Christ was the lambe foreknowne before the creation of the world. For what is more fond or trifling, than to say that God from on high did stand looking whence salvation should come to mankind? Therefore in Paul the foreknowing people is as much as a small portion mingled with the multitude which falsely pretendeth name of God. In another place also Paul to beate downe their boasting which being but covered with a visor, doe take upon themselves the chiefe preheminence among the godly before the world, saith that God knoweth who be his. Finally, by that saying, Paul poynteth unto us two sorts of people: the one, of the whole kindred of Abraham: the other, severally chosen out of it, and which being laid up under the eies of God, is hidden from the sight of men. And it is no doubt that he tooke this out of Moses, which affirmeth that God will be mercifull to whom hee will (although he there speake of the elect people, whose estate in outward seeming was equall) as if he should have said, that in the common adoption is included with him a speciall grace toward some, as it were a more holy treasure: and that the common covenant withstandeth not but that the same small number may be exempt in degree: and hee willing to make himselfe the free disposer and ruler of this thing, precisely denieth that he will be mercifull to one rather than to another, for any other reason, but for that it so pleaseth him: because when mercy commeth to him that seeketh it, though he indeed suffer not a deniall, yet he either preventeth or partly getteth to himselfe the favour whereof God claimeth to himselfe the praise.

Their election whom S. Paul ſpeaketh of, was not onely to an earthlie inheritance but an heavenlie.

Rom. 9. 15.

Speciall and free election proved by the words of Christ in S. Iohn.

7 Now let the soveraigne Judge and master pronounce of the whole matter. When he saw so great hardnesse in his hearers, that he did in a manner waste his words without fruit among the multitude: to remedy this offence, he crieth out, Whatsoever my Father giveth me, it shall come to me. For this is the will of my Father, that whatsoever my Father hath given me, I shall not loose any thing of it. Note that the beginning is taken at the Fathers gift, that we may be delivered into the faithfull keeping and defence of Christ. Here some man peradventure will turne a circle about, and will take exception, saying that they onely are accounted in the proper possession of the Father, whose yeelding hath beene voluntary by faith. But Christ standeth onely upon that point, that although the fallings away of great multitudes doe shake the whole world, yet the counsell of God shall be stedfast and stand faster than the heavens themselves, that his election may never faile. They are said to have beene the elect of the Father, before that he gave to them his onely begotten Sonne. They aske whether it were by nature: yea rather, them which were strangers he made his owne by drawing them to him. There is a greater cleerenesse in the words of Christ than can by shifting be covered with any darknesse. No man (saith he) can come to me, unlesse my Father draw him. But who so hath heard and learned of my Father, he commeth to me. If all generally without difference should bow their knee before Christ, then the election were common: but now in the fewnesse of the beleevers appeareth a manifest diversitie:

John 6 44.

Therefore

Therefore after that Chriſt had affirmed that the diſciples which were given him, were the peculiar poſſeſſion of God the Father, within a little after he added, I pray not for the world, but for thoſe whom thou haſt given me, becauſe they are thine. Whereby is proved that the whole world belongeth not to the Creator of it, ſaving that grace delivereth a few from the wrath of God, and from eternall death, which otherwiſe ſhould have periſhed: but the world it ſelfe is left in his owne deſtruction to which it was appointed. In the meane time although Chriſt put himſelfe meane betweene, yet he claimeth to himſelfe the power of choſing in common with the Father. I ſpeake not (ſaith he) of all: I know whom I have choſen. If any man aske from whence hee hath choſen them, he anſwereth in an other place, Out of the world, which he excludeth out of his prayers when hee commendeth his diſciples to his Father. This is to be holden, that when hee affirmeth that he knoweth whom he hath choſen, there is ſignified ſome ſpeciall ſort in the generall kind of men: then, that the ſame ſpeciall ſort is made to differ not by the qualitie of their owne vertues, but by the heavenly decree. Whereupon followeth that many excell by their owne force or diligence, when Chriſt maketh himſelfe the authour of election. For when in an other place he reckoneth Judas among the elect, whereas he was a devill, this is referred only to the office of Apoſtleſhip, which although it be a cleere mirrour of the favour of God (as Paul ſo oftentimes acknowledgeth in his owne perſon,) yet it containeth not in it ſelfe the hope of eternall ſalvation. Judas therefore, when he did unfaithfully beare the office of an Apoſtle, might be worſe than the devill: but of thoſe whom Chriſt hath once graffed into his bodie, hee will ſuffer none to periſh: becauſe in preſerving their ſalvation he will performe that which he hath promiſed, that is, he will ſtretch forth the power of God which is greater than all. For whereas hee ſaith in another place, Father, of thoſe whom thou haſt given mee, I have loſt none but the ſonne of perdition: although it be an abuſive ſpeech by figure, yet it hath no doubtfull meaning. The ſumme is, that God maketh them his children by free adoption whom hee will have to be his children: and that the inward cauſe thereof is in himſelfe: becauſe hee is content with his owne ſecret good pleaſure.

John 10.28.

8 But Ambroſe, Origene, and Hierome thought that God diſtributeth his grace among men, as he foreſeeth that every man will uſe it well: Yea and Auguſtine was once in the ſame opinion. But when he had better profited in knowledge of the Scripture, hee not onely revoked it as evidently falſe, but alſo ſtrongly confuted it: yea and after his revoking of it, in reproving the Pelagians for that they continued in the ſame errour, ſaith: who cannot marvell that the Apoſtle knew not this moſt ſubtle ſenſe? For when he had ſet out a thing to be wondred at of theſe brethren, while they were not yet borne, and afterward objected a queſtion againſt himſelfe, ſaying: what then? Is there unjuſtice with God? Heere was fit place for him to anſwere, that God foreſaw the merits of them both: yet he ſaith not this, but flieth to the judgements and mercy of God. And in another place, when hee had taken away all merits before election, Heere (ſaith hee) is confuted their vaine reaſoning which defend the foreknowledge of God againſt the grace of God, and therefore ſay that we are choſen before the making of the world, becauſe God foreknew that we would be good, not that hee himſelfe would make us good. He ſaith not this, which ſaith: Yee have not choſen me, but I have choſen you. For if he had therefore choſen us, becauſe hee foreknew that we would be good: he ſhould therewithall alſo have foreknowne that we would choſe him: and ſo forth as followeth to that effect. Let the teſtimonie of Auguſtine be of force among them that willingly reſt in the authoritie of the Fathers. Howbeit Auguſtine ſuffreth not himſelfe to be ſevered from the reſt: but by cleere teſtimonies ſheweth that this diſagreement is falſe with the malice whereof the Pelagians burdened him. For in the xix. Chapter of his booke of the predeſtination of Saints, hee alleageth out of Ambroſe, Chriſt calleth whom hee hath mercy on. Againe, if he had willed, of the undevout hee might have made devout. But God calleth whom hee vouchſafeth, and whom hee will he maketh religious. If I liſted to knit together a whole volume out of Auguſtine, I could readily ſhew to the readers that I neede no other words but his: But I will not load them with tediouſneſſe. But go to, let us imagine that they speake not at all: but let us give heed to the matter it selfe. A hard question was moved, whether God did righteously in this that hee vouchsafed to grant his grace but to some: Of which question Paul might have uncombred himselfe with one word if hee had alleaged the respect of works. Why therefore doth hee it not, but rather continueth on a discourse which abideth in the same hardnesse? Why, but because hee ought not? For the Holy Ghost which spake by his mouth, had not the disease of forgetfulnesse. Therefore without any circumstances hee answereth, that God therefore favoureth his elect, because hee will: therefore hath mercy, because he will. For this Oracle of God, I will have mercie upon whom I will have mercie, and I will shew mercie to whom I will shew mercie, is as much in effect as if it had beene said, that God is moved to mercy by no other reason, but because hee will have mercie. Therefore this saying of Augustine remaineth true, that the grace of God doth not find men fit to be chosen, but maketh them.

The shift which Thomas useth in solving this question, rejected.

9 Neither doe we any thing passe upon the subtletie of Thomas, that the foreknowing of deservings, is not indeede the cause of Predestination on the behalfe of the act of him that doth predestinate, but on our behalfe it may after a certaine manner be so called, that is, according to the particular weighing of Predestination: as when it is said that God predestinateth glorie to man by deservings, because hee hath decreed to give to him grace by which he may deserve glorie. For sith the Lord will in election have us to looke unto nothing but his meere goodnesse, if any man shall covet heere to see any more, it shall be a wrongfull greedinesse. If we lusted to strive in subtletie, we want not wherewith to beate backe this silly subtletie of Thomas. Hee affirmeth that to the elect, glorie is after a certaine manner predestinate by deservings, because the Lord doth after a certaine manner predestinate to them the grace, by which they may deserve glorie. What if I answere on the contrarie side and say that predestination unto grace, serveth election unto life, and is as it were a waiting made after it? that grace is predestinate to them, to whom the possession of glorie hath beene long agoe appointed: because it pleaseth the Lord to bring his children from election into justification? For thereupon it shall follow that the predestination of glorie was rather the cause of the predestination of grace, than contrariwise. But away with these strivings as things superfluous for such as shall thinke that there is wisedome ynough for them in the word of God. For this was in old time truly written of an Ecclesiasticall writer, that they which assigne the election of God to merits are more wise than they ought to be.

Ambros. de vocat. gent. lib. cap. 1.

There is no repugnancy betweene Gods calling of all, and calling effectually but a few onely.

10 Some doe object that God should be contrarie to himselfe if he should universally call all men to him, and receive but a few elect. So by their opinion the universalnesse of the promise taketh away the difference of speciall grace. And thus certaine sober men speake, not so much to oppresse the truth, as to debarre crabbed questions, and to bridle the curiositie of many. Their will is praise-worthie, but their counsell is not to be allowed: because dallying by shifts is never excusable. But their objecting of it which doe more railinglie inveigh against it, is verily too fond a cavillation, or too shamefull an errour. How the Scripture maketh these two to agree together, that by outward preaching all men are called to repentance and faith, and yet not to all men is given the Spirit of repentance and faith, I have in another place alreadie declared, and by and by somewhat of it must be repeated againe. Now that which they require I denie to them, sith it is two waies false. For, he that threatneth that while it raineth upon one citie, there shall be drought upon another: Hee that pronounceth that there shall in another place be famine of doctrine, bindeth not himselfe with a certaine law to call all men legallie. And he which forbidding Paul to speake in Asia, and turning him from Bithinia, draweth him into Macedonia, sheweth, that it is in his owne power to distribute this treasure to whomsoever it shall please him. Yet more plainly he sheweth by Esay, how hee peculiarly directeth to the elect the promises of salvation: for hee saith of them onely, and not of all mankind indifferently, that they shall be his Disciples. Whereby it is certaine that the doctrine of salvation is wrongfully set open in common to all men to profit effectually, which is said to be severally laid up onely for the children of the Church. Let this suffice at this present, that that although the voice of the Gospel spake generally to all, yet the gift of faith is rare. Esay assigneth the cause, for that the arme of the Lord is not open to all men. If he had said that the Gospell is maliciously and frowardly despised, because many doe stubbornely refuse to heare: peradventure this colour touching universall calling should prevaile. Neither is it the purpose of the Prophet to diminish the fault of men, when he teacheth that the fountaine of blindnesse is, that God vouchsafeth not to open his arme to them: onely he giveth warning, that because faith is a singular gift, the eares are beaten in vaine with outward doctrine. But I would faine know of these doctors, whether onely preaching, or faith, make the children of God. Certainly when it is said in the first Chapter of Iohn, Whosoever beleeve in the onely begotten Sonne of God, are themselves also made the children of God, there is not in that place a confused heape jumbled up together: but a speciall order is given to the faithfull, which are borne not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. But (say they) there is a mutuall consent of faith with the word, namely, wheresoever is faith. But it is no new thing that seed fall among thornes or in stony places: not onely because the greater part appeareth indeed obstinate against God, but also because not all men have eies and eares. How then shall it agree that God calleth to him them whom hee knoweth will not come? Let Augustine answer for me. Wilt thou dispute with mee? Marvell with mee, and crie out, O depth, Let us both agree in feare, lest wee perish in errour. Moreover if election (as Paul witnesseth) be the mother of faith, I turne backe the argument upon their owne head, that faith is therefore not generall, because election is speciall. For by the orderly hanging together of causes and effects, it is easily gathered, that where Paul saith, that we are full of all spirituall blessing, as God had chosen us before the creation of the world: therefore these riches are not common to all, because God hath chosen onely whom he would. This is the reason why in another place he commendeth the faith of the elect, lest it should be thought that any man doth by his owne motion get faith to himselfe: but that this glory may remaine with God, that they are freely enlightned of him, whom he had chosen before. For Bernard saith rightly, Friends doe severally heare, to whom he also saith, Feare not thou small flocke: for to you it is given to know the mysterie of the kingdome of heaven. Who be these? even they whom he hath foreknowne and predestinate to be fashioned like to the image of his Sonne. A great and secret counsell is made knowne. The Lord knew who be his: but that which was knowne to God is made manifest to men: neither doth he vouchsafe to make any other partakers of so great a mystery, but those selfe same men whom he hath foreknowne and predestinate to be his. A little after hee concludeth: The mercy of God is from eternity even to eternity upon them that feare him: from eternity, by reason of predestination: to eternitie, by reason of blessed making: the one without beginning, the other without ending. But what neede I to cite Bernard for witnesse, when we heare of the masters owne mouth, that none doe see but they which are of God? By which words he signifieth, that all they which are not begotten againe of God, doe dazell at the brightnesse of his countenance. And to election faith indeed is fitly joyned, so that it keepe the second degree. Which order the words of Christ doe cleerely expresse in another place, This is the will of my Father, that I lose not that which he hath given. For this is his will, that whosoever beleeveth in the Sonne, shall not perish. If he would have all saved, he would appoint over them his Sonne to be their keeper, and would graffe them all into his body with the holy bond of faith. Now it is certaine that faith is a singular pledge of his fatherly love, laid up for his children whom he hath adopted. Therfore Christ in another place saith, that the sheepe follow the shepheard, because they know his voice: but they follow not a stranger, because they know not the voice of strangers. Whence commeth this difference, but because their eares are boared by God? For no man maketh himselfe a sheepe: but hee is made one by the heavenly grace. For which cause also the Lord teacheth that our safetie shall alway bee certaine and free from danger, because it is kept by the invincible power of God. Wherefore hee concludeth that the unbeleevers are not of his sheepe: namely because they are not of the number of them, whom God hath promised by Esay that they shall be his disciples. Now because in the testimonies which I have alleaged is expressed perseverance, they doe therewithall testifie the unmoveable stedfastnesse of election.

Amos 4. 7. & 8. 11. Act. 16. 6.

Esa. 8. 16.

Rom.9.13. The ground of reprobation the will of God to reject, and not mens deserving to be rejected.

11 Now let us speake of the reprobate, whom the Apostle joyneth there together. For as Iacob, having yet with good works deserved nothing, is taken into grace: so Esau, being yet defiled with no wicked doing, is hated. If we turne our eyes to works, we doe wrong to the Apostle, as though he sawe not the same thing which we cleerely see. It is proved that he sawe it not, forasmuch as hee expresly enforceth this point, that when they had not yet done any good or evill, the one was chosen, and the other refused, to prove that the foundation of the predestination of God is not in works. Againe when hee moved the objection, whether God be unrighteous, he alleageth not that which had been the most certaine and plaine defence of his righteousnesse; namely, that God reduced to Esau according to his evilnesse: but he was content with another solution, that the reprobate are stirred up to this end, that the glorie of God may be set forth by them. Last of all he adjoyneth a concluding sentence, that God hath mercie upon whom he will, and hardeneth whom he will. See you not how hee imputeth both to the onely will of God? Therefore if wee cannot declare a reason why hee vouchsafeth to grant mercie to them that be his, but because it so pleaseth him: neither also shall we have any other cause in rejecting of other, than his owne will. For when it is said that God hardeneth, or sheweth mercie to whom he will, men are thereby warned to seeke no cause elsewhere than in his will.

THE XXIIJ. CHAPTER.

A confutation of the slanders wherewith this doctrine hath alway beene wrongfully burdened.

Election granted by some who notwithstanding denie reprobation.

BUt when the wit of man heareth these things, the frowardnesse thereof cannot bee restrained, but that by and by as at the bloudie blast of a trumpet sounding to battell, it diversly & excessively turmoileth. And many indeed, as though they would drive away the malice from God, doe so grant election, that they denie that any man is reprobate: but they doe too ignorantly and childishly: for as much as election it selfe could not stand unlesse it were set contrarie to reprobation: God is said to sever them whom he adopteth unto salvation: it should be more than foolishly said that other doe either by chaunce or by their owne endevour obtaine that which onely election giveth to a fewe. Therefore whom God passeth over, hee rejecteth: and for none other cause, but for that he will exclude them from the inheritance which he doth predestinate to his children. Neither is the waywardnesse of men tolerable, if it suffer not it selfe to be bridleth with the word of God, where the incomprehensible counsell of God is intreated of, which the Angels themselves doe worship. But we have alreadie heard, that hardening is no lesse in the hand and will of God than mercie. Neither doth Paul (as these men doe that I have spoken of) busily labour to excuse God with a lying defence: but onely he teacheth that it is not lawfull for the thing formed to quarrell with him that formed it. Now who so doe not admit that any are rejected of God, how will they uncomber themselves from that saying of Christ: Every tree which my father hath not planted, shall be plucked up by the roote? They plainely heare that all they are adjudged and avowed to destruction, whom the heavenly Father hath not vouchsafed to plant as holie trees in his ground. If they denie this to be a signe of reprobation, then is there nothing so cleere that it may be proved to them. But if they cease not to wrangle, let the sobrietie of faith be contented with this admonition of Paul, that there is no cause to quarrell with God, if he willing on the one side to shew his wrath and to make his power knowne, doe with dum sufferance and lenitie beare with the vessels of wrath prepared to destruction: and on the other side he make knowne the riches of his glorie toward the vessels of mercy which he hath prepared to glorie. Let the Readers marke, how Paul to cut off occasion from whisperings and backbitings, giveth the chiefe rule to the wrath and power of God: because it is unjust that those deepe judgements which swallow up all our senses, ſhould be made ſubject to our determination. Our adverſaries anſwere is very trifling, that God doth not utterly reject them whom he ſuffereth in lenitie, but abideth with a minde hanging in ſuſpence toward them, if peradventure they may repent. As though Paul giveth to God a patience, to looke for their turning, whom he ſaith to be made to deſtruction. For Auguſtine ſaith rightly where he expoundeth this place, where power is joyned to ſufferance, God doth not ſuffer, but governe with his power. They further ſay alſo that it is not for nothing ſaid, that the veſſels of wrath are prepared to deſtruction: but, that God hath prepared the veſſels of mercie: becauſe by this meane he aſcribeth and challengeth the praiſe of ſalvation to God, but the blame of deſtruction he caſteth upon them which by their owne will doe bring it upon themſelves. But although I graunt to them that Paul by the divers manner of ſpeaking did ſoften the roughneſſe of the firſt part of the ſentence, yet is it not meete to aſſigne the preparing unto deſtruction to any other thing than to the ſecret counſell of God: which alſo is affirmed a little before in the reſt of the text. That God ſtirred up Pharao? Then that he hardneth whom he will. Whereupon followeth that the hidden counſell of God is the cauſe of hardening. This at the leaſt I get which Auguſtine ſaith, that when God of wolves maketh ſheepe, he doth with a mightier grace reforme them, that their hardneſſe may be tamed: and therefore God for this cauſe doth not convert the obſtinate, becauſe he doth not ſhew forth in them the mightier grace, which he wanteth not if he would ſhew it forth.

2 Theſe ſayings indeede ſhould be ſufficient for the godly and ſober, and them which remember themſelves to be men. But for as much as theſe venemous dogs doe caſt up not onely one ſort of venome againſt God, we will as the matter ſhall ſerve anſwere to everie one particularly. Fooliſh men doe divers waies quarrell with God, as though they had him ſubject to their accuſations. Firſt therefore they aske, by what right the Lord is angrie with his creatures, of whom he hath not beene firſt provoked by any offence: for to condemne to deſtruction whom he will, agreeth rather with the wilfulneſſe of a tyrant, than the lawfull ſentence of a Judge. Therefore they ſay that there is cauſe why men ſhould charge God, if by his bare will, without their owne deſerving, they be predeſtinate to eternall death. If ſuch thoughts doe at any time come into the minde of the godly, to breake their violent aſſaults they ſhall be ſufficiently armed with this, although they had no more, if they conſider how great wickednesſe it is, even ſo much as to inquire of the cauſes of the will of God: ſith of all things that are, it is the cauſe, and worthily ſo ought to be. For if it have any cauſe, then ſome what muſt goe before it, whereto it muſt be as it were bound: which it is unlawfull once to imagine. For, the will of God is ſo the higheſt rule of righteouſneſſe, that whatſoever he willeth, even for this that he willeth it, it ought to be taken for righteous. When therefore it is asked, why the Lord did it: it is to be anſwered, becauſe he willed it. But if thou go further in asking why he willed it, thou askeſt ſome greater and higher thing than the will of God: which cannot be found. Let therefore the raſhneſſe of man reſtraine it ſelfe, and not ſeeke that which is not, leaſt peradventure it may not finde that which is. With this bridle (I ſay) he ſhall be well withholden whoſoever hee be that will diſpute of the ſecrets of God without reverence. As for the boldneſſe of the wicked, which dread not openly to ſpeake evill of God: againſt it the Lord with his owne righteouſneſſe, without any our defence ſhall ſufficiently defend himſelfe, when he ſhall take all ſhifting from their conſciences, and hold them faſt convinced, and condemne them. Neither doe we yet thruſt in the faigned deviſe of abſolute power, which as it is prophane, ſo worthily ought to be abhorred of us. We faigne not God lawleſſe, who is a law to himſelfe: becauſe (as Plato ſaith) men ſtand in neede of lawes, who are troubled with unlawfull luſts: but the will of God is not onely pure from all fault, but alſo is the higheſt rule of perfection, yea and the law of all lawes. But we denie that he is ſubject to yeeld account. We denie alſo that we are meete judges, which would pronounce of this cauſe after our own ſenſe. Wherefore if we attempt further than we lawfully may, let that threatning of the Pſalme bring us in feare, that God ſhall overcome ſo oft as he is judged of any mortall man.

There is no ſtriving againſt God in this cauſe.

This is taken out of Auguſtine lib. 1. de Gen. contra Manic. cap. 3.

Pſal. 51. 6.

3 So can God in keeping ſilence, put his enemies to ſilence. But, that we may not sufficient to stop their mouthes, who aske why God should foreappoint some unto death, when they, not being, could not deserve the death whereunto they were appointed.

suffer them freely to scorne his holie name, he delivereth to us out of his word weapons against them. Wherefore if any man assaile us with such words: why God hath from the beginning predestinate some to death, which when they were not, could not yet deserve the judgement of death: wee in stead of answere may againe on our side aske of them, what they thinke that God oweth to man, if he will judge him by his owne nature. In such sort as we be all corrupted with sin, we cannot but be hatefull to God: and that not by tyrannous crueltie, but by most upright reason of justice. If all they whom the Lord doth predestinate to death, are by the estate of nature subject to the judgement of death: of what unjustice against themselves, I beseech you, may they complaine? Let all the sonnes of Adam come: Let them strive and dispute with their creator, for that by his eternall providence they were before their generation condemned to everlasting miserie. What shall they be able once to mutter against this defence, when God on the other side shal cal them to reknowledging of themselves? If they be all taken out of a corrupt masse, it is no marvell if they be subject to damnation. Let them not therefore accuse God of unjustice, if by his eternall judgement they be appointed to death, to which they themselves doe feele whether they will or no, that they are willingly led of their owne nature. Whereby appeareth how wrongfull is the desire of their murmuring, because they doe of set purpose hide the cause of damnation which they are compelled to acknowledge in themselves, that the laying of the blame upon God may acquite them. But though I doe a hundred times confesse, as it is most true that God is the author of it, yet doe they not by and by wipe away the guiltinesse which, being engraven in their consciences from time to time with oft recourse, presenteth it selfe to their eies.

God not unjust though men be condemned for that corruption whereunto they were foreappointed.

4 Againe they except and say: were they not before predestinate by the ordinance of God to the same corruption which is now alleadged for the cause of damnation? When therefore they perish in their corruption, they doe nothing but suffer the punishment of that miserie into which by his predestination Adam fell and drew his posteritie headlong with him. Is not he therefore unjust, which doth so cruelly mocke his creatures? I grant indeed that all the children of Adam fell by the will of God into that miserie of state wherein they be now bound: and this is it that I said at the beginning, that at length we must alway returne to the determination of the will of God, the cause whereof is hidden in himselfe. But it followeth not by and by that God is subject to this slander. For wee will with Paul answere them in this manner, O man, what art thou that contendest with God? doth the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou formed me so? Hath not the potter power to make of the same lumpe one vessell to honour, and another to dishonour? They will say that the righteousnesse of God is not so truly defended, but that we may seeke a shift, such as they are wont to have that want a just excuse. For what else seemeth here to be said, than that God hath a power which cannot be hindred from doing any thing whatsoever it be as he will himselfe? But it is far otherwise. For, what stronger reason can be brought than when we are commanded to thinke what a one God is? For how should he commit any unjustice, which is judge of the world? If it properly pertaine to the nature of God to doe judgement, then he naturally loveth righteousnesse, and abhorreth unrighteousnesse. Wherefore the Apostle did not, as though he were overtaken, looke about for holes to hide him: but shewed that the reason of the righteousnesse of God is higher than that either it is to be measured by the measure of man, or may be comprehended by the slender capacitie of the wit of man. The Apostle indeed confesseth that there is such depth in the judgements of God, wherewith the mindes of men should be swallowed, if they endevoured to pearse into it. But he teacheth also how hainous wreng it is, to binde the workes of God to such a law, that so soone as we understand not the reason of them, we may be bold to disallow them. It is a knowne saying of Salomon (which yet few doe rightly understand) The great creator of all rendreth reward to the foole, and reward to transgressors. For he crieth out concerning the greatnesse of God: in whose will it is to punish fooles and transgressors, although he doe not vouchsafe to let them have his spirit. And monstrous is the madnesse of men, when they so covet to make that which is unmeasurable, subject to the small measure of their reason. The Angels which ſtood ſtill in their uprightneſſe, Paul calleth elect. If their ſtedfaſtneſſe was grounded upon the good pleaſure of God, the falling away of the other proveth that they were forſaken: Of which thing there can no other cauſe be alleaged than reprobation, which is hidden in the ſecret counſell of God. 2 Tim. 2. 22.

5 Goe to: let there now be preſent ſome Manichee, or Celeſtine, a ſlanderer of the providence of God: I ſay with Paul that there ought no reaſon to be rendered thereof: becauſe with the greatneſſe of it, it farre ſurmounteth our underſtanding. What marvaile? or what abſurditie is it? Would hee have the power of God ſo limited, that it might be able to worke no more, than his minde is able to conceive? I ſay with Auguſtine, that they are created of the Lord, whom he without doubting foreknew that they ſhould goe into deſtruction: and that it was ſo done becauſe he ſo willed: but why hee willed, it is not our part to aske a reaſon of it, who cannot comprehend it: neither is it meet that the will of God ſhould come downe into controverſie among us, of which ſo oft as mention is made, under the name of it is named the higheſt rule of righteouſnes. Why therefore is any queſtion moved of unrighteouſneſſe where righteouſneſſe clearly appeareth? Neither let us be aſhamed, after the example of Paul, ſo to ſtop the mouthes of the wicked, and from time to time ſo oft as they ſhall be bold to barke againſt it, to repeate this, Who be yee miſerable men, that lay an accuſation to Gods charge and doe therefore lay it to his charge, becauſe hee doth not temper the greatneſſe of his works to your dulneſſe? As though they were therefore wrongfull, becauſe they are hidden from fleſh. The unmeaſurableneſſe of the judgements of God is by cleere experiences knowne unto you. Yee know that they are called the deepe bottomleſſe depth. Now aske of the narrow capacities of your wit, whether they comprehend that which God hath decreed with himſelfe. What good doth it you therefore with mad ſearching to plunge your ſelves into the bottomleſſe depth, which reaſon it ſelfe teacheth you that it ſhall be to your deſtruction? Why are yee not at the leſt reſtrained with ſome feare, of the which both that hyſtory of Job and the bookes of the Prophet doe report of the incomprehenſible wiſedome, and terrible power of God? If thy minde be unquieted, let it not grieve thee to embrace the counſell of Auguſtine. Thou being a man lookeſt for an anſwere at my hand: and I alſo am a man. Therefore let us both heare him that ſaith: O man, what art thou? Better is a faithfull ignorance than raſh knowledge. Seeke merits: thou ſhalt finde nothing but paine. O depth, Peter denieth: The Thiefe beleeveth. O depth: Seekeſt thou a reaſon? I will tremble at the depth. Reaſon thou, I will wonder, diſpute thou, I will beleeve: I ſee depth, but I reach not the bottome. Paul reſted, becauſe he found wondering. He calleth the judgements of God unſearchable: and art thou come to ſearch them? Hee ſaith that his waies are impoſſible to be traced out: and doſt thou trace them? with proceeding further we ſhall nothing profit: For neither we ſhall ſatisfie their wayward wanton curiouſneſſe, neither doth the Lord need any other defence, than which hee hath uſed by his ſpirit, which ſpake by the mouth of Paul: and we forget to ſpeake well, when we ceaſe to ſpeake with God.

A reaſon of the will of God in reſpect of the wicked we neither can nor ſhould ſearch.

Aug. de verb. apo. ſerm. 20.

6 Their other objection alſo ariſeth out of ungodlineſſe, which yet tendeth not ſo directly to the accuſing of God as to the excuſing of the ſinner. Howbeit the ſinner which is condemned of God cannot be juſtified without diſhonour of the judge. Thus therefore prophane tongues doe barke againſt God, ſaying: why ſhould God impute thoſe things for ſinne to men, whereof he hath by his predeſtination laid neceſſitie upon men? For, what ſhould they doe? Should they wraſtle with his decrees? But ſo ſhould they doe it in vaine, ſith they cannot doe it at all. Therefore they are not rightfully puniſhed for thoſe things, whereof the chiefe cauſe is in Gods predeſtination. Heere I will abſtaine from that defence, whereunto the Eccleſiaſticall writers doe commonly flee, namely that the foreknowledge of God withſtandeth not but that man may be accounted the ſinner: becauſe God foreſeeth the evils of man, not his owne. For ſo the cavillation would not ſtay here, but will rather preſſe us further with ſaying that God might if he had would, have provided remedie for thoſe evils which he foreſaw: and that ſith he hath not ſo done, hee hath of determined purpoſe created men to that end that hee ſhould ſo behave himſelfe in earth: and if by the providence of God, man man was created to this condition, that hee ſhould doe all thoſe things that he doth: then he is not to be blamed for that which hee cannot avoide, and which he enterpriſed by the will of God. Therefore let us ſee how this knot ought to be well looſed. Firſt of all this ought to be holden certaine among all men which Salomon ſaith, that God hath created all things, for himſelfe, and the wicked man to an evill day. Behold, when the diſpoſing of all things is in the hand of God, when in his power remaineth the rule of ſafetie and death: hee ſo ordereth them by his counſell and becke, that among men there are borne ſome adjudged even from their mothers wombe to death, which with their deſtruction may glorifie his name. If any man anſwere, that there is no neceſſitie laid upon them by the providence of God, but rather that hee created them in ſuch eſtate, becauſe he foreſaw their perverſneſſe to come: he neither ſaith nothing at all, nor altogether. The old writers are wont indeed ſometimes to uſe this ſolution: but as it were doubtingly. But the Schoolemen reſt upon it, as though nothing could be objected againſt it. Indeed I will willingly grant, that foreknowledge alone bringeth no neceſſitie to creatures, although all men doe not ſo agree: for there be ſome that will have it alſo to be the cauſe of things. But it ſeemeth to me that Vtilla, a man otherwiſe not much practiſed in holy writings, ſaw both more deepely and more wiſely, which ſhewed that this contention is ſuperfluous: becauſe both life and death are rather the doings of Gods will than of his foreknowledge. If God did but foreſee the ſucceſſes of men, and did not alſo diſpoſe and order them by his will, then this queſtion ſhould not without cauſe be moved, whether his foreſeeing any thing availed to the neceſſitie of them. But ſith he doth none otherwiſe foreſee the things that ſhall come to paſſe, than becauſe he hath decreed that they ſhould ſo come to paſſe: it is vaine to move controverſie about foreknowledge, where it is certaine that all things doe happen rather by ordinance and commandement.

God did not only foreſee, but diſpoſe the fall of man, and in him the ruine of his poſteritie.

7 They ſay that this is not written in expreſſe words, that it was decreed of God, that Adam ſhould periſh by his falling away. As though the ſame God, whom the Scripture reporteth to doe whatſoever hee will, created the nobleſt of all his creatures to an uncertaine end. They ſay hee had freewill, that hee might ſhape to himſelfe his owne fortune: and that God decreed nothing, but to handle him according to his deſerving. If ſo cold a deviſe be received, where ſhall bee that almightineſſe of God, whereby hee governeth all things according to his ſecret counſell, which hangeth upon none other thing than it ſelfe? But Predeſtination, whether they will or no, ſheweth himſelfe in Adams poſteritie. For it came not to paſſe naturally that all men ſhould looſe ſalvation by the fault of one Parent. What hindreth them to confeſſe of one man, that which againſt their wils they confeſſe of all mankinde? For why ſhould they looſe their labour with dallying ſhifts? The Scripture crieth out that all men were in the perſon of one man made bound to eternall death. Sith this cannot be imputed to nature, it is plaine that it proceeded from the wondrous counſell of God. But it is too much abſurditie that theſe good Patrones of the righteouſneſſe of God doe ſo ſtumble at a ſtraw, and leape over great beames. Againe I aske: how came it to paſſe, that the fall of Adam did wrap up in eternall death ſo many nations with their children being infants without remedie, but becauſe it ſo pleaſed God? Here their tongues which are otherwiſe ſo pratling, muſt of neceſſitie be dumbe. It is a terrible decree, I grant: yet no man ſhall be able to denie, but that God foreknew what end man ſhould have, ere hee created him, and therefore foreknew it becauſe hee had ſo ordained by his decree. If any man here inveigh againſt the foreknowledge of God, hee raſhly and undiſcreetly ſtumbleth. For, what matter is there, I beſeech you, why the heavenly judge ſhould be accuſed for that hee was not ignorant of that which was to come? Therefore if there be any either juſt or colourable complaint, it toucheth predeſtination. Neither ought it to ſeeme an abſurditie which I ſay, that God foreſaw not onely the fall of the firſt man, and in him the ruine of his poſteritie, but alſo diſpoſed it after his owne will. For as it belongeth to his wiſedome, to foreknow all things that ſhall be: ſo it belongeth to his power, to rule and governe all things with his hand. And this queſtion Auguſtine very well diſcuſſeth, as he doth other, ſaying: We moſt wholeſomely confeſſe that which we moſt rightly beleeve, that the God and Lord of all things things, which created all things very good, and foreknew that evill things should spring out of good, and knew that it more pertained to his almighty goodnesse even of evill things to do wel, than not to suffer them to be evill: that he so ordered the life of Angels and men, that in it he might first shew what free will could doe, and then what the benefit of his grace and judgement of justice could doe.

8 Here they run to the distinction of will and permission, by which they will have it granted that the wicked doe perish, God onely permitting but not willing it. But why should we say that he permitted it, but because he so willeth? Howbeit it is not likely that man by himselfe, by the onely permission of God, without any his ordinance, brought destruction to himselfe: as though God appointed not, of what condition hee would have the chiefe of his creatures to be. I therefore will not doubt to confesse simply with Augustine, that the will of God is a necessitie of things, and that what he willeth, it must of necessitie come to passe: as those things shall truly come to passe which hee hath foreseene. Now if for excuse of themselves and of the ungodlie, either the Pelagians, or Manichees, or Anabaptists, or Epicurians (for with these fower sects wee have to doe in this question) shall object against us necessitie wherewith they be bound by the predestination of God: they bring nothing fit to the purpose. For if predestination be nothing else but a dispensation of righteousnesse of God, which is hidden indeed, but yet without fault: Forasmuch as it is certaine that they were not unworthy to be predestinate to that estate, it is also as certaine that the destruction is most righteous which they enter into by predestination. Moreover their destruction so hangeth upon the predestination of God, that both cause and matter thereof is found in themselves. For the first man fell, because the Lord so judged it to be expedient: why he so judged, is unknowne to us: yet it is certaine that he so judged for no other reason but because he saw that thereby the glory of his name should be worthily set forth. When thou heareſt mention of the glory of God, there thinke of his righteousnesse: for it must be righteous that deserveth praise. Man therfore falleth, the providence of God so ordaining it: but he falleth by his owne fault. The Lord had a little before pronounced, that all the things which hee had made were very good. Whence therefore commeth that perversnesse to man, to fall away from his God? Least it should be thought to bee of creation, the Lord with his commendation allowed that which came from himselfe. Therefore by his owne evilnesse he corrupted the nature which he had received pure of the Lord, and by his fall he drew his whole posteritie with him into destruction. Wherefore let us rather behold an evident cause of damnation in the corrupted nature of mankinde, which is neerer to us, than search for a hidden and utterly incomprehensible cause thereof in the predestination of GOD. Neither let it grieve us so far to submit our wit to the unmeasurable wisedome of God, that it may yeeld in many secrets of his. For, of those things which it is neither granted nor lawfull to know, the ignorance is well learned: the coveting of knowledge is a kinde of madnesse.

The wicked doe sin and perish not by Gods permission only, but by his will and appointment. De Gen. ad lite. li. 6. c. 15.

Gen. 1. 31.

9 Some man perhaps will say, that I have not yet brought enough to subdue that wicked excuse. But I verily confesse that it can never be brought to passe, but that ungodlinesse will alway grudge and murmure against it: yet I thinke that I have spoken so much as might suffice to take away not onely all reason but also all colour of saine-saying. The reprobate would be thought excusable in sinning, because they cannot escape the necessitie of sinning: specially sith such necessitie is cast upon them by the ordinance of God. But we denie that they are thereby well excused, because the ordinance of God, by which they complaine that they are destinate to destruction, hath his righteousnesse, unknowne indeed to us, but yet most certaine. Whereupon wee conclude, that they beare no evill which is not laid upon them by the most righteous judgement of God. Then, wee teach that they doe overthwartly, which to seeke out the beginning of their damnation, doe bend their eies to the secret closets of the counsell of God, and winke at the corruption of nature, from whence their damnation springeth. And this withstandeth that they cannot impute it to God, for that he witnesseth of his owne creation. For although man is create by the eternall providence of God to that calamitie, whereunto he is subject: yet the matter thereof he hee tooke of himselfe, not of God, forasmuch as hee is by no other meane so lost, but because hee went out of kinde from the pure creation of God into a corrupt and unpure perversnesse.

God not to be charged as a partiall accepter of persons.

10 Now the adversaries of Gods Predestination doe slander it also with a third absurditie. For when wee impute it to nothing else but to the choise of the will of God, that they are made free from the universall destruction, whom he maketh heires of his kingdome, thereby they gather that there is with him accepting of persons, which the Scripture every where denieth: and therefore, that either the Scripture disagreeth with it selfe, or that in the election of God there is respect of deservings. First, the Scripture in another sense denieth, that God is an accepter of persons, than as they judge it. For by the name of person, it signifieth not a man, but those things which being seene with eies in man are wont to procure either favour, grace, and dignitie, or hatred, contempt, and shame: as riches, wealth, power, nobility, office, countrey, excellency of beauty, and such other: on the other side, poverty, need, baseneſſe, vileneſſe, contempt and such other. So Peter and Paul doe teach that the Lord is not an accepter of persons, because he putteth not difference betweene the Jew and the Grecian, to refuse the one and embrace the other for onely respect of nation. So James useth the same words when hee mindeth to affirme, that God in his judgement nothing regardeth riches. But Paul in another place speaketh thus of God, that in judging he hath no consideration of freedom or bondage. Wherfore there shall be no contrariety if we shall say that God, according to the will of his good pleasure without any deserving, choseth to his Sonnes whom he will, rejecting and refusing other. But the matter may thus be opened, that men may be more fully satisfied. They aske how it commeth to passe, that of two betweene whom no deserving putteth any difference, God in his electing passeth over the one and taketh the other. I on the other side doe aske them, whether they thinke that in him that is taken, there is any thing that may make the minde of God to encline toward him. If they confesse (as they needs must) that there is nothing, it shall follow that God looketh not upon man, but from his owne goodnesse feteheth a cause why to doe good to him. Whereas therefore God choseth one man, refusing an other, this commeth not of respect of man, but of his mercy alone, which ought to have liberty to shew forth and utter it selfe where and when it pleaseth him. For we have in another place also shewed, that there were not from the beginning many called noble, or wise, or honourable, that God might humble the pride of flesh: so far is it off, that his favour was bound to persons.

God finding all guilty is not partiall in condemning any but in saving some, mercifull.

11 Wherefore many doe falsely and wickedly accuse God of partiall unrighteousnesse, for that hee doth not in his Predestination keepe one selfe-course toward all men. If (saith they) hee finde all guilty, let him equally punish all: if he finde them unguilty, let him withhold the rigour of his judgement from all. But so they deale with him, as if either mercy were forbidden him, or when we would have mercy, he be compelled altogether to give over his judgement. What is it that they require? if all be guilty, that all may together suffer all one paine. We grant the guiltinesse to be common, but we say that the mercy of God helpeth some. Let it helpe all, say they. But we answer, that it is rightfull that he should also in punishing shew himselfe a rightful judge. When they suffer not this: what doe they else but either goe about to spoile God of his power to have mercy, or at least to grant it him upon this condition, that he utterly give over his judgement. Wherefore these sayings of Augustine doe very well agree together. Sith in the first man the whole masse of mankinde fell into condemnation, these vessels that are made of it to honour, are not the vessels of their owne righteousnesse, but of the mercy of God: and whereas other are made to dishonour, the same is not to be imputed to unrighteousnesse but to judgement, &c. That to those whom he refuseth, God rendreth due paine: to those whom he calleth, he giveth undeserved grace: that they are delivered from all accusation, after the manner of a creditour, in whose power it is to forgive to the one, and aske of the other. Therefore the Lord also may give grace to whom hee will, because he is mercifull: and give it not to all, because he is a just judge. Hee may by giving to some that which they doe not deserve, shew his free grace: and by not giving to all, declare what all deserve. For whereas Paul writeth that God enclosed all under sinne, that he might have mercy upon all, it is therewithall to be added that he is debter to no man: because no man first gave to him, that he may require like of him.

12 This also they often say, to overthrow predestination, that while it standeth, all carefullnesse and endevour of well doing falleth away. For who (say they) shall heare that either life or death is certainly appointed for him by the eternall decree of God, But that it will by and by come into his minde that it maketh no matter how he behave himselfe, sith the predestination of God can by his worke be nothing hindered or furthered? So shall all men dissolutely throw forth themselves, and after a desperate manner runne headlong whither their lust shall carry them. And verily they say not altogether falsly, for there bee many swine, which with filthy blasphemies defile the doctrine of predestination: and by this pretence also doe mocke out all admonishments and rebukings, saying; God knoweth what he hath once determined to doe with us: if he have decreed our salvation, he will bring us to it at the time appointed: if he have predestinate our death, we should travell in vaine to the contrary. But the Scripture when it teacheth with how much greater reverence and religiousnesse wee ought to thinke of so great a mystery, doth both instruct the godly to feare other sence, and well confutes these mens outrage. For it doth not speake of predestination to this end, that we should be encouraged to boldnesse, and with unlawfull rashnesse attempt to search the unattained secrets of God? but rather that being humbled and abased wee should learne to tremble at his judgement, and reverently to looke up to his mercie. To this marke the faithfull will levell themselves. As for that filthy groning of swine, it is well confuted of Paul. They say that they goe carelesly forward in vices: because if they be of the number of the elect, their vices shall nothing hinder them, but that they shall at length be brought to life. But Paul telleth that we be to this end, that we should lead a holy and faultlesse life. If the marke that election is directed unto, be holinesse of life, it ought more to awake and stirre us up cheerefully to practise that holinesse, than to serve for a cloking of slothfullnesse. For how greatly doe these things differ the one from the other? to cease from well doing, because election sufficeth to salvation: and that the appointed end of election is that we should apply our selves to the endevour of good doings. Away therefore with such sacriledges which doe wrongfully misturne the whole order of election. Where they stretch their blasphemies further, when they say that he which is reprobate of God, shall lose his labour if hee goe about to make himselfe allowable to him with innocency and honesty of life: therein they are taken with a most shameletse lye. For, whence could such endevour come but of election? For whosoever be of the number of the reprobate, as they are vessels made to dishonour, so they cease not with continuall wicked doings to provoke the wrath of God against themselves, and by evident tokens to confirme the judgment of God which is already pronounced upon them; so far be they from striving with him in vaine.

Predestination taketh not away the care of well-doing.

Eph. 1. 4.

13 But other doe malitiously and shamefully slander this doctrine, as though it did overthrow all exhortations to godly living, For which matter in old time Augustine was burdened with a great malice. Which hee wiped away with his booke of corrreption and grace written to Valentine, the reading whereof will appease all godly and tractable men: yet I will touch a few things, which (as I trust) shall satisfie them that bee honest and not contentious. Wee have already seene how open and lowd a preacher of the free election Paul was: was hee therefore cold in admonishing and exhorting? Let these good zealous men compare their earnestnesse with his, and it shall be found in them yee in comparison of his incredible heat. And truely this principle taketh away all doubts, that wee are not called to uncleanesse, but that every man should possesse his vessell in honour, &c. Againe, that we are the handy worke of God created to good workes, which he hath prepared that wee should walke in them. Summarily, they that are even but meanely exercised in Paul, shall without long declaration easily perceive how fitly hee maketh these things to agree, which they faigne to disagree. Christ commandeth that men beleeve in him: Yet is his definitive sentence neither false nor contrary to his commandement, where hee saith: No man can come to me, but he to whom it is given of my father. Let preaching therefore have his course, which may bring men to faith, and with continuall profiting hold them fast in perseverance. Neither yet let the knowledge of predestination bee hindered, that they which obey may not be proud as of their owne, but may glory in the Lord. Christ not for nothing saith: Who so hath eares of hearing, let them heare. Therefore when we exhort and preach, they that have eares doe willingly obey: but who so lacke eares, in them is fulfilled that which is written, That hearing they heare not. But why (saith Augustine) should some have, and othersome not have? Who hath knowne the minde of the Lord? Must that therefore bee denyed which is open, because that cannot bee comprehended which is hidden: These sayings I have faithfully reported out of Augustine: but because peradventure his words shall have more authority than mine, goe to, let us bring forth the very words that are reade in himselfe. If when this is heard, many are turned into dulnesse and sluggishnesse, and being inclined from labour to lust doe goe after their desires: ought that therefore to bee accompted false which is spoken of the foreknowledge of God? If God have foreknowne that they shall bee good, shall they not be good, in how great evillnesse soever they now live? and if we have foreknowne that they will be evill, shall they not be evill in how great goodnesse soever they be now seene? shall therefore those things which are truely spoken of the fore knowledge of God, bee for such causes either to be denied or to be left unspoken of? namely then when if they be not spoken of, men goe into errors? The rule (saith he) to keepe truth unspoken of, is one thing, and the necessitie to speake truth is another. As for the causes of leaving truth unspoken, it were long to search them out all: of which yet this is one, that they be not made worse which understand it not, while wee meane to make them more learned that understand it, who when wee speake any such thing are indeede not made more learned, nor yet are made worse. But when a true thing is in such a case, that when wee speake it, hee is made worse that cannot conceive it: and when wee speake it not, hee is made worse that can conceive it: what thinke wee now to bee done? Is not the truth rather to bee spoken that he may conceive it, that can conceive it: than to keepe it unspoken, that not only neither of them may conceive it, but also hee that more understandeth may bee the worse? whereas if hee did heare and conceive it, by him also many should learne. And we will not say that which, as the Scripture witnesseth, wee lawfully might have spoken. For wee feare forsooth least when wee speake, hee bee offended that cannot conceive it: but we feare not least while we holde our peace, he that can conceive truth be deceived with falshood. Which sentence hee at the last shortly knitting up, more plainely also confirmed. Wherefore if the Apostles, and they which followed them the doctors of the Church did both, namely both godlily preach of the eternall election of God, and hold the faithfull in awe under the discipline of godly life: why doe these our adversaries being confuted with invincible violence of truth, thinke that they say well in saying, that that which is spoken of predestination is not to bee preached to the people although it be true? Yea it must in any wise be preached, that hee which hath eares to heare may heare. But who hath eares if hee hath not received them from him that promiseth that he will give them: Truely let him that receiveth not, refuse it: so that yet he which receiveth it, doe take and drinke, doe drinke and live. For as godlinesse is to bee preached, that God may be rightly worshipped; so is also predestination, that hee which hath eares to heare of the grace of God, may glory in God and not in himselfe.

14 And yet that holy man, as hee had a singular desire to edifie, so tempereth the manner of teaching the truth, that offence bee wisely avoyded so farre as it lawfully may be. For hee sheweth that those things which are truly said, may also bee conveniently said. If any man doe thus preach to the people. If yee beleeve not, the cause is for that yee are already predestinate of God to destruction; such a man doth not only cherish slothfullnesse, but also maintaine wickednesse. If any man also stretch his saying to the time to come, and say that they which heare shall not beleeve, because they are reprobate: this shall bee rather a cursing than a teaching. Such therefore Augustine not unworthily biddeth to depart from the Church, as foolish teachers, and unlucky unlucky and ill prophecying Prophets. In another place he truely affirmeth that it is to be holden that a man then profiteth with rebuking, when hee hath mercy and helpeth which maketh to profit whom he will, even without rebuking. But why ſome thus and ſome otherwiſe? God forbid that, that wee ſhould ſay the power of judging belongeth rather to the clay than to the Potter. Againe afterward. When men by rebuking either come or returne into the way o righteouſneſſe, who worketh ſalvation in their hearts, but hee, which when any whoſoever he bee planteth and watereth giveth the increaſe, whom when he will ſave, no freewill of man reſiſteth? It is therefore not to be doubted that the wils of men cannot reſiſt the will of God (which both in heaven and earth hath done whatſoever he would, and which hath alſo done thoſe things that are to come) but that he may doe what he will, foraſmuch as even of the very wils of men he doth what he will. Againe, when he will leade men to him, doth he binde them with corporall bonds? He inwardly worketh, inwardly holdeth harts, inwardly moveth harts, and draweth them with their wils which he himſelf hath made in them. But, that which he by and by addeth ought in no wiſe to bee omitted: that becauſe we know not who belongeth or not belongeth to the number of the predeſtinate, we ought ſo to be affectioned that we would all men to be ſaved. So ſhall it come to paſſe, that whomſoever we finde, we ſhall travell to make him partaker of peace. But our peace ſhall reſt upon the children of peace, therfore for our part, we muſt apply wholeſome and ſharpe rebuking to all men like a medicine, that they periſh not, nor deſtroy other, but it ſhall be the worke of God to make it profitable to them whom he hath foreknowne and predeſtinate.

THE XXIIIJ. CHAPTER.

That election is eſtabliſhed by the calling of God, but that the reprobate doe bring upon themſelves the juſt deſtruction whereunto they are appointed.

Gods effectuall and inward calling of ſome whoſe election is thereby ſealed.

BVT, that the matter may more plainely appeare, wee muſt intreate both of the calling of the elect, and of the blinding and hardening of the wicked. Of the firſt of theſe I have already ſpoken somewhat, when I confuted their errour, which thinke that the generallneſſe of the promiſes extendeth equally to all mankinde. But this election which otherwiſe God hath hidden with himſelfe hee doth not without choiſe at length diſcloſe by his calling, which a man may therefore call the teſtifying of it. For, whom he hath foreknowne, them he hath alſo fore appointed to be faſhioned like the image of his ſonne: whom he hath foreappointed, them he hath alſo called: whom he hath called, them hee hath alſo juſtified, that in time to come hee may glorifie them. When the Lord hath by electing already adopted his into the number of his children: yet wee ſee how they enter not into poſſeſſion of ſo great a benefit, but when they be called: on the other ſide, how being called they doe now enjoy a certaine communicating of his election. For which reaſon Paul calleth the ſpirit which they receive, both the ſpirit of adoption, and the ſeale, and earneſt of the inheritance to come: namely becauſe it doth with the teſtimony thereof ſtabliſh and ſeale to their hearts the aſſuredneſſe of the adoption to come. For though the preaching of the Goſpell ſpring out of the fountaine of election: yet becauſe it is alſo common to the reprobate, therefore it could not by it ſelfe be a ſure proofe thereof. But God effectually teacheth his elect, that hee may bring them to faith: as wee have before alleadged out of the words of Chriſt, Whoſo is of God, hee and none other ſeeth the Father. Againe, I have ſhewed thy name to the men whom thou haſt given me: Whereas hee ſaith in another place, no man can come to mee, unleſſe my Father draw him. Which place Auguſtine wiſely weigheth, whoſe words are theſe. If (as Truth ſaith every one that hath learned, commeth: whoſoever commeth not, certainely neither hath he learned. It doth not therefore follow that he which can come, alſo commeth, unleſſe hee have both willed and done it. But every one that hath learned of the Father, not onely can come, but alſo commeth, when now there is preſent both the profit of comming, and the affection of willing, and the effect of doing. Alſo in another place more plainely. What is this elſe, every one that hath heard of the father, and hath learned, commeth to mee, but there is none that heareth and learneth of the father and commeth not to mee? For if every one which hath heard of the father and learned, commeth: truely every one that commeth not, hath not heard of the father, nor learned: for if hee had heard and learned, he would come. This ſchoole is farre from the ſenſes of the fleſh, in which ſchoole the father is heard and teacheth, that men may come to the ſonne. And a little after. This grace which is ſecretly given to the hearts of men, is received of no hard heart: for it is therefore given, that the hardneſſe of the heart may firſt be taken away. When therefore the Father is heard within, hee taketh away the ſtony heart, and giveth a fleſhly heart. For ſo hee maketh the children of promiſe and veſſels of mercy, which hee hath prepared to glory. Why therefore doth hee not teach all, that they may come to Chriſt, but becauſe all whom he teacheth, by mercy hee teacheth: whom hee doth not teach, by judgement he doth not teach? becauſe hee hath mercy upon whom he will, and hardeneth whom hee will. Therefore God aſſigneth them for children to himſelfe, and appointeth himſelfe father to them, whom he hath choſen. Now by calling hee bringeth them into the houſhold, and uniteth himſelfe to them, that they may bee one together. But, when calling is joyned to election, in that manner the Scripture ſufficiently ſignifieth that in it nothing is to be required but the mercy of God. For if we aske, whom he calleth and and for what reaſon: he anſwereth, whom he had elected. But when wee come once to election, there the onely mercy of God appeareth on every ſide. And here that ſaying of Paul truely hath place, It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Neither yet that ſame ſo, as they commonly take it, which part is betweene the grace of God, and the willing and running of man. For they expound it, that the deſire and indevour of man hath indeed no force of themſelves, unleſſe they be proſpered by the grace of God: but when they are holpen by his bleſſing, then they affirme that they have alſo their parts in obtaining ſalvation. Whoſe cavillation I had rather confute with Auguſtines words than mine owne: If the Apoſtle meant nothing elſe but that it is not of him onely that willeth or runneth, unleſſe the Lord bee there preſent merciſull: wee may contrariwiſe turne it againſt them and ſay that it is not of onely mercy, unleſſe there be preſent willing and running. But if this bee openly wicked, let us not doubt that the Apoſtle giveth all to the mercy of the Lord, and leaveth nothing to our wils or indevours. To this effect ſpeaketh that holy man. And I ſet not a ſtraw by that nice ſubtilty, that they ſay that Paul would not have ſo ſaid unleſſe there had beene ſome indeavour and ſome will in us. For he did not conſider what was in man: but when hee ſaw that ſome did aſſigne part of ſalvation to the endevour of men, hee ſimply condemned their errour in the firſt part of the ſentence, and in the ſecond hee challenged the whole ſumme of ſalvation of the mercy of God. And what other things doe the Prophets travell about but continually to preach the free calling of God?

Enchir ad Laur. cap. 31.

It is of God's moſt free and undeſerved favour, that we are effectually called to ſalvation.

2 Moreover the very nature alſo and diſpenſation of calling doth cleerely ſhew it, which conſiſteth not in the onely preaching of the word, but alſo in the inlightening of the Spirit. To whom God offereth his word, is ſhewed us in the Prophet: I am found of them that ſought mee not: I have openly appeared to them that did not aske for mee. To a people which hath not called upon my name I have ſaid, Loe I am preſent. And leaſt the Iewes ſhould thinke that this kindneſſe belonged onely to the Gentiles, he doth alſo put them in remembrance from whence he tooke their father Abraham, when hee vouchſafed to joyne him to himſelfe, namely from meere idolatry, in which hee was drowned with all his. When hee firſt ſhineth with the light of his Word to men not deſerving it, hee therein ſheweth an example plaine enough of his free goodneſſe: Here therefore the unmeaſurable goodneſſe of God ſheweth forth it ſelfe, but now unto ſalvation to all: becauſe for the reprobate there abideth a more grievous judgement, for that they refuſe the teſtimony of the will of God. And God alſo, to ſet forth his glory, withdraweth from them the effectuall force of his Spirit. Therefore this inward calling is a pledge of ſalvation, which cannot deceive us. For which purpoſe maketh that ſaying of Iohn. Thereby wee know know that wee are his children, by the ſpirit which hee hath given us. And leaſt fleſh ſhould glory, that it did at the leaſt anſwer to him when hee called and of his owne will offered himſelfe, hee affirmeth that it hath no eares to heare, no eies to ſee but which hee hath made: and that hee maketh them, not according to every mans thankfullneſſe, but according to his owne election. Of which thing you have a notable example in Luke, where both Iewes and Gentiles in common together, heard the preaching of Paul and Barnabas. Whereas they were at that time all taught with one ſelfe-ſame word, it is ſaid that they beleeved which were ordained to everlaſting life. With what face may we deny that the calling is free, in which even to the very laſt part election raigneth alone? Act. 13. 14.

1. Iohn 5 24.

3 But here wee muſt beware of two errors, becauſe many make man a worker together with God, that he by his conſent may make the election to bee of force: ſo by their opinion, the will of man is above the counſell of God. As though the Scripture did teach, that it is onely given us that wee may beleeve, and not rather faith it ſelfe. Otherſome, although they doe not ſo weaken the grace of the holy Ghoſt: yet being led by I wot not what reaſon, hang election upon faith as though it were doubtfull, yea and uneffectuall untill it bee confirmed by faith. It is indeed certaine that it is confirmed, as toward us: and we have already ſhewed that the ſecret counſell of God beginneth to ſhine out, which was before hidden: ſo that by this word you underſtand nothing elſe, then that it is approved which was unknowne, and is as it were ſealed with a ſeale. But it is falſely ſaid, that the election is then and not till then effectuall, when we have embraced the Goſpell, and that thereof it taketh lively ſtrength. We muſt indeed from thence fetch the certainty of it: Becauſe if wee attempt to reach unto the eternall ordinance of God, that deepe bottomeleſſe depth will ſwallow us up. But when God hath opened it unto us, wee muſt climbe up higher, leſt the effect ſhould drowne the cauſe. For what greater abſurdity or ſhamefull unjuſtice is there, than that when the Scripture teacheth that wee are enlightned as God hath choſen us, our eies ſhould bee ſo dazeled with this light, that they ſhould refuſe to looke upon election? Yet in the meane time I deny not, that to the end wee may be certaine of our ſalvation, wee muſt begin at the word, and that our affiance ought therewith to be contented, that we may call upon God by the name of Father. For ſome quite contrary to right order, that they may be certified of the councell of God (which is neere unto us, in our mouth and in our heart) doe covet to flie above the clouds. Therefore that raſhneſſe is to bee reſtrained with ſobriety of faith, that it may ſuffice us that God in his outward word is a witneſſe of his hidden grace: ſo that the conduit pipe out of which there floweth water largely for us to drinke, doe not hinder but that the ſpring-head may have due his honour. We are not workers with God of our owne election neither doth it hang in ſuſpence upon our faith. Deut. 30. 14.

4 Therefore as they doe wrongfully, which hang the ſtrength of election upon the faith of the Goſpell, by which faith we feele that election pertaineth to us: ſo we ſhall keepe the beſt order, if in ſeeking the certainty of our election, wee ſticke faſt in theſe latter ſignes, which are ſure witneſſings of it: Satan doth with no tentation either more grievouſly, or more dangerouſly aſtoniſh the faithfull, than when diſquieting them with doubt of their election, hee doth alſo move them with a perverſe deſire to ſeeke it out of the way. I call it ſeeking out of the way, when a wretched man enterpriſeth to breake into the hidden ſecrets of the wiſdome of God, and to pearce even to the higheſt eternity, to underſtand what is determined of himſelfe at the judgement ſeat of God. For then hee throweth himſelfe headlong to bee ſwallowed up into the depth of the unmeaſurable devouring pit: then hee wrappeth himſelfe with innumerable ſnares and ſuch as hee cannot winde out of: then hee overwhelmeth himſelfe with the bottomeleſſe depth of blinde darkeneſſe. For ſo it is rightfull that the fooliſhneſſe of the wit of man bee puniſhed with ſo horrible ruine, when he attempteth of his owne force to riſe up to the height of the wiſedome of God. And ſo much more deadly is this tentation, as there is none to which wee are commonly all more bent. For there is moſt rarely any man to be found, whoſe mind is not ſometime ſtricken with this thought. Whence haſt thou ſalvation, but of the election of God? And of Election what revelation haſt thou? which thought, if it have once taken place in any The certainty of our election to be ſearched not in the boſome of God but in our ſelves, according to that light which he hath given us in his word.

man, either perpetually vexeth the miserable man with terrible torments, or utterly dismayeth him. Truely I would have no surer argument than this experience to prove how wrongfully such men imagine of predestination. For the minde can bee infected with no errour more pestilent, than that which plucketh downe, and thrusteth the conscience from her peace and quietnesse toward God. Therefore if we feare shipwracke, we must diligently beware of this rocke, which is never stricken upon without destruction. And though the disputing of predestination bee esteemed like a dangerous sea, yet in passing through it there is found a safe and quiet yea and pleasant sayling. unlesse a man doe wilfully covet to bee in danger. For as they doe drowne themselves in the deadly bottomelesse depth, which to be certified of their election doe enquire of the secret Counsell of God without his word: so they which doe rightly and orderly search it in such sort as it is contained in the word, receive thereof a singular fruit of comfort. Let this therefore bee our way to search it, that wee begin at the calling of God, and end in the same. Howbeit this withstandeth not, but that the faithfull may thinke that the benefits which they daily receive at the hand of GOD, doe descend from that secret adoption: as they say in Esay, Thou hast done marvels, thy thoughts are old, true, and faithfull: forasmuch as by that adoption as by a token, the Lords will is to confirme so much as is lawfull to bee knowne of his counsell. But least any man should thinke this a weake testimony, let us consider how much both clearenesse, and certainty it bringeth us. Of which thing Bernard speaketh fitly. For after that hee had spoken of the reprobate, hee saith: The purpose of God standeth. the sentence of peace standeth upon them that feare him, both covering their evils, and rewarding their good things: so as to them after a marvellous manner not onely good things but also evill doe worke together unto good. Who shall accuse the elect of God? It sufficeth mee to all righteousnesse, to have him alone mercifull, to whom alone I have sinned. All that he hath decreed not to impute to me, is so as if it never had beene. And a little after: O place of true rest, and to which not unworthily I may give the name of a bedchamber, in which God is seene not as troubled with wrath, not as withholden with care: but his will is proved in him good, and well pleasing, and perfect. This sight doth not make afraid, but calmeth: doth not stirre up unquiet curiousnesse, but appeaseth it: doth not weary the senses, but quieteth them: Here is quiet truely taken, God being appeased, appeaseth all things: and to behold him quiet, is to be quiet.

Being chosen in Christ in him we must behold our choosing ascertained.

5 First, if wee seeke a fatherly kindnesse, and favourable minde of God, wee must turne our eies to Christ, in whom alone the soule of the father resteth. If wee seeke salvation, life, and the immortality of the heavenly kingdome, wee must then also flee to no other: forasmuch as hee alone is both the fountaine of life, and Authour of salvation, and heire of the kingdome of Heaven. Now whereto serveth election, but that being adopted of the heavenly Father into the degree of children, we may by his favour obtaine salvation and immortality? Howsoever in seeking thou tosse it and shake it, yet thou shalt finde that the uttermost marke of it extendeth no further. Therefore whom God hath taken to his children, it is not said that hee hath chosen them in themselves, but in his Christ? because hee could not love them but in him, nor give them the honour of the inheritance of his kingdome, unlesse they had first beene made partakers of him. If we be chosen in him, we shall not finde in our selves that certainty of our election: no, nor yet in God the Father, if we imagine him naked without the Sonne. Christ therefore is the mirror, in whom wee both must, and without deceit may behold our election. For sith it is hee into whose body the Father hath appointed to graft all them whom from eternity hee hath willed to bee his, that hee may take for his children so many as hee reknowledgeth among his members: wee have a witnesse plaine and sure enough, that wee are written in the booke of life, if wee communicate with Christ. And that sure communion of himselfe hee gave us, when by preaching of the Gospell he testified that he was given to us of the Father, that he withall his good things should bee ours. Wee are said to put on him, and to grow together into him, that we may live: because hee liveth. So oft is this doctrine repeated, The Father spared not his onely begotten Sonne, that of whosoever beleeveth in him, may not perish.

periſh. But hee that beleeveth in him, is ſaid to have paſſed from death into life, In which ſenſe hee calleth himſelfe the Bread of life, which who ſo eateth, hee ſhall not die for ever. He (I ſay) hath beene a witneſſe to us, that they ſhall bee received of the heavenly Father in place of his children, of whom hee hath beene received by Faith. If wee covet any more than to bee accounted among the children and heires of God, then wee may climbe above Chriſt. If this bee our uttermoſt marke: how much bee wee mad in ſeeking without him that which wee have already obtained in him, and which may bee found in him alone? Moreover, ſith hee is the eternall wiſdome, the unchangeable truth, and faſt ſetled counſell of the Father: it is not to bee feared leaſt that which he declareth to us in his word, ſhould vary any thing bee it never ſo little from that will of the Father which we ſeeke: but rather hee faithfully openeth it unto us, ſuch as it was from the beginning, and ever ſhall be. The practiſe of this doctrine ought alſo to bee in ure in prayers. For though the faith of election doth incourage us to call upon God: yet when we make our prayers, it were unorderly done to thruſt it into the preſence of God, or to covenant with this condition. Lord, if I be elected, heare me: foraſmuch as hee willeth us to bee content with his promiſes, and no where elſe to ſeeke whether he will bee intreatable to us or no. This wiſdome ſhall deliver us from many ſnares, if we can skill to apply that, to a right uſe which hath beene rightly written: but let us not undiſcreetly draw hither and thether that which ought to have beene reſtrained.

6 There is alſo for ſtabliſhing of our affiance another ſtay of election, which wee have ſaid to bee joyned with our calling. For, whom Chriſt taketh being enlightned with the knowledge of his name into the boſome of his Church, them he is ſaid to receive into his faith and protection. And whomſoever hee receiveth, they are ſaid to bee committed to him of the Father, and deliver to his truſt, that they may bee kept into eternall life. What meane we? Chriſt cryeth out with a lowd voyce, that ſo many as the Father willeth to bee ſaved, hee hath delivered them into his protection. Therefore if wee liſt to know whether God hath care of our ſafety, let us ſeeke whether hee hath committed us to Chriſt, whom hee hath made the onely Saviour of all his. Now if we doubt whether we be received of Chriſt into his faith and keeping, hee preventeth our doubting, when hee voluntarily offereth himſelfe to be our ſhepheard, and pronounceth that we ſhall be in the number of his ſheepe if we heare his voice. Let us therefore imbrace Chriſt, being liberally ſet open for us, and comming to meete us, he ſhall number us in his flocke, and ſhall keepe us incloſed within his fold. But there entreth into us a carefulneſſe of our ſtate to come. For as Paul teacheth that they are called, which were before choſen, ſo Chriſt ſheweth that many are called, but few are choſen. Yea and alſo Paul himſelfe in another place diſhorteth us from careleſneſſe: Let him that ſtandeth (ſaith he) looke that he fall not. Againe, Art thou graffed into the people of God? Be not proud, but feare: for God is able to cut thee off againe that he may graffe other. Finally, wee are ſufficiently taught by experience it ſelfe, that calling and faith are of ſmall value, unleſſe there bee adjoyned continuance which happeneth not to all men. But Chriſt hath delivered us from this care: for verilie theſe promiſes have reſpect to the time to come. All that my father giveth me ſhall come to me: and him that ſhall come to me, I will not caſt him out of doores. Againe, this is the will of him that ſent me, the Father, that I looſe nothing of all things that hee hath given mee, but may raiſe them up againe in the laſt day. Againe, My ſheepe heare my voice, and they follow mee: I know them, and I give them eternall life, and they ſhall not periſh for ever, neither ſhall any man take them out of my hand. The father which gave them to mee, is greater than all: and no man can take them out of the hand of my father. Now when hee pronounceth, Every tree which my father hath not planted, ſhall bee plucked up by the roote: hee ſignifieth on the contrary ſide, that they can never bee plucked from ſalvation, which have roote in God. Wherewith agreeth that ſaying of Iohn, If they had beene of us, they had not at all gone out from us. Hereupon alſo commeth that noble glorying of Paul againſt life and death, preſent things and things to come: which glorying muſt needs bee grounded upon the gift of continuance. Neither is it any doubt that hee directeth this

As also David when his faith fainted, leaned upon this day: Thou shalt not forsake the worke of thy hands. And now neither is this doubtfull, that Christ when he prayeth for all the faithfull, asketh the same thing for them which he asked for Peter, that their faith may never faile. Luke 22.32. Whereby we gather, that they are out of danger of falling away, because the Sonne of God, asking stedfast continuance for their godlinesse, suffered no deniall. What would Christ have us to learne hereby, but that wee should trust that we shall perpetually be safe, because we are once made his.

They which fall from Christ were in truth never christians, in whom a modest, humble, and religious feare of falling doth not take away assuredness of continuing in. Iohn 17.12. 1 Iohn 2.19. Iohn 3.16. & 6. 39.

7 But it daily happeneth, that they which seemed to bee Christs, doe againe revolt from him and fall. Yea and in the very same place where hee affirmeth that none had perished of them which were given him of the Father, yet he excepteth the sonne of perdition. That is true indeed: but this is also as certaine, that such did never cleave to Christ with that affiance of heart with which I say that the assurednesse of our election is established. They went out from us (saith Iohn) but they were not of us. For if they had beene of us, they had still tarryed with us. Neither doe I deny that they have like signes of calling as the elect have: but I doe not grant that they have that sure stablishment of election which I bid the faithfull to fetch out of the word of the Gospell. Wherefore let not such examples move us, but that we quietly rest upon the promise of the Lord, where he pronounceth, that all they are given to him of the Father, which receive him with true faith, of whom sith hee is their keeper and Pastor, none shall perish. Of Judas wee shall speake hereafter. Paul doth not counsell Christians from assurednesse altogether, but from careless and loose assurednesse of the flesh, which draweth with it pride, presumption, and disdaine of other, and quencheth humility and the reverence of God, and bringeth forgetfulnesse of grace received. For he speaketh to the Gentiles, whom hee teacheth, that they ought not proudly and ungently to reproch the Iewes for this, that the Iewes being disherited, they were set in their stead. Feare also he requireth not wherewith they should bee dismayed and stagger, but with framing us to the receiving of the grace of God, should abate nothing of the affiance thereof, as wee have said in another place. Beside that hee doth not there speake to every man particularly, but to the sects themselves generally. For when the Church was divided into two parts, and envy bred dissention, Paul putteth the Gentiles in minde that they being supplyed into the place of the peculiar and holy people ought to be to them a cause of feare and modesty. And among them there were many puffed up with glory, whose vaine boasting it was profitable to beate downe. But wee have in another place shewed, that our hope is extended to the time to come even beyond death, and that nothing is more contrary to the nature of it, than to doubt what shall become of us.

Calling generall and speciall,

8 That saying of Christ, of many being called but few chosen, is very ill taken after that manner. There shall bee nothing doubtfull if wee hold fast that which ought to be cleare by the things above spoken, that there are two sorts of calling. For there is an universall calling whereby through the outward preaching of the word, God calleth altogether to him, even them also to whom hee setteth it forth unto the savour of death, and unto matter of more grievous condemnation. The other is a speciall calling which for the most part hee vouchsafeth to give onely to the faithfull, when by the inward inlightning of his spirit hee maketh that the word preached is setled in their hearts. Yet sometime hee maketh them also partakers of it whom hee enlightneth but for a time, and afterward by the deserving of their unthankefullnesse forsaketh them, and striketh them with greater blindnesse. Now when the Lord saw the Gospell so bee published farre and wide, and to bee despised of many, but to bee had in due price of few: hee describeth to us God under the person of a King, which preparing a solemne feast sendeth his messengers round about to bid a great multitude to bee his guests, and yet can get but a few, because every one alleageth lets for his excuse, so that at length hee is compelled upon their refusall, to call out of the high waies every one that hee meeteth. Hither to every man seeth that the parable must bee understood of the outward calling. Hee addeth afterward that God doth like a good maker of a feaſt, which goeth about the tables, to cheare his gueſts. If he finde any not clothed with a wedding garment, hee will not ſuffer him with his uncleanneſſe to diſhonour the ſolemnity of the feaſt. This part of the parable, I grant, is to bee underſtood of them which enter into the Church by the profeſſion of faith, but are not cloathed with the ſanctification of Chriſt. Such diſhonours and as it were Botches of his Church, the Lord will not ſuffer for ever, but, as their filthineſſe deſerveth, he will caſt them out. Therefore few are choſen out of a great number of them that are called, but yet not with that calling by which we ſay that the faithfull ought to judge their election. For, that generall calling is alſo common to the wicked: but this ſpeciall calling bringeth with it the ſpirit of regeneration, which is the earneſt and ſeale of the inheritance to come, wherewith our hearts are ſealed up againſt the day of the Lord. In a ſumme, ſith hypocrites boaſt of godlineſſe as well as the true worſhippers of God, Chriſt pronounceth that at length they ſhall be caſt out of the place which they wrongfully poſſeſſe: as it is ſaid in the Pſalme, Lord, who ſhall dwell in thy tabernacle? The innocent in hands, and a man of a pure heart. Againe, in another place. This is the generation of them that ſeeke God, of them that ſeeke the face of the God of Iacob. And ſo doth the Spirit exhort the faithfull to ſufferance, that they take it not grievouſly that the Iſraelites bee mingled with them in the Church: for at length their vizor ſhall bee plucked from them and they ſhall be caſt out with ſhame.

Ephe.1.13. Pſal 15.1. Pſal.24.3.

9 The ſame reaſon is of the exception even now alleadged, where Chriſt ſaith, that none periſhed but the ſonne of perdition. It is indeed an unproper ſpeech, but yet not darke. For he was not accounted among the ſheepe of Chriſt, for that hee was one indeed, but becauſe hee kept the place of one. And wherein another place the Lord affirmeth that hee was choſen with the Apoſtles, that is ſpoken onely in reſpect of the myniſtery. Twelve (ſaith hee) have I choſen, and one of them is a Devill: that is, hee had choſen him to the office of an Apoſtle. But when hee ſpeaketh of chooſing to ſalvation, hee driveth him farre away from the number of the choſen, ſaying: I ſpeake not of all: I know whom I have choſen. If a man doe in both places confound the word of chooſing, hee ſhall miſerably entangle himſelfe: if hee make difference, nothing is more plaine. Therefore Gregory teacheth very ill and peſtilently when hee ſaith that wee know onely our calling, but are uncertaine of our election: whereby he moveth all men to feare and trembling: uſing alſo this reaſon, but becauſe wee know what wee bee to day, but what we ſhall be, we know not. But in that place hee ſufficiently declareth, how hee ſtumbleth at this blocke. For, becauſe he hanged election upon the merits of workes, hee had matter enough, and more to diſcourage the mindes of men: but hee could not ſtrengthen them, which did not remove them from themſelves to the affiance of the goodneſſe of God. Hereof the faithfull have ſome taſte of that which wee have determined at the beginning, that predeſtination if it bee rightly thought upon, bringeth not a ſhaking of faith, but rather the beſt ſtrengthening of it. And yet I deny not, that the holy Ghoſt framed his talke to the ſmall meaſure of our ſenſe. As when hee ſaith, In the ſecret of my people they ſhall not be, and in the roule of my ſervants they ſhall not be written. As though God did begin to write in the booke of life, them whom hee reckoneth in the number of his: whereas yet we know, even by the witneſſe of Chriſt, that the names of the children of God are from the beginning written in the booke of life. But in theſe words onely is expreſſed the caſting away of them which ſeemed the chiefe among the elect: as it is ſaid in the Pſalme. Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and let them not be written with the righteous.

10 But the elect are neither immediately from the wombe, nor all at one time, by calling gathered together into the flocke of Chriſt, but as it pleaſeth God to diſtribute his grace to them. But ere they bee gathered together to that chiefe ſhepheard they are ſcattered abroad and ſtray in the common deſert, and differ nothing from other, ſaving that they be defended by the ſingular mercy of God, from falling into the extreame headlong downe-fall of death. Therefore if you looke upon themſelves, you ſhall ſee the of-ſpring of Adam, which ſavoureth of the common corruption of the whole maſſe. That they bee not carryed into extreame and deſpaired ungodlineſſe godlineſſe, this commeth not to paſſe by any goodneſſe naturally planted in them, but becauſe the eye of God watcheth, and his hand is ſtretched out to their ſalvation. For they that dreame that from their very nativity there is planted in their hearts I wot not what ſeed of election, by the vertue whereof they are alway inclined to godlineſſe and to the feare of God, they both are not holpen to prove it by the authority of Scripture, and alſo are confuted by experience it ſelfe. They doe indeede bring forth a few examples to proove that the elect even before their enlightning, were not utterly ſtrangers from religion: that Paul in his being a Phariſee lived unreproveable, that Cornelius was by almes and prayers accepted of God: and ſuch other. Of Paul, wee grant to them: of Cornelius, we ſay, that they are deceived. For it appeareth that hee was then already enlightned and regenerate, ſo that hee wanted nothing but the cleare revealing of the Goſpell. But what will they wring out by theſe few examples? that all the elect are alway indued with the Spirit of godlineſſe? No more than if a man by ſhewing the uprightneſſe of Ariſtides, Socrates, Zenocrates, Scipio, Curius Camillus, an other, ſhould thereof gather, that all they that are left in blindeneſſe of idolatry, were deſirous followers of holineſſe and honeſty. Yea and the Scripture in more places than one, openly cryeth out againſt them. For, the ſtate which Paul deſcribeth of the Epheſians before their regeneration, ſheweth not one graine of this ſeed. Ye were (ſaith he) dead with defaults and ſinnes, in which ye walked according to the time of this world, according to the prince of the aire, which now worketh in the obſtinate children: among whom wee all alſo were ſometime converſant in the luſts of our fleſh, doing thoſe things that liked our fleſh and minde. And we were by nature the children of wrath, as other alſo were. Againe, remember that yee were ſometime without hope, and lacked God in the world. Againe, Yee were ſometime darkeneſſe: but now yee are light in the Lord, walke as the children of light. But peradventure they will have theſe things to be referred to the ignorance of the true God, wherewith they deny not that the elect are holden, before that they be called. Albeit this were a ſhameleſſe cavilling, ſith he thereof concludeth, that they ought now no more either to lie or to ſteale: yet what will they anſwer to other places? as is that place to the Corinthians, where when hee had pronounced that neither whooremongers, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor weakelings, nor buggerers, nor theeves, nor covetous men, ſhall bee heires of the kingdome of God: he by and by addeth that they were wrapped in the ſame hainous offences before that they knew Chriſt: but now that they are both waſhed by his bloud and made free by his ſpirit. Againe another place to the Romans: As yee have given your members ſervants to uncleanneſſe, and to iniquity to commit iniquity, now yeeld them in bondage to righteouſneſſe. For what fruit had you of theſe things in which ye are now worthily aſhamed, &c.

In men before God call them, there is no bud of righteouſneſſe termed by ſome the ſeed of election.

11 What manner of ſeed of election, I pray you, did then bud in them, which being manifoldly defiled in all their life, as it were with deſperate wickedneſſe, wallowed in the moſt abhominable and accurſed ſinne of all? If he would have ſpoken after their opinion, he ſhould have ſhewed how much they were bound to the bountifulneſſe of God, by which they had beene preſerved from ſliding into ſo great filthineſſe. So Peter alſo ſhould have exhorted his to thankefulneſſe for the perpetuall ſeede of election. But hee contrariwiſe putteth them in minde that the time paſt ſufficed to make an end of the luſts of the Gentiles. What if wee come to examples? what bud of righteouſneſſe was there in Rahab the harlot before faith? in Manaſſes, when Hieruſalem was dipped and in a manner drowned in the bloud of the Prophets? in the Theefe, which among his laſt gaſpings beganne to thinke of repentance? Away therefore with theſe arguments, which ſilly curious men doe raſhly deviſe to themſelves without the Scripture. But let that abide certaine with us, which the Scripture hath, that all have ſtraied like loſt ſheepe, every one hath ſwarved into his owne way, that is perdition. Out of this gulfe of perdition; whom the Lord hath determined once to plucke forth, them hee deferreth till his fit time: onely he preſerveth them, that they fall not unto unpardonable blaſphemy.

12 As the Lord by the effectuallneſſe of his calling toward the elect maketh perfect ſect the ſalvation, whereunto he had by eternall counſell appointed them: ſo hee hath his judgements againſt the reprobate, whereby hee executeth his counſell of them. Whom therefore hee hath created unto the ſhame of life, and deſtruction of death, that they ſhould bee inſtruments of his wrath, and examples of his ſeverity: from them, that they may come to their end, ſometime he taketh away the power to heare his word, and ſometime by the preaching of it hee more blindeth and amazeth them. Of the firſt manner, whereas there bee innumerable examples, let us chuſe out one more cleere and notable than all the reſt. There paſſed away about foure thouſand yeares before Chriſt, in which hee hid from all the Gentiles the light of his health bringing doctrine. If any man anſwer that hee therefore made them not to enjoy ſo great a benefit becauſe hee deemed them unworthy, they which come after ſhall not bee proved any more worthy. Of which thing, beſide the experience, Malachi is a ſubſtantiall witneſſe, which reproving Infidelity mingled with groſſe blaſphemies, yet declareth that there ſhall come a Redeemer. Why therefore is he rather given to theſe than to thoſe? Hee ſhall trouble himſelfe in vaine, that ſhall here ſearch for a cauſe higher than the ſecret and unſearchable councell of God. Neither is it to be feared leaſt any ſcholler of Porphyrie, ſhould freely gnaw at the righteouſneſſe of God while we anſwer nothing in defence of it. For when we ſay that none periſh undeſerving, and that it is of the free bountifullneſſe of God that ſome bee delivered, there is largely enough ſaid for the ſetting forth of his glory, ſo that it needeth not our ſhifting. The ſoveraigne judge therefore maketh a way for his predeſtination, when whom hee hath once rejected, them being deprived of the communicating of his light hee leaveth in blindeneſſe. Of the other manner there are both daily examples, and alſo many contained in the Scripture. One ſelfeſame preaching is commonly made to a hundred, twenty receive it with ready obedience of faith: the reſt doe either ſet naught by it, or ſcorne it, or hiſſe it out, or abhorre it. If any man anſwer that this diverſity proceedeth of their malice and perverſeneſſe, hee ſhall not yet ſatisfie us: becauſe the others wit alſo ſhould bee poſſeſſed with the ſame malice, unleſſe God did amend it with his goodneſſe. Therefore wee ſhall ſtill bee encombred, unleſſe wee call to minde that which Paul ſaith, Who maketh thee to differ? Whereby he ſignifieth that ſome excell otherſome, not by their owne vertue, but by the only grace of God.

The meanes whereby reprobates come to their ends: ſome debarred of the power of hearing the word ſome by the light thereof blinded.

Mal.4.1.

1 Cor.4.7.

13 Why therefore doth he in granting grace to thoſe paſſe over theſe? Of thoſe Luke ſheweth a cauſe, Becauſe they are ordained to life. Of theſe, what ſhall wee thinke, but becauſe they are the veſſels of wrath unto diſhonour? Wherefore let it not greeve us to ſay with Auguſtine. God (ſaith he) might turne the will of the evill into good, becauſe he is almighty. He might indeed. Why therefore doth he not? becauſe he would not. Why hee would not, is in himſelfe. For wee ought to be no more wiſe than we ought to bee. And that is much better, than to ſhift with Chriſoſtome, and ſay that hee draweth him that is willing and reacheth his hand, that the difference may not ſeeme to ſtand in the judgement of God, but in the onely will of men. Truly it ſo ſtandeth not in proper motion of man, that even the godly and they that feare God have neede of a ſingular inſtruction of the ſpirit. Lydia the Purple ſeller feared God, and yet it behooved that her heart ſhould be opened, that ſhe might hearken to the doctrine of Paul, and profit in it. This is ſpoken of one woman alone, but that wee ſhould know that the profiting of every man in godlineſſe is the ſecret worke of the ſpirit. This verily cannot be brought in queſtion, that the Lord ſendeth his word to many, whoſe blindneſſe he will have to be more inforce. For, to what purpoſe doth he bid ſo many commandements to bee carryed to Pharao? was it becauſe he hoped that with often repeated meſſages he would be appeaſed? No, but before he began, he foreknew and foretold the end. Goe (ſaid hee to Moſes) and declare to him my will: but I will harden his heart, that he obey not. So when he ſtirreth up Ezechiell: he warneth him aforehand that he ſendeth them to a rebellious and ſtubborne people: to the end that he ſhould not be a fraid if he perceive himſelfe to ſing to deafe men. So he foretelleth to Ieremy, that his doctrine ſhould become a fire, to deſtroy and waſte the people like ſtubble. But the prophecy of Eſay yet more enforceth it. For he is thus ſent of the Lord

The difference betweene one ſort and another hangeth upon the ſecret counſell & will of God, wherefore there is no higher cauſe than his will.

Ier.1.10. Eſay.6.9.

Lord: Goe and say to the children of Israel: With hearing ye heare, and understand not: With seeing ye see, and know not. Make obstinate the heart of this people and make heavie their eares, and over plaister their eies, least peradventure they may see with their eies, and heare with their eares, and understand with their heart, that being turned they may be healed. Behold, hee directeth his voyce to them, but that they wax more deafe: he lighteth a light, but that they may be made more blinde: hee sheweth forth doctrine, but that they may bee made more dull: hee layeth to them a remedy, but not that they may bee healed. And Iohn alleadging this prophecie, affirmeth that the Iewes could not beleeve the doctrine of Christ, because this curse of God lay upon them. Neither can this also bee in controversie, that whom God will not have to bee enlightened, to them hee delivered his doctrine wrapped up in darke speeches, that they may nothing profit thereby but to be thrust into greater dulnesse. Christ also testifieth, that hee doth therefore expound onely to the Apostles the parables in which he had spoken to the multitude, because to them it was given to know the mysteries of the kingdome of God, but to the common people not so. What meaneth the Lord (wilt thou say) in teaching them, of whom he provideth that he may not be understood? Consider whence is the fault, and thou wilt cease to aske. For in the word how great darkenesse soever there be, yet there is alway light enough to convince the conscience of the wicked.

Mat.13.11.

The unchangeable decree of God concerning the destruction of the wicked is the ground of their untoward disposition to the meanes whereby men are saved.

14 Now remaineth for us to see, why the Lord doth that, which it is plaine that he doth. If it bee answered that it is so done because men have so deserved by their ungodlinesse, wickednesse, and unthankefullnesse: the same shall indeed be well and truly said: But because there appeareth not yet the reason of this diversity, why then some are bowed to obedience, othersome continue hardned, in searching it, we must needes goe to that which Paul hath noted out of Moses, namely that God hath raised them up from the beginning, that hee might shew his name in the whole earth. Whereas therefore the reprobate doe not obey the word of God opened unto them, that shall be well imputed to the malice and perversenesse of their heart, so that this bee therewithall added, that they are therefore given into this perverseneſſe, because by the righteous, but yet unsearchable judgement of God they are raised up to set forth his glory with their damnation. Likewise when it is said of the sons of Heli, that they harkened not to wholesome warnings, because the Lord willed to kill them: it is not denyed that their stubbornnesse proceeded of their owne naughtinesse: but it is therewithall touched why they were left in stubbornnesse, when the Lord might have softned their hearts, namely because his unchangeable decree had once appointed them to destruction. To the same purpose serveth that saying of Iohn, When hee had done so great signes, no man beleeved in him: that the word of Esay might be fullfilled, Lord, who hath beleeved our saying? For though he doe not excuse the stiffenecked from blame, yet hee is content with that reason, that the grace of God is unsavoury to men, till the holy Ghost bring taste. And Christ alledging the prophecie of Esay: They shall all be taught of God, tendeth to no other end but to prove that the Iewes are reprobate and strangers from the Church, because they are unapt to learne: and hee bringeth no other cause thereof, but for that the promise of God doth not pertaine to them. Which thing this saying of Paul confirmeth, that Christ which to the Iewes is an offence, and to the Gentiles foolishnesse, is to the Called the strength and wisdome of God. For when hee hath told what commonly happeneth so oft as the Gospell is preached, namely that some it maketh more obstinate, and of some it is despised, hee saith that it is had in price of them onely which are called. Hee had indeed a little before named them beleevers, but he meant not to take away the due degree from the grace of God which goeth before faith, but rather hee addeth this second saying by way of correction, that they which had embraced the Gospell should give the praise of their faith to the calling of God: As also a little after hee teacheth that they are chosen of God. When the ungodly heare these things, they cry out that God with inordinate power abuseth his poore creatures for a sport to his cruelty. But wee which know that all men are so many waies endangered to the judgement seate of God, that being asked of a thousand things they can not satisfie in in one, doe confeſſe that the reprobate ſuffer nothing which agreeth not with the moſt juſt judgement of God. Whereas we doe not clearely attaine the reaſon thereof, let us not be diſcontent to be ignorant of ſomewhat, where the wiſedome of God lifteth up it ſelfe into ſo great height.

15 But for aſmuch as there are a few places of Scripture wont to be objected, in which God ſeemeth to denie that it is done by his ordinance that the wicked doe periſh, but by this that, he crying out againſt it, they wilfully bring death upon themſelves: let us briefely declaring theſe places, ſhew that they make nothing againſt the ſentence above ſet. There is brought forth a place of Ezechiel, that God will not the death of a ſinner, but rather that hee may be turned and live. If they will extend this to all mankinde: why doth hee not move many to Repentance, whoſe mindes are more pliable to obedience, than theirs which at his dayly allurements waxe harder and harder? With the Sodomites (as Chriſt witneſſeth) the preaching of the Goſpell and Miracles would have brought forth more fruite than in Iurie. How commeth it to paſſe therefore, if God will all to be ſaved, that hee openeth not the gate of Repentance to thoſe miſerable men that would have beene more readie to receive grace? Hereby wee ſee that the place is violently wreſted, if the will of God, whereof the Prophet maketh mention, be ſet againſt his eternall counſell, whereby hee hath ſevered the elect from the reprobate. Now if we ſeeke for the true naturall meaning of the Prophet: his purpoſe is to bring hope of pardon to the penitent. And this is the ſumme, that it is not to be doubted but that God is readie to forgive ſo ſoone as the ſinner turneth. Therefore he willeth not his death, in ſo much as he willeth his repentance. But experience teacheth that hee ſo willeth them to repent whom hee generally calleth to him, that yet he toucheth not all their harts. Yet is it not therefore to be ſaid that hee dealeth deceitfully, becauſe although the outward voyce doe but make them unexcuſable which heare and doe not obey it, yet it is truly accounted the teſtimonie of the grace of God, by which teſtimonie hee reconcileth men to himſelfe. Therefore let us hold this for the meaning of the Prophet, that the death of a ſinner pleaſeth not God: that the godly may have affiance, that ſo ſoone as they ſhall be touched with Repentance, there is pardon readie for them with God, and the wicked may feele that their fault is doubled, becauſe they anſwere not to ſo great mercifull kindneſſe and gentleneſſe of God. The mercie of God therefore will alway meete Repentance, but to whom Repentance is given, both all the Prophets, and Apoſtles, and Ezechiel himſelfe doe plainly teach. Secondly, there is alleadged a place of Paul, where he ſaith, that God willeth all men to be ſaved, which although it have a divers meaning from the other, yet in ſome thing they agree together. I anſwer, firſt, that by the reſt of the text it is made plaine how hee willeth. For Paul coupleth together, that hee willeth them to be ſaved, and to come to the acknowledging of the truth. If they will have this to be determined, by the eternall counſell of God that they receive the doctrine of ſalvation, what meaneth that ſaying of Moſes, What nation is ſo noble, that God commeth neere to it as hee doeth to thee? How came it to paſſe that God reſtrained from many peoples the light of the Goſpell, which other enjoyed? How came it to paſſe that the pure knowledge of godlineſſe never came to ſome, and ſome ſcarcely taſted ſo much as any darke principles of it? Hereof it ſhall now be eaſie to gather, whereto Paul tendeth. He had commanded Timothie to make ſolemne prayers in the Church for Kings and Princes. But when it ſeemed ſomewhat an abſurditie that prayers ſhould be made to God for a kinde of men in a manner deſperate (becauſe they were not onely ſtrangers from the bodie of Chriſt, but alſo endevoured with all their forces to oppreſſe his kingdome) he added, that the ſame is acceptable to God, which willeth all men to be ſaved. Whereby verily hee ſignifieth nothing elſe but that he hath ſtopped up the way to ſalvation to no degree of men: but rather that hee hath ſo powred out his mercie that hee willeth no man to be voide of it. The other ſentences doe not declare what God hath by his ſecret judgement determined of all men: but doe ſhew that there is pardon readie for all ſinners which doe onely turne themſelves to require it. For if they more ſtiffely ſtand upon this, that it is ſaid that hee will have mercie upon all, I will on the contrarie ſide anſwer them with that which is written in another place. That our God is in heaven where he doth whatſoever he will. This word therefore muſt ſo be expounded that it may agree with the other, I will have mercie upon whom I will have mercie, and I will ſhew mercie to whom I will ſhew mercie. Hee that choſeth out them whom he will have mercy on, doth not give it to all. But ſith it clearely appeareth that in that place is ſpoken not of all particular men, but of degrees of men, we will make no longer diſputing about it. Howbeit it is alſo to be noted, that Paul doth not affirme what God doth alway and every where and in all men: but leaveth it to him at his liberty at length to make kings and mageſtrates partakers of the heavenly doctrine, although by reaſon of there blindneſſe they doe now rage againſt it. They ſeeme to preſſe us more ſtrongly with objecting the place of Peter, that God willeth none to periſh, but receiveth all to repentance. But the undoing of this knot doth by and by offer it ſelfe in the ſecond word, becauſe the will to receive cannot be underſtanded to be any other than that which is every where taught. Truly the turning is in the hand of God: whether he wilt turne all or no, let himſelfe be asked, when hee promiſeth that he will give to a certaine few men a fleſhly heart, leaving to otherſome a ſtony heart. It is true indeed, that unleſſe he were ready to receive them which call upon his mercie, this ſaying ſhould be falſe. Turne to me, and I will turne to you. But I ſay that none of all mortall men doth come to God but he that is prevented of God: And if repentance were in the will of man, Paul would not ſay, If peradventure he give them repentance. Yea unleſſe the ſame God which with word exhorteth all men to repentance, did with ſecret moving of his ſpirit bring the choſen to it: Jeremy would not ſay, Turne me, Lord, and I ſhall be turned: for when thou haſt turned me, I have repented.

No repugnancie betweene the promiſe of ſalvation offered universally unto all and the purpoſe of God concerning the condemnation of ſome.

16 But (thou wilt ſay) if it be ſo, there ſhall be ſmall truth in the promiſes of the Goſpel, which when they teſtifie of the will of God, affirme that he willeth that which is againſt his inviolable decree. Not ſo. For howſoever the promiſes of ſalvation be univerſall, yet they nothing diſagree with the predeſtination of the reprobate, ſo that wee direct our mindes to the effect of them. We know that then and not till then the promiſes are effectuall to us, when we receive them by Faith, on the other ſide when Faith is made voide, the promiſe is therewithall aboliſhed. If this be the nature of them, let us then ſee whether theſe things diſagree together: that it is ſaid that God hath from eternitie ordained whom he will embrace with love, and upon whom he will exerciſe wrath: and that he promiſeth ſalvation to all without difference. Truly I ſay that they agree verie well. For in ſo promiſing he meaneth nothing elſe than that his mercie is ſet open for all which doe covet and crave it: which thing none doe but they whom hee hath enlightned. And them hee enlightneth, whom he hath predeſtinate to ſalvation. They (I ſay) have the truth of the promiſes ſure and unſhaken, ſo as it cannot be ſaid that there is any diſagreement betweene the eternall election of God, and the teſtimonie of his grace which hee offereth to the Faithfull. But why nameth he all? verily that the conſciences of the godly may the more ſafely reſt, when they underſtand that there is no difference of ſinners, ſo that Faith be preſent: and that the wicked may not cavill for their excuſe, that they want a ſanctuarie whereunto they may withdraw themſelves from the bondage of ſinne, when with their owne unthankfulneſſe they refuſe it being offered them. Therefore when the mercy of God is by the Goſpell offered to both ſorts, it is Faith, that it is to ſay, the enlightning of God, which maketh difference betweene the godly and ungodly, ſo as the one ſort feeleth the effectualneſſe of the Goſpell, and the other ſort obtaine no fruit thereof. The enlightning it ſelfe alſo hath the eternall election of God for the rule thereof. The complaint of Chriſt, which they alleadge, Jeruſalem, Jeruſalem, how oft have I willed to gather together their chickens, but thou wouldeſt not? maketh nothing for them. I grant that Chriſt there ſpeaketh not onely in the perſon of man, but alſo reprocheth them that in all ages they have refuſed his grace. But we muſt define that will of God which is entreated of. For neither is it unknowne, how diligently God endevoured to keepe ſtill that people, and with how great ſtiffeneſſe they even from the firſt to the laſt being given to their wandring deſires refuſed to be gathered together: but it followeth not therof that the counſel of God was made void by the malice of men

Mat. 23. 37.

They

They anſwer and ſay that nothing leſſe agreeth with the nature of God than to have a double will in him. Which I grant to them, ſo that they fitly expound it. But why doe they not conſider ſo many teſtimonies, where God putting upon him the affections of man, deſcendeth beneath his owne majeſtie? He ſaith that he hath with ſtretched out armes called the rebellious people, that he hath early and late travailed to bring them backe to him. If they will apply all theſe things to God, and not conſider the figure, there ſhall ariſe many ſuperfluous contentions, which this one ſolution bringeth to agreement, that the property of man is figuratively applied to God. How be it the ſolution which we have brought in another place largely ſufficeth, that although the will of God be, as to our ſenſe manifold: yet he doth not in himſelfe diverſly will this and that, but according to this wiſedome, which is diverſly manifold (as Paul calleth it) he amaſeth our ſenſes, till it ſhall be given us to know that he marveilouſly willeth that which now ſeemeth to be againſt his will. They alſo mocke with cavillations, that ſith God is the Father of all, it is unrighteous that he ſhould diſherit any that hath not before with his owne fault deſerved this puniſhment. As though the liberality of God ſtretcheth not even to hogges and dogges. But if they ſpeake onely of mankind, let them anſwer why God bound himſelfe to one people, to be the Father thereof: and why alſo out of the ſame people he picked a ſmall number as it were a floure. But their owne luſt of evill ſpeaking hindereth theſe railers that they conſider not that God ſo bringeth forth his Sunne to ſhine upon the good and evill, that the inheritance is laid up for a few, to whom it ſhall one day be ſaid: Come ye bleſſed of my Father, poſſeſſe the kingdome, &c. They object alſo that God hateth none of theſe things that he hath made. Which although I grant them, yet this remaineth ſafe which I teach, that the reprobate are hatefull to God, and that very rightfully, becauſe they being deſtitute of his Spirit can bring forth nothing but cauſe of curſe. They ſay further, that there is no difference of the Jew and the Gentile, and therfore that the grace of God is without difference ſet before all men: namely, if they grant (as Paul determineth) that God calleth as well out of the Jewes as out of the Gentiles, according to his good pleaſure, ſo that he is bound to no man. After this manner alſo is that wiped away which they object in another place, that God hath encloſed all things under ſinne, that hee may have mercy upon all: namely becauſe he will that the ſalvation of all them that are ſaved be aſcribed to his mercy, although this benefit be not common to all. Now when many things are alleaged on both parts, let this be our concluſion, to tremble with Paul at ſo great depth, and if wanton tongues ſhall be buſie, that we be not aſhamed of this his crying out: O man, what art thou that ſtriveſt with God? For Auguſtine truly affirmeth that they doe perverſly which meaſure the righteouſneſſe of God by the meaſure of the righteouſneſſe of man.

THE XXV. CHAPTER.

Of the laſt Reſurrection.

The uſe and neceſſitie of meditating continually upon the reſurrection of the dead.

ALthough Chriſt the ſonne of righteouſneſſe, having overcome death, ſhining by the Goſpell, giveth us the light of life (as Paul witneſſeth) whereby alſo it is ſaid that by beleeving wee have paſſed from death into life, being now not forreiners and ſtrangers, but citizens with the ſaints, and of the houſhold of God, which hath made us to ſit with the onely begotten ſonne himſelfe in heavenly places, that nothing may be wanting to perfect felicitie: yet leaſt it ſhould be grievous unto us to be exerciſed under this hard warfare, as though we had no fruit of the victory which Chriſt hath gotten, we muſt hold faſt that which is in another place taught of the nature of hope. For, becauſe we hope for thoſe things which appeare not, and (as it is ſaid in another place) faith is a demonſtration of things inviſible: ſo long as wee are incloſed in the priſon of the fleſh, wee are wayfaring from the Lord. For which reaſon the ſame Paul ſaith in another place that wee are dead, and that our life is hidden with Chriſt in God, and that when hee which is our life, ſhall appeare, then ſhall we alſo appeare with him in glory. This therefore is our condition, that with living ſoberly and juſtly and godly in this world, wee looke for the bleſſed hope, and the comming of the glory of the great God, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Heere we neede a singular patience, that we be not wearied and either turne backe our course or forsake our standing. Therefore whatsoever hath beene hitherto set out concerning our salvation, requireth mindes lifted up to heaven, that we may love Christ whom we have not seene and beleeving in him may rejoyce with unspeakable and glorious joyfulnesse till we receive the end of our faith, as Peter telleth us. After which manner, Paul saith that the faith and charitie of the godly hath respect to the hope which is laid up in heaven. When wee thus with our eies fastned upon Christ doe hang of heaven, and nothing withhold them in earth from carrying us to the promised blessednesse: then is that truly fulfilled, Our heart is where our treasure is. Hereupon commeth, that faith is so rare in the world, because nothing is more hard to our dulnesse than through innumerable steps to climbe up above them with endevouring forward to the price of our heavenly calling. To the great heape of miseries wherewith wee be almost overwhelmed, are added the mockings of ungodly men, wherewith our simplicitie is rayled at, when voluntarily forsaking the allurements of present good things, wee seeme to follow the blessednesse hidden from us, as it were a fleeing shadow. Finally above and beneath us, before us and behinde us, violent tentations besiege us, to the sustaining of the feare whereof our courages should be farre too weake, unlesse being uncombred of earthly things they were fast bound to the heavenly life, which in seeming is farre from us. Wherefore onely hee hath soundly profited in the Gospell, which is enured to a continuall meditation of the blessed resurrection.

Mat. 7.11.

The felicitie or soveraigne good of man, and the cheerefull travell which he should undertake for the attaining thereunto.

2 Of the soveraigne end of good things, the Philosophers have in old time curiously disputed, and also strived among themselves: yet none except Plato acknowledged the soveraigne good of man to be his conjoyning with God. But what manner of conjoyning that was, he could not perceive so much as with any small taste, and no marvell, sith he had never learned of the holy bond thereof. To us the onely and perfect felicitie is knowne even in this earthly waifaring: but, such as daily more and more enkindleth our hearts with desire of it, till the full injoying may satisfie us. Therefore I said that none receive fruit of the benefits of Christ, but they that lift up their mindes to the resurrection. For, Paul setteth up this marke to the faithfull, toward which he saith that he endevoureth, and forgetteth all things till he come to it. And so much the more cheerefully ought we to travell toward it, least if this world withhold us, we suffer grievous punishment for our slothfulnesse. Wherefore in another place hee marketh the faithfull with this marke, that their conversation is in heaven, from whence also they looke for their Saviour. And that their courages should not faint in this race, hee joyneth all creatures companions with them. For, because every where are seene deformed ruines, hee saith that all things in heaven and earth doe endevour to the renewing. For sith Adam by his fall dissolved the perfect order of nature to the creatures, their bondage is painfull and grievous, whereunto they are subject by reason of the sinne of man, not for that they are indued with any feeling, but for that they naturally covet the perfect estate from which they are fallen. Therefore Paul saith that they grone, and are as in paine of child bearing, that we to whom are given the first fruits of the spirit, may be ashamed to pine away in our corruption, and not at the least to follow the dead elements, which beare paine of anothers sinne. And the more to pricke us forward, hee calleth the last comming of Christ our redemption. It is true indeed that all the parts of our redemption are already fulfilled: But because Christ hath once beene offered for sinnes, hee shall bee seene againe without sinne unto salvation. With what miseries soever we be pressed, let this redemption sustaine us even untill the performance of it.

Rom. 8.19.

Heb. 10.

The doctrine of the resurrection of the flesh weighty and hard: the weight a meane to make us carefull

3 The very weight of the thing it selfe shall whet our endevour. For neither doth Paul without cause affirme that the holy Gospell is voide and deceitfull, unlesse the dead doe rise againe: because our state should be more miserable than the state of all men, namely sith wee lying open to the hatreds and reproches of many: are every houre in danger, yea and are as sheepe appointed to the slaughter: and therefore the authoritie thereof should fall away not onely in one part, but also in the whole sum

which both our adoption and the effect of our ſalvation conteineth. And ſo let us be heedfully bent to the moſt earneſt thing of all, that no continuance of time may make us wearie. For which purpoſe I have deferred to this place that which I had breeflie to intreate of it, that the Readers may learne, when they have received Chriſt the authour of their ſalvation, to riſe up higher, and may know that he is clothed with heavenly immortalitie and glorie, that the whole body may be made like faſhioned to the head, as alſo the holy Ghoſt oftentimes ſetteth forth in his perſon an example of the reſurrection. It is a thing hard to be beleeved, that bodies when they have beene conſumed with rottenneſſe, ſhall at their appointed time riſe up againe. Therefore where many of the Philoſophers have affirmed ſoules to be immortall, the reſurrection of the fleſh hath beene allowed of few: wherein although there was no excuſe, yet we are thereby put in minde, that it is too hard a thing to draw mans ſenſes to beleeve it. That faith may overcome ſo great a ſtop, the Scripture miniſtreth two helps: the one is in the likeneſſe of Chriſt, the other is the almightineſſe of God. Now ſo oft as the reſurrection is thought of, let the image of Chriſt come into our mindes: which in the nature that hee tooke of us, ſo ranne out the race of mortall life, that now having obtained immortalitie, hee is to us a pledge of the reſurrection to come. For in the miſeries wherewith wee are beſieged, wee carrie about his mortifying in our fleſh, that his life may be openly ſhewed in us. And wee may not ſever him from us, neither can wee poſſibly, but that hee muſt be torne in ſunder. Whereupon commeth that argument of Paul, If the dead doe not riſe againe, then neither is Chriſt riſen againe, becauſe verily hee taketh that principle for confeſſed, that Chriſt was not made ſubject to death, nor obtained victorie of death by riſing againe, privatly for himſelfe: but, that that was begun in the head which muſt needs be fulfilled in all the members, according to the degree and order of every one. For it were not right that they ſhould in all points be made equall with him. It is ſaid in the Pſalme. Thou ſhalt not ſuffer thy meeke one to ſee corruption: although a portion of this truſt pertaine to us according to the meaſure of gift, yet the full effect hath not appeared but in Chriſt, which being free from all rotting, hath received againe his bodie whole. Now leſt the fellowſhip of bleſſed reſurrection with Chriſt ſhould be doubtfull to us, that wee may be contented with this pledge, Paul expreſly affirmeth that hee therefore ſitteth in heaven, and ſhall come at the laſt day a Judge, that hee may make our baſe and vile bodie like faſhioned to the glorious bodie. In another place alſo hee teacheth, that God raiſed not up his Sonne from death to the intent to ſhew a token of his power: but to ſtretch out the ſame effectuall force of the ſpirit toward us which are faithfull: whom hee therefore calleth life, while hee liveth in us, becauſe hee was given to this end that he ſhould make alive that which is mortall in us. I knit up in a briefe abridgement thoſe things which might both be more largely handled, and are worthie to be more gorgeouſly ſet out: and yet I truſt that the godly readers ſhall in few words finde matter enough which may ſuffice to edifie their faith. Chriſt therefore is riſen againe, that hee might have us companions of the life to come. Hee was raiſed up of the Father, in ſo much as hee was the head of the Church, from which hee doth in no wiſe ſuffer himſelfe to be plucked away. Hee was raiſed up by the power of the Spirit, which is common to us unto the office of quickening. Finally hee was raiſed up, that hee ſhould be reſurrection and life. But as wee have ſaid that in this mirrour, there is to be ſeene of us a lively image of the reſurrection, ſo let it be to us a ſure ſubſtance to ſtay our minde, ſo that yet we be not lothfull or wearie of long tarrying: becauſe it is not our part to meaſure the ſeaſons of times by our will, but patiently to reſt, till God at his owne fit time repaire his kingdome. To which purpoſe ſeemeth that exhortation of Paul: The firſt fruits is Chriſt: and then they that are Chriſts, every one in his order. But that no queſtion ſhould be moved of the reſurrection of Chriſt, upon which the reſurrection of us all is founded, we ſee by how many and how diverſe meanes he hath made it approved by witneſſe to us. Fine noſed men will laugh at the hiſtorie which the Evangeliſts rehearſe, as at a childiſh mockery. For of what importance ſhall the meſſage bee which fearefull ſilly women bring, and afterward the diſciples confirme,

being in a manner astonished? Why did not Christ rather set up the triumphing ensignes of his victorie in the midst of the temple and the market place? Why came hee not forth terrible into the sight of Pilate? Why doth he not also prove himselfe to the Priests, and to whole Jerusalem that hee is risen up alive againe? As for the witnesses which hee chose, prophane men will scarcely grant them to be sufficient. I answere, that although in these beginnings the weakenesse thereof was contemptible, yet all this was governed by the wonderfull providence of God: that partly the love of Christ and zeale of godlinesse, and partly their owne hardnesse of beliefe should carrie them in hast to the sepulchre which had lately beene dismaied for feare, that they might not onely be seeing witnesses of the thing, but also should heare of the Angels that which they saw with their eyes. How shall we suspect their credit, who thought it to be a table which they had heard of the women, till they were brought to the present sight of the thing it selfe? As for all the people and the Ruler himselfe, after that they had been largely convinced, it is no marvell if as well the sight of Christ, as other signes was not granted them. The sepulchre was sealed up, the watchmen watched it, the third day the bodie was not found. The souldiers corrupted with money scattered a rumor that his disciples had stolen him away: As though they had had power to gather a band together, or had armour, or were practised men to enterprise any such feare. If the souldiers had not courage enough to drive them away, why did they not pursue them, that with the help of the people they might have taken some of them? Pilate therefore with his ring truly sealed the resurrection of Christ: and the watchmen which were set at the sepulchre both in their holding their peace and in their lying, were made publishers of the same resurrection. In the meane time the voyce of Angels sounded, He is risen, hee is not heere. The heavenly glistering plainly shewed that they were not men but Angels. Afterward, if there remained any doubting, Christ himselfe tooke it away. The disciples saw him ofter than once, and also felt his feet and his hands, that their hardnesse of beleeving not a little profited to the strengthening of our faith. Hee disputeth among them of the mysteries of the kingdome of God, and at the last in their sights beholding him, he ascended into heaven. And not onely this sight was shewed to the xj. Apostles, but also he was seene at once of moe than five hundred brethren. Now when he sent the holy Ghost, hee shewed a sure proofe not onely of life, but also of the soveraigne power: as he had said before, It is profitable for you that I goe: otherwise the holy Ghost shall not come. But now Paul was overthrowne by the way, not by the strength of a dead man, but he felt him whom he persecuted to have most high power. To Stephen hee appeared for another end, namely, that with assuredness of life hee might overcome the feare of death. To discredit so many authentike witnesses, is not onely a part of distrustfulnesse, but also of froward and furious stubbornesse.

The infinitie of the power of God confirmeth in the assured certaintie of the resurrection.

4 This which wee have said, that in proving the resurrection our senses must be directed to the infinite power of God, Paul briefely teacheth, that he may make (saith he) our vile bodie like fashioned to the bodie of his brightnesse, according to the working of his power, by which hee may subdue all things to himselfe. Wherefore nothing is more unmeete, than heere to have respect what may naturally be done, where an inestimable miracle is set before us, which with the greatnesse thereof swalloweth up our senses. Yea, Paul by setting forth an example of nature, reproveth their dulnesse which denie the resurrection. Thou foole (saith hee) that which thou sowest is not quickened unlesse it first dye, &c. Hee saith that in seed is seene a forme of the resurrection, because out of rottennesse groweth corne. Neither were it so hard a thing to beleeve, if wee were as heedfull as wee ought to be to the miracles which throughout all the coasts of the world doe offer themselves to our eyes. But let us remember that none is truly perswaded of the resrrrection to come, but hee which being ravished into admiration, giveth to the power of God his glorie. Esay lifted up with this affiance, crieth out, Thy dead shall live, my carcase shall rise againe. Awake ye, and praise, ye dwellers of the dust. In despaired case he lifteth up himselfe to God the author of life, in whose hand are the ends of death, as it is said in the Psalme. Job also being liker to a carrion than to a man, trusting upon the power of God, sticketh not as though though hee were whole and ſound to lift up himſelfe to that day, ſaying, I know that my redeemer liveth: and in the laſt day hee ſhall riſe upon the duſt (namely to ſhew forth his power therein) and I ſhall againe be compaſſed with my skin, and in my fleſh I ſhall ſee God, I ſhall ſee him, and none other. For albeit that ſome doe ſubtlely wreſt theſe places, as though they ought not to be underſtood of the reſurrection, yet they ſtrengthen that which they covet to overthrow: becauſe the holy men in their evils ſeeke comfort from no where elſe than from the likeneſſe of the reſurrection. Which better appeareth by the place of Ezechiel. For when the Jewes beleeved not the promiſe of their returne, and objected that it was no more likely that a way ſhould be made open for them, than that dead men ſhould come out of their grave: there was a viſion ſhewed to the Prophet, a field full of drie bones: thoſe the Lord commanded to take againe fleſh and ſinewes. Although under that figure hee raiſeth up the people to hope of returne: yet the matter of hoping hee gathereth of the reſurrection: as it is to us an exemplar of the deliverances which the faithfull doe feele in this world. So Chriſt when he had raught that the voice of the Goſpell giveth life: becauſe the Jewes received not this, he by and by ſaid further: Marvell not at this, becauſe the houre commeth in which all that are in the graves ſhall heare the voice of the ſonne of God, and ſhall come forth. Therefore after this example of Paul, let us already cheerefully triumph in the middeſt of battels, becauſe he which hath promiſed life to come, is mightie to keepe that which is left with him: and ſo let us glorie that a crowne of righteouſneſſe is laid up for us, which the juſt judge ſhall deliver us. So ſhall it come to paſſe, that whatſoever griefes we ſuffer, they ſhall be to us a ſhewing of the life to come, becauſe it agreeth with the nature of God to render affliction to the wicked which afflict us: but to us which are unjuſtly afflicted, reſt at the appearing of Chriſt with the Angels of his power, in a flame of fire. But that is to be holden which hee addeth by and by afterward, that hee ſhall come that hee may be glorified in his Saints, and be made wonderfull in all them that have beleeved, becauſe the Goſpell hath beene beleeved.

2 Tim. 4.3.

5 But although the mindes of men ought to have beene continually occupied in this ſtudie: yet as though they would of ſet purpoſe deſtroy all remembrance of the reſurrection, they have called death the uttermoſt bond of all things, and the deſtruction of man. For verily Salomon ſpeaketh of the common and received opinion, when hee ſaith that a living dog is better than a dead Lion. And in another place: Who knoweth whether the ſoule of a man goe upward, and the ſoule of a beaſt downeward? But in all ages this brutiſh ſenſeles error hath been common in the world, yea and hath broken into the Church it ſelfe: for the Sadduces have preſumed to profeſſe openly that there is no reſurrection, yea and that ſoules are mortall. But that this groſſe ignorance ſhould not helpe to excuſe any man, the infidels even by very inſtinct of nature have alway had an image of the reſurrection before their eies. For to what purpoſe ſerved that holy and inviolable manner of burying, but to be an earneſt of new life? Neither may it be anſwered that this ſpring of errour: becauſe the religiouſneſſe of buriall was alway in uſe among the holy Fathers, and God willed the ſame manner to remaine among the Gentiles, that an image of the reſurrection ſet before them might awake their drowſineſſe. But although that ceremonie wanted his uſe of profiting, yet it is profitable for us if we wiſely marke the end of it, becauſe it is no ſlender confutation of unbeliefe, that altogether profeſſed that which no man beleeved. But Satan hath not onely aſtoniſhed the ſenſes of men, ſo that they have buried with the bodies the remembrance of the reſurrection, but alſo hath practiſed to corrupt this part of doctrine with divers faigned inventions, that at length it might utterly die. I paſſe over, how in Pauls time Satan began to pinch at it: but in a little after there followed the Millenaries, which limited the raigne of Chriſt to a thouſand yeares. This error is childiſh, that it needeth not or is not worthy of any confutation. Neither doth the Revelation make on their ſide, by which it is certaine that they coloured their error: for as much as in the place where he mentioneth the number of a thouſand, he entreateth not of the eternall bleſſednesſe of the Church, but onely of the divers troubles which were to come upon the Church while it yet travelled in earth. But the whole Scripture crieth out that there ſhall be no end of the bleſſednesſe of the elect, nor of the puniſhment of the reprobate. Now of all things which both are hidden from our sight and doe far passe the capacitie of our minde, either we must fetch the credit out of the certaine oracles of God, or we must utterly cast it away. They which assigne to the children of God a thousand yeares to enjoy the inheritance of the life to come, doe not marke how great a dishonour they doe both to Christ and his kingdome. For if they shall not be clothed with immortalitie: then neither is Christ himselfe, to whose glory they shall be newly fashioned, received into the immortall glorie. If their blessednesse shall have any end: then the kingdome of Christ, upon the stedfastnesse whereof it standeth, endureth but for a time. Finally, either they are most unskilfull of all matter concerning God, or they goe about with crooked maliciousnesse to overthrow the whole grace of God, and power of Christ, the fulfilling whereof is no otherwise perfect, but when sinne being blotted out and death swallowed up, eternall life is fully restored. But very blind men may see how fondly they play the fooles: which feare that they should ascribe to God too great cruelcie if the reprobate be condemned to everlasting paines. The Lord forsooth shall doe wrong, if he denie his kingdome to them which have by their unthankfulnesse made themselves unworthy of it. But (say they) their sinnes endure but for a time. I grant: but the majestie, yea and the righteousnesse of God which they have offended by sinning, is eternall. Worthily therefore the remembrance of iniquitie dieth not: But so the paine exceedeth the measure of the fault. This is a blasphemie not to be suffered, when the majestie of God is so little set by, when the despising thereof is esteemed at no greater value than the destruction of one soule. But let us leave these trifles, least contrary to that which wee have before said, we may seeme to judge their dotages worthy of confutation.

Their errour who have thought that man is utterly extinguished by death and that the soules shall as well be raised againe as the bodies.

6 Beside these, there have beene two other doting errors brought in by men perversly curious. The one sort thought, as though the whole man died, that the soules shall rise againe with the bodies. The other forasmuch as they grant that the soules be immortall spirits, say that they shall be clothed with new bodies: whereby they denie the resurrection of the flesh. Of the first sort, because I have touched somewhat in speaking of the creation of man, it shall be enough for me to warne the readers againe, how beastly an errour it is to make of a spirit fashioned after the image of God, a vanishing blast which doth nothing but quicke the bodie in this fraile life, and to bring the temple of the holy Ghost to nothing. Finally, to spoile that part of us wherein divinenesse chiefly shineth and marks of immortalitie appeare, to spoile it (I say) of this gift: so that the estate of the bodie should be better and more excellent than the estate of the soule. The scripture teacheth far otherwise, which compareth the body to a cottage, out of which it saith that we remove when we die, because it esteemeth us by that part which maketh us differing from bruit beasts. So Peter being nigh to death, saith that the time is come, when hee must lay away his tent. And Paul speaking of the faithfull, after that he hath said: That when our earthly house shall be dissolved, there is a building for us in heaven, adjoyneth that we are waytairing from the Lord so long as we abide in the bodie, but doe desire the presence of God in the absence of the bodie. If the soules doe not overlive the bodies, what is it that hath God present, when it is severed from the bodie? But the Apostle taketh away all doubting, when he teacheth that wee are joyned in fellowship to the spirits of the righteous. By which words hee sheweth, that we are joyned in fellowship to the holie fathers, which even being dead doe keepe the same godlinesse with us, so that wee cannot be the members of Christ unlesse wee grow together with them. Unlesse also the soules being unclothed of the bodies, did keepe still their substance and were able to receive blessed glorie, Christ would not have said to the theefe: This day thou shalt bee with mee in Paradise. Having so cleare testimonies, let us not doubt after the example of Christ when wee are dying, to commend our soules to God, or after the example of Stephen to commit them to Christ to keepe, which not unworthily is called a faithfull shepheard and Bishop of them. To enquire of their meane state, is neither lawfull nor expedient. Many doe much comber themselves with disputing what place they keepe, and whether they doe now enjoy the heavenly glorie or no. But it is folly and rashnes, to search deeplier of unknowne things, than God doth give us leave to know.

When

When the Scripture hath ſaid that Chriſt is preſent with them, and receiveth them into Paradiſe that they may enjoy comfort, on the other ſide that the ſoules of the reprobate doe ſuffer ſuch paines as they have deſerved: it goeth no further. What teacher or Maſter ſhall now open to us that which God hath hidden? Of the place, the queſtion is no leſſe fond and vaine: foraſmuch as wee know that there is not the ſame dimenſion of the Soule which is of the bodie. Whereas the bleſſed gathering together of holie Spirits is called the boſome of Abraham, it is enough for us after this wayfairing to be received of the common father of the Faithfull, that he may communicate with us the fruit of his Faith. In the meane time ſith the Scripture every where biddeth us to hang upon the expectation of Chriſts comming, and deferreth the crowne of glory till then: let us be content with theſe bonds appointed us of God: namely, that the Soules of the godly having ended the labour of their warfare doe goe into a bleſſed reſt, where with happie joyfulneſſe they looke for the enjoying of the promiſed glory: and that ſo all things are holden in ſuſpenſe till Chriſt the redeemer appeare. As for the reprobate, it is no doubt that they have the ſame eſtate which Jude aſſigneth to the divels, to be holden bound with chaines, till they be drawne to the puniſhment whereunto they are condemned. Mat. 5 8. & 16. John 12.32. Jude 1 6.

7 No leſſe monſtrous is their errour which imagine that Soules ſhall not receive againe the ſame bodies wherewith they are now clothed, but ſhall have new and other bodies. And the reaſon of the Manichees was very trifling, that is, that it is not meete that fleſh which is uncleane ſhould riſe againe. As though there were no uncleanneſſe of Soules, which yet they debarred not from the hope of everlaſting life. It was therefore all one as if they ſhould ſay, that that which is infected with the filth of ſinne cannot be cleanſed by God. For I now paſſe over that dotage, that fleſh was naturally uncleane, becauſe it was create of the Divell: Onely I ſhew that whatſoever is now in us unworthy of heaven, it hindereth not the reſurrection. And firſt whereas Paul biddeth the Faithfull to cleanſe themſelves from all defiling of the fleſh and of the Spirit, thereupon followeth the judgement which he in another place pronounceth, that every man ſhall receive by his bodie either good or evill. Wherewith agreeth that which he writeth to the Corinthians, That the life of Jeſus Chriſt may be openly ſhewed in our mortall fleſh. For which reaſon in another place hee doth no leſſe pray that God preſerve the bodies whole unto the day of Chriſt, than the Soules and Spirits. And no marvell, becauſe it were a moſt great abſurditie that the bodies which God hath dedicate to bee temples to himſelfe, ſhould fall away into rottenneſſe without hope of riſing againe. What ſay wee to this, that they are alſo the members of Chriſt? that God commandeth all the parts of them to be ſanctified to himſelfe? that he willeth his name to be praiſed with tongues, pure hands to be lifted up to him, ſacrifices to be offered? What madneſſe is it therfore, that that part to which the heavenly Judge hath vouchſafed to grant ſo great honor, ſhould be brought from a mortall man into duſt without any hope of reſtoring? Likewiſe when Paul exhorteth us to ſuffer with the Lord as well in bodie as in Soule, becauſe both belong to God, verily he ſuffereth not that which he challengeth to God as holy, to be adjudged to eternall rottenneſſe. Neither is there a plainer determination of the Scripture for any thing, than for the riſing againe of this fleſh which we beare. This corruptible (ſaith Paul) muſt put on uncorruption, and this mortall muſt put on immortalitie. If God did make new bodies, where is this changing of qualitie? If it had beene ſaid that we muſt be renued, the doubtfull ſpeech peradventure might have given occaſion to their cavillation. But now when pointing with his finger to the bodies wherewith wee are clothed, he promiſeth to them uncorruption, he plainly enough denieth any new bodies to be made. Yea he could not (ſaith Tertullian) ſpeake more plainly, unleſſe he had holden his owne skin in his hand. And they can by no cavillation eſcape from this, that where in another place he ſaith that Chriſt ſhall be the judge of the world, hee alleadgeth this teſtimonie of Eſay, I live (ſaith the Lord) every knee ſhall bow to me: for as much as he plainly pronounceth that they to whom he ſpeaketh ſhall be ſubject to yeeld an account of their life, which could not agree, if new bodies ſhould be brought before the judgement ſeate. Now in the words of Daniel there is no doubtfulneſſe: And many of them that ſleepe in the earth of duſt, ſhall awake, awake, some to eternall life, and some to reproches and to everlasting contempt: sith hee fetcheth not new matter out of the foure elements to make men, but calleth dead men out of their graves. And this very plaine reason teacheth. For if mortalitie which tooke beginning at the fall of man, be accidentall: then the repairing which Christ brought, pertaineth to the same bodie which began to be mortall. And truly, whereas the Athenians laughed when Paul affirmed the resurrection, thereupon we may gather what manner of resurrection he preached: and that same laughing not smally availeth to strengthen our faith. The saying of Christ also is worthie to be noted. Feare them not which kill the bodie, and cannot kill the soule: but feare him which can throw both the soule and the body into hell fire. For there is no cause to feare, unlesse the body which we now beare be subject to punishment. And no lesse plaine is another saying of the same Christ. The houre commeth, when all they that are in graves, shall heare the voyce of the Sonne of God, and shall come forth: they that have done good, into the resurrection of life: but they that have done evill, into the resurrection of judgement. Shall wee say that soules rest in the graves, that they lying there may heare Christ? and not rather that at his commandement the bodies shall returne into the livelinesse which they had lost? Moreover, if we shall have new bodies given us, where is the like fashioning of the head & the members? Christ rose againe: was it with forging to himselfe a new body? No, but as he had said before, Destroy this temple, and in three dayes I will build it up: he tooke againe the same body which he had before borne mortall. For he had not much profited us, if a new body being put in place, the old body had beene destroyed which was offred up for a sacrifice of satisfactorie cleansing. Wee must also hold fast that fellowship which the Apostle preacheth. That we rise againe, because Christ hath risen againe: for nothing is lesse probable then that our flesh in which we beare about the mortifying of Christ, should be deprived of the resurrection of Christ. Which verily appeared by a notable example, when at the rising againe of Christ many bodies of the Saints came out of the graves. For it cannot be denied that this was a foreshewing, or rather an earnest of the last resurrection which we hope for: such as was before in Enoch and Elias, whom Tertullian calleth New possessors of the resurrection: because they being in bodie and soule delivered from corruption, were received into the keeping of God.

Their errour which have imagined that we ſhall in the day of the reſurrection receive not the ſame bodies which die but others for them.

8 I am ashamed in so cleere a matter to spend so many words: but the readers shall contentedly beare this trouble with me, that no hole may be open for froward and bold wits to deceive the simple. The fleeing spirits with whom I now dispute, bring forth a faigned invention of their owne braine that at the resurrection there shall be a creation of new bodies. What reason moveth them to thinke so, but because it seemeth to them incredible, that a carrion consumed with so long rottennesse should returne into his auncient state? Therefore onely unbeliefe is the mother of this opinion. But us on the other side the Spirit of God ech where in the Scripture exhorteth to hope for the resurrection of the flesh. For this reason baptisme (as Paul witnesseth) is to us a seale of the resurrection to come: and likewise the holie Supper alloureth us to the trust thereof, when we receive with our mouth the signes of spirituall grace. And truly the whole exhortation of Paul, that wee give our members to be weapons unto the obedience of righteousnesse, should be cold unlesse that were joyned which he addeth afterward. Hee that hath raised up Christ from the dead, shall quicken also your mortall bodies. For, what should it profit to applie our feet, hands, eyes, and tongues, unto the service of God, unlesse they were partakers of the fruite and reward? Which thing Paul plainely confirmeth with his owne words, saying: The body not to fornication, but to the Lord: and the Lord to the body. And he that hath raised up Christ, shall also raise us up by his power. More plaine are those words which follow: That our bodies are the temples of the holie Ghost and the members of Christ. In the meane time wee see how hee joyneth the resurrection with chastitie and holinesse, as a little after he saith that the price of redemption pertaineth also to the bodies. Now it were not reasonable that the bodie of Paul, in which hee hath borne the prints of Christ, and in which hee honourablie glorified Christ, should loose the reward of the crowne. Whereupon also came that glorying. Wee looke for the Redeemer from heaven, which shall make our vile bodie like fashioned to the bodie of his brightnesse. And if this be true, that we must by many afflictions enter into the kingdome of God, no reason suffereth to debar the bodies from this entrie which God both exerciseth under the standerd of the crosse, and honoreth with the praise of victorie. Therefore of this matter there arose among the Saints no doubting, but that they hoped to be companions of Christ, which removeth into his owne person all the afflictions wherewith we are proved, to teach that they bring life. Yea and under the law he exercised the holy fathers in this faith with an outward ceremonie. For to what purpose served the usage of burying, as we have already shewed, but that they should know that there is new life prepared for the bodies that are laid up? Heereunto also tended the spices and other signes of immortalitie, wherewith under the law the darknesse of faith was holpen even as it was by the sacrifices. Neither was that manner bred by superstition, forasmuch as we see that the spirit doth no lesse diligently rehearse burials than the chiefe mysteries of faith. And Christ commendeth that worke as a speciall worke, truly for none other reason but because it lifteth up our eies from beholding of the grave which corrupteth and destroyeth all, to the sight of the rewing. Moreover the so diligent observing of the ceremonie which is praised in the fathers, sufficiently proveth that it was to them a rare and pretious helpe of faith. For neither would Abraham have so carefully provided for the burying place of his wife, unlesse there had beene set before his eies a religion and a profit higher than the world, namely that garnishing the dead bodie of his wife with the signes of the resurrection he might confirme both his owne faith and the faith of his household. But a clearer proofe of this thing appeareth in the example of Jacob, which to testifie to his posteritie that the hope of the promised land was not even by death fallen out of his minde, commanded his bones to be carried thither. I beseech you, if he was not to be clothed with a new bodie, should he not have given a fond commandement concerning dust that should be brought to nothing? Wherefore if the authoritie of the Scripture be of any force with us, there can be required of no doctrine either a more cleare or more certaine proofe. For this even children understand by the words of resurrection, and raising up againe. For neither can we call it the resurrection of that which is now first created, neither should that saying of Christ stand fast, Whatsoever the Father hath given me, it shall not perish but I will raise it up in the last day. To the same purpose serveth the word of Sleeping, which pertaineth onely to the bodies. Whereupon also burying places were called Cemeteria, Sleeping places. Now it remaineth that I speake somewhat of the manner of the resurrection. I use this word, because Paul calling it a mysterie, exhorteth us to sobrietie, and bridleth the libertie to dispute like Philosophers freely and subtlely of it. First we must hold, as we have said, that we shall rise againe in the same flesh which we beare, as touching the substance, but the qualitie shall be other. As when the same flesh of Christ which had beene offered for sacrifice, was raised up againe, yet it excelled in other qualities as if it had beene altogether another flesh. Which thing Paul declareth by familiar examples. For as there is all one substance of the flesh of a man, and of a beast, but not all one qualitie: as all stars have like matter, but not like brightnesse: so he teacheth that though we shall keepe still the substance of our bodie, yet there shall be a change, that the state of it may be much more excellent. The bodie therefore, that we may be raised up againe, shall not perish nor vanish away: but putting off corruption, it shall put on uncorruption. But for as much as God hath all the elements ready at his becke, no hardinesse shall hinder him, but that he may command both the earth and waters and fire, to render that which seemeth to be consumed by them. Which also Esay testifieth though not without a figure, where he saith, Behold, the Lord shall goe forth of his place, that he may visit the iniquitie of the earth: and the earth shall discover her bloud, and shall no more hide her dead. But there is to be noted a difference betweene them that have beene dead long before, and those whom that day shall finde alive. For we shall not all sleepe (as Paul saith) but we shall all be changed: that is to say, it shall not be of necessitie that there be a distance of time betweene death and the beginning of the second life: because in a moment of time, and in the twinkling of an eie the sound of the trumpet shall pearce, to raise up the dead uncorruptible, and with a sudden change to fashion

Neither was that manner bred by superstition, forasmuch as we see that the spirit doth no lesse diligently rehearse burials than the chiefe mysteries of faith. And Christ commendeth that worke as a speciall worke, truly for none other reason but because it lifteth up our eies from beholding of the grave which corrupteth and destroyeth all, to the sight of the rewing. Moreover the so diligent observing of the ceremonie which is praised in the fathers, sufficiently proveth that it was to them a rare and pretious helpe of faith. For neither would Abraham have so carefully provided for the burying place of his wife, unlesse there had beene set before his eies a religion and a profit higher than the world, namely that garnishing the dead bodie of his wife with the signes of the resurrection he might confirme both his owne faith and the faith of his household. But a clearer proofe of this thing appeareth in the example of Jacob, which to testifie to his posteritie that the hope of the promised land was not even by death fallen out of his minde, commanded his bones to be carried thither. I beseech you, if he was not to be clothed with a new bodie, should he not have given a fond commandement concerning dust that should be brought to nothing? Wherefore if the authoritie of the Scripture be of any force with us, there can be required of no doctrine either a more cleare or more certaine proofe. For this even children understand by the words of resurrection, and raising up againe. For neither can we call it the resurrection of that which is now first created, neither should that saying of Christ stand fast, Whatsoever the Father hath given me, it shall not perish but I will raise it up in the last day. To the same purpose serveth the word of Sleeping, which pertaineth onely to the bodies. Whereupon also burying places were called Cæmeteria, Sleeping places. Now it remaineth that I speake somewhat of the manner of the resurrection. I use this word, because Paul calling it a mysterie, exhorteth us to sobrietie, and bridleth the libertie to dispute like Philosophers freely and subtlely of it. First we must hold, as we have said, that we shall rise againe in the same flesh which we beare, as touching the substance, but the qualitie shall be other. As when the same flesh of Christ which had beene offered for sacrifice, was raised up againe, yet it excelled in other qualities as if it had beene altogether another flesh. Which thing Paul declareth by familiar examples. For as there is all one substance of the flesh of a man, and of a beast, but not all one qualitie: as all stars have like matter, but not like brightnesse: so he teacheth that though we shall keepe still the substance of our bodie, yet there shall be a change, that the state of it may be much more excellent. The bodie therefore, that we may be raised up againe, shall not perish nor vanish away: but putting off corruption, it shall put on uncorruption. But for as much as God hath all the elements ready at his becke, no hardinesse shall hinder him, but that he may command both the earth and waters and fire, to render that which seemeth to be consumed by them. Which also Esay testifieth though not without a figure, where he saith, Behold, the Lord shall goe forth of his place, that he may visit the iniquitie of the earth: and the earth shall discover her bloud, and shall no more hide her dead. But there is to be noted a difference betweene them that have beene dead long before, and those whom that day shall finde alive. For we shall not all sleepe (as Paul saith) but we shall all be changed: that is to say, it shall not be of necessitie that there be a distance of time betweene death and the beginning of the second life: because in a moment of time, and in the twinkling of an eie the sound of the trumpet shall pearce, to raise up the dead uncorruptible, and with a sudden change to fashion againe the living into the ſame glorie. So in another place hee comforteth the faithfull which muſt die: becauſe they which ſhall then remaine alive ſhall not goe before the dead, but rather they ſhall firſt riſe againe which have ſlept in Chriſt. If any object that ſaying of the Apoſtle, that it is appointed to all mortall men once to die, it is eaſie to anſwere it, with ſaying that when the ſtate of nature is changed, it is a kinde of death, and is fitly ſo called. And therefore theſe things agree well together, that all ſhall be renewed by death when they ſhall put off their mortall bodie: and yet that it is not neceſſarie that there be a ſevering of the bodie and the ſoule where there ſhall bee a ſudden changing.

Heb.9 27.

How it commeth to paſſe that the wicked are to be raiſed from the dead, as well as the juſt and righteous.

John 11.25. Math.25.31.

9 But here ariſeth a harder queſtion: by what right the reſurrection which is the ſingular benefit of Chriſt is common alſo to the wicked and the accurſed of God. We know that all were in Adam condemned to the death. Chriſt came the reſurrection and life. Came he to give life to all mankinde univerſally without choiſe? But what is more againſt reaſon than that, that they ſhould by their obſtinate blindneſſe obtaine that which the godly worſhippers of God doe obtaine onely by faith? Yet this remaineth certaine, that there ſhall be one reſurrection of judgement, and another reſurrection of life, and that Chriſt ſhall come to ſever the Lambes from the goates. I anſwere, that this ought not to ſeeme ſtrange, the likeneſſe whereof we ſee in daily experience. We ſee that in Adam we were deprived of the inheritance of the whole world, & that we are by no leſſe juſt reaſon debarred from common food, than from the eating of the tree of life. Whence then commeth it to paſſe, that God doth not onely make his ſunne to riſe upon the good and evill, but alſo as touching the uſes of this preſent life, his ineſtimable liberalitie continually floweth forth to them with large plentiouſneſſe? Hereby verily we know that thoſe things which properly belong to Chriſt and his members, doe alſo overflow to the wicked, not that it is their rightfull poſſeſſion, but that they may be made the more inexcuſable. So the wicked doe oftentimes finde God beneficiall, by more than meane proofes, yea ſuch as ſometime doe darken all the bleſſings of the godly, but yet doe turne to their greater damnation. If any man object, that the reſurrection is not fitly compared to fading and earthly benefit: here alſo I anſwere that ſo ſoone as they were eſtranged from God the fountaine of life, they deſerved the death of the Divell, whereby they ſhould be utterly deſtroied. Yet by the marvellous counſell of God there was found a meane ſtate that out of life they might live in death. No more abſurditie ought it to ſeeme, if the reſurrection happen to the wicked, which draweth them againſt their wils to the judgement ſeat of Chriſt, whom now they refuſe to heare for their maſter and teacher. For it were a ſmall paine to be conſumed away with death, if they were not to ſuffer puniſhment for their obſtinacie, brought before the Judge, whoſe vengeance they have without end, and meaſure provoked againſt themſelves. But although we muſt hold that which we have ſaid, and which that notable confeſſion of Paul before Felix containeth, that hee looketh for the reſurrection of the righteous, and wicked: yet the Scripture oftentimes ſetteth forth election together with the heavenlie glorie to the onely children of God: Becauſe Chriſt properly came not to the deſtruction, but to the ſalvation of the world. Therefore in the Creede there is made mention of the bleſſed life onely.

Act.24.15.

The incomprehenſible excellencie of that eternall bleſſednes whereof we have here a taſte given us, and looke for the perfect fruition hereafter in the world to come.

Ose.13.14. 1 Cor.15.54. 1 John 3.2.

10 But for as much as the prophecie of death ſwallowed up by victorie, ſhall then and not till then be fulfilled: let us alway have in minde the eternall felicitie, the end of the reſurrection: of the excellencie whereof, if all things were ſpoken which the tongues of men were able to ſpeake, yet ſcarcely the ſmalleſt parcell thereof ſhould be expreſſed. For howſoever we truly heare that the kingdome of God ſhall bee ſtuffed full with brightneſſe, joy, felicitie, and glorie: yet thoſe things that are ſpoken of are moſt far removed from our ſenſe, and remaine as it were wrapped in darke ſpeeches, untill that day come when he himſelfe ſhall give to us his glory to be ſeene face to face. We know (ſaith John) that we are the children of God, but it hath not yet appeared. But when we ſhall be like to him, then we ſhall ſee him ſuch as hee is. Wherefore the Prophets, becauſe they could by no words expreſſe the ſpirituall bleſſedneſſe in it ſelfe, did in a manner groſſely portray it out under bodily things. But for as much as the ferventneſſe of deſire muſt with ſome taſte of that ſweetnes e kindled in us, let us chiefely continue in this thought, that if God doe as a certaine fountaine which cannot be drawen dry, containe in him the fulneſſe of all good things, nothing is beyond him to be coveted of them that tend toward the ſoveraigne good and the full perfection of felicity: as wee are taught in many places. Abraham, I am thy exceeding great reward. With which ſaying accordeth David. The Lord is my portion, the lot hath very well fallen to me. Againe in another place, I ſhall bee ſatisfied with thy countenance, but Peter pronounceth that the faithfull are called to this end, that they may be made partakers of the nature of God. How ſo? becauſe he ſhall be glorified in all his Saints, and ſhall bee made wonderfull in them that have beleeved. If the Lord will impart his glory power, and righteouſneſſe with his elect, yea and will give himſelfe to them to bee enjoyed, and (which is better) will after a certaine manner grow into one with them: let us remember that under this benefit is contained all kinde of felicity. And when we have much profited in this meditation, let us reknowledge that wee yet ſtay beneath at the bottome of the rootes, if the conceiving of our minde bee compared with the highneſſe of this myſtery. Wherefore in this behalfe wee muſt keepe ſobriety, leaſt with how much greater bouldnes wee ſhall fly upon high being unmindfull of our owne ſmall meaſure, ſo much more the brightneſſe of the heavenly glory overwhelme us. We feele alſo how the unmeaſurable greedineſſe to know more than is lawfull, tickleth us: from whence both trifling and hurtfull queſtions doe ſpring from time to time: trifling I call thoſe of which there can no profit be gathered, but this ſecond kinde is worſe, becauſe they which give themſelves to them doe entangle themſelves with pernitious ſpeculations, and therefore I call them hurtfull. That which the Scriptures doe teach, ought to bee out of all doubt with us: namely that as God diverſly diſtributing his gifts to the Saints in this world, doth unequally enlighten them, ſo the meaſure of glory ſhall not be equall in heaven where God ſhall crowne his gifts. For neither doth this belong indifferently to all which Paul ſaith; Yee are my glory and crowne in the day of Chriſt: nor alſo that ſaying [illegible] Chriſt to the Apoſtles: Yee ſhall ſit judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael. [illegible] (which knew that as God enricheth the holy ones with ſpirituall gifts in earth, ſo hee beautifieth them with glory in heaven) doubteth not that there is a peculiar crowne laid up for him according to the rate of his labours. And Chriſt to ſet forth to the Apoſtles the dignitie of the office which they did beare, telleth them that the fruit thereof is laid up for them in heaven. So Daniel alſo ſaith, but the wiſe ſhall ſhine as the brightneſſe of the firmament, and they which juſtifie many, as Starres to the worlds end and forever. And if a man heedefully conſider the Scriptures they doe not onely promiſe eternall life to the faithfull, but alſo ſpeciall reward to every one. Whereupon commeth that ſaying of Paul, The Lord render to him in that day. Which the promiſe of Chriſt confirmeth, Yee ſhall receive a hundred in the eternall life. Finally, as Chriſt beginneth in this world the glory of his body with manifold diverſity of gift, and encreaſeth it by degrees: ſo he ſhall alſo make it perfect in heaven.

11 But as all the godly will receive this with one conſent, becauſe it is ſufficiently teſtified by the word of God: ſo on the other ſide leaving crabbed queſtions, which they ſhall know to bee a hinderance to them, they will not paſſe their appointed bounds. As for my part, I doe not onely privately forbeare ſuperfluous ſearching of unprofitable things, but I alſo thinke that I ought to beware that I doe not with anſwering nowriſh the lightneſſe of other. Men hungry of vaine knowledge doe aske how great ſhall bee the diſtance betweene the Prophets and the Apoſtles. and againe betweene the Apoſtles and the Martyrs: how many degrees Virgins differ from maried folkes: Finally, they leave no corner of heaven unſearched. Then it commeth to their mindes to enquire to what purpoſe ſerveth the repairing of the world, ſith the children of God ſhall neede nothing of all this ſo great and incomparable plenty: but ſhall bee like to the Angels, whoſe not eating is a ſigne of the eternall bleſſedneſſe. but I anſwer, that in the very ſight there ſhall bee ſo great pleaſantneſſe, ſo great ſweetneſſe in the onely knowledge without any uſe, that this felicity ſhall farre paſſe all the helpes wherewith wee bee now holpen. Let us imagine our ſelves to be ſet in the moſt wealthy coaſt of the world, and where wee ſhall want no pleaſure: yet who is there whom his ſickeneſſe doe not ſometime hinder, and not ſuffer to uſe the benefits of God? who is there whoſe courſe his owne intemperance doth not oft breake in ſunder? Whereupon followeth that a cleere injoying and pure from all fault, although there bee no uſe of corruptible life, is the perfection of felicity. Some goe further and aske whether droſſe and other corruptions in mettals, bee not farre from reſtoring and are contrary to it. Which though in ſome reſpects I grant, yet I looke with Paul for are repairing of theſe faults which tooke their beginning at ſinne, toward which repairing they grone and are in travell. Yet they proceede further, and aske what better eſtate is prepared for man, ſith the bleſſing of iſſue ſhall then be at an end. This knot is alſo eaſie to bee looſed. Whereat the Scripture ſo honourably ſetteth out that kinde of bleſſing, that is referred to the increaſes wherewith God continually draweth forward the order of nature to her marke: but in the perfection it is knowne that there is another manner. But ſith the unware are eaſily taken with allurements, and then the maze draweth them in deeplier, and at length when every mans devices pleaſe himſelfe there is no end of ſtriving: therefore let this bee a ſhort way for us, to be contented with the glaſſe and darke ſpeech untill we ſhall ſee face to face. For few of a great multitude care in which way they may goe to heaven: but all doe before their time covet to know what is done their. All being commonly ſluggiſh and ſlow to enter into battailes, doe already paint out to themſelves imagined triumphes.

Rom. 8. 22.

The grievous torments which God hath prepared for the wicked.

Mat. 8. 12. and 22. 13. Marke. 9. 43. Eſay 66. 24. Eſay 30. 33.

12 Now becauſe no diſcription can match the grievouſneſſe of the vengeance of God upon the reprobate, their torments and paines are figured to us by bodily things, namely, by darkeneſſe, weeping, gnaſhing of teeth, unquenchable fire, and a worme endleſſely gnawing the heart. For by ſuch manners of ſpeech it is certaine that the holy Ghoſt meant to trouble all our ſenſes with horrour: as when it is ſaid that there is prepared from eternity a deepe Hell, that the nouriſhments thereof are fire and much wood: that the blaſt of the Lord, as a ſtreame of brimſtone, doth ſet it on fire. As by ſuch things we muſt be holpen after a certaine manner to conceive the miſerable ſtate of the wicked, ſo we ought chiefly to faſten our thought upon this, how wretched a thing it is to bee eſtranged from the fellowſhip of God: and not that onely, but alſo to feele the Majeſty of God ſo bent againſt thee, that thou canſt not eſcape but bee faſt ſtralned of it. For firſt his diſpleaſure is like a moſt violent fire, with touching whereof all things are devoured and ſwallowed up. Then, all creatures ſo ſerve him to execute his judgement, that they to whom the Lord ſhall ſo ſhew his wrath, ſhall feele the heaven, earth, ſea, and beaſts, as it were with cruell indignation enflamed againſt them, and armed to their deſtruction. Wherefore it is no ſmall thing that the Apoſtle pronouncerh, when he ſaith, that the unbeleeving ſhall ſuffer eternall puniſhment by dying from the face of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. And ſo oft as the Prophets doe caſt us in feare with bodily figures, although they ſpeake nothing exceſſively for our dulneſſe, yet they adde foreſhewings of the judgement to come, in the Sunne and Moone, and the whole frame of the world. Wherefore the unhappy conſciences do finde no reſt, from being vexed and toſſed with a terrible whirlewinde, from feeling themſelves to be torne in peeces by God being angerly bent againſt them, from being pearced and launced with deadly ſtings, from trembling at the lightning of God, and being bruiſed with the weight of his hand: ſo that it is much more eaſe to enter into all bottomeleſſe depths and devouring pits, than to ſtand one moment in thoſe terrours. What and how great then is this, to be preſſed with ever laſting and never ceaſing ſiege of him? Of which thing the 90. Pſalme containeth a notable ſentence: that although with onely fight hee ſcatter abroad all mortall men and bring them to naught, yet his worſhippers, how much more fearefull they are in the world, ſo much more he inforceth them and pricketh them forward loaden with the croſſe, untill he be all in all.

THE

which intreateth of the outward meanes or helps, whereby God allureth us into the fellowship of Christ, and holdeth us therein.

THE FIRST CHAPTER.

Of the true Church with which we ought to keepe unity, because it is the mother of all the godly.

THAT by Faith of the Gospell, Christ is become ours, and we be made partakers of the salvation brought by him, and of eternall blessednesse, is already declared in the last booke. But because our rudenesse and slothfulnesse, yea and vanity of wit, doe need outward helps whereby Faith in us may both be ingendred, and grow and increase in proceeding toward the marke whereunto it tendeth: God hath also added them thereby to provide for our weakenesse. And that the Preaching of the Gospell might flourish, he hath left this treasure with the church. Hee hath appointed Pastors and Teachers, by whose mouth hee might teach them that bee his: hee hath furnished them with authority, finally, hee hath left nothing undone that might availe to the holy consent of Faith, and right order. First of all he hath ordained Sacraments, which we feele by experience to be more than profitable helpes to nourish and confirme Faith. For because being inclosed in the prison of our flesh, we doe not yet attaine to the degree of Angels, God applying himselfe to our capacity according to his wonderfull providence, hath appointed a meane whereby wee being farre distant from him might come unto him. Wherefore the order of teaching requireth that now wee intreat of the church, and of the governement, orders and power of it, and then of the Sacraments, and lastly of the civill order: and therewith all that we call away the godly readers from those corruptions wherewith Satan and the Papacy hath depraved all things that God hath appointed for our salvation. I will begin at the church, into whose bosome God will have his children to bee gathered together, not onely that they should by her helpe and ministery bee nourished while they are infants and young children, but also be ruled by her motherly care till they grow to riper age, and at length come to the marke of faith.

The summe of the former Booke, and the drift of this which concerneth the Church.

Ephe. 4. 11.

Mat.10.9. Gal.8.26.

For it is not lawfull that those things bee severed which God hath conjoyned, that to whom hee is a Father, the Church bee also their Mother: and that not onely under the Law, but also since the comming of Christ, as Paul witnesseth, which teacheth that we are the children of the new and heavenly Hierusalem.

The Church invisible which in the Creede wee professe that we beleeve.

2 In the Creede, where we professe that wee beleeve the Church, that is not spoken onely of the visible Church whereof we now intreate, but of all the elect of God, in whose number they are also comprehended that are departed by death. And therefore this word Beleeve is there set, because oftentimes there can no other difference bee noted betweene the children of God, and the ungodly, betweene his peculiar flocke, and savage beasts. For whereas many doe interlace this word, In, that is without probable reason. I grant indeede that it is the more commonly used, and also wanteth not the consenting testimony of antiquity, forasmuch as even the Nicen Creede, as it is reported in the Ecclesiasticall history, addeth the preposition, In. But therewithall wee may marke by the writings of the ancient Fathers, that it was received without controversie to say, that they beleeved the Church and not in the Church. For Augustine, and that ancient writer whatsoever hee was, whose worke remaineth under the name of Cyprian concerning the exposition of the Creede, doe not onely so speake themselves, but also doe expressely note that it should be an unproper manner of speaking if the preposition were adjoyned, and they confirme their opinion with no trifling reason. For wee therefore testifie that we beleeve in God, because upon him as a true speaker our minde reposeth it selfe, and in him our confidence resteth, which could not so conveniently bee spoken to say in the Church no more than it could bee said, I beleeve in the forgivenesse of sinnes, or in the resurrection of the flesh. Therefore although I would not strive about words, yet I had rather follow the propriety of speaking that should bee fittest to expresse the matter, than curiously to seeke for formes of speech whereby the matter may without cause bee darkened. But the end is, that we should know that although the devil attempt all meanes to overthrow the grace of Christ, and though the enemies of God bee carryed with violent rage to the same intent: yet it cannot be extinguished, nor the bloud of Christ be made barren, but that it will bring forth some fruit. And so is both the secret election of God and his inward calling to be considered: because hee alone knoweth who be his, and holdeth them inclosed under a seale as Paul termeth it: saying that they beare his tokens whereby they may bee severally knowne from the reprobate. But because a small and contemptible number lieth hid under a huge multitude, and a few graines of wheate are covered with a heape of Chaffe, to God onely is to be left the knowledge of his Church, the foundation whereof is his secret election. But it is not sufficient to conceive in thought and minde the multitude of the elect, unlesse we thinke upon such an unity of the Church into which we be truely perswaded that we our selves be ingraffed. For unlesse we bee under our head Christ united together with all the rest of his members, there abideth for us no hope of the inheritance to come. It is therefore called Catholike or universall because we cannot finde two or three churches but that Christ must be torne in sunder, which cannot bee done. But all the elect of God are so knit together in Christ, that as they hang upon one head, so they may grow together as it were into one body: cleaving together with such a compacting of joynts as the members of one selfe body: being truely made one, which with one hope, Faith, Charity, with one selfe spirit of God doe live together, being called not onely into one inheritance of eternall life, but also into one partaking of one God and Christ. Wherefore although the sorrowfull desolation that on each side presenteth it selfe in sight, cryeth out that there is nothing left of the church, yet let us know that Christs death is fruitfull, and that God marvellously as it were in secret corners preserveth his church. As it was said to Elias, I have kept to my selfe seven thousand men that have not bowed their knee before Baall.

1 Reg.19.18.

The article of the Creed touching the Church, concerneth of-

3 Albeit this article of the Creede doth in some respect belong to the outward church, that every one of us should hold himselfe in brotherly consent with all the children of God, should yeeld unto the church that authority which it deserveth, finally should so behave himselfe as the sheepe of the flocke, And therefore is adjoyned the communion of Saints. Which parcell, although commonly the old writers doe leave it out, yet is it not to bee neglected: because it very well expresseth the quality of the church: as if it had beene said that the Saints are gathered together into the fellowship of Christ with this condition, that whatsoever benefits God bestoweth upon them, they should continually communicate them one to another. Whereby yet the diversity of graces is not taken away. As we know that the gifts of the holy Ghost are diversly distributed, neither is the order of civill government disturbed, by which it is lawfull for every man privately to enjoy his owne possessions, as it is necessarie, that for preservation of peace among men, they should have among themselves peculiar and divided properties of things. But there is a community affirmed, such as Luke describeth, that of the multitude of the beleevers there was one hart and one soule: and Paul, when hee exhorteth the Ephesians to be one body, one spirit as they be called in one hope. For it is not possible, if they be truely perswaded that God is the common father, and the common head to them all, but that being conjoyned among themselves with brotherly love, they should continually communicate those things that they have. Now it much behooveth us to know what profit thereupon returneth unto us. For wee beleeve the church to this end, that we may bee certainely perswaded that we are the members of it. For by this meane, our salvation resteth upon sure sound stayes, that it, although the whole frame of the world bee shaken, cannot come to ruine and fall downe. First it standeth with Gods election, neither can it vary or faile but together with his eternall providence. Then, it is after a certaine manner joyned with the stedfastnesse of Christ, which will no more suffer his faithfull to bee plucked from him, than his owne members to be rent and torne in peeces. Beside that, we are assured that truth shall alway abide with us, so long as we are holden in the bosome of the church. Last of all, that wee feele that these promises belong to us, there shall bee salvation in Sion, God shall for ever abide in Hierusalem, that it may not at any time be moved. So much can the partaking of the Church doe, that it holdeth us in the fellowship of God. Also in the very word Communion is much comfort: because while it remaineth certaine, that whatsoever the Lord giveth to his and our members, belongeth to us, our hope is by all their good things confirmed. But in such sort to embrace the unity of the church, it is not needefull (as we have already said) to see the Church it selfe with our eies, or feele it with our hands: but rather by this that it consisteth in Faith, we are admonished that we ought no lesse to thinke it to be, when it passeth our understanding, than if it openly appeared. Neither is our Faith therefore the worse, because it conceiveth it unknowne: forasmuch as wee are not herein commanded to discerne the reprobate from the elect (which is the office of God onely, and not ours (but to determine assuredly in our mindes, that all they that by the mercifull kindenesse of God the Father through the effectuall working of the holy Ghost, are come into the partaking of Christ, are severed into the peculiar right and proper possession of Christ: and that, for as much as we bee in the number of those, wee are partakers of so great a grace.

ter a sort the visible Church, whereunto the communion of Saints being added containeth foure speciall haies of faith.

Act. 4 32.
Ephe 4.4

4 But sith it is now our purpose to intreate of the visible Church, let us learne even by this one title of Mother, how much the knowledge thereof is profitable, yea necessary for us: forasmuch as there is no other entrie into life, unlesse she conceive us in her wombe, unlesse shee bring us forth, unlesse shee feede us with her breasts, finally, unlesse shee keepe us under her custody and governance, untill such time as being unclothed of mortall flesh we shall be like unto Angels. For our weakenesse suffereth us not to be dismissed from schoole, till wee have beene schollers throughout the whole course of our life. Beside that out of her bosome there is no forgivenesse of sinnes, and no salvation to be hoped for, as witnesseth Esay and Joel, with whom agreeth Ezechiel when hee declareth that they shall not be in the number of Gods people whom hee putteth away from the heavenly life. As on the contrary side, they are said to write their names among the Citizens of Hierusalem, that turne themselves to the following of true godlinesse. After which manner it is also said in another Psalme: Remember mee Lord in the good will of thy people: visit mee in thy salvation that I may see the benefits of thy elect, that I may bee merry in the mirth of thy people, that I may rejoyce with thy thy inheritance. In which words the fatherly favour of God, and the peculiar testimony of the Spirituall life is restrained to his flocke, so that the departing from the church is alway damnable.

The ministery of the church together with the necessity and use thereof.

5 But let us proceede to prosecute that which properly belongeth to this place. Paul writeth that Christ, that hee might fulfill all things, gave some Apostles, some Prophets, some Evangelists, and some Pastors and Teachers, to the restoring of the holy ones, into the worke of the ministery, unto the edification of the body of Christ untill wee all come into the unity of Faith, and of the acknowledging of the Sonne of God, unto a perfect man, and to the measure of the full growne age of Christ. We see how God, which was able to make them that bee his perfect in a moment, yet will not have them grow into manly age but by the bringing up the Church. Wee see the meane expressed, for that unto the Pastors is enjoyed the preaching of the heavenly doctrine. Wee see how all, not one excepted, are brought into one rule, that they should with milde Spirit and willing to learne, yeeld themselves to the teachers appointed for that use. And by this marke Esay had long before set out the kingdome of Christ, where hee saith: My spirit which is in thee, and the words that I have put in thy mouth shall never depart, neither out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed and thy childrens children. Whereupon followeth that they are worthy to perish with famine and pining hunger, whosoever they bee that refuse the Spirituall meate of the Soule reached unto them of God by the hands of the Church. GOD doth breath Faith into us, but by the instrument of his Gospell, as Paul saith that faith is by hearing. As also with God remaineth his power to save, but (as the same Paul witnesseth) hee uttereth and displaieth the same in the preaching of the Gospell. For this reason in old time hee willed that there should bee made holy assemblies to the sanctuary, that doctrine uttered by the mouth of the Priest should nourish the consent of Faith. And to no other end those glorious titles have respect, where the temple is called the rest of God, and the sanctuarie his house, where hee is said to sit betweene the Cherubines: but to bring estimation, love, reverence and dignity to the ministery of the heavenly doctrine, which otherwise the sight of a mortall and despised man would not a little diminish. Therefore that wee should know, that out of earthen vessels is brought forth unto us inestimable treasure, God himselfe commeth forth, and in as much as hee is the author of this degree, so hee will have himselfe to bee acknowledged present in his institution. Therefore after that he hath forbidden his to give themselves to judgement by flying of birds, to south-sayings, magicall arts, necromancy and other superstitions, hee immediately addeth that hee will give them that which ought to suffice instead of all, that is to say, that they shall never be destitute of Prophets. But like as hee sent not the old people to Angels, but raised up teachers out of the earth, which might truely performe the office of Angels: so at this day also his will is to teach us by men. And as in the old time hee was not content with the onely law, but added Priests for expositers, at whose lips the people should enquire for the true meaning thereof: so at this day he not onely willeth us to be heedefully bent to reading, but also appointeth masters over us, by whose travell wee may bee holpen: whereof commeth double profit. For on the one part by a very good triall it proveth our obedience, when wee here his ministers speaking even as it were himselfe. On the other side it also provideth for our weakenesse, while after the manner of men hee had rather speake unto us by interpreters to allure us unto him, than with thundring drive us away from him. And truely how expedient this familiar manner of teaching is for us, all the godly doe feele by the feare wherewith the majesty of God doth worthily astonish them. But they that thinke that the authority of the doctrine is abased by the contempt of the men that are called to teach, doe bewray their unthankefulnesse, because among so many excellent gifts wherewith God hath garnished mankind: this is a singular prerogative, that he vouchsafeth to consecrate the mouthes and tongues of men to himselfe, that his owne voice should sound in them. Wherefore on our behalfes let us not bee grieved obediently to embrace the doctrine of salvation set forth by his commandement and by his owne mouth: because although the power of God is not bound to outward meanes, yet yet he hath bound us to the ordinary manner of teaching: which while phrentike men refuſe to keepe, they wrap themſelves in many deadly ſnares. Either pride, or diſdainefulneſſe, or envy moveth many to perſwade themſelves that they can ſufficiently profit by their owne private reading and ſtudy, and ſo to deſpiſe publike aſſemblies, and to account preaching ſuperfluous. But ſith they doe as much as in them is, looſe or breake in ſunder the holy bond of unity, no man eſcapeth the due puniſhment of this divorce, but he bewitcheth himſelfe with peſtilent errours and moſt wicked dotages. Wherefore, that the pure ſimplicitie of faith may flouriſh among us, let us not bee grieved to uſe this exerciſe of godlineſſe, which God by his inſtitution hath ſhewed to be neceſſary for us and ſo earneſtly commendeth. But there was never yet found any even of the moſt wanton dogges which would ſay that we ought to ſtop our eares againſt God: But in all ages the Prophets and godly teachers have had a hard ſtrife againſt the wicked, whoſe ſtubborneneſſe can never come under this yoke, to be taught by the mouth of the miniſtery of men. Which is as much as to blot out the face of God which ſhineth to us in doctrine. For in old time time the faithfull were commanded to ſeeke the face of God in the ſanctuary, and the ſame is ſo oft repeated in the law for no other cauſe, but for that the doctrine of the law and the exhortations of the Prophets were to them a lively image of God: as Paul affirmeth that in his preaching ſhineth the glory of God in the face of Chriſt. How much the more deteſtable are the Apoſtates, which greedily ſeeke to divide Churches, as though they did drive ſheepe from their folds and caſts them into the mouthes of wolves. But wee muſt hold that which hee hath alleaged out of Paul, that the Church is no otherwiſe builded but by outward preaching, and that the holy ones are holden together with no other bond but when with learning and profiting with one conſent they keepe the order appointed by God to the Church. To this end principally, as I have ſaid, the faithfull in old time under the law were commanded to reſort to the Sanctuary. Becauſe when Moſes ſpeaketh of the dwelling place of God, hee doth therewithall call it the place of name, where God hath ſet the memory of his name. Whereby hee plainely teacheth that without the doctrine of godlineſſe there is no uſe thereof. And it is not doubtfull but that for the ſame reaſon David with great bitterneſſe of Spirit complaineth that hee is by the tyrannous cruelty of his enemies kept from entring into the Tabernacle. It ſeemeth commonly to many a childiſh lamentation, becauſe it ſhould be but a very ſmall loſſe, and alſo no great pleaſure ſhould be foregone thereby, to want the entry of the temple, ſo that there were enough of other delightfull things. But hee bewaileth that with this one griefe, anguiſh and ſorrow, he is vexed and fretted and in a maner waſted. For nothing is of greater eſtimation with the faithfull, than this helpe whereby God by degrees lifteth up his on high. For this is alſo to be noted, that God in the mirror of his doctrine alway ſo ſhewed himſelfe to the holy Fathers, that the knowledge was ſpirituall. Wherefore the temple is called not onely his face, but alſo (to take away all ſuperſtition) his footeſtoole. And this is that happy meeting into unity of faith, while from the higheſt even to the loweſt all doe aſpire to the head. All the temples that ever the Gentiles upon any other purpoſe builded to God, were but a meere prophaning of his worſhip: whereunto though not with like groſſeneſſe, yet ſomewhat the Iewes fell. Whereof Stephen out of the mouth of Eſay reprocheth them where he ſaith, that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, &c. Becauſe onely God doth by his word ſanctifie to himſelfe temples to the lawfull uſe. And if wee raſhly attempt any thing without his commandement, by and by to an evill beginning doe cleave new deviſes by which the evill is ſpread abroad without meaſure. Yet Xerxes, when by the counſell of the Magitians he burned up or plucked downe all the temples of Greece, undiſcreetely ſaid, that the Gods to whom all things ought to bee freely open, were incloſed within walles and tiles. As though it were not in the power of God, to the intent hee might be neere us, after a certaine manner to deſcend unto us, and yet neither to change place, nor to faſten us to earthly meanes: but rather by certaine chariots to carrie us up to his heavenly glory, which with the immeaſurable greatneſſe thereof filleth all things, yea and in height ſurmounteth the heavens.

the force of Ecclesiasticall ministers.

6 Now forasmuch as at this time there hath beene great strife about the effectualnesse of the ministery, while some excessively amplyfie the dignity thereof: and some other affirme that that which is properly belonging to the holy Ghost is wrongfully given away to mortall man, if wee thinke that ministers and teachers do pearce to the minds and hearts, to amend as well the blindenesse of the mindes as the hardnesse of hearts: it is meete that we give a right determination of this controversie. All that they contend on both parts shall easily bee accorded by expresly noting the places where God the author of preaching joyning his spirit with it promiseth fruit thereof: or againe when severing himselfe from outward helpes hee challengeth to himselfe alone as well the beginning of faith as the whole course thereof. It was the office of the second Elias (as Malachie witnesseth) to enlighten the mindes and to turne the hearts of Fathers to the children, and unbeleevers to the wisdome of the righteous. Christ pronounceth that hee sendeth the Apostles, that they should bring fruit of their labour, But what that fruit is Peter shortly defineth, saying that we bee regenerate with incorruptible seede. And therefore Paul gloryeth that hee by the Gospell begate the Corinthians, and that they were the seale of his Apostleship: yea that hee was not a literall Minister: such as did onely beate the eares with sound of voice, but that there was given him an effectualnesse of Spirit, that his doctrine should not bee unprofitable. In which meaning also in another place hee saith, that his Gospell was not in word onely, but in power. Hee affirmeth also that the Galathians by hearing received the Spirit of Faith. Finally in many places hee maketh himselfe not onely a worker together with GOD, but also assigneth to himselfe the office of giving salvation. Truely hee never brought forth all these things to this intent to give unto himselfe any thing were it never so little severally from God: as in another place he shortly declareth, saying, our labour was not unprofitable in the Lord, according to his power mightily working in mee. Againe in another place, hee that was mighty in Peter toward the circumcision, was also mighty in mee toward the Gentiles. But how hee leaveth nothing severally to the ministers, appeareth by other places. as: hee that planteth is nothing, and he that watereth is nothing, but GOD that giveth the encrease. Againe: I have laboured more than all: not I, but the grace of God that was with mee. And truely wee must hold fast those sayings, where God ascribing to himselfe the enlightning of the minde, and the renewing of the heart teacheth that it is a robbery of GOD if man take upon himselfe any part of either of them, In the meane time if any man offer himselfe to the ministers whom GOD ordaineth, willing to learne, hee shall know by the fruit, that this manner of teaching not in vaine pleased God, and that this yoke of modesty was not in vaine laid upon the faithfull.

The Scripture speaketh both of a visible Church, and of a Church which is invisible

7 But as for the Church visible and which is within the compasse of our knowledge, what judgement is meete to be given thereof, I thinke it already appeareth evidently by that which wee have before said. For wee have said, that the holy Scripture speaketh of the Church after two sorts. Sometime, when it nameth the Church, it meaneth that Church which is indeede before God, into which none are received but they that are both by grace of adoption the children of God, and by sanctification of the Spirit the true members of Christ. And then truely it comprehendeth not onely the holy ones that dwell in earth, but also all the elect that have beene since the beginning of the world. But oftentimes under the name of the Church it signifieth the universall multitude of men scattered abroad in the world, which professe that they worship one God and Christ, by baptisme enter into his faith, by partaking of the supper testifie their unity in true doctrine and charity, have an agreement in the word of the Lord, and for the preaching thereof doe keepe the ministery ordained by Christ. In this church there bee mingled many hypocrites which have nothing of Christ but the name and outward shew: there bee many ambitious, covetous, envious, evill speakers, some of uncleane life: which be suffered for a time, either because they cannot by lawfull order of judgement be convinced, or because there is not alway in ure that severity of discipline that ought to be. Therefore as we must needs beleeve that the church which is invisible to us, is to bee seene with the eyes of God onely

so are we commanded to regard the church which is called a church in respect of men, and to keepe the communion of it. 2 Tim. 2. 19.

8 Therefore so much as behooveth us to know it, the Lord hath set it out by certaine markes and as it were signes unto us. This is indeede the singular prerogative of God himselfe, to know who bee his, as we have already alleaged out of Paul. And truly that the rashnesse of men should not creepe so far, it is provided by the very successe of things daily putting us in minde, how farre his secret judgements doe surmount our understanding. For even they that seemed most desperate, and accounted utterly past hope, are by his goodnesse called backe into the way: and they that seemed to stand fast in comparison of other, do oftentimes fall. Therefore according to the secret predestination of God (as Augustine saith) there bee many sheepe without, and many wolves within. For he knoweth them, and hath them marked that know neither him nor themselves. But of those that openly beare his badge, his onely eies doe see who bee both holy without faigning, and who will continue even to the end, which is the very chiefe point of salvation. Yet on the other side, for as much as he foresaw it to bee some deale expedient, that we should know who were to be accounted his children, hee hath in this part applyed himselfe to our capacity. And because the certainety of faith was not necessary, hee hath put in place thereof a certaine judgement of charity: whereby wee should acknowledge for members of the church those that both with confession of faith and with example of life, and with partaking of Sacraments, doe professe the same God and Christ with us. But as for the knowledge of the body thereof, how much more that he knew it to be necessary for our salvation, with so much the more certaine markes he hath set it out.

Properly, truely and infallibly God alone knoweth who are his.

Hom. in Ioan. 45.

9 Loe hereupon groweth and ariseth unto us, a face of the church visible to our eies. For wheresoever wee see the word of God to bee purely preached and heard, and the sacraments to bee ministred according to the institution of Christ, there it is in no wise to be doubted that there is some church of God: forasmuch as his promise cannot deceive, Wheresoever two or three be gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them. But that wee may evidently understand the summe of this matter, wee must proceede by these as it were by degrees: that is to say, that the universall church is a multitude gathered together out of all nations whatsoever they bee, which being sundered and severally scattered by distances of places, yet doth agree in one truth of godly doctrine, and is bound together with the bond of one selfe religion. And that so under this are comprehended all particular churches, which are in all townes and streetes according to the order of mens necessitie, so that every one of them may rightfully have the name and authority of a church: And that all particular men which by profession of godlinesse are reckoned among such churches, although they bee indeed strangers from the church, yet doe after a certaine manner belong unto it, till by publike judgement they bee vanished out of it. Howbeit there is somewhat a divers manner in judging of private men and of churches. For it may fall in experience, that such men as we shall thinke not to bee altogether worthy of the company of the godly, yet wee must use like brethren and account them among the faithfull, for the common consent of the church, whereby they are suffered and borne with all the body of Christ. We doe not by our testimonie allow such to bee members of the church: but wee leave them the place that they have among the people of God, till it be by orderly right of law taken away from them. But of the very multitude we must otherwise thinke: which if it hath and honoreth the ministery of the word, and the administration of Sacraments, it deserveth without doubt to be esteemed and judged a church: because it is certaine that those things are not without fruit. So we doe also preserve to the universall church her unity, which devillish spirits have alway travelled to cut in sunder: neither doe we defraud of their authority those lawfull assemblies which are disposed according to the fitnesse of places.

One way to know what Church is true, and another who be the true members of the Church.

Mat. 18. 20.

10 Wee have set for signes to discerne the church by, the preaching of the word and the observing of the Sacraments. For those can bee no where but they must bring forth fruit, and bee prospered with the blessing of God. I doe not say, that wheresoever the word is preached, there by and by springeth up fruit: but I say that no where it it is received and hath a ſtayed ſeate, but that it bringeth forth the effectualneſſe thereof. Where the preaching of the Goſpell is reverently heard, and the Sacraments are not neglected, howſoever it be, therefore that time appeareth, not a deceitfull and doubtfull face of the church, whereof no man may unpuniſhed either diſpiſe the authority, or refuſe the admonitions, or reſiſt the counſels, or mocke at the corrections: much leſſe to depart from it, and to breake in ſunder the unity of it, For the Lord ſo highly eſteemeth the Communion of his Church, that hee counteth him for a traiterous run-away and forſaker of Religion, whoſoever ſhall ſtubbornely eſtrange himſelfe from any Chriſtian fellowſhip, ſo that it be ſuch a one as hath a true miniſtery of the Word and Sacraments. He ſo commendeth the churches authority, that when it is violate, he judgeth his owne diminiſhed. Neither is it of ſmall importance, that the church is called the pillar and ſtrong ſtay of truth and the houſe of God. By which words Paul ſignifieth, that to the end the truth of God ſhould not decay in the world, the church is a faithfull keeper thereof: becauſe Gods will was to have the preaching of his word kept pure, and to ſhew himſelfe unto us a father of houſhold by her miniſtery and labour, while ſhe feedeth us with ſpirituall nouriſhments, and procureth all things that make for our ſalvation. It is alſo no ſlender praiſe, that it is ſaid, that ſhee is choſen and ſevered by Chriſt to bee his ſpouſe, that ſhould be without wrinckle and ſpot, the body and fulneſſe of him. Whereupon followeth, that departing from the church is a denying of God and of Chriſt. Therfore ſo much the more wee muſt beware of ſo wicked diſagreement. For while we goe about, ſo much as in us lyeth, to procure the ruine of Gods truth, we are worthy that he ſhould ſend downe his lightning with the whole violent force of his wrath to deſtroy us. Neither can there be imagined any fault more hainous, than with wicked breach of faith to defile the marriage that the onely begotten ſonne of God hath vouchſafed to contract with us.

The face, communion, and reverence of the Church, and how it is termed the pillar of truth.

1 Tim. 3. 15.

Ephe. 5. 27. Ephe. 1. 23.

Satan laboureth either to aboliſh, or to bring in contempt the marks of the true Church, whereupon a double miſchiefe groweth, that either the true Church is diſpiſed, or the falſe reverenced.

11 Wherefore let us diligently keepe theſe markes imprinted in our mindes, and let us eſteeme them according to the Lords will. For there is nothing that Satan more endevoureth, than to take away, and aboliſh the one of theſe, or both ſometime, that when theſe marks are raſed and blotted out, he may take away the true and naturall diſtinction of the church: ſometime that when they are brought in contempt, hee may with open falling away plucke us from the church. By this craft it is brought about that in certaine ages paſt, the pure preaching of the word hath vaniſhed away: and now he doth with as great importunacy travell to overthrow the miniſtery, which yet Chriſt hath ſo ſtabliſhed in the church, that when it is taken away, the edification of the church periſheth. But now, how dangerous, yea how deadly a tentation is it when it doth but come in our mindes to depart from that congregation wherein are ſeene the ſignes and tokens by which the Lord thought his church ſufficien ly deſcribed? We ſee how great heed is to be taken on both ſides. For, that we ſhould not be deceived under the title of the church, every congregation that pretendeth the name of the church muſt be examined by that manner of tryall, as by a touchſtone. If it have in the word and Sacraments the order appointed by the Lord, it will not deceive us: let us boldly yeeld unto it the honour due to churches. But contrariwiſe if it boaſt it ſelfe without the word and Sacraments, we muſt no leſſe with fearefull conſcience beware of ſuch deceits, than on the other ſide we muſt flee raſhneſſe and pride.

Where the ſignes of a true Church are, from that ſociety we may not ſever our ſelves, and ceaſe to have communion, though in doctrine and adminiſtration of Sacraments ther be ſome fault.

12 Whereas wee ſay that the pure miniſtery of the word and pure uſage in celebrating the Sacraments, is a ſufficient pledge and earneſt, ſo that we may ſafely embrace as the church any fellowſhip wherein both theſe ſhall bee: this extendeth ſo far, that it is never to be caſt off, ſo long as it ſhall continue in thoſe although it ſwarme full of many other faults. Yea and there may ſome faultineſſe creepe into it, in the adminiſtration either of doctrine, or of the Sacraments, which ought not to eſtrange us from the communion of it. For all the articles of true doctrine be not of one ſort. Some bee ſo neceſſary to be knowne, that they ought to be certaine and undoubted to all men, as the proper principles of religion: of which ſort are, That there is one God, That Chriſt is God, and the ſonne of God. That our ſalvation conſiſteth in the mercy of God: and ſuch like. There bee other that being in controverſie betweene churches, yet doe not breake the unity of faith. For thoſe churches that diſagree about this one point, it without luſt of contention, without ſtubbornneſſe of affirming, the one thinke thar ſoules when they depart from the bodies doe flee up into heaven, and the other Church dare determine nothing of the place, but yet certainely holdeth that they live to the Lord: the words of the Apoſtle are: Let all us that bee perfect thinke all one thing: but if yee thinke any thing otherwiſe, this the Lord ſhall alſo reveale unto you. Doth he not ſufficiently ſhew that diverſity of opinion about theſe matters, that be not ſo neceſſary, ought to bee no ground of diſagreement among Chriſtians: It is indeed a principall point, that wee agree in all things. But for as much as there is no man that is not wrapped with ſome little cloud of ignorance, either wee muſt leave no Church at all, or wee muſt pardon a being deceived in ſuch things as may bee unknowne without violating the ſumme of religion, and without loſſe of ſalvation. But I meane not here to defend any errors bee they never ſo little, ſo as I would thinke that they ſhould bee cheriſhed with flattering and winking at them: but I ſay that wee ought not raſhly for every light diſſention forſake the Church, in which at leaſt that Doctrine is retained ſafe and uncorrupted, wherein ſtandeth the ſtay of godlineſſe, and the uſe of Sacraments is kept as it was inſtituted by the Lord. In the meane time if wee indevour to amend that which diſpleaſeth us, wee doe therein according to our duty. And hereunto belongeth that ſaying of Paul: If any thing better be revealed to him that ſitteth, let the firſt hold his peace. Whereby it is evident, that all the members of the Church are every one charged with endevour to publicke edification, according to the meaſure of his grace, ſo that it be done comely and according to order: that is, that we neither doe forſake the communion of the Church, nor abiding in it, doe trouble the peace and well ordered diſcipline thereof.

Phil. 3. 19.

1 Cor. 14 30.

13 But in bearing with the imperfection of life, our gentle tenderneſſe ought to goe much further. For herein is a very ſlippery eaſineſſe to fall: and herein with no ſmall deviſes doth Satan lay waite for us. For there have beene alway ſome, which filled with falſe perſwaſion of perfect holineſſe as though they were already made certaine aiery ſpirits, diſpiſed the company of all men, in whom they ſaw remaining any thing of the nature of man. Such in old time were the Cathary, and they that were as mad as they, the Donatiſts, Such at this day are ſome of the Anabaptiſts, which would ſeeme to have profited above the reſt. Some there bee that offend more by an undiſcreet zeale of righteouſneſſe, than by that mad pride. For when they ſee among them to whom the Goſpell is preached, the fruit of life not agreeably anſwering to the doctrine thereof, they by and by judge that there is no Church. It is indeed a moſt juſt diſpleaſure, and ſuch a one whereunto in this moſt miſerable age of the world, we give too much occaſion. Neither may wee excuſe our accurſed ſlothfulneſſe, which the Lord will not ſuffer unpuniſhed: as even already he beginneth with grievous ſcourges to chaſtiſe it. Woe therefore to us, which with ſo diſſolute licentiouſneſſe of wicked doings, make that weake conſciences be wounded by reaſon of us. But in this againe they offend whom I have ſpoken of, becauſe they cannot meaſure their being diſpleaſed. For where the Lord requireth clemencie, they leaving it, doe give themſelves wholy to immeaſurable rigorouſneſſe. For, becauſe they thinke that there is no Church where there is no ſound pureneſſe and uprightneſſe of life, for hatred of ſinnes they depart from the lawfull church, while they thinke that they ſwarve from a company of wicked men. They alleadge that the Church of Chriſt is holie. But that they may alſo underſtand that it is mingled of good and evill men, let them heare this parable out of the mouth of Chriſt, wherein it is compared to a net, in which fiſhes of all kindes are gathered together: and are not choſen out till they be laid abroad upon the ſhoare. Let them heare that it is like unto a corne-field, which being ſowen with good graine, is by the enemies fraud ſcattered with tares, of which it is not cleanſed untill the crop be brought into the barne floore. Finally, let them heare that it is like unto a floore, wherein the wheat is ſo gathered together, that it lieth hidden under the chaffe, till being cleanſed with fan and ſyeve, it bee at length laid up in the garner. If the Lord pronounce that the Church ſhall even to the day of judgement be troubled with this evill, to bee burdened with mingling of evill men: they doe in vaine ſeeke for a Church ſprinkled with no ſpot.

Imperfection in the lives and corruption in the manners of ſome men, muſt not cauſe us to leave the fellowſhip of the Church.

Mat. 3. 12.

Mat. 13. 23.

14 For

The ſtate of the church of Corinth in the Apoſtles owne times.

14 For they cry out that it is an intolerable thing, that the peſtilence of vices ſo rangeth abroad. What if the ſaying of the Apoſtle doe here alſo anſwer them? Among the Corinthians not onely a few had gone out of the way, but the inſtinction had in a manner poſſeſſed the whole body: There was not onely one kinde of ſinne, but many: neither were they light offences, but certaine horrible outragious doings: it was not onely corruption of manners, but alſo of doctrine. What in this caſe ſaith the holy Apoſtle, that is to ſay, the inſtrument of the holy Ghoſt, by whoſe teſtimony the church ſtandeth and falleth? Doth he require a diviſion from them? Doth hee baniſh them out of the kingdome of Chriſt? Doth hee ſtrike them with the extreameſt thunderbolt of curſe; Hee not onely doth none of all theſe things: but he both acknowledgeth and reporteth it a church of Chriſt and fellowſhip of Saints. If there remaine a church among the corinthians, where contentions, ſects, and envious partakings doe broile: where quarrels and brawlings be in ure, with a greedineſſe of having, where that wicked doing is openly allowed, which were abhominable among the very Gentiles: where Pauls name is unjuſtly railed at, whom they ought to have honoured as their Father: where ſome ſcorne at the reſurrection of the dead, with ruine whereof the whole Goſpell falleth: where the gratious gifts of God ſerve to ambition and not to charity: where many things are uncomely and unorderly done: and if therefore there ſtill remaine a church becauſe the miniſtery of the word and of the Sacraments is there not refuſed, who dare take away the name of the church from them that cannot be charged with the tenth part of theſe faults? They that with ſo great preciſeneſſe deale ſo cruelly againſt the churches of this preſent time: what (I pray you) would they have done to the Galathians, which were almoſt utter forſakers of the Goſpell, among whom yet the ſame Apoſtle found churches.

Gal 1.

One thing to ſhun the private compaſſe of a wicked man, and another for hatred thereof to forſake the fellowſhip of the Church.

1 Cor. 5. 2.

15 They object alſo, how that Paul grievouſly rebuketh the Corinthians for ſuffering in their company a man that was a hainous ſinner, and then hee ſetteth a generall ſentence wherein hee pronounceth, that it is unlawfull even to eat bread with a man of reprochfull life. Here they cry out: If it be not lawfull even to eate common bread, how may it bee lawfull to eate with them the bread of the Lord? I confeſſe indeed that it is a great diſhonour, if hogges and dogges have place among the children of God: it is alſo a much more diſhonour if the holy body of Chriſt bee given forth to them. And truely if they be well ordered churches, they will not ſuffer wicked men in their boſome, and will not without choiſe admit both worthy and unworthy together, to that holy banket. But foraſmuch as the Paſtors doe not alway ſo diligently watch, yea and ſometime are more tender in bearing with men than they ought to bee, or are hindered ſo that they cannot uſe that ſeverity that they would: it commeth to paſſe that even they that are openly evill, are not alway thruſt out of the company of the holy ones. This I grant to be a fault: neither will I diminiſh it, ſith Paul doth ſo ſharpely rebuke it in the Corinthians. But although the church be ſlacke in her duety, it ſhall not be therefore immediately in the power of every private man, to take upon himſelfe the judgement to ſever him. I doe indeed not deny that it is the doing of a godly man, to withdraw himſelfe from all private company of evill men, to intangle himſelfe in no willing familiarity with them. But it is one thing to flee the company of evil men, and another thing for hatred of them to forſake the communion of the church. But whereas they thinke it ſacriledge to bee partakers of the Lords bread with them, they are therein much more rigorous than Paul is. For where he exhorteth us to a holy and pure partaking, he requireth not that one ſhould examine an other, or every man the whole church, but that they ſhould each one prove himſelfe. If it were unlawfull to communicate with an unworthy man, then truely Paul would bid us to looke circumſpectly, whether they were any in the multitude, by whoſe uncleanneſſe we might bee defiled. Now when he requireth onely of every man the proofe of themſelves, he ſheweth that it nothing hurteth us if any unworthy doe thruſt themſelves in among us. And nothing elſe is meant by this which he ſaith afterward. Hee that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgement to himſelfe. He doth not ſay, to other, but to himſelfe. And rightfully. For it ought not to ſtand in the choiſe of every particular man, who be to be received, and who to bee rejected. The knowledge thereof belongeth to the the whole Church, which knowledge cannot be had without lawfull order, as hereafter ſhall be ſaid more at large. Therefore it ſhould be unrighteous, that any private man ſhould be defiled with the unworthineſſe of another, whom he neither can, nor ought to keepe backe from comming to it.

16 But although by this undiſcreete zeale of righteouſneſſe this tentation doth ſometime alſo enter into good men: yet this we ſhall find that too much preciſeneſſe, groweth rather of pride, diſdainfulneſſe, and falſe opinion of holineſſe, than of true holineſſe and true zeale thereof. Therefore they that are bolder than other, and as it were ſtandard bearers to make any departing from the Church, for the moſt part doe it upon no other cauſe, but in deſpiſing of all men to boaſt themſelves to be better than other. Therefore Auguſtine ſaith well and wiſely: When godly order and manner of Eccleſiaſticall diſcipline ought principally to have regard unto the unity of Spirit in the bond of peace: which the Apoſtle commanded to be kept by bearing one with another: and which being not kept, the medicine of revenge is proved to be not onely ſuperfluous, but alſo pernicious, and therefore now to be no medicine at all: thoſe evill children, which not for hatred of other mens iniquities, but for affection of their owne contentions doe greedily labour either wholy to draw or at leaſt to divide the weake common people intangled with the boaſting of their name, ſwelling with pride, mad with ſtubbornneſſe, traiterous with ſlanders, troubleſome with ſeditions, leaſt they ſhould ſeeme to want the light of truth, doe pretend a ſhadow of rigorous ſeverity: and thoſe things that are in the holy Scriptures commanded to be done with a gentler kinde of healing, ſaving the ſinceritie of love, and keeping the unitie of peace, to correct the faults of brethren, they abuſe it to ſacriledge of ſchiſme, and to occaſion of cutting off. But to godly and quiet men hee giveth this counſell, that they mercifully correct that which they can, and that which they cannot, patiently beare, and grone and mourne with love, untill God either amend and correct them, or at the harveſt roote up the teares, and fanne out the chaffe. Let the godly travaile to fortifie themſelves with theſe armours, leaſt while they ſeeme to themſelves ſtrong and couragious revengers of righteouſneſſe, they depart from the kingdome of heaven, which is the onely kingdome of righteouſneſſe. For ſith it is Gods will to have the communion of his Church to be kept in this outward fellowſhip: hee that for hatred of evill men doth breake the token of that fellowſhip, entereth into a way whereby is a ſlippery falling from the communion of Saints. Let them thinke that in a great multitude there be many truly holy and innocent before the eies of the Lord, whom they ſee not. Let them thinke that even of them that be diſeaſed there be many that doe not pleaſe or flatter themſelves in their faults, but being now and then awaked with earneſt feare of God doe aſpire to a greater uprightneſſe. Let them thinke that judgement ought not to be given of a man by one deede: foraſmuch as the holieſt doe ſometime fall away with a moſt grievous fall. Let them thinke that to gather a Church there leveth more weight both in the miniſtery of the word and in the partaking of the holy myſteries, than that all that force ſhould vaniſh away by the fault of ſome wicked men. Laſt of all let them conſider, that in judging the Church, the judgement of God is of greater value than the judgement of man.

The ſinfulneſſe of ſome by reaſon of pride, & a vaine opinion of their owne holineſſe, which by five eſpeciall conſiderations may be abated. Contra. Par. lib. 3. cap. 1.

17 Where alſo they pretend that the Church is not without cauſe called holy, it is meet to weigh with what holineſſe it excelleth: leaſt if we will admit no church but ſuch a one as is in all points perfect, we leave no Church at all: It is true indeed which Paul ſaith, that Chriſt gave himſelfe for the Church to ſanctifie it: that hee clenſed it with the laver of water with the word of life, to make her unto himſelf a glorious ſpouſe having no ſpot, or wrinckle, &c. Yet this is alſo nothing leſſe true, that the Lord daily worketh in ſmoothing her wrinkles and wiping away her ſpots. Whereupon followeth that her holineſſe is not yet fully finiſhed. Therefore the Church is ſo holy, that it daily profiteth and is not yet perfect: daily proceedeth, and is not yet come to the marke of holines: as alſo in another place ſhall be more largely declared. Whereas therfore the Prophets prophecie that there ſhall be a holy Hieruſalem, through which ſtrangers ſhall not paſſe: and a holy temple wherinto uncleane men ſhall not enter: let us not ſo take it, as if there were no ſpot in the members of the church: but for that with their whole endevour to aſpire to holineſſe and ſound pureneſſe, by the goodneſſe of God cleanneſſe is aſcribed unto them, which they have not yet fully obtained. And although oftentimes there be but rare tokens of ſuch ſanctification among men: yet we muſt determine that there hath beene no time ſince the creation of the world wherein the Lord hath not had his church, and that there ſhall alſo bee no time to the very end of the world, wherein hee ſhall not have it. For albeit immediately from the beginning, the whole kinde of men is corrupted and defiled by the ſinne of Adam: yet out of this, as it were a polluted maſſe, God alway ſanctifieth ſome veſſels unto honour, that there ſhould be no age without feeling of his mercie. Which he hath teſtified by certaine promiſes, as theſe: I have ordained a teſtament to my elect: I have ſworne to David my ſervant, I will for ever continue thy ſeed: I will build thy ſeate in generation and generation. Againe, the Lord hath choſen Sion, he hath choſen it for a dwelling to himſelfe: This is my reſt for ever, &c. Againe, theſe things ſaith the Lord which giveth the Sunne for the light of the day, the Moone and ſtars for the light of the night. If theſe lawes ſhall faile before me, then the ſeed of Iſrael ſhall alſo faile.

The corruption of the Church in the Prophets times.

18 Hereof Chriſt himſelfe, the Apoſtles, and in a manner all the Prophets have given us example. Horrible are thoſe deſcriptions wherein Eſay, Hieremie, Joel, Abacuc, and the other doe lament the ſickneſſes of the church of Hieruſalem. In the common people, in the magiſtrate, in the Prieſts all things were ſo corrupt, that Eſay doubteth not to match Hieruſalem with Sodom and Gomorrah. Religion was partly deſpiſed, partly defiled: in their manners, are commonly reported theftes, extortions, breaches of faith, murthers and like miſchiefes. Yet therefore the Prophets did neither erect to themſelves new churches, nor build up new altars on which they might have ſeverall ſacrifices: but of whatſoever manner of men they were, yet becauſe they conſidered, that God had left his word with them, and ordained ceremonies whereby hee was there worſhipped, in the midſt of the aſſemblie of the wicked, they held up pure hands unto him. Truly if they had thought that they did gather any infection thereby, they would rather have died a hundred times than have ſuffered themſelves to be drawne thereunto. Therefore nothing withheld them from departing, but deſire to the keeping of unitie. But if the Prophets thought it againſt conſcience, to eſtrange themſelves from the church for many and great wicked doings, not of one or two men, but in a manner of the whole people: then we take too much upon us, if we dare by and by depart from the communion of that church, where not all mens manners doe ſatisfie either our judgement, yea or the Chriſtian profeſſion.

The Church of Ieruſalem in the daies of Chriſt and his Apoſtles.

19 Now what manner of world was there in the time of Chriſt and the Apoſtles? And yet that deſperate ungodlineſſe of the Phariſees, and the diſſolute licentiouſneſſe of living, which then each where reigned, could not hinder, but that they uſed the ſame ceremonies with the people, and aſſembled with the reſt into one temple to the publike exerciſes of religion. Whereof came that, but becauſe they knew that the fellowſhip of evill men did not defile them, which with a pure conſcience did communicate at the ſame ceremonies? If any man bee little moved with the Prophets and Apoſtles, let him yet obey the authoritie of Chriſt. Therefore Cyprian well ſaith, though there be ſeene tares or uncleane veſſels in the church, yet there is no cauſe why wee ſhould depart from the church: wee muſt onely labour that we may be wheate: wee muſt uſe diligence and endevour as much as wee may that we may be a golden or ſilver veſſell. But to breake the earthen veſſels, is the onely worke of the Lord, to whom alſo is given an iron rod. And let no man chalenge to himſelfe that which is properly belonging to the Sonne onely, to bee able alone to fanne the floore, and cleanſe the chaffe, and ſever all the tares by mans judgement. This is a proud obſtinacie, and preſumption full of ſacriledge, which a perverſe furie taketh to it ſelfe, &c. Therefore let both theſe things remaine certainely fixed. Firſt hee that hath no excuſe, that of his owne will forſaketh the outward communion of the church. Where the word of God is preached and the Sacraments miniſtred: then that the faultes of a few or of many are no hinderance, but that we may therein rightly profeſſe our faith by the ceremonies inſtitute by God: becauſe a godly conſcience is not hurt by the unworthines of any other either paſtor or private man, and the myſteries are to a holy and upright man nevertheles pure & wholsom becauſe they are altogether handled of unclean men.

20 Their preciſeneſſe and diſdainfulneſſe proceedeth yet further: becauſe they acknowledge no Church but ſuch a one as is pure from all ſpots be they never ſo ſmall: yea they are angry with good teachers, for that in exhorting the faithful to go forward, they teach them all their life long to grone under the burden of vices, and to flee unto pardon. For they prate that by this meane men be led from perfection. I grant indeed, that in earneſt calling upon perfection we ought not ſlowly or coldly to travell, much leſſe to be idle, but to fill our mindes with confidence thereof while we be yet in our courſe, I ſay, it is a diveliſh invention. Therefore in the Creede the forgiveneſſe of ſins is aptly joyned next after the Church. For none doe attaine it, but onely they that are citizens and of the houſhold of the Church as it is read in the Prophet. Therefore the building of the heavenly Hieruſalem ought to goe before, wherein afterward this mercifulneſſe of God may have place, that whatſoever come unto it, there iniquitie may be taken away. I ſay that it ought firſt to be builded, not for that there can be any Church without the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, but becauſe the Lord hath not promiſed his mercie but in the communion of Saints. Therefore the firſt entry for us into the Church and kingdome of God, is the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, without which we have no covenant or conjoyning with God. For thus he ſaith by the Prophet, In that day I will ſtrike you a covenant with the beaſt of the field, with the fowle of the aire, and with the vermine of the earth. I will breake the ſword of warre from out of the earth, and I will make men to ſleepe without feare. I will eſpouſe you unto me for ever. I will eſpouſe you (I ſay) in righteouſneſſe, in judgement, in mercie, and in compaſſions. We ſee how by his mercie the Lord reconcileth us to himſelfe. And ſo in another place, when he foreſaith that the people ſhall be gathered together againe, whom he had ſcattered abroad in his wrath, hee ſaith, I will cleanſe them from all wickedneſſe wherewith they have ſinned againſt me. Wherefore by the ſigne of waſhing wee enter into the fellowſhip of the Church, whereby we may be taught that there is no entry open for us into the houſhold of God, unleſſe our filthineſſe be firſt wiped away with his goodneſſe.

Jere.33.8.

21 But by the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes the Lord doth not onely receive and adopt us once into the Church, but by the ſame he alſo preſerveth and maintaine thus ſtill in it. For to what purpoſe were it, to have ſuch a pardon granted us, as ſhould ſerve for no uſe? But every one of the godly is a witneſſe to himſelfe that the mercie of God ſhould be vaine and mocking, if it ſhould be granted onely but once: becauſe there is none that is not in his owne conſcience privie throughout his whole life of many weakneſſes, which neede the mercie of God. And truly not in vaine God promiſeth this grace peculiarly to them of his owne houſhold: and not in vaine he commandeth the ſame meſſage of reconciliation to be daily offered unto them. Therefore as throughout all our life we carry about us the remnants of ſinne, unleſſe we be ſuſtained with the continuall grace of the Lord in forgiving our ſinnes, wee ſhall ſcarcely abide one moment in the Church. But the Lord hath called his unto eternall ſalvation. Therefore they ought to thinke that there is pardon alwaies ready for their ſinnes. Wherefore we ought to hold aſſuredly, that by the liberalitie of God by meane of Chriſts deſerving through the ſanctification of the Spirit, ſinnes have beene and are daily pardoned to us which be called and graffed into the bodie of the Church.

By remiſſion of ſinnes men not onely received into; but alſo kept and continued in the Church of Chriſt.

22 To deale this benefit unto us, the keies were given to the Church. For when Chriſt gave the Apoſtles commandement, and delivered them power to forgive ſinnes, he meant not this onely, that they ſhould looſe them from ſinnes that were from ungodlineſſe converted to the faith of Chriſt: but rather that they ſhould continually execute this office among the faithfull. Which thing Paul teacheth, when he writeth that the embaſſage of reconciliation was left with the miniſters of the Church, whereby they ſhould oftentimes in Chriſts name exhort the people to reconcile themſelves to God. Therefore in the communion of Saints, by the miniſterie of the Church it ſelfe, ſinnes are continually forgiven us, when the Prieſts or Biſhops, to whom that office is committed, doe with the promiſes of the Goſpell confirme godly conſciences in hope of pardon and forgiveneſſe: and that as well publikely as privately, according as neceſſitie requireth. For there bee very many, which for their weakneſſe doe neede

The keies committed to the Church, not for remiſſion of ſins to be warranted as well unto faithfull men when they ſin, as unto ſinners when they firſt become faithfull.

a singular attonement. And Paul reporteth that not onely in common preaching, but also in houses he had testified the Faith in Christ, and severally admonished every one of the doctrine of salvation. Therefore we have heere three things to be noted. First, that with how great holinesse soever the children of God doe excell, yet they be alway in this estate, so long as they dwell in a mortall body, that without forgivenesse of sins they cannot stand before God. Secondly, that this benefit is so proper to the Church, that we cannot otherwise enjoy it, but if we abide in the Communion thereof. Thirdly, that it is distributed unto us by the ministers and Pastors, either by preaching of the Gospell, or by ministring of the Sacraments: and that in this behalfe principally appeareth the power of the keies, which the Lord hath given to the fellowship of the faithfull. Wherfore let every one of us thinke this to be his duty, no where elſe to seeke forgivenesse of sinnes, than where the Lord hath set it. Of publike reconciliation which belongeth to discipline we shall speake in place fit for it.

The errour of Novatians and Anabaptists, who, as if baptisme did make men Angels, denie pardon unto sinners that are baptised.

23 But for as much as those phrantike spirits that I have spoken of, doe goe about to plucke away from the Church this only anchor of salvation, consciences are the more strongly to be confirmed against so pestilent an opinion. The Novatians in old time troubled the church with this doctrine: but not much unlike to the Novatians our age also hath with many of the Anabaptists which fall to the same dotages. For they faigne that the people of God are in baptisme regenerate into a pure and Angelike life, that is corrupted with no filthinesse of the flesh. But if any man offend after baptisme, they leave unto him nothing but the unappeaseable judgement of God. Briefely they grant no hope of pardon to a sinner fallen after grace received: because they acknowledge no other forgivenesse of sinnes but that whereby we be first regenerate. But although there be no lie more cleerely confuted by the Scriptures: yet because these men finde some whom they may deceive (as also in old time Novatus had many followers) let us shortly shew how mad they bee to their owne and others destruction. First, whereas by the commandement of the Lord, the holy ones doe daily repeate this praier, forgive us our debts: truly they doe confesse themselves debters. Neither doe they crave it in vaine, because the Lord hath alway appointed no other thing to be asked, than that which he himselfe would give. Yea, whereas he hath testified that the whole praier shall be heard of his father, yet he hath also sealed this absolution with a peculiar promise. What will wee more? The Lord requireth of the holy ones all their life long a confession of sinnes, yea and that continuall, and promiseth pardon. What boldnesse is it, either to exempt them from sinne, or if they have stumbled, utterly to exclude them from grace? Now whom doth he will us to forgive seventie times seaven times? not to our brethren? To what end did he command it, but that we should follow his clemencie? He forgiveth therefore, not once or twise: but as often as being stricken downe with the acknowledging of sins they sigh unto him.

24 But (that we may begin in a manner at the very swadling cloutes of the church) the Patriarches were circumcised, being allured into partaking of the covenant, having undoubtedly by their fathers diligence beene taught righteousnesse and innocencie, when they conspired to murther their brother: this was a mischeevous act, to be abhorred even of the most desperate theeves. At the last being meekned with the monitions of Judas, they sould him: this was also an intollerable hainousnesse. Simeon and Levi with wicked revenge, and such as was also condemned by their owne fathers judgement, used crueltie against the Sichemites. Ruben with most uncleane lust defiled his fathers bed. Judas when he would give himselfe to fornication against the law of nature, went to his sonnes wife. And yet so far are they from being wiped out of the chosen people, that they be rather raised up to be heads of it. But what did David? when he was a governour of justice, with how great wickednesse did hee by shedding of innocent blood open the way to his blinde lust? Hee was already regenerate and among the regenerate garnished with notable praises of the Lord: nevertheless hee committed that hainous offence, which is horrible even among the Gentiles: and yet hee obtained pardon. And (that wee may not tarrie upon single examples) how many promises there are in the Law and the Prophets of Gods mercie toward the Israelites, so oft it is proved that the Lord sheweth himselfe appeaseable to the offences of his people. For what doth Moses promise to come to passe, when the people being fallen into Apostasie shall returne unto the Lord? Hee shall bring thee backe out of captivitie, and shall have mercie on thee, and shall gather thee together out of the peoples to whom thou hast beene dispersed. If thou be scattered even to the borders of the heaven, I will from thence againe gather thee together. Deut 30.3.

25 But I will not begin a recitall that should never be ended. For the Prophets are full of such promises, which doe yet offer mercy to the people covered with infinite wicked doings. What offence is there more hainous than rebellion? for it is called a divorce betweene God and the Church. But this is overcome by the goodnes of God. What man is there (saith he by Ieremie) that if his wife give forth her bodie in common to the adulterers, can abide to returne into favour with her? but with thy fornication all thy waies are polluted, O Iuda, the earth hath beene filled with thy filthy loves. But returne unto mee, and I will receive thee. Returne thou, turne away, I will not turne away my face from thee: because I am holy, and am not angry for ever. And truly hee can be no otherwise minded, which affirmeth that hee willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that hee should be converted and live. Therefore when Salomon did dedicate the temple, he appointed it also to this use, that the praiers made for obtaining pardon of sinnes should be heard from thence. If (said he) thy sonnes shall sinne (for there is no man that sinneth not) and thou being angry shalt deliver them to their enemies and they shall repent in their heart, and being turned shall entreat thee in their captivitie, saying, we have sinned, we have done wickedly, and shall pray toward the land which thou hast given to their fathers, and toward this holy temple: thou shalt heare their prayers in heaven, and shalt be made mercifull to thy people that hath sinned against thee, and to all their wickednesses wherewith they have offended thee. And not vainely the Lord ordained in the law daily sacrifices for sinnes. For if the Lord had not foreseene that his people should be troubled with continuall diseases of sins, he would never have appointed these remedies for them.

26 Was this benefit taken away from the faithfull, by the comming of Christ, wherein the fulnesse of grace was shewed forth, so that they dare not now pray for pardon of sins? that if they offend the Lord they may not obtaine any mercie? What shall this be else, but to say that Christ came to the destruction of them that be his, and not to their salvation, if that mercifulnesse of God in pardoning sinnes which in the old testament was continually readie for the holy ones, be now said to be utterly taken away? But if we beleeve the Scriptures which expresly cry out, that in Christ onely the grace and kindnesse of the Lord fully appeared, that the plentifulnesse of mercie was powred out, that the reconciliation of God and men was fulfilled: let us not doubt that there floweth unto us a more bountifull mercifulnesse of the heavenly father, than that it is cut off or shortned. And hereof there want not examples. Peter which had heard that hee should be denied before the Angels of God that confessed not the name of Christ before men, denied him thrise in one night, and that not without execration: yet he was not put away from pardon. They that lived inordinately among the Thessalonians are so chastised, that yet they be gently called to repentance. Even Simon the Magician himselfe is not cast in desperation, but he is rather commanded to hope well, when Peter counselleth him to flee to prayer.

27 Yea, most hainous sinnes have sometime possessed whole Churches, out of which Paul rather gently unwrapped them, than pronounced them accursed. The falling away of the Galathians was no meane offence. The Corinthians were so much lesse excusable than they, as they abounded in moe and those nothing lighter sins: yet neither of them are excluded from the mercie of God. Yea even they that had sinned above the rest in uncleannesse, fornication and unchastitie, are namely called to repentance. For the covenant of the Lord remaineth, and shall remaine for ever inviolable, which he solemnly made with Christ the true Salomon and his members, in these words: If his sons shall forsake my law, and shall not walke in my judgements, if they shall defile my righteousnesses, and not keepe my commandements, I will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their sinnes with stripes: But my mercie I will not take away from him. Finally by the very order of the Creed we be taught, that there remaineth in the Church of Christ continuall pardon of sins: For that when the church is as it were stablished, yet forgiveneſſe of sins is adjoyned.

Sin after baptisme not one'y through ignorance but willingly committed, yet pardonable. Levit. 4.

28 Some that be somewhat wiser, when they see the doctrine of Novatus to be confuted with so great plaineneſſe of Scripture, make not every sin unpardonable, but wilfull transgreſſing of the Law, into which a man wittingly and willingly falleth. Now they that say so, doe vouchsafe to grant pardon to no sinne, but where a man hath erred by ignorance. But whereas the Lord in the law commandeth one sort of Sacrifices to be offered for cleansing of the wilfull sinnes of the faithfull, and other to redeeme their ignorances: how great lewdneſſe shall it be to grant no cleansing to wilfull sinne? I say that there is nothing plainer, than that the onely sacrifice of Christ availeth to forgive the wilfull sins of the holy ones: forasmuch as the Lord hath testified the same by carnall Sacrifices as by signes. Againe who can excuse David by ignorance, whom it is evident to have beene so well instructed in the Law? Did David not know how great was the fault of adultery and manslaughter, which daily punished the same in other? Did brother-slaughter seeme to the Patriarkes a lawfull thing? Had the Corinthians so ill profited that they thought that wantonneſſe, uncleanneſſe, whoredome, hatreds, and contentions pleased God? Did Peter being so diligently admonished not know how great a matter it was to forsweare his master? Therfore let us not with our owne enviousneſſe stop up the way against the mercy of God that so gently uttereth it selfe.

In what sense the fathers doe sometimes teach that repentance is no more iterrable than baptisme.

29 Truly I am not ignorant that the old writers expound those sinnes that are daily forgiven to the faithfull, to be the light offences that creepe in by weakneſſe of the flesh: and that they thought that the solemne repentance which was then required for hainous misdeeds might no more be iterate than Baptisme. Which saying is not so to be taken, as though they would either throw them down headlong into desperation, that after their first Repentance had fallen againe, or extenuate those other sinnes as though they were small in the sight of God. For they knew that the holy ones doe oftentimes stagger by infidelitie, that superfluous othes doe sometimes fall from them, they now and then are chafed unto anger, yea that they breake out even into manifest railings, and beside these be troubled with other evils which the Lord not slenderly abhorreth: but they so called them, to put a difference between them and publike crimes that with great offence came to the knowledge of the Church. But whereas they did so hardly pardon them that had committed any thing worthy of Eccleſiasticall correction, they did not this therefore, because they thought that such should hardly have pardon with the Lord: but by this severity they meant to make other afraid that they should not rashly run into wicked doings, by the deserving whereof they might be estranged from the Communion of the Church: howbeit truly the word of the Lord which herein ought to be the onely rule unto us, appointeth a greater moderation. For it teacheth that the rigour of discipline is so far to be extended, that he that ought chiefly to be provided for, be not swallowed up with heavines: as we have before declared more at large.

THE SECOND CHAPTER.

A comparison of the false Church with the true Church.

Some faults doe corrupt and some destroy the Church.

OF how great value the ministery of the word and Sacraments ought to be with us and how far the reverence of it ought to proceed, that it be unto us a perpetuall token whereby to discerne the Church, it hath beene already declared. That is to say, whereſoever the ministerie abideth whole and uncorrupted, there the faults or diseases of manners are no impediment but that it may beare the name of a Church. Then, that the very ministerie it selfe is by small errors not so corrupted, but that it may be esteemed lawfull. Moreover wee have shewed that the errours that ought so to be pardoned are those whereby the principall doctrine of religion is not hurt, whereby those chiefe points of religion that ought to be agreeably holden among the Faithfull are not destroyed, and in the Sacrament, those that doe not aboliſh nor impaire the lawfull institution of him that ordained them. But so soone as lying is broken into the the chiefe tower of religion, ſo ſoone as the ſumme of neceſſarie doctrine is perverted, and the uſe of the Sacraments faileth: truly the deſtruction of the Church followeth: like as a mans life is at an end, when his throate is thruſt throughout his hart deadly wounded. And this is clearely proved by the words of Paul, when he teacheth, that the foundation of the Church is laid upon the doctrine of the Apoſtles and Prophets, Chriſt himſelfe being the head corner ſtone. If the foundation of the Church be the doctrine of the Prophets and Apoſtles, by which the Faithfull are commanded to repoſe their ſalvation onely in Chriſt: then take away that doctrine, and how ſhall the building ſtand any longer? Therefore the Church muſt needs fall downe where that ſumme of religion falleth which is onely able to uphold it. Againe, if the true Church be the pillar and ſtay of the truth, it is certaine, that there is no Church, where lying and falſhood have uſurped the dominion. Eph.2.20. 2 Tim.3.15.

2 Sith it is in ſuch caſe under the Papiſtrie, we may underſtand how much of the Church is there remaining. In ſtead of the miniſterie of the word, there reigneth a perverſe government and made of lies mingled together, which partly quencheth and partly choaketh the pure light: Into the place of the Lords Supper is entred a moſt filthie ſacriledge: the forme of worſhipping God is deformed with a manifold and intollerable heape of ſuperſtitions: the doctrine, without which Chriſtianitie cannot ſtand, is altogether buried and driven out: the publike aſſemblies are the ſchooles of idolatrie and ungodlineſſe. Therefore there is no perill leaſt in departing from a damnable partaking of ſo many miſchiefes, wee be plucked from the Church of Chriſt. The communion of the Church was not ordained to this end that it ſhould be a bond whereby we ſhould be intangled with idolatrie, ungodlineſſe, ignorance of God, and other kinds of evils: but rather whereby we ſhould be faſt holden in the feare of God and obedience of truth. They doe indeed glorioufly ſet out their Church unto us, that there ſhould ſeeme to be no other Church in the world: and afterward, as though the victorie were gotten, they decree that all be Schiſmatikes that dare withdraw themſelves from the obedience of that Church that they paint out: and that all be heretikes that dare once mutter againſt the doctrine thereof. But by what proofes doe they confirme that they have the true Church? They alleage out of the ancient Chronicles, what in old time was in Italie, in France, in Spaine. They ſay that they fetch their beginning from thoſe holie men that with ſound doctrine founded and raiſed up Churches, and ſtabliſhed the ſame doctrine and edifying of the Church with their blood. And that ſo the Church hath beene among them ſo conſecrate both with ſpirituall gifts, and with the blood of Martyrs, and preſerved with continuall ſucceſſion of Biſhops, that it might not fall away. They rehearſe how much Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Auguſtine, and other eſteemed this ſucceſſion. But how trifling theſe things be, and how they be but very mockeries, I will make them very eaſie to underſtand that will be content a little to weigh them with me. Truly I would alſo exhort themſelves earneſtly to take heed hereunto, if I did truſt that I might any thing prevaile with them by teaching. But for as much as they, leaving all regard of truth, doe bend themſelves to this onely purpoſe, by all the waies that they can, to defend their owne cauſe, I will onely ſpeake a few things whereby good men and thoſe that love the truth, may winde themſelves out of their ſubtle cavillations. Firſt I aske of them, why they do not alleage Afrike, and Ægypt, and all Aſia? Even becauſe in all thoſe countries this holie ſucceſſion of Biſhops hath ceaſed, by meane whereof they boaſt that they have preſerved Churches. They come therefore to this point to ſay, that they therefore have a true Church, becauſe ſince it firſt began to be, it hath not been deſtitute of Biſhops: for in perpetuall courſe they have ſucceeded one another. But what if I caſt Greece in their way? Therefore I aske againe of them, why they ſay that the Church is loſt among the Grecians, among whom that ſucceſſion of Biſhops was never interrupted, which in their opinion is the onely keeper and preſerver of the Church. They make the Grecians Schiſmatikes, and by what right? becauſe in departing from the Apoſtolike ſea, they have loſt their priviledge. What? Doe not they much more deſerve to looſe it that depart from Chriſt himſelfe? It followeth therefore, that the pretence of ſucceſſion is but vaine, unleſſe the poſteritie doe keepe faſt and abide in the truth of Chriſt, which which they have received of their fathers from hand to hand.

The Church amongst the Iewes vainely measured by outward things, as the glorie of the Temple, the pompe of Ceremonies, the succession of Priests.

3 Therefore the Romanists at this day doe alleage nothing else but that which it appeareth that the Iewes in old time alleaged, when they were by the Prophets of the Lord reproved of blindnesse, ungodlinesse, and idolatrie. For they gloriously boasted of the Temple, Ceremonies and Priesthoods, by which things, by great reason as they thinke they measured the Church. So in stead of the Church, they shew certaine outward visors, that oftentimes are far from the Church, and without which the Church may very well stand. Therefore wee neede to confute them with no other argument, then that wherewith Hieremie fought against the foolish presumptuousnesse of the Iewes: that is, that they should not boast in lying words, saying: The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, it is the temple of the Lord. For as much as the Lord doeth no where acknowledge any thing for his, but where his word is heard, and reverently observed. So when the glorie of God did sit betweene the Cherubins in the Sanctuarie, and he had promised them that that should be his stedfast seate: yet when the Priests once corrupted the worshipping of him with perverse superstitions, he removed else where, and left the place without any holinesse. If the same temple which seemed to be holily appointed to the perpetuall dwelling of God, might be forsaken of God and become unholie: there is no cause why these men should faigne to us that God is so bound to persons or places, and so fast tied to outward observations, that he must needs abide with them that have onely the title and shew of the Church. And this is it about which Paul contendeth in the Epistle to the Romanes, from the ninth Chapter to the twelfth. For this did sore trouble weake consciences, that the Iewes when they seemed to be the people of God, did not onely refuse the doctrine of the Gospell, but also persecuted it. Therefore after that he hath set out the doctrine, he removeth this doubt, and denieth that those Iewes being enemies of the truth are the Church, howsoever they wanted nothing that otherwise might be required to the outward forme of the Church. And therefore hee denieth it, because they embrace not Christ. But somewhat more expresly in the Epistle to the Galathians: wherein comparing Ismael with Isaac, he saith that many hold place in the Church, to whom the inheritance belongeth not, because they are not begotten of the free Mother. From whence also he descendeth to the comparison of two Hierusalems. Because as the Law was given in the mount Sina, but the Gospell came out of Hierusalem: So many being servilely borne and brought up doe without doubting boast themselves to be the children of God and of the Church, yea they proudly despise the naturall children of God, when themselves be but bastards. On the other side also, when wee heare that it was once pronounced from heaven: Cast out the bond woman and her sonne, let us, standing upon this inviolable decree, boldly despise their unsavorie boastings. For if they be proud by reason of outward profession, Ismael was also circumcised: if they contend by antiquitie, he was the first begotten, and yet we see that he is put away. If the cause be demanded, Paul assigneth it, for that none are accounted children, but they that are begotten of the pure lawfull seed of doctrine. According to this reason God denieth that he is bound to wicked Priests by this: that he covenanteth with their Father Levi that hee should be his Angell or interpreter: yea, he turneth against themselves their false boasting, wherewith they were wont to rise up against the Prophets, that the dignitie of Priesthood was to be had in singular estimation. This he willingly admitteth, and with the same condition hee debateth with them, because he is readie to keepe his covenant, but when they doe not mutually performe their part to him, they deserve to be rejected. Loe what succession availeth, unlesse therewithall be also joyned an imitation and evenly continuing course: even to this effect, that the successours, so soone as they be proved to have swarved from their originall, be deprived of all honour. Unlesse perhaps because Caiphas succeeded many godly Bishops (yea there was even from Aaron to him a continuall unbroken course of succession) therefore that same mischievous assembly was worthie the name of the Church. But this were not tolerable even in earthly dominions, that the tyrannie of Caligula, Nero, Heliogabalus, and such other, should be called a true state of Commonweale, for that they succeeded the Brutes, Scipios, and Camilles. But specially in the governement of the Church there is nothing more fond, than leaving the Doctrine to set the succession in the Persons onely. But neither did the holie Doctors whom they falsely thrust in unto us, meane any thing lesse, than to prove that precisely as it were by right of inheritance Churches be there, where Bishops are successively placed one after another. But where as it was then out of controversie, that from the very beginning to that age nothing was changed in Doctrine, they alleaged that which might suffice to make an end of all new errours, that is, that by those was that doctrine oppugned, which had beene even from the Apostles constantly and with one agreeing consent retained. There is therefore no cause, why they should any longer goe forward to deceive by pretending a false colour under the name of the Church, which we doe reverently esteeme as becommeth us: but when they come to the definition of it, not only water (as the common saying is) cleaveth unto them, but they sticke fast in their owne myre because they put a stinking harlot in place of the holie spouse of Christ. That this putting in of a changeling should not deceive us, beside other admonitions, let us remember this also of Augustine. For speaking of the Church, he sayeth: It is it that is sometime darkned and covered with multitude of offences as with a cloud: sometime in calmenesse of time appeareth quiet and free: sometime is hidden and troubled with waves of tribulations and temptations. Hee bringeth forth examples, that oftentimes the strongest pillers either valiantly suffered banishment for the faith, or were hidden in the whole world. Ad Vincent. epist 48.

4 In like manner the Romanists doe vexe us, and make afraid the ignorant with the name of the Church, whereas they be the deadly enemies of Christ. Therfore although they pretend the Temple, the Priesthood, and other such outward shewes, this vaine glistering wherewith the eies of the simple be dazeled ought nothing to move us to grant that there is a Church where the Word of God doth not appeare. For this is the perpetuall marke wherewith God hath marked them that be his. He that is of the truth (saith he) heareth my voice. Againe, I am that good shepheard, and I know my sheep, and am knowne of them. My sheep heare my voice, and I know them, and they follow me. And a little before he had said, that the sheepe follow their shepheard, because they knew his voice: but they follow not a stranger, but run away from him because they knew not the voice of strangers. Why are wee therefore wilfully mad in judging the Church, whereas Christ hath marked it with an undoubtfull signe, which wheresoever it is seene cannot deceive, but that it certainely sheweth the Church to be there: but where it is not, there remaineth nothing that can give a true signification of the Church. For Paul rehearseth that the Church was builded, not upon the judgements of men, nor upon Priesthoods, but upon the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophets. But rather Hierusalem is to be severally knowne from Babylon, and the Church of Christ from the conspiracie of Satan, by that difference wherewith Christ hath made them different one from the other. Hee that is of God (saith he) heareth the words of God: Ye therefore heare not, because ye are not of God. In a summe, forasmuch as the Church is the kingdome of Christ, and he reigneth not but by his word, can it be now doubtfull to any man, but that those be the words of lying, by which Christs kingdome is faigned to be without his Scepter, that is to say without his holie Word? Like pretenses used by Romanists to dazell the eies of the simple, and to uphold the estimation of their Church. John 18.3. Luk 20.14. Ephe. 2 20. John 8.47.

5 But now whereas they accuse us of Schisme and heresie, because we both preach a contrary doctrine to them, and obey not their lawes, and have our assemblies to praiers, to baptisme, to the ministration of the Supper, and other holy doings, severally from them: it is indeed a very sore accusatioa, but such as needeth not a long or laborsome defence. They are called heretikes and scismatikes, which making a division, doe breake in sunder the communion of the Church. And this communion is holden together with true bounds, that is to say, the agreement of true doctrine, and brotherly charitie. Whereupon Augustine putteth this difference betweene heretikes and scismatikes, that heretikes indeed doe with false doctrine corrupt the pureneſse of faith, but the schismatikes sometime even where there is like faith, do breake the bond of fellowship. But this is also to be noted, that this conjoyning of charitie so hangeth upon the unitie of Faith, that faith ought to be the beginning thereof, the end, and finally the only rule. Let us therefore remember that so oft as the unitie of the Church is commended unto us, this is required, that while our mindes agree in Christ, our wils also Our Churches by Romanists without just cause accused of heresie and of Schisme. Lib quæsti. Ephe 4.5. may be joined together with mutuall well willing in Christ. Therefore Paul when hee exhorteth us to that well willing, taketh for his foundation that there is one God, one Faith, and one Baptisme. Yea whereſoever hee teacheth us to be of one minde, and of one will, hee by and by addeth in Christ, or according to Christ: meaning, that it is a factious companie of the wicked, and not agreement of the faithfull which is without the word of the Lord.

The undividable unitie of the Church: the ground and bond whereof is truth.

6 Cyprian alſo following Paul deriveth the whole fountaine of the agreement of the Church, from the onely Biſhoprick of Chriſt. He afterward addeth the Church is but one, which ſpreadeth abroade more largely into a multitude with increaſe of fruitfulneſſe: like as there be many ſunne beames, but one light: and many branches of a tree, but one body grounded upon a faſt roote: And when many ſtreames doe flowe from one fountaine, although the number ſeeme to bee ſcattered abroade by largeneſſe of overflowing plentie, yet the unitie abideth in the originall. Take away a beame of the ſunne from the body, the unitie can ſuffer no diviſion. Breake a branch from the tree, the broken branch cannot ſpring. Cut off the ſtreame from the ſpring head, being cut off it drieth up. So alſo the Church being overſpred with the light of the Lord, is extended over the whole world: yet there is but one light that is ſpred every where. Nothing could be ſaid more fitly to expreſſe that undividable knitting together, which all the members of Chriſt have one with another. We ſee how he continually calleth us backe to the very head. Whereupon hee pronounceth that hereſies and ſchiſmes doe ariſe hereof, that men doe not returne to the originall of truth, nor doe ſeeke that head, nor keepe the doctrine of the heavenly Maſter. Now let them go and cry that wee be heretikes that have departed from their church: ſith there hath beene no cauſe of our eſtranging from them but this one, that they can in no wiſe abide the pure profeſſing of the truth: but I tell not how they have driven us out with curſings and cruell execrations. Which very ſelfe doing doth aboundantly enough acquite us, unleſſe they will alſo condemne the Apoſtles for ſchiſmatikes, with whom we have all one cauſe. Chriſt (I ſay) did foreſay to his Apoſtles, that the time ſhould come when they ſhould be caſt out of the Synagogues for his name ſake. And thoſe Synagogues of which he ſpeaketh, were then accounted lawfull Churches. Sith therefore it is evident that wee be caſt out, and we be readie to ſhew that the ſame is done for the names ſake of Chriſt, truly the cauſe ought firſt to be inquired of, before that any thing be determined upon us, either one way or other. Howbeit, if they will, I am content to diſcharge them of this point. For it is enough for me, that it behoved that we ſhould depart from them, that we might come to Chriſt.

John 16.2.

The Church and the defection of the Church of Iſrael.

7 But it ſhall appeare yet more certainely in what eſtimation wee ought to have all the Churches, whom the tyrannie of that Romiſh idoll hath poſſeſſed, if it be compared with the old church of the Iſraelites, as it is deſcribed in the Prophets. There was then a true Church among the Jewes and Iſraelites, when they continued in the lawes of the covenant, for they obtained thoſe things by the benefit of God, whereupon the Church conſiſteth. They had the truth of doctrine in the law: the miniſterie thereof was among the Prieſts and Prophets: with the ſigne of circumciſion they entred into religion: by other Sacraments they were exerciſed to the confirmation of Faith. It is no doubt that thoſe titles wherewith the Lord hath honored his Church, fitly pertained to their fellowſhip. After that, forſaking the law of the Lord they went out of kind to idolatrie and ſuperſtition, they partly loſt that prerogative. For who dare take away the name of the Church from them, with whom God hath left the preaching of his word and obſervation of his myſteries? Againe, who dare call that the Church without any exception, where the word of the Lord is openly and freely troden under foote? where the miniſterie thereof, the chiefe ſinew, yea the very ſoule of the Church is deſtroyed?

What was remaining of the Church in Iuda and Iſrael when they were fallen to idolatrie.

8 What then? will ſome man ſay: was there therefore no parcell of a Church remaining among the Jewes after that they fell away to idolatry? The anſwer is eaſie. Firſt I ſay that in the very falling away there were certaine degrees. For we will not ſay that there was all one fall of Juda, and Iſrael, at ſuch time as they both firſt ſwarved from the pure worſhipping of God. When Jeroboam firſt made calves, againſt the the open prohibition of God, and did dedicate an unlawfull place for worshipping, he did utterly corrupt religion. The Jewes did first defile themselves with wicked and superstitious manners before that they wrongfully changed the order in the outward forme of religion. For although under Rechabeam they had already gotten them many perverse ceremonies: yet becaus there tarried at Hierusalem both the Doctrine of the Law, and the Priesthood, and the ceremonious usages in such sort as God had ordained them, the godly had there a tolerable state of church. Among the Israelites unto the raigne of Achab, there was no amendment of things, and from thence forth they fell from worse to worse. They that succeed afterward, to the very destruction of the kingdome, partly were like unto him, and partly (when they minded to be somewhat better than he) they followed the example of Jeroboam: but they all every one were wicked and idolaters. In Jewry there were now and then diverse changes, while some kings perverted the worshipping of God with false and forged superstition, some other restored religion that was decaied: untill the verie priests themselves defiled the Temple of God with prophane and abhominable usages.

The Church of Rome more corrupt than the Church of Israell under Ieroboam.

9 Now let the Papists if they can how much soever they extenuate their owne faults, denie that among them the state of religion is as corrupt & defiled as it was in the kingdome of Israel under Jeroboam. But they have a grosser Idolatrie: and in doctrine they are not one drop purer: unlesse peradventure even in it also they be more unpure. God, yea all men that are endued but with a meane judgement, shall be witnesses with me, and the thing it selfe also declareth, how herein I tell nothing more than truth. Now when they will drive us to the communion of the Church, they require two things of us: first, that we should communicate with all their praiers, sacraments, and Ceremonies: then that whatsoever honour, power, and Jurisdiction Christ giveth to his Church we should give the same to their Church. As to the first point, I grant that all the Prophets that were at Hierusalem, when things were there very much corrupted, did neither severally sacrifice, nor had assemblies to pray severall from other men. For they had a commandement of God, whereby they were commanded to come together into Salomons temple: they knew that the Leviticall Priests, howsoever they were unworthy of that honour, yet becaus they were ordained by the Lord ministers of the holy ceremonies, and were not as then deposed, did yet still rightfully possesse that place. But (which is the chiefe point of this question) they were compelled to no superstitious worshipping, yea they tooke in hand to doe nothing but that which was ordained by God. But among these men, I meane the Papists, what like thing is there? For we can scarcely have any meeting together with them, wherein wee shall not defile our selves with open idolatrie. Truly the principall bond of their communion is in the Masse, which wee abhorre as the greatest sacriledge. And whether wee doe this rightfully or wrongfully, shall be seene in another place. At this present it is enough to shew that in this behalfe wee are in other case than the Prophets were, which although they were present at the ceremonies of the wicked, were not compelled to behold or use any ceremonies but such as were instituted by God. And, if they will needs have an example altogether like, let us take it out of the kingdome of Israel. After the ordinance of Jeroboam Circumcision remained, the sacrifices were offered, the Law was accounted holy, the same God was called upon whom they had received of their fathers: but for the forged and forbidden formes of worshipping, God disallowed and condemned all that was there done. Shew me one Prophet, or any one godly man that once worshipped or sacrificed in Bethell. For they knew they could not doe it, but that they should defile themselves with some sacriledge. Wee have then thus much, that the communion of the Church ought not so farre to be of force with the godly, that if it should degenerate to prophane and filthy usages, they should foorthwith of necessitie follow it.

1 King. 11.31.

A Church degenerated and made prophane is no such church as we ought of 10 But about the other point wee contend yet more earnestly. For if the Church be so considered to be such, whose judgement we ought to reverence, whose authority to regard, whose monitions to obey, with whose chastisements to be moved, whose communion in all things wee ought religiously to observe: then we cannot grant them a Church, but that we must of necessitie be bound to subjection and obedience unto it.

necessitie to have communion with and fellowship.

Yet wee will willingly grant them that which the Prophets granted to the Jewes and Israelites of their time: when things were there in as good, yea or better state. But we see how each where they crie out, that their assemblies are unholy, to which it is no more lawfull to consent than it is to denie God. And truly if those were Churches, it followeth therefore that in Israel Helias, Michæa, and such other: In Iurie, Esay, Jeremy, Osee, and such other of that sort, whom the Prophets, Priests, and people of that time hated and detested worse than any uncircumcised men, were strangers from the Church of God. If those were Churches, than the Church was not the pillar of truth, but the stay of lying: not the tabernacle of the living God, but the receptacle of idols. Therfore it was needfull for them to depart from the consent of those assemblies, which was nothing else but a wicked conspiracie against God. In like manner if any man acknowledge the assemblies at these daies being defiled with idolatrie, superstition, and wicked doctrine, to be such in whose full communion a Christian man ought to continue even to the consent of Doctrine, he shall greatly erre. For if they be churches, then they have the power of the keies. But the keies are unseparably knit with the word, which is from thence quite driven away. Againe, if they be churches, then the promise of Christ is of force among them, whatsoever ye binde, &c. But they contrariwise doe banish from their communion all such as doe professe themselves not fainedly the servants of Christ. Therefore either the promise of Christ is vaine, or at least in this respect they are not churches. Finally, instead of the ministery of the word they have schooles of ungodlinesse, and a sinke of all kinds of errours. Therefore either in this respect they are not churches, or there shall remaine no token whereby the lawfull assemblies of the faithfull may be severally knowne from the meeting of Turkes.

1 Tim. 3. 15.

Mat. 16. 19. & 18. 18. John 20. 23.

The steps of a Church remaining as of old in the corrupt state of Israell, so at this day amongst the Romanists.

11 But as in the old time there yet remained among the Jewes certaine peculiar prerogatives of the church, so at this day also we take not from the Papists such steps as it pleased the Lord to have remaining among them after the dissipation of the church. The Lord had once made his covenant with the Jewes. That same rather being upholden by the stedfastnesse of it selfe did continue with striving against their ungodlinesse, than was preserved by them. Therefore (such was the assurednesse and constancie of Gods goodnesse) there remained the covenant of the Lord, neither could his faithfulnesse be blotted out by their unfaithfulnesse: neither could Circumcision be so prophaned with their unclean hands, but that it still was the signe and sacrament of that covenant. Whereupon the children that were borne of them, the Lord called his owne, which unlesse it were by speciall blessing, belonged nothing to him. So when hee hath left his covenant in France, Italie, Germanie, Spaine, England: since those provinces have beene oppressed with the tyrannie of Antichrist, yet that his covenant might remaine inviolable, first hee there preserved baptisme, the testimonie of his covenant, which being consecrate by his owne mouth retaineth her owne force notwithstanding the ungodlinesse of man: then, with his providence he hath wrought that there should remaine other remnants, least the church should be utterly destroyed. And as oftentimes buildings are so pulled downe, that the foundations and ruines remaine: so hee hath not suffered his church either to be overthrowne by Antichrist from the very foundation, or to be laid even with the ground (howsoever to punish the unthankfulnesse of men that had despised his word, he suffereth horrible shaking and dissipation to chance) but even after the very wasting hee willed that the building halfe pulled downe should yet remaine.

The Church of Rome not simplie a Church, nor utterly no Church, but a Church prophaned and unlawfully ordered.

12 Whereas therefore wee will not simply grant to the Papists the title of the church, we doe not therefore denie that there be churches among them: but only we contend of the true and lawfull ordering of the church: which is required in the communion both of the Sacraments which are the signes of profession, and also specially of doctrine. Daniel and Paul foretold that Antichrist should sit in the temple of God. With us wee account the Bishop of Rome the Captaine and Standard-bearer of that wicked and abhominable kingdome. Whereas his seate is placed in the temple of God, thereby is meant that his kingdome shall be such as cannot abolish the name of Christ nor of his Church. Heereby therefore appeareth, that wee doe not denie but that even under his tyrannie remaine churches, but such as hee hath prophaned with ungodlineſſe full of ſacriledge, ſuch as he hath afflicted with outragious dominion, ſuch as hee hath corrupted and in manner killed with evill and damnable doctrines, as with poyſoned drinks: ſuch wherein Chriſt lyeth halfe buryed, the Goſpell overwhelmed, godlineſſe baniſhed, the worſhipping of God in a manner aboliſhed: ſuch finally wherein all things are ſo troubled, that therein rather appeareth the face of Babilon than of the holy city of God. In ſumme, I ſay that they bee Churches, in reſpect that the Lord there marvellouſly preſerveth the remnants of his people howſoever they were diſperſed and ſcattered abroad, in reſpect that there remaine ſome tokens of the church, eſpecially theſe tokens, the effectuallneſſe whereof neither the craft of the devill, nor the malicioufneſſe of man can deſtroy. But on the other ſide becauſe theſe markes are blotted out, which in this diſcourſe wee ought principally to have reſpect unto, I ſay, that every one of their aſſemblies and the whole body wanteth the lawfull forme of a Church.

THE THIRD CHAPTER.

Of the Teachers and Miniſters of the Church, and of their election and office.

NOw it is meet that we ſpeake of the order, by which it was the Lords will to have this Church governed. For although in his Church he onely muſt rule and raigne, yea and beare prehemineence or excell in it, and this government to be uſed or executed by his onely word: yet becauſe hee dwelleth not among us in viſible preſence, ſo that he can preſently with his owne mouth declare his will unto us, we have ſaid that in this he uſeth the miniſtery of men, and as it were the travell of deputies, not in transferring his right and honour unto them, but onely that by their mouth he might doe his owne worke, like as a workeman to doe his worke uſeth his inſtrument. I am compelled to repeate againe thoſe things that I have already declared. He might indeede doe it either by himſelfe without any other helpe or inſtrument, or alſo by meane of Angels: but there are many cauſes why he had rather doe it by men. For by this meane firſt hee declareth his good will toward us, when he taketh out of men them that ſhall do his meſſage in the world, that ſhall be the interpreters of his ſecret will, finally that ſhall repreſent his owne perſon. And ſo by experience hee proveth that it is not vaine that commonly he calleth us his temples, when out of the mouthes of men, as out of his ſanctuary, hee giveth anſwers to men. Secondly, this is the beſt and moſt profitable exerciſe to humility, when hee accuſtometh us to obey his word, howſoever it be preached by men like unto us, yea ſometime our interiors in dignity. If hee himſelfe ſpeake from heaven, it were no marvell if his holy Oracles were without delay reverently received with the eares and minde of all men. For who would not dread his power being in preſence? Who would not bee throwne downe at the firſt ſight of ſo great Majeſty? Who would not bee confounded with that infinite brightneſſe? But when ſome ſilly man riſen out of the duſt ſpeaketh in the name of God, here with very good teſtimony wee declare our godlineſſe and reverent obedience toward God himſelfe, if to his miniſter we yeeld our ſelves willing to learne, which yet in nothing excelleth us. Therefore for this cauſe alſo hee hath hidden the treaſure of his heavenly wiſedome in brickle and earthen veſſels, that hee might have the certaine proofe how much he is eſteemed of us. Moreover there was nothing fitter for the cheriſhing of mutuall charity, than that men ſhould be bound together one to another with this bond, when one is made a Paſtor to teach the reſt, and they that are commanded to be ſchollers receive all one doctrine at one mouth. For if every man were able enough to ſerve himſelfe, and needed not the helpe of another: ſuch is the pride of mans nature, that every one would diſpiſe other, and ſhould againe bee diſpiſed of them. Therefore the Lord hath bound his Church with that knot, which he foreſaw to be the ſtrongeſt knot to hold unity together, when he hath left with men the doctrine of ſalvation, and of eternall life, that by their hands hee might communicate it to the reſt. Hereunto Paul had reſpect when hee wrote to the Epheſians, One body, one ſpirit, as alſo ye be called in one hope of your calling.

The reaſons why God would have his Church to bee governed by men.

Mat. 26. 11.

1 Cor. 4. 7.

Ephe. 4. 4.

One Lord, one Faith, one Baptisme: One God, and the Father of all, which is above all, and by all, and in us all. But unto every one of us grace is given according to the measure of the gift of Christ, Wherefore he saith: When he was gone up on high, he led captivity captive, he gave gifts to men. Hee that went downe, is the selfesame hee, that went up, that hee might fulfill all things. And the same hath given some to be Apostles, and some Prophets, and some Evangelists, and othersome Pastors and teachers, unto the restoring of the holy ones, to the worke of ministration, to the edifying of the body of Christ, untill we come all into the unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Sonne of God into a perfect man, into the measure of full growne age: that we may be no more children that may be carried about with every winde of doctrine: but following truth in charity, let us in all things grow into him that is the head, even Christ, in whom the whole body conjoyned and compacted together by all the joynt of subministration, according to the working in measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the editying of it selfe by charity.

They overthrow the Church that impaire the authority of mans ministery in the church

Eph. 4 10.

2 By these words hee sheweth, that that ministery of men, which God useth in governing his church is the chiefe sinew, whereby the faithfull cleave together in one body: and also hee sheweth that the church cannot otherwise bee preserved safe, but if it bee upholden by these stayes, in which it pleased the Lord to repose the salvation of it. Christ (saith he) is gone upon high, that he might fulfill all things. This is the manner of fulfilling, that by his ministers, to whom he hath committed that office, and hath given the grace to execute that worke, hee disposeth and distributeth his gifts to the church, yea and after a certaine manner giveth himselfe present, with extending the power of his spirit in this institution, that it should not bee vaine or idle. So is the restoring of the holy ones performed: so is the body of Christ edifyed, so doe we by all things grow into him that is the head, and doe grow together among our selves: so are wee all brought into the unity of Christ, if prophecie flourish among us, if wee receive the Apostles, if we refuse not the doctrine ministred unto us. Therefore he goeth about the dissipation, or rather the ruine and destruction of the church, whosoever hee be, that either endevoureth to abolish this order of whom we speake, and this kind of goverament, or minisheth the estimation of it as a thing not so necessary. For neither the light and heate of the sunne, nor meat and drinke are so necessary to nourish and sustaine this present life, as the office of the Apostles and Pastors is necessary to preserue the Church in earth.

Ephe 4.12.

The honour and necessity of church ministery.

Esay 52.7. Mat 5.15. and 14. Luke 10 16.

3 Therefore I have above admonished, that God hath oftentimes with such titles as hee could, commended the dignity thereof unto us, that wee should have it in most high honour and price, as the most excellent thing of all. Hee testifieth that hee giveth to men a singular benefit, in raysing them up teachers, where he commandeth the Prophet to cry out, that faire are the feete, and blessed is the comming of them that bring tydings of peace: and when hee calleth the Apostles the light of the world, and salt of the earth. Neither could this office bee more honourably advanced, than it was when hee said: He that heareth you, heareth me: He that dispiseth you, despiseth me. But there is no place more plaine, than in Paul in his second Epistle to the Corinthians, where hee as it were of purpose intreateth of this matter. Hee affirmeth therefore, that there is nothing in the church more excellent or glorious than the Ministery of the Gospel, forasmuch as it is the administration of the Spirit, and of righteousnesse, and eternall life. These and like sayings serve to this purpose, that that order of governing and preserving the Church by Ministers, which the Lord hath stablished for ever, should not grow out of estimation among us, and so at length by very contempt grow out of use. And how great is the necessity thereof, hee hath declared not onely by words, but also by examples. When his will was to shine more fully to Cornelius with the light of his truth, hee sent an Angell from heaven to send Peter unto him. When his will was to call Paul to the knowledge of himselfe, and to engrafte him into the Church, hee spake not to him with his owne voyce, but sent him to a man, of whom hee should receive both the doctrine of salvation, and the sanctification of baptisme. If it be not done without cause, that an Angell which is the interpreter of God, doe himselfe abstaine from declaring the will of God,

but commandeth that a man be sent for, to declare it: and not without cause that Christ the only Schoolemaster of the Faithfull committeth Paul to the schooling of a man, yea even that same Paul whom he had determined to take up into the third heaven, and to vouchsafe to grant him miraculous revelation of things unspeakeable: who is there now that dare despise that ministerie, or passe it over as a thing superfluous, the use whereof it hath pleased God to make approved by such examples? 2 Cor. 12.2.

4 They that have rule of the government of the Church according to the institution of Christ, are named of Paul first Apostles, then Prophets, thirdly Evangelists, fourthly Pastors, last of all Teachers. Of which, the two last alone have ordinarie office in the Church: the other three the Lord raised up at the beginning of his kingdome, and sometime yet also raiseth up, as the necessitie of times requireth. What the Apostles office is, appeareth by that commandement: goe, preach the Gospell to every creature. There are not certaine boundes appointed unto them: but the whole world is assigned them, to be brought into the obedience of Christ: that in spreading the Gospell among all nations whersoever they shall be able, they may each where raise up his Kingdome. Therefore Paul, when hee went about to prove his Apostleship, rehearseth that hee hath gotten to Christ not some one Citie, but hath far and wide spread abroad the Gospell: and that he hath not laid his hands to another mans foundation, but planted Churches where the name of the Lord had never beene heard of. Therefore the Apostles were sent to bring backe the world from falling away, untotrue obedience of GOD, and each where to stablish his kingdome by preaching of the Gospell: or (if you like that better) as the first builders of the Church, to lay the foundations thereof in all the world. Prophets hee calleth, not all expositors of Gods will whatsoever they be, but those that by singular revelation excelled, such as at this time either bee none, or are lesse notable. By Evangelists I understand those, which when in dignitie they were lesse than the Apostles, yet in office were next unto them, yea and occupied their roomes. Such were Luke, Timothie, Titus, and other like: and peradventure also the seventie Disciples, whom Christ appointed in the second place after the Apostles. According to this exposition (which seemeth to me agreable both with the words and meaning of Paul) those three offices were not ordained in the Church to this end that they should bee perpetuall, but onely to serve for that time wherein Churches were to bee erected, where were none before, or at least to bee removed from Moses to Christ. Albeit I denie not, but that afterward also the Lord hath sometime raised up Apostles, or at least in their places Evangelists, as it hath beene done in our time. For it was needfull to have such, to bring backe the Church from the falling away of Antichrist. Yet the office it selfe I doe nevertheless call extraordinarie, because it hath no place in the Churches alreadie well set in order. Next after these are Pastors and Teachers, whom the Church may never lacke: betweene whom I thinke that there is this difference, that the teachers are not appointed to beare rule of discipline, nor for the ministration of Sacraments, nor admonishments or exhortations, but onely to expound the Scripture, that pure and sound doctrine may be kept among the faithfull. But the office of Pastor containeth all these things within it.

5 Now we have, which were those ministeries in the Church that continued but for a time, and which were those that were ordained to endure perpetually. If wee joyne the Evangelists with the Apostles, wee shall have remaining two couples after a certaine manner answering the one to the other. For as our teachers are like to the old Prophets, in such sort are our Pastors like to the Apostles. The office of Prophets was more excellent, by reason of the singular gift that they had of revelation: but the office of teachers hath in a manner like order, and altogether the same end. So those twelve whom the Lord did choose, that they should publish abroad to the world the new preaching of the Gospell, in degree and dignitie went before the rest. For although by the meaning and propertie of the world, all the ministers of the Church may bee rightly called Apostles, because they are sent of the Lord, and are his messengers: yet because it was much behovefull, that there should bee a certaine knowledge had of the sending of them that should bring a thing new and unheard of, it was neeeſſary that thoſe twelve (to whoſe number Paul was afterward added) ſhould be garniſhed with ſome peculiar title above the reſt. Paul himſelfe indeede in one place giveth this name to Andronicus and Ionias, whom hee ſaith to have beene notable among the Apoſtles: but when he meaneth to ſpeake properly hee referreth it to none other but to that principall degree. And this is the common uſe of the Scripture. Yet the Paſtors (ſaving that each of them doe governe ſeverall Churches appointed to them) have all one charge with the Apoſtles. Now what manner of thing this is, let us heare it more plainely.

The same charge of Apostles and Pastors, saving that these have each of them severall Churches to governe.
Luk. 6.13.
Gal. 1.1.

Tit.1.9.

6 The Lord when hee ſent the Apoſtles, gave them commandement (as wee ſaid even now) to preach the Goſpell, and to baptiſe them that beleeve unto forgiveneſſe of ſinnes. He had before commanded, that they ſhould diſtribute the holy ſignes of his bodie and bloud, as he had done. Loe heere is a holy, inviolable, and perpetuall law laid upon them that ſucceed in the Apoſtles place, whereby they receive commandement to preach the Goſpell, and miniſter the Sacraments. Whereupon wee gather, that they which neglect both theſe things, doe falſly ſay that they beare the perſon of the Apoſtles. But what of the Paſtors? Paul ſpeaking not of himſelfe onely, but of them all, when he ſaith: Let a man ſo eſteeme us as the miniſters of Chriſt, and diſtributers of the myſteries of God. Againe in another place, A Biſhop muſt bee a faſt holder of that faithfull word which is according to doctrine: that he may be able to exhort by ſound doctrine, and to convince the gaineſayers. Out of thoſe and like places, which are each where to be found, we may gather, that alſo in the office of the Apoſtles, theſe be the two principall parts, to preach the Goſpell, and to miniſter the Sacraments. As for the order of teaching, it conſiſteth not onely in publike ſermons, but belongeth alſo to private admonitions. So Paul calleth the Epheſians to witneſſe that hee hath not fled from doing of any of thoſe things that were for their profit, but that hee preached and taught them both openly and in every houſe, teſtifying both to the Iewes and Grecians, repentance and faith in Chriſt. Againe a little after: that hee hath not ceaſed with teares to admoniſh every one of them. Neither yet belongeth it to my purpoſe at this preſent to expreſſe all the qualities of a good Paſtor, but onely to point out what they profeſſe that call themſelves paſtors: that is, that they are ſo made rulers of the Church, not that they ſhould have an idle dignitie, but that they ſhould with the doctrine of Chriſt inſtruct the people to true godlineſſe, miniſter the holy myſteries, and preſerve and exerciſe upright diſcipline. For whoſoever be ſet to bee watchmen in the Church, the Lord declareth unto them, that if any by their negligence periſh through ignorance, hee will require the bloud at their hands. That alſo pertaineth to them all, which Paul ſaith of himſelfe: Woe to mee unleſſe I preach the Goſpell, foraſmuch as the diſtributing thereof is committed to me. Finally, what the Apoſtles performed to the whole world, the ſame ought every Paſtor to performe to his flocke, to which he is appointed.

How far forth men are tied unto ſeverall charges.

7. Albeit when wee aſſigne to every one their ſeverall Churches, yet in the meane while wee doe not denie but that hee which is bound to one Church may helpe other Churches, if any troubleſome thing doe happen that requireth his preſence, or if hee bee asked counſell of any darke matter. But forasmuch as for the keeping of the peace of the Church, this policie is neceſſarie, that there bee ſet forth to every man what hee ſhould doe, leaſt all bee confuſedly diſordered, run about without calling, or raſhly run altogether into one place, and leaſt ſuch as are more carefull for their owne commoditie than for the edification of the Church, ſhould at their owne will leave their Churches vacant: this ordering ought commonly to bee kept ſo neere as may bee, that every man contented with his owne bounds, ſhould not breake into another mans charge. And this is no invention of man, but the ordinance of GOD himſelfe. For wee reade that Paul and Barnabas created Prieſts in all the ſeverall Churches of Lyſtra, Antioch, Iconium: and Paul himſelfe commandeth Titus that hee ſhould appoint Prieſts in every towne. So in one place hee ſpeaketh of the Biſhops of Philippes, and in another place of Archippus Biſhop of the Coloſſians. And there remaineth a notable Sermon of his in Luke, to the Prieſts of the Church of Epheſus. Whoſoever therefore ſhall take upon him the government and charge of the Church, let him know that he is bound to this law of Gods calling: not that as bound to the ſoyle (as the Lawyers tearme it) that is, made bound and faſtened unto it, he may not once move his foote from thence, if the common profit doe ſo require, ſo that it be done well and orderly: but he that is called into one place ought not himſelfe to thinke of removing, nor ſeeke to be delivered as hee ſhall thinke to be good for his commoditie. Then if it be expedient that any be removed to another place, yet he ought not to attempt it of his owne private adviſe, but to tary for publike authoritie.

With officers appointed for teaching, elders joyned to governe the Church.

8 But whereas I have without difference called them Biſhops, and Prieſts, and Paſtors, and Miniſters, that rule Churches: I did that according to the uſage of the Scripture, which indifferently uſeth theſe words. For whoſoever do execute the Miniſterie of the word, to them he giveth the title of Biſhops. So by Paul, where Titus is commanded to appoint Prieſts in every towne, it is immediatly added. For a Biſhop muſt bee unreproveable, &c. So in another place hee ſaluteth many Biſhops in one Church. And in the Acts it is rehearſed, that he called together the Prieſts of Epheſus, whom he himſelfe in his own ſermon calleth Biſhops. Heere now it is to be noted, that hitherto we have recited none but thoſe offices that ſtand in the Miniſterie of the word: neither doth Paul make mention of any other in that fourth Chapter which wee have alleaged. But in the Epiſtle to the Romanes, and in the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, he reckoneth up other offices, as powers, the gift of healing, interpretation, government, caring for the poore. Of the which I omitted thoſe that endured but for a time, becauſe it is to no profitable purpoſe to tary upon them. But there are two that doe perpetually abide, that is to ſay, government, and care of the poore. Governours I thinke were the Elders choſen out of the people, that ſhould together with the Biſhops have rule of the judgement of manners, and the uſing of diſcipline. For a man cannot otherwiſe expound that which hee ſaith: Let him that ruleth doe it with carefulneſſe. Therefore at the beginning every Church had their Senate, gathered of godly, grave, and holie men: which had that ſame juriſdiction in correcting of vices, whereof wee ſhall ſpeake hereafter. And that this was the order of more than one age, experience it ſelfe declareth. Therefore this office of government is alſo neceſſarie for all ages.

Deacons and widowes choſen to care for the poore and ſicke. Rom. 12. 9.

9 The care of the poore was committed to the Deacons. Howbeit to the Romanes there are ſet two kindes. Let him that giveth (ſaith Paul in that place) doe it in ſimplicitie: let him that hath mercie, doe it in cheerefulneſſe. For as much as it is certaine that he ſpeaketh of the publike offices of the Church, it muſt needs be that there were two ſeverall degrees. Unleſſe my judgement deceive me, in the firſt point hee meaneth Deacons, that diſtributed the almes: in the other he ſpeaketh of them that had given themſelves to looking to the poore and ſicke: of which ſort were the widowes of whom hee maketh mention to Timothie. For women could execute no other publike office, but to give themſelves to the ſervice of the poore. If we grant this, (as we muſt needs grant it) then there ſhall be two ſorts of Deacons: of which, one ſort ſhall ſerve in diſtributing the things of the poore; the other in looking to the poore of the church themſelves. But although the very word Diaconia, Deaconrie extendeth further: yet the Scripture ſpecially calleth them Deacons, to whom the Church hath given the charge to diſtribute the almes, and to take care of the poore, and hath appointed them as it were ſtewards of the common treaſurie of the poore: whoſe beginning, inſtitution, and office, is deſcribed of Luke in the Acts. For when a murmuring was raiſed by the Grecians: for that in the miniſterie of the poore their widowes were neglected, the Apoſtles excuſing themſelves with ſaying that they could not ſerve both offices, both the preaching of the word and the miniſtring at tables, required of the multitude, that there might be choſen ſeven honeſt men, to whom they might commit that doing. Loe what manner of Deacons the Apoſtolike Church had, and what Deacons it were meete for us to have according to their example.

Act. 6. 3.

Order and ſeemlineſſe eſpecially required in church government.

10 Now whereas in the holie aſſemblie all things are to be done in order and comely, there is nothing wherein that ought to be more diligently obſerved, than in ſtabliſhing the order of government: becauſe there is no where greater perill if any thing be done unorderly. Therefore to the end that unquiet and troubleſome men (which otherwiſe would happen) ſhould raſhly thruſt in themſelves to teach or to rule, it is expresly provided, that no man should without calling take upon him a publike office in the Church. Therefore that a man may be judged a true minister of the Church, first he must be orderly called, then he must answere his vocation, that is to say, take upon him and execute the duties enjoyned him. This we may oftentimes marke in Paul: which when hee meaneth to approve his Apostleship, in a manner alway with his faithfulnesse in executing his office hee alleadgeth his calling. If so great a minister of Christ dare not take upon himselfe the authoritie, that hee should bee heard in the Church, but because hee both is appointed thereunto by the commandement of the Lord, and also faithfully performeth that which is committed unto him: how great shamefulnesse shall it be, if any man wanting both or either of these, shall challenge such honor to himselfe? But because we have above touched the necessitie of executing the office, now let us entreat onely of the calling.

Inward and outward calling of men to execute the ministerie of the church.

11 The discourse thereof standeth in fower points: that we should know, what manner of ministers, how, and by whom, ministers ought to be institute, and with what usage or what ceremonie they are to be admitted. I speake of the outward and solemne calling, which belongeth to publike order of the Church: as for that secret calling, whereof every minister is privie in his owne conscience before God, and hath not the Church witnesse of it, I omit it. It is a good witnesse of our heart, that not by any ambition, nor covetousnesse, nor any other greedie desire, but with pure feare of God and zeale to edifie the Church, wee receive the office offered unto us. That indeed is (as I have said) necessarie for every one of us, if wee will approve our ministerie allowable before God. Nevertheless he is rightly called in presence of the Church, that commeth unto it with an evill conscience, so that his wickednesse be not open. They are wont also to say that even private men are called to the ministerie, whom they see to be meete and able to execute it: because verily learning joyned with godlinesse and with the other qualities of a good Pastour, is a certaine preparation to the very office. For whom the Lord hath appointed to so great an office, he first furnisheth them with those armours that are required to fulfill it, that they should not come emptie and unprepared unto it. Whereupon Paul also to the Corinthians, when he meant to dispute of the very offices, first rehearsed the gifts which they ought to have that execute the offices. But because this is the first sort of those fower points that I have propounded, let us now goe forward unto it.

1 Cor. 12. 7.

Of what qualitie and with what reverence ministers should be chosen.
2 Tim. 3. 1.

12 What manner of Bishops it is meete to choose, Paul doth largely declare in two places, but the summe commeth to this effect, that none are to bee chosen, but they that are of so sound doctrine, and of holy life, and not notable in any vice, which might both take away credit from them, and procure slander to the ministerie. Of Deacons and Elders there is altogether like consideration. It is alway to bee looked unto, that they be not unable or unfit to beare the burden that is laid upon them, that is to say, that they may be furnished with those powers that are necessarie to the fulfilling of their office. So when Christ was about to send his Apostles, he garnished them with those weapons and instruments which they could not want. And Paul when he had painted out the image of a good and true Bishop, warneth Timothie, that he would not defile himselfe with choosing any man that differeth from it. I refer this word How, not to the Ceremonie of choosing, but to the reverent feare that is to be kept in the choosing. Hereupon come the fastings and praiers, which Luke reciteth that the faithfull used when they made Priests. For whereas they understood that they medled with a most earnest matter, they durst attempt nothing, but with great reverence and carefulnesse. But they chiefly applied themselves to praiers, whereby they might crave of God the spirit of counsell and discretion.

Luk. 21. 15. & 24. 49. Mat. 16. 15. Act. 1. 8. 1 Tim. 5. 22.

Apostles elected of God himselfe.

13 The third thing that we have set in our division was, by whom ministers are to be chosen. Of this thing no certaine rule can be gathered out of the institution of Apostles, which had some difference from the common calling of the rest. For because it was an extraordinarie ministerie, that it might be made discernable by some more notable marke, it behooved that they which should execute it, should bee called and appointed by the Lords owne mouth. They therefore tooke in hand their doing, being furnished by no mans election, but by the only commandement of God and of Christ.

Hereupon

Hereupon commeth that when the Apoſtles would put another in the place of Judas, they durſt not certainly name any one man, but they brought forth two, that the Lord ſhould declare by lot, whether of them he would have to ſucceed. After this manner alſo it is meete to take this, that Paul denieth that he was create Apoſtle of men or by man, but by Chriſt and God the Father. That firſt point, that is to ſay of men, hee had common with all the godly miniſters of the word. For no man could rightly take upon him that execution, but hee that were called of God. But the other point was proper and ſingular to himſelfe. Therefore when he glorieth of this, he doth not only boaſt that he hath that which belongeth to a true and lawfull Paſtour, but alſo bringeth forth the ſignes of his Apoſtleſhip. For when there were ſome among the Galathians, which travelling to diminiſh his authoritie, made him ſome meane diſciple, put in office under them by the principall Apoſtles : hee, to defend in ſafetie the dignitie of his preaching, which hee knew to be ſhot at by thoſe ſubtile deviſes, needed to ſhew himſelfe in all points nothing inferiour to the other Apoſtles. Therfore hee affirmeth that hee was choſen, not by the judgement of men, like ſome common Biſhop, but by the mouth and manifeſt Oracle of the Lord himſelfe. Act.1.13. Gal.1.12.

14 But no man that is ſober will denie, that it is according to the order of lawfull calling, that Biſhops ſhould be appointed by men : foraſmuch as there are ſo many teſtimonies of the Scripture for proofe thereof. Neither doth that ſaying of Paul make to the contrary, as it is ſaid, that hee was not ſent of men, nor by men : foraſmuch as he ſpeaketh not there of the ordinary chooſing of Miniſters, but chalengeth to himſelfe that which was ſpeciall to the Apoſtles. Howbeit God alſo appointed Paul by himſelfe by ſingular prerogative, that in the meane time he uſed the diſcipline of Eccleſiaſticall calling. For Luke reporteth it thus, when the Apoſtles were faſting and praying, the Holy Ghoſt ſaid : Separate unto me Paul and Barnabas to the worke to which I have ſeverally choſen them. To what purpoſe ſerved that ſeparation and putting on of hands, ſith the holy Ghoſt hath teſtified his owne election, but that the diſcipline of the Church in appointing miniſters by men, might be preſerved? Therefore the Lord could by no plainer example approve ſuch order, than he did when having firſt declared that he had ordained Paul an Apoſtle for the Gentiles, yet he willeth him to be appointed by the Church. Which thing wee may ſee in the chooſing of Mathias. For becauſe the office of Apoſtleſhip was of ſo great importance, that they durſt not by their owne judgement chooſe any one man into that degree, they did ſet two men in the middeſt, upon the one of whom the lot ſhould fall : that ſo both the election might have an open teſtimonie from heaven, and yet the policy of the Church ſhould not be paſſed over. Biſhops lawfully called by men. Gal.1.1. Act.13.2. Act.1.23.

15 Now it is demanded whether the miniſter ought to bee choſen of the whole Church, or onely of the other of the ſame office, and of the Elders that have the rule of diſcipline, or whether hee may be made by the authoritie of one man. They that give this authoritie to one man, alleadge that which Paul ſaith to Titus : Therefore I have left thee in Creta, that thou ſhouldeſt appoint in every towne Prieſts. Againe to Timothie : laie not hands quickly upon any man. But they are deceived if they thinke that either Timothie at Epheſus, or Titus in Creta, uſed a kingly power, that either of them ſhould diſpoſe all things at his owne will. For they were above the reſt, onely to goe before the people with good and wholſome counſels : not that they onely, excluding all other, ſhould doe what they liſted. And that I may not ſeeme to faine any thing, I will make it plaine by a like example. For Luke rehearſeth that Paul and Barnabas appointed Prieſts in divers Churches : but hee alſo expreſſeth the order or manner how, when hee ſaith that it was done by voices ordaining Prieſts (ſaith he) by lifting up of hands in every Church. Therefore they two did create them : but the whole multitude, as the Grecians manner was in elections, did by holding up their hands, declare whom they would have. Even in like manner the Roman hiſtories doe oftentimes ſay that the Counſell which kept the aſſemblies, created new officers, for none other cauſe but for that he received the voices and governed the people in the election. Truly it is not likely that Paul granted more to Timothy and Titus than he tooke to himſelfe. But we ſee that he was wont to create Biſhops by voices of the people. Therefore the pla- Whether a miniſter of the Church may be made by the authoritie of one man or no. Tit.1.15. 1 Tim.5.22. Act.14.23.

ces above are so to be understood, that they minish nothing of the common right and liberty of the Church. Therefore Ciprian saith well, when he affirmeth that it commeth from the authority of God, that the Priest should bee chosen in presence of the people before the eies of all men, and should by publike judgement and testimony bee allowed for worthy and meet. For wee see that this was by the commandement of the Lord observed in the Leviticall Priests, that before their consecration they should be brought into the sight of the people. And no otherwise is Mathias added to the fellowship of the Apostles: and no otherwise the seven Deacons were created: but the people seeing and allowing of it. These examples (saith Cyprian) doe shew, that the ordering of a Priest ought not to be done, but in the knowledge of the people standing by: that the ordering may be just and lawfull, which hath beene examined by the witnesse of all. We are therefore come thus far, that this is by the word of God a lawfull calling of a minister, when they that seeme meet are created by the consent and allowance of the people and that other pastors ought to beare rule of the election, that nothing be done amisse of the multitude, either by lightnesse, or by evill affections, or by disorder.

Levit. 8. 6. Num. 20. 26. Act. 1. 15. & 6. 2.

The forme of ordaining ministers in the Church by laying on of hands.

16 Now remaineth the forme of ordering, to which wee assigned the last place in the calling. It is evident that the Apostles used no other ceremony when they admitted any man to the ministery, but the laying on of hands. And I thinke that this usage came from the manner of the Hebrewes, which did as it were present unto God by laying on of hands that which they would have blessed and hallowed. So when Jacob was about to blesse Ephraim and Manasse, hee laid his hands upon their heads. Which thing our Lord followed, when he praied over the infants. In the same meaning (as I thinke) the Jewes by the ordinance of the law, laid hands upon the Sacrifices. Wherefore the Apostles by laying on of hands did signifie that they offered him to God, whom they admitted into the ministery. Albeit they used it also upon them to whom they applied the visible graces of the spirit. Howsoever it be, this was the solemne usage, so oft as they called any man to the ministerie of the Church. So they consecrated Pastors and teachers, and so also Deacons. But although there be no certaine commandement concerning the laying on of hands, yet because we see that it was continually used among the Apostles, their so diligent observing of it ought to bee to us insteed of a commandement. And truly it is profitable, that by such a signe, both the dignity of the ministery should be commended to the people, and also that he which is ordained should be admonished, that he is not now at his owne liberty, but made bound to God and that Church. Moreover it shall not be a vaine signe, if it be restored to the naturall beginning of it. For if the Spirit of God, hath ordained nothing in the Church in vaine, wee must thinke that this ceremonie, sith it proceeded from him, is not unprofitable, so that it be not turned into a superstitious abuse. Last of all this is to be holden, that not the whole multitude did laie their hands upon the ministers, but the Pastors onely. Howbeit it was uncertaine whether many did alway lay on their hands or no. But it is evident that that was done in the Deacons, in Paul and Barnabas, and a few other. But Paul himselfe in another place reporteth, that he, and not many other, did lay his hands upon Timothee. I admonish thee (saith he) that thou raise up the grace which is in thee by laying on of my hands. For, as for that which in the other Epistle is spoken of the laying on of the hands of the degree of Priests, I doe not so take it, as though Paul did speake of the company of the Elders, but I understand by that word the verie ordinance it selfe: as if hee had said: Make that the Grace, which thou hast received by laying on of hands when I did create thee a Priest, may not be voide.

THE FOVRTH CHAPTER.

Of the state of the old Church, and of the manner of governing that was in use before the Papacie.

The ministers of the ancient Church of Christ.

HItherto we have intreated of the order of governing the Church, as it hath beene delivered us out of the pure word of God, and of the ministeries, as they were instituted by Christ. Now that all these things may be more clearely and familiarly opened, opened, and also be better fastened in our mindes: it shall bee profitable in these things to consider the forme of the old Church. which shall represent to our eies a certaine image of Gods institution. For although the Bishops of those times did set forth many Canons, wherein they seemed to expresse more than was expressed in the holy Scripture: yet they with such heedfulnesse framed all their order after the onely rule of Gods word, that a man may easily see that in this behalfe they had in a manner nothing disagreeing from the word of God. But although there might be somewhat wanting in their ordinances, yet because they with syncere zeale endevoured to preserve Gods institution, and they swarved not much from it, it shall bee very profitable here shortly to gather what manner of observation they had. As we have declared that there are three sorts of Ministers commended unto us in the Scripture: so all the Ministers that the old Church had, it devided into three Orders. For out of the order of Elders were partly chosen Pastors ond teachers: the rest of them had the rule of the judgement and correction of manners. To the Deacons was committed the care of the poore, and the distributing of the almes. As for the Readers and Acolothes, they were not names of certaine offices: but those whom they called Clerkes, they trained from their youth upward in certaine exercises to serve the Church, that they might the better understand to what purpose they were appointed, and might in time come the better prepared to their office: as I shall by and by shew more at large. Therefore Hierom, when hee had appointed five Orders of the Church, reckoneth up Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Beleevers, and Cethecumeni, to the rest of the Cleargie and Monkes hee giveth no proper place.

Presbiters or Priests and Deacons out of the order of Presbiters Pastors and teachers chosen.

In Esa. c. 6.

2. Therefore to whom the office of teaching was injoyned, all them they named Priests in every Citie they chose out of their owne number one man, to whom they specially gave the title of Bishop; that dissentions should not grow of equalitie, as it is wont to come to passe. Yet the Bishop was not so above the the rest in honor and dignity that he had a dominion over his fellowes. But what office the consull had in the Senate, to propound of matters, to ask opinions, to go before the other with counselling, admonishing, and exhorting, to governe the whole action with his authoritie, and to put in execution that which is decreed by common counsel; the same office had the Bishop in the assembly of the Priests. And the old writers themselves confesse, that the same was by mens consent brought in for the necessitie of the times. Therefore Hierome upon the Epistle to Titus saith. The same was a Priest which was a Bishop. And before that by the instinction of the Divell, there were dissentions in religion, and it was said among the people, I am of Paul, I am of Cephas: Churches were governed by common counsell of Elders. Afterward, that the seeds of dissentions might be plucked up, all the care was committed to one man. As therefore the Priests doe know, that by custome of the Church they are subject to him that is set over them: so let the Bishops know, that they are above the Priests, rather by custome, than by the truth of the Lords disposing, and that they ought to governe the Church in common together. But in another place he teacheth, how ancient an institution it was. For he saith that at Alexandria, from Marke the Evangelist even to Heraclas and Dyonysius, the Priests did alway choose out one of themselves, and set him in a higher degree, whom they named a Bishop. Therefore evere Citty had a company of Priests which were Pastors, and Teachers. For they all did execute among the people that office of teaching, exhorting and correcting, which Paul appointeth to the Bishops: and that they might leave seed after them, they travailed in teaching the younger men, that had professed themselves souldiers in the holy warfare. To every Citty there was appointed a certaine Country, that should take their Priests from thence, and bee accounted as it were into the body of that Church. Every company (as I have before said) onely for preservation of policie and peace were under one Bishop: which was so above the rest in dignitie, that he was subject to the assemblie of his brethren. If the compasse of ground that was under his Bishoprick were so great, that he could not suffice to serve all the offices of a Bishop in every place of it, in the country it selfe there were in certaine places appointed Priests which in small matters should execute his authority. Them they called country Bishops, because in the country they represented the Bishop.

A colledge or company of Priests in every Citty, to teach, exhort, and correct the people: out of that company for avoiding of dissention, one chosen to be a Bishop: the honor & dignitie which a Bishop so chosen had above the rest: the country furnished with Priests from the Citie: those Priests under the Bishops authority: the compasse of ground committed to the care of one Bishop, termed the Bishopricke in the Primitive Church.

Epi. ad Eva. Tit. 1. 9.

3 But,

The office of Bishops and Priests to distribute the word and Sacraments.

3 But, so much as belongeth to the office, whereof we now speake, as well the Bishops as the Priests were bound to applie the distributing of the word and Sacraments. For it was ordained onely at Alexandria, (because Arrius had there troubled the Church) that the Priest should not preach to the people, as Socrates saith in the 9. booke of the Tripartite Historie. Which yet Hierom confesseth that hee misliketh not. Truly it should be counted monstrous, if any man had given out himselfe for a Bishop, that had not also in verie deed shewed himselfe a true Bishop. Therefore such was the severitie of those times, that all Ministers were driven to the fulfilling of such office, as the Lord requireth of them. Neither doe I rehearse the manner of one age alone. For even in Gregories time, when the Church was now almost decaied (certainly it was much degenerate from the ancient pureneſſe) it had not been tolerable that any Bishop should abstaine from preaching. The Priest (saith he in one place) dieth if there bee no sound heard of him: because hee asketh against himselfe the wrath of the secret judge, if hee goe without sound of preaching. And in another place: When Paul testifieth that hee is cleane from the blood of all: in this saying we be convinced, we be bound, wee be shewed to be guiltie, which are called Priests, which beside the evils that we have of our owne, adde also the deaths of other: because we kill so many as we, being luke-warme and silent, doe daily see to goe to death. He calleth himselfe and other silent because they were lesse diligent in their worke than they ought to be. When he spareth not them, that did halfe performe their duty: what thinke you he would have done, if a man had altogether sit idle? Therefore this was a great while holden in the Church, that the chiefe dutie of the Bishop was to feed Gods people with the word, or both publikely and privately to edifie the Church with sound doctrine.

Act. 20. 16.

For preserving of discipline Archbishops & Patriarches: ordained by them who never meant to forge another forme of ruling the Church, than God hath appointed in his word.

4 But whereas every Province had among their Bishops one Archbishop: also where in the Nicene Synod there were ordained Patriarches, which should in degree and dignitie be above the Archbishops, that pertained to the preserving of discipline. Howbeit in this discourse, that which was most rarely used may not bee omitted. For this cause therefore chiefly these degrees were ordained, that if any thing happened in any Church, that could not well be ended by a few, might be referred to a provinciall Synod. If the greatneſſe or difficultie of the matter required a greater discussing, the Patriarches were also called to it with the Synods, from whom there might be no appeale but to a generall Councell. The government so ordered many called a Hierarchie, by a name (as I thinke) unproper, and truly unused in the Scriptures. For the holy Ghost willed to provide, that no man should dreame of a principalitie or dominion when the government of the Church is spoken of. But, if leaving the word we looke upon the thing, we shall finde that the old Bishops meant to forge no forme of ruling the Church, differing from that which the Lord appointed by his word.

The office of Deacons, the same under the Apostles, and in the primitive Church: the occasion of making Subdeacons and Archdeacons.

5 Neither was the order of the Deacons at that time any other than it was under the Apostles. For they received the daily offerings of the Faithfull, and the yearely revenues of the Church, to bestow them upon true uses, that is to say, to distribute them to feede partly the ministers, and partly the poore: but by the appointment of the Bishop, to whom also they yearely rendered accounts of their distribution. For whereas the Canons doe every where make the Bishop distributer of all the goods of the Church, it is not so to be understood, as though he did by himselfe discharge that care: but because it was his part to appoint to the Deacon, who should be received into the common almes of the Church, and of that which remained, to whom it should be given, and how much to every one: because he had an overseeing whether the Deacon did faithfully execute that which belonged to his office. For thus it is read in the Canons which they ascribe to the Apostles: Wee command that the Bishop have the goods of the Church in his owne power. For if hee be put in trust with the Soules of men, which are more precious, much more it is meete that he have charge of money: so that by his power all things may be distributed to the poore by the Elders and Deacons: that they may be all ministred with feare and carefulneſſe. And in the Councell of Antioche it is decreed, that the Bishops should be restrained that meddle with the goods of the Church, without the knowledge of the Elders and Deacons. But of that point we neede to make no longer disputation, sith it is evident by many Epistles of Cap. 35.

Gregorie

Gregory, that even at that time, when otherwise the ordinances of the church were much corrupted, yet this observation continued, that the Deacons should under the Bishop be the stewards for the poore. As for Subdeacons, it is likely that at the beginning they were joyned to the Deacons, that they should use their service about the poore: but that difference was by little and little confounded. But Archdeacons began then to be created, when the plenty of the goods, required a new and more exact manner of disposing them: Albeit Hierome doth say, that it was even in his age. In their charge was the summe of their revenewes, possessions, and store, and the collection of the daily offerings. Whereupon Gregory declareth to the Archdeacon Salon, that hee should bee holden guilty if any of the goods of the church, perished either by his fraud or negligence. But whereas it was given to them to read the Gospell to the people, and to exhort them to pray: and whereas they were admitted to deliver the Cup in the holy Supper, that was rather done to garnish their office, that they should execute it with the more reverence, when by such signes they were admonished that it was no prophane Bayliwike that they exercised, but a spirituall function, and dedicate to God.

Epi ad Nep. Epi. 10. lit.

6 Here also wee may judge what use there was, and what manner of distribution of the church goods. Each were both in the decrees of Synods, and among the old writers it is to bee found, that whatsoever the Church possesseth either in lands or in mony, is the patrimony of the poore. Therefore oftentimes there, this song is sung to the Bishops and Deacons, that they should remember, that they meddle not with their owne goods, but the goods appointed to the necessity of the poore: which if they unfaithfully suppresse or waste, they shall be guilty of Bloud. Whereby they are admonished, with great feare and reverence, as in the sight of God, without respect of persons, to distribute them to whom they bee due. Hereupon also come those grave protestations in Chrisostome, Ambrose, Augustine, and other like Bishops, whereby they affirme their owne uprightnesse to the people. But sith it is equity, and established by the Law of the Lord, that they which employ their service to the Church, should bee fed with the common charges of the Church, and also many Priests in that age, consecrating their patrimonies to God, were willingly made poore: the distributing was such, that neither the Ministers wanted sustenance, nor the poore were neglected. But yet in the meane time it was provided, that the ministers themselves, which ought to give example of honest sparing to other should not have so much, whereby they might abuse it to riotous excesse or delicious esse, but onely wherewith to sustaine their owne need. For those of the Cleargy (saith Hierome) which are able to live of the goods of their Parents, if they take that which is the poores, doe commit sacriledge, and by such abuse they eate and drinke to themselves damnation.

The bestowing of Church goods.

7 First the ministration was free and voluntary, whereas the Bishops and Deacons were of their owne will lawfull, and uprightnesse of conscience and innocency of life were to them instead of the Lawes. Afterward when evill examples grew of the greedinesse or perverse affections of some, to correct those faults, the Canons were made, which divided the revenues of the church into foure parts: of which they assigned one part to them of the Clergy, the second to the poore, the third to the maintainance and reparation of churches, and other holy buildings, the fourth to the poore as well strangers as of their owne countrey. For whereas the other Canons give this last part to the Bishop, that varieth nothing from my above said division. For they meane not that that part should be his owne, that either hee himselfe alone should devoure it, or power it out, upon whom or what he list, but that it should suffice to maintaine the Hospitality which Paul requireth of that order. And so doe Gelasius and Gregorie expound it. For Gelasius bringeth no other reason why the Bishop should challenge any thing to himselfe, but that he might give it prisoners and strangers. And Gregory speaketh yet more plainely. It is the manner (saith he) of the sea Apostolike, to give commandement to the Bishop when he is ordered, that of all the revenue that ariseth, there bee made foure portions: that is to say, the one to the Bishop and his Family for Hospitality, and entertainment: the second to the Clergy: the third to the poore: the fourth to the repairing of churches. Therefore it was lawfull for the Bishop to take

Church goods divided into foure parts: one assigned to the maintenance of the Cleargie, the rest to other uses.

2 Tim. 3. 2.

nothing

nothing to his owne use, but so much as were enough for moderate and meane foode and clothing. If any began to exceede either in riotous expence, or in ostentation and pompe, hee was by and by repressed by his fellowes, and if he obeyed not, he was put from his dignity.

The treasures & ornaments of the Church made away to helpe the necessities of the poore which could not otherwise be provided for.

8 As for that which they bestowed upon garnishing of holy things, at the first it was very little. Afterward when the Church became somewhat richer, yet in that behalfe they still kept a meane. And yet all the mony that was bestowed thereupon remained safe for the poore, if any great necessity happened. So when famine possessed the province of Hierusalem, and the need could not otherwise be releeved, Cyrillus sold the vessels and garments and spent them upon sustenance of the poore, Likewise Acasius Bishop of Amida, when a great multitude of the Persians, in a manner starved for hunger, called together the Clergie, and when he had made that notable oration, Our God needeth neither dishes nor cups, because he neither eateth nor drinketh, hee molt the vessels, to make thereof both meate and ransome for men in misery. Hierome also, when he inveigheth against the too much gorgeousnesse of temples, doth with honour make mention of Exuperius Bishop of Tholosa in his time, which carried the Lords body in a wicker basket, and his bloud in glasse, but suffereth no poore man to be hungry. That which I even now said of Acasius, Ambrose reherseth of himselfe. For when the Arrians charged him, for that hee had broken the holy vessels to ransome prisoners, hee used this most godly excuse: Hee that sent the Apostles without gold, gathered Churches together without gold. The Church hath gold not to keepe it, but to bestow it, and give releife in necessities. What neede is to keepe that which helpeth not? Doe wee not know, how much gold and silver the Assyrians tooke out of the temple of the Lord? Doth not the Priest better to melt them for the sustenance of the poore, if other releifes doe faile, than an enemie, a robber of God to beare them away? Will not the Lord say: Why hast thou suffered so many needy to die for hunger? and verily thou hadst gold whereof thou mightest have ministred them sustenance. Why were so many led away captive, and not ransomed? why were so many slaine by the enemie? It had beene better that thou shouldest save the vessels of living men, than of mettals. To these things that thou shalt not be able to answer. For what wouldst thou say? I feared least Gods temple should want garnishing. He would answer, Sacraments require not gold: neither doe those things please with gold that are not bought with gold. The ransoming of prisoners is a garnishing of Sacraments. In summe wee see, that it is most true which the same man saith in another place, that whatsoever the Church then possessed was the store of the needy. Againe: that a Bishop hath nothing that is not the poores.

The institution of young Clergymen & young clerks in lower functions, to be trained up for the higher services of the Church.

9 These that wee have rehearsed were the ministeries of the old Church. For the other of which the Ecclesiasticall writers make mention, were rather certaine exercises and preparations, then appointed offices. For those holy men, that they might leave a store for the church after them, received into their charge, governance and discipline, young men which with the consent and authority of their parents, professed themselves souldiers of the spirituall warefare: and they so framed them from their tender age, that they should not come unskilfull and raw to the executing of their office. But all they that were instructed with such beginnings, were called clarks, I would indeed that some other more proper name had rather beene given them: For this name grew in of error, or of corrupt affection: forasmuch as Peter calleth the whole church the Clergie, that is to say, the Lords inheritance. But the institution it selfe was very holy and profitable, that they which would consecrate themselves and their service to the Church, should be so brought up under the keeping of the bishop, that none should minister to the Church, but he that were well informed aforehand, and that had from his very youth both sucked holy doctrine, and by severe discipline put in a certaine continuing quality of gravity and holy life, and were estranged from worldly cares and were accustomed to spirituall cares and studies. But as young souldiers are by certaine counterfeit skirmishes instructed to learne true and earnest fight, so there were also certaine rudiments, whereby they were exercised while they were Clerkes, before that they were promoted to the very offices. Therefore first they committed to

THE SIXT CHAPTER.

Of the Supremacie of the Sea of Rome.

The Supremacie of the Sea of Rome, neither derived from Chriſts inſtitution, nor from the uſe of the old Church.

HItherto we have rehearſed thoſe orders of the church, which were in the government of the old church: but afterward corrupted in times, and from thence forth more and more abuſed, doe now in the Popiſh Church retaine onely their name, and indeed are nothing elſe but viſours: that by compariſon the godly reader might judge what manner of Church the Romaniſts have, for whoſe ſake they make us ſchiſmatikes, becauſe we have departed from it. But as for the head and top of the whole order, that is to ſay, the Supremacie of the Sea of Rome, whereby they travell to prove that they onely have the Catholike Church, we have not yet touched it: becauſe it tooke beginning neither from the inſtitution of Chriſt, nor from the uſe of the old Church, as thoſe former parts did: which wee have ſhewed to have ſo proceeded from antiquitie, that by wickedneſſe of times they are utterly degenerate, and have put on altogether a new forme. And yet they goe about to perſwade the world, that this is the chiefe and in a manner onely bond of the unitie of the church, if we cleave to the Sea of Rome, and continue in the obedience thereof. They reſt (I ſay) principally upon this ſtay, when they will take away the Church from us, and claime it to themſelves, for that they keepe the head, upon which the unitie of the Church hangeth, and without which the Church muſt needs fall aſunder and be broken in peeces. For thus they thinke that the Church is as it were a maimed and headleſſe bodie, unleſſe it be ſubject to the Sea of Rome, as to her head. Therefore when they talke of their Hierarchie, they alway take their beginning at this principle: that the Biſhop of Rome (as the Vicar of Chriſt, which is the head of the Church) is in his ſtead Preſident of the univerſall Church: and that otherwiſe the Church is not well ordered, unleſſe that Sea doe hold the Supremacie above all other. Therefore this alſo is to be examined of what ſort it is: that we may omit nothing that pertaineth to a juſt government of the Church.

The high prieſts authoritie amongſt the Iewes, no proofe for the ſoveraigne dignitie of Rome.

2 Let this therefore be the principall point of the queſtion: Whether it be neceſſarie for the true forme of Hierarchie (as they call it) or Eccleſiaſticall order, that one Sea ſhould be above the reſt both in dignitie and in power, that it may be the head of the whole body. But wee make the Church ſubject to too unjuſt lawes, if we lay this neceſſitie upon it, without the word of God. Therefore if the adverſaries will prove that which they require, they muſt firſt ſhew that this diſpoſition was ordained by Chriſt. For this purpoſe they alleadge out of the Law the high Prieſthood, alſo the high judgement, which God did inſtitute at Hieruſalem. But it is eaſie to give a ſolution, and that many waies, if one way doe not ſatisfie them. Firſt no reaſon compelleth to extend that to the whole world, which was profitable in one nation: yea rather, the order of one nation and of the whole world ſhall be farre different. Becauſe the Iewes were on each ſide compaſſed with Idolaters: that they ſhould not bee diverſly drawne with varietie of religions, God appointed the place of worſhipping him in the middeſt part of the land: there hee ordained over them one head Biſhop, whom they ſhould have all regard unto, that they might be the better kept together in unitie. Now when religion is ſpred abroad into the whole world, who doth not ſee that it is altogether an abſurditie, that the government of the Eaſt and Weſt be given to one man? For it is in effect as much as if a man ſhould affirme that the whole world ought to be governed by one Ruler, becauſe one peece of land hath no moe rulers but one. But there is yet another reaſon, why that ought not to be made an example to be followed. No man is ignorant that the high Biſhop was a figure of Chriſt. Now, ſince the Prieſthood is removed, that right muſt alſo be removed. But to whom is it removed? Truly not to the Pope (as he himſelfe is ſo bold ſhameleſly to boaſt) when he draweth this title to himſelfe: but to Chriſt, which as hee alone ſuſtaineth this office, without any Vicar or Succeſſor, ſo hee reſigneth the honour to none other. For the Prieſthood conſiſteth not in doctrine onely, but in the appeasing of God, which Christ hath fully wrought by his death, and in that intercession which he now useth with his Father.

Heb. 7. 12.

Things in the new Testament spoken to Peter, prove not the power which the Bishop of Rome challengeth.

3 There is therefore no cause why they should binde us by this example, as by a perpetuall rule, which wee have seene to be enduring but for a time. Out of the new Testament they have nothing to bring forth for proofe of their opinion, but that it was said to one: Thou art Peter, and upon this stone I will build my Church. Againe, Peter, Lovest thou me? Feede my sheepe. But admitting that these be strong proofes, they must first shew, that he which is commanded to feede the flocke of Christ, hath power committed to him over all Churches: and that to binde and to loose is nothing else but to be ruler of all the world. But as Peter had received the commandement of the Lord, so he exhorteth all other Priests to feede the Church. Heereby we may gather, that by this saying of Christ, there was either nothing given to Peter more than to the rest, or that Peter did equally communicate with other the power that he had received. But, that we strive not vainely, we have in another place a cleare exposition out of the mouth of Christ, what is to binde and loose: that is to say, to retaine and to forgive sinnes. But the manner of binding and loosing, both the whole Scripture each where sheweth, and Paul very well declareth, when he saith that the ministers of the Gospell have commandement to reconcile men to God, and also have power to punish them that refuse this benefit.

1 Pet. 5. 2. John 20. 23.

2. Cor. 5. 18. & 10. 16.

What keies Christ gave unto Peter.

4 How shamefully they wrest those places, that make mention of binding and loosing, I both have already shortly touched, and a little after I shall have occasion to declare more at large. Now it is good to see onely, what they gather of that famous answere of Christ to Peter. Hee promised him the keies of the kingdome of heaven: hee said that whatsoever hee bound in earth, should be bound in heaven. If we agree upon the word Keies, and the manner of binding, all contention shall by and by cease. For the Pope himselfe will gladly give over the charge injoyned to the Apostles, which beeing full of travell and griefe, should shake from him his pleasures, without gaine. For as much as the heavens are opened unto us by the doctrine of the Gospell, it is with a very fit Metaphor expressed by the name of Keies. Now men are bound and loosed in no otherwise, but when faith reconcileth some to God, and their owne unbeliefe bindeth other some. If the Pope did take this onely upon him: I thinke there will bee no man that would either envie it or strive about it. But because this succession, being travelsome and nothing gainefull, pleaseth not the Pope, heereupon groweth the beginning of the contention, what Christ promised to Peter. Therefore I gather by the very matter it selfe, that there is nothing meant, but the dignitie of the office of an Apostle, which cannot be severed from the charge. For if that definition which I have rehearsed, be received (which cannot but shamelesly be rejected) here is nothing given to Peter, that was not also common to his other fellowes: because otherwise there should not onely wrong be done to the persons, but the very maiestie of doctrine should halt. They cry out on the other side: what availeth it, I pray you, to runne upon this rocke? For they shall not prove, but as the preaching of one same Gospell was enjoyned to all the Apostles, so they were also all alike furnished with power to binde and loose. Christ (say they) appointed Peter prince of the whole Church, when hee promised that he would give him the keies. But that which he then promised to one, in another place hee gave it also to all the rest, and delivered it as it were into their hands. If the same power were granted to all, which was promised to one, wherein shall hee be above his fellowes? Herein (say they) he excelleth, because he received it both in common together with them, and severally by himselfe, which was not given to the other, but in common. What if I answere with Cyprian and Augustine, that Christ did it not for this purpose, to preferre one man before other, but so to set out the unitie of the Church. For thus saith Cyprian, that God in the person of one gave the keies to all, to signifie the unitie of all: and that the rest were the same thing that Peter was, endued with like partaking both of honor and power: but that the beginning is taken at unitie, that the church of Christ may be shewed to be one. Augustine saith: If there were not in Peter a mysterie of the church, the Lord would not say to him, I will give thee the keies. For if this was said to Peter, the church hath them not:

but if the Church have them, then Peter, when hee received the keies, betokened the whole Church. And in another place. When they were all asked, onely Peter answered, thou art Christ: and it is said to him, I will give thee the keies, as though he alone had received the power of binding and loosing: whereas both he being one, said that one for all, and he received the other with all, as bearing the person of unitie. Therfore one for all, because there is unitie in all.

5 But this, Thou art Peter, and upon this rocke I will build my Church, is no where read or spoken to any other. As though Christ spake there any other thing of Peter, than that which Paul and Peter himselfe speaketh of all Christians. For Paul maketh Christ the chiefe and corner stone, upon which they are builded together, that grow into a holie temple to the Lord. And Peter biddeth us to be lively stones which being founded upon that chosen and pretious stone, doe by this joynt and coupling together with our God, cleave also together among our selves. He (say they) above the rest: because he hath the name peculiarly. Indeed I doe willingly grant this honour to Peter, that in the building of the Church he be placed among the first, or (if they will have this also) the first of all the faithfull: but I will not suffer them to gather thereupon, that he should have a Supremacie over the rest. For what manner of gathering is this? He excelleth other in ferventnesse of zeale, in learning, and courage: therefore he hath power over them. As though we might not with better colour gather, that Andrew is in degree before Peter, because he went before him in time, and brought him to Christ. But I passe over this. Let Peter truly have the first place, yet there is great difference betweene the honour of degree and power. We see that the Apostles commonly granted this to Peter, that he should speake in assemblies, and after a certaine manner goe before them with propounding, exhorting, and admonishing: but of his power we read nothing at all.

Peter in some kind of honour before the rest, but not above the rest in power, because our Saviour said, thou art Peter, and upon this rocke I will build my Church. Matt.16.18. Ephe.2.20. 1 Pet.2.5.

John 1.40. & 42.

6 Howbeit wee be not yet come to dispute of that point: onely at this present I would prove, that they doe too fondly reason, when by the onely name of Peter, they would build an Empire over the whole Church. For those old follies wherewith they went about to deceive at the beginning, are not worthie to be rehearsed, much lesse to be confuted, that the Church was builded upon Peter, because it was said, upon this rock, &c. But some of the Fathers have so expounded it. But when the whole Scripture crieth out to the contrarie, to what purpose is their authoritie alleaged against God? Yea, why doe we strive about the meaning of these words, as though it were darke or doubtfull; when nothing can bee more plainly nor more certainly spoken? Peter had confessed in his owne and his brethrens name that Christ is the Sonne of God. Upon this rocke Christ buildeth his Church: because it is (as Paul saith) the onely foundation, beside which there can be laid none other. Neither doe I heere therefore refuse the authoritie of the Fathers, because I want their testimonies, if I listed to alleage them: but (as I have said) I will not with contending about so cleere a matter trouble the Readers in vaine, specially sith this point hath been long agoe diligently enough handled and declared by men of our side.

Upon what rock Christ hath builded his Church.

Matt.16.16.

1 Cor.3.11.

7 And yet indeed no man can better assoyle this question, than the Scripture it selfe, if we compare all the places, where it teacheth, what office and power Peter had among the Apostles, how he behaved himselfe, and how hee was accepted of them. Runne over all that remaineth written, you shall find nothing else, but that he was one of the twelve, equall with the rest and their fellow, but not their Lord. He doth indeed propound to the Councell, if any thing be to be done, and giveth warning what is meete to be done: but therewithall he heareth other, and doth not onely graunt them place to speake their minde, but leaveth the judgement to them: when they had determined, he followed and obeyed. When he writeth to the Pastors, he doth not command them by authoritie, as Superiour: but hee maketh them his companions, and gently exhorteth them, as equals are wont to doe. When he was accused for that hee had gone into the Gentiles, although it were without cause, yet he answered and purged himselfe. When he was commanded by his fellowes, to goe with John into Samaria, hee refused not. Whereas the Apostle did send him, they did thereby declare that they held him not for their Superiour. Whereas hee obeyed and tooke upon him the Embassage committed to him, hee did thereby confesse that he had a fellowship with them, and not an authoritie over them. If none of these things were, yet the only Epistle to the Galathians may easily take all doubting from us: where almost in two Chapters together, Paul travelleth to prove nothing else, but that hee himselfe was equall to Peter in honour of Apostleship. Then hee rehearseth that hee came to Peter, not to professe subjection, but onely to make their consent of doctrine approved by testimonie to all men: and that Peter himselfe required no such thing, but gave him his right hand of fellowship, to worke in common together in the Lords Vineyard: and that there was no lesser grace given to him among the Gentiles, than to Peter among the Jewes; Finally, that when Peter dealt not very faithfully, hee was corrected by him, and obeyed his reproving. All these things doe make plaine, either that there was an equalitie betweene Paul and Peter, or at least that Peter had no more power over the rest, than they had over him. And (as I have alreadie said) Paul of purpose laboureth about this, that none should preferre before him in the Apostleship either Peter, or John, which were fellowes, not Lords.

Gal 1.18. & 2.8.

If Peter were the Prince of the Apostles, it followeth not hereupon that the whole world should be subject to the Bishop of Rome.

8 But, to grant them that which they require concerning Peter, that is, that he was the Prince of the Apostles, and excelled the rest in dignitie: yet there is no cause why they should of a singular example make an universall rule, and drawe to perpetuitie that which hath beene once done: sith there is a farre differing reason. One was chiefe among the Apostles: forsooth, because they were few in number. If one were the chiefe of twelve men, shall it therefore follow that one ought to be made ruler of a hundred thousand men? It is no marvell that twelve had one among them that should rule them all. For nature beareth this, and the wit of men requireth this, that in every assembly, although they be all equall in power, yet there be one as a governour, whom the rest may have regard unto. There is no Court without a Consull, no Session of Judges without a Pretor, or Propounder, no companie without a Ruler, no fellowship without a Maister. So should it be no absurditie, if we confessed that the Apostles gave to Peter such a supremacie. But that which is of force among few, is not by and by to be drawne to the whole world, to the ruling whereof no one man is sufficient. But (say they) this hath place no lesse in the whole universalitie of nature, than in all the parts, that there be one soveraigne head of all. And hereof (and God will) they fetch a proofe from Cranes and Bees, which alway choose to themselves one guide, not many. I allow indeede the examples which they bring forth: but doe Bees resort together out of all the world to choose them one king? every severall king is content with his owne hyve. So among Cranes, every heard hath their owne king. What else shall they prove hereby, but that every Church ought to have their owne severall bishop appointed them? Then they call us to civill examples. They alleadge that saying of Homer, It is not good to have many governours: and such things as in like sense are read in prophane writers to the commendation of Monarchie. The answere is easie. For Monarchie is not praised of Ulysses in Homer, or of any other, in this meaning, as though one ought to be Emperour of the whole world: but they meane to shew that one kingdome cannot hold two kings: and that power (as he calleth it) can abide no companion.

No head of the whole Church but only Christ.

9 But let it be as they will, that it is good and profitable that the whole world be holden under Monarchie, which yet is a very great absurditie: but let it be so: yet I will not therefore grant that the same should take place in the government of the Church. For the Church hath Christ her onely head, under whose dominion wee all cleave together, according to that order and that forme of pollicie which he hath prescribed. Therefore they doe a great wrong to Christ, when by that pretence they will have one man to be ruler of the universall Church, because it cannot be without a head. For Christ is the head of whom the whole body coupled and knit together in every joynt, wherewith one ministreth to an other, according to the working of every member in the measure thereof, maketh increase of the bodie. See you not, how hee setteth all men without exception in the body, and leaveth the honour and name of head to Christ alone? See you not how he giveth to every member a certaine measure, and a determined, and limited function: whereby both the perfection of the grace and the ſoveraigne power of governance may remaine with Chriſt onely? Neither am I ignorant what they are wont to cavill, when this is objected againſt them: they ſay that Chriſt is properly called the onely head, becauſe he alone raigneth by his owne authoritie and in his owne name: but that this nothing withſtandeth, but that there may be under him another miniſteriall head (as they terme it) that may be his vicegerent in earth. But by this cavillation they prevaile nothing, unleſſe they firſt ſhew that this miniſtery was ordained by Chriſt. For the Apoſtle teacheth, that the whole miniſtration is diſperſed through the members, and that the power floweth from the one heavenly head. Or if they will have it any plainer ſpoken, ſith the Scripture teſtifieth that Chriſt is the head, and claimeth that honour to him alone, it ought not to be transferred to any other, but whom Chriſt himſelfe hath made his vicar. But that is not onely no where read, but alſo may be largely confuted by many places.

Eph. 1. 22. & 4. 15. & 5 23. Col. 1. 18. & 2. 10. Eph 4. 10.

10 Paul ſometimes depainteth unto us a lively image of the church. Of one head hee maketh there no mention. But rather by his deſcription we may gather, that it is diſagreeing from the inſtitution of Chriſt. Chriſt at his aſcending tooke from us the viſible preſence of himſelfe: yet he went up to fulfill all things. Now therefore the church hath him yet preſent, and alway ſhall have. When Paul goeth about to ſhew the meane wherby he preſenteth himſelfe, he calleth us backe to the miniſteries which he uſeth. The Lord (ſaith he) is in us all, according to the meaſure of grace that hee hath given to every member. Therefore hee hath appointed ſome Apoſtles, ſome Paſtors, ſome Evangeliſts, otherſome Teachers, &c. Why doth hee not ſay, that hee hath ſet one over all, to be his vicegerent? For the place required that principally, and it could by no meanes have beene omitted, if it had beene true. Chriſt (ſaith hee) is with us. How? by the miniſtery of men, whom hee hath appointed to governe the Church. Why not rather by the myſteriall head, to whom he hath committed his ſteed? Hee nameth unitie: but in God, and in the faith of Chriſt. Hee aſſigneth to men nothing but common miniſterie, and to every one a particular meaſure. In that commendation of unitie, after that he had ſaid that there is but one body, one ſpirit, one hope of calling, one God, one Faith, one baptiſme, why hath he not alſo immediately added one chiefe biſhop, that may hold the church together in unitie? For nothing could have beene more fitly ſpoken, if it had beene true. Let that place be diligently weighed. It is no doubt but that hee meant there altogether to repreſent the holy and ſpirituall government of the church, which they that came after called Hierarchie. As for Monarchie among miniſters, he not onely nameth none, but alſo ſheweth that there is none. It is alſo no doubt but that he meant to expreſſe the manner of conjoyning, whereby the faithfull cleave together with Chriſt their head. There he not onely ſpeaketh of no miniſteriall head, but appointeth to every of the members a particular working according to the meaſure of grace diſtributed to every one. Neither is there any reaſon why they ſhould ſubtlely diſpute of the compariſon of the heavenly and earthly Hierarchie. For it is not ſafe to know beyond meaſure of it. And in framing this government we muſt follow no other figure, than the Lord himſelfe hath painted out in his word.

The Apoſtles knew no monarchie in the miniſteriall government of the Church. Eph. 4. 7. & 11.

11 Now although I grant them another thing, which they ſhall never winne by proofe before ſober men, that the ſupremacie of the church was ſtabliſhed in Peter, that it ſhould alway remaine by perpetuall ſucceſſion: yet how will they prove, that his ſeat was ſo placed at Rome, that whoſoever is biſhop of that church, ſhould be ſet over the whole world? By what right doe they binde this dignitie to the place, which is given without mention of place? Peter (ſay they) lived and died at Rome. What did Chriſt himſelfe? Did not he, while he lived, exerciſe his biſhopricke, and in dying fulfill the office of Prieſthood, at Hieruſalem? The Prince of Paſtors, the ſoveraigne biſhop, the head of the church, could not purchaſe honour to the place: and could Peter, that was farre inferior to him? Are not theſe fallies more than childiſh? Chriſt gave the honour of ſupremacie to Peter, Peter ſate at Rome, therefore he there placed the ſeat of ſupremacie. By this reaſon the Iſraelites in old time might have ſet the ſeat of ſupremacie in the deſert, where Moſes the chiefe Teacher and Prince of Prophets executed his miniſterie and died.

If Peter had a ſupremacie not onely to be confirmed unto him, but alſo conveyed unto others, the title of the biſhop of Rome is not verely proved.

Deut. 34. 5.

12 Let us ſee how trimly they reaſon. Peter (ſay they) had the Supremacie among

A vaine surmise that the Supremacie of the church belonging sometime to Antioch, was by the Lords commandement thence translated to Rome.

the Apostles: therefore the Church where he sate ought to have that priviledge. But where sate he first? At Antioch, say they. Therefore the Church of Antioch doth rightly claime to it selfe the Supremacie. They confesse that it was in old time the first: but they say, that in removing thence hee removed to Rome the honour that he brought with him. For there is an Epistle under the name of Pope Marcellus to the Bishops of Antioch, where he sayeth thus: Peters seate was at the beginning with you, which afterward by the Lords commandement was removed hither. So the Church of Antioch, which was once the chiefe, hath given place to the Sea of Rome. But by what Oracle had that good man learned, that the Lord so commanded? For if this cause be to be determined by the Law, it is necessarie that they answere, whether they will have this priviledge to be personall, or reall, or mixt. For it must be one of these three. If they say that it is personall, then it belongeth nothing to the place. If they say that it is reall, then when it is once given to the place, it is not taken away by reason either of the death or departure of the person. It remaineth therefore that they must say it is mixt: but then that place shall be not simply to be considered, unlesse the person doe also agree. Let them choose which soever they will, I will by and by inferre and easily prove, that Rome can by no meane take the Supremacie upon it selfe.

If the first place be granted to the Church of Rome, why the second unto Alexandria, before either Antioch, or Ephesus, or Ierusalem
Gal. 2. 9.

13 But be it, that (as they trifflingly say) the supremacie was removed from Antioch to Rome: yet why did not Antioch keepe the second place? For if Rome have therfore the first place, because Peter late there to the end of his life: to whom shall the second place rather be granted, than where he had his first seate? How came it to passe then, that Alexandria went before Antioch? How agreeth it, that the Church of one disciple should be above the seate of Peter? If honour be due to every church, according to the worthinesse of the founder, what shall we say also of the other churches? Paul nameth three, that seemed to be pillars, James, Peter, and John. If the first place were given to the sea of Rome in the honour of Peter: doe not the seates of Ephesus and Hierusalem, where John and James sate, deserve the second and third place? But among the Patriarches Hierusalem had the last place: Ephesus could not sit so much as in the uttermost corner. And other churches were left out, both all those that Paul founded, and those that the other Apostles were rulers of. The seate of Marke, which was but one of their disciples, obtained the honour. Therefore they must either confesse that that was a preposterous order, or they must grant us that this is not a perpetuall rule, that there be due to every church the same degree of honour which the founder had.

Peters sitting at Rome scarce worthy of credit.
Gal. 2 1.

14 Howbeit, as for that which they report of Peters sitting in the Church of Rome, I see not what credit it ought to have. Truly that which is in Eusebius, that he ruled there five and twenty yeeres, is very easily confuted. For it is evident by the first and second Chapter to the Galathians, that about twentie yeeres after the death of Christ, he was at Hierusalem, and that then he went to Antioch: where how long he was, is uncertaine. Gregorie reckoneth seven yeeres, and Eusebius twentie and five. But from the death of Christ, to the end of Neroes Empire, (in whose time they say that he was slaine) there shall be found but thirtie and seven yeeres. For the Lord suffered under Tiberius, the eighteenth yeere of his Empire. If you rebate twenty yeeres, during the which Paul is witnesse that Peter dwelt at Hierusalem, there will remaine but seventeene yeeres at the most, which must now be divided betweene two Bishopricks. If he taried long at Antioch he could not sit at Rome but a very little while. Which thing we may yet also more plainly prove. Paul wrote to the Romanes, when he was in his journey going to Hierusalem, where he was taken and from thence brought to Rome. It is not likely that this Epistle was written foure yeeres before that he came to Rome. Therein is yet no mention of Peter, which should not have beene left out, if Peter had ruled that Church. Yea and in the end also, when he rehearseth a great number of the godly, whom he biddeth to be saluted, where verily he gathereth together all those that he knew, he yet saith utterly nothing of Peter. Neither is it needfull heere to make a long or curious demonstration to men of sound judgement: for the matter it selfe, and the whole argument of the Epistle crieth out, that he should not have overpassed Peter, if he had beene at Rome.

Rom. 15 15.

Rom. 6. 21.

15 Then

15 Then Paul was brought priſoner to Rome. Luke reporteth that he was receiued of the brethren, of Peter he ſaith nothing. He wrote from thence to many Churches: and in ſome places alſo hee writeth ſalutations in the names of certaine: but hee doth not in one word ſhew that Peter was there at that time, Who, I pray you ſhall thinke it likely, that he could haue paſſed him ouer with ſilence, if he had beene preſent? Yea to the Philippians, where he ſaid that he had none that ſo faithfully looked vnto the worke of the Lord, as Timothie, hee complained that they did all ſeeke their owne. And to the ſame Timothie he maketh a more grieuous complaint, that none was with him at his firſt defence, but all forſooke him: where therefore was Peter then? For if they ſay that hee was then at Rome, how great a ſhame doth Paul charge him with, that hee was a forſaker of the Goſpell? For hee ſpeaketh of the beleeuers: becauſe he addeth, God impute it not vnto them. How long therefore, and in what time did Peter keepe that ſeate? But it is a conſtant opinion of writers, that hee gouerned that Church euen to his death. But among the writers themſelues it is not certaine who was his ſucceſſor, becauſe ſome ſay Linus, and otherſome ſay Clement. And they tell many fond fables, of the diſputation had betweene him and Simon the Magician. And Auguſtine ſticketh not to confeſſe, when hee entreateth of ſuperſtitions, that by reaſon of an opinion raſhly conceiued, there was a cuſtome growne in vſe at Rome, that they ſhould not faſt that day that Peter got the victorie of Simon the Magician. Finally the doings of that time are ſo entangled with diuerſitie of opinions; that we ought not raſhly to beleeue where we finde any thing written. And yet by reaſon of this conſent of writers, I ſtriue not againſt this, that hee died there: but yet that hee was biſhop there, and ſpecially a long time, I cannot be perſwaded, neither doe I much paſſe vpon that alſo: for as much as Paul teſtifieth that Peters Apoſtleſhip did peculiarly belong to the Iewes, and his owne to vs. Therefore that that fellowſhip which they couenanted betweene themſelues, may be confirmed with vs, or rather that the ordinance of the holy Ghoſt may ſtand in force among vs, wee ought to haue reſpect rather to the Apoſtleſhip of Paul and Peter. For the holy Ghoſt ſo deuided the prouinces betweene them that hee appointed Peter to the Iewes, and Paul to vs. Now therefore let the Romaniſts goe and ſeeke their ſupremacie elſe where than in the word of God, where it is found not to be grounded.

As Peters gouerning the Church of Rome is hardly proued, ſo he ſucceſſor in gouernment is not agreed vpon: his deeds and death at Rome vncertaine: his being Biſhop of Rome anie waie ſo long moſt improbable.

Auguſt. ad Sanar.

16 Now let vs come to the old Church; that it may alſo bee made to appeare plainely that our aduerſaries doe no leſſe cauſelesly and falſely boaſt of the conſent thereof, than they doe of the witneſſe of the word of God. When therefore they bragge of that principle of theirs, that the vnitie of the Church cannot otherwiſe bee kept together, but if there bee one ſupreame head in earth, to whom all the members may obey, and that therefore the Lord gaue the ſupremacie to Peter, and from thence forth to the ſea of Rome by right of ſucceſſion, that the ſame ſhould remaine in it to the end: they affirme, that this hath beene alway obſerued from the beginning. But foraſmuch as they wrongfully wreſt many teſtimonies, I will firſt ſay this aforehand, that I denie not but that the writers doe each where giue great honour to the Church of Rome, and doe ſpeake reuerently of it. Which I thinke to be done ſpecially for three cauſes. For that ſame opinion, which I wot not how was growne in force, that it was founded and ordained by the miniſterie of Peter, much availed to procure fauour and eſtimation vnto it. Therefore in the Eaſt parts it was for honours ſake called the ſea Apoſtolike. Secondly, when the head of the Empire was there; and that therefore it was likely, that in that place were men more excellent both in learning and wiſedome, and skill, and experience of many things, than any where elſe: there was worthily conſideration had thereof, that both the honour of the Citie, and alſo the other more excellent gifts of God ſhould not ſeeme to be deſpiſed. There was beſide theſe alſo a third thing, that when the Churches of the Eaſt, and of Greece, yea and of Affrica, were in tumults among themſelues with diſagreement of opinions; the Church of Rome was quieter and leſſe full of troubles than the reſt. So came it to paſſe, that the godly and holy Biſhops, being driuen out of their ſeates, did oftentimes flee thither as into a ſanctuarie or certaine haue. For as the Weſterne men are of leſſe ſharpneſſe and ſwiftneſſe of wit, than the Aſians or Affricans be, ſo much are they leſſe deſirous of alterations.

alterations. This therefore added much authoritie to the Church of Rome, that in those doubtfull times it was not so troubled as the rest, and did hold the doctrine once delivered them, faster than all the rest as we shall by and by better declare. For these three causes (I say) it was had in no small honour, and commended with many notable testimonies of the old writers.

The Fathers of the Church confessing the churches unitie never dreamed that the B. Shop of Rome's supremacie should be the bond to make it one.

17 But when our adversaries will thereupon gather that it hath a supremacie and soveraigne power over other Churches, they doe too much amisse, as I have already said, And that the same may the better appeare, I will first briefly shew what the old Fathers thought of this unitie which they enforce so earnestly. Hierom writing to Nepotianus, after that he had received many examples of unitie, at the last descended to the Hierarchie of the Church. Each Bishop of every severall Church, each Archpriest, each Archdeacon, and all the Ecclesiasticall order, doe rest upon their owne rulers. Heere a Romaine Priest speaketh, hee commendeth union in the Ecclesiasticall order, why doth he not rehearse that all Churches are knit together with one head as with one bond? Nothing could have more fitly served the matter that he had in hand: and it cannot bee said that it was for forgetfulnesse, that he omitted it: for he would have done nothing more willingly if the matter had suffered him. He saw therefore without doubt, that that is the true reason of unitie which Cyprian excellently well describeth in these words: The Bishoprick is one, wherof each hath a part wholy: and the church is one, which is with increase of fruitfulnesse more largely extended into a multitude. Like as there are many sun-beames and one light: and many branches of a tree, but one bodie grounded on a fast holding roote: and like as from one fountaine flow many streames, and though the multitude seeme to be diversly spread abroad with largenesse of overflowing plentie, yet the unitie is kept whole in the originall: so the church also being overspread with the light of the Lord, extendeth her beames abroad throughout the whole world, yet it is but one that is each where powred forth, and the unitie of the bodie is not severed: she spreadeth her branches over the whole world, she tendeth out her overflowing streames: yet is there but one head and one beginning, &c. Afterward: The spouse of Christ cannot be an adultéresse: she knoweth one onely house, she keepeth the holinesse of one onely chamber with chast shamefastnesse. You see how he maketh the universall Bishoprick to be Christs onely, which comprehendeth the whole Church under him: and saith that all they that execute the office of Bishop under this head, have their parts thereof wholy. Where is the supremacie of the sea of Rome, if the whole Bishoprick remaine with Christ onely, and each Bishop hath his part thereof wholy? These things therefore make to this purpose, that the Reader may understand by the way, that the old Fathers were utterly ignorant of that principle, which the Romanists doe take for confessed and undoubted, concerning the unitie of an earthly head in the Hierarchie of the Church.

De sim. præ.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Of the beginning and encreasing of the Papacie of Rome, untill advanced it selfe to this height, whereby both the libertie of the Church hath beene oppressed, and all the right government thereof overthrowne.

Sundry ancient Councels where in the Bishop of Rome had not the chiefest place.

AS concerning the ancientnesse of the supremacie of the sea of Rome, there is nothing had of more antiquitie to stablish it, than the decree of the Nycene Synod, wherein the Bishop of Rome both hath the first place among the Patriarches given unto him, and is commanded to looke unto the Churches adjoyning to the Citie. When the Councell maketh such division betweene him and the other Patriarches, that it assigneth to every one their bounds: truely, it doth not appoint him the head of all, but maketh him one of the chiefe. There were present Vitus and Vincentius in the name of Julius, which then governed the Church of Rome: to them was given the fourth place. I beseech you, if Julius were acknowledged the head of the Church, should his Legates be thrust into the fourth seate? Should Athanasius bee chiefe in the Councell, where principally the image of the Hierarchicall order ought to be seene? In the Synod at Ephesus it appeareth, that Celestinus which was then Bishop of Rome, uſed a crooked ſubtle meane to provide for the dignitie of his ſeate. For when he ſent his deputies thither, hee committed his ſteede to Cyrillus of Alexandria, which ſhould notwithſtanding otherwiſe have beene the chiefe. To what purpoſe was that ſame committing, but that his name might by what meane ſoever abide in the firſt place? For his Legates ſate in a lower place, and were asked their opinion among the reſt, and ſubſcribed in their order: in the meane time the Patriarch of Alexandria joyned Celeſtines name with his owne. What ſhall I ſay of the ſecond Councell at Epheſus: where when Leos Legates were preſent, yet Dioſcorus Patriarch of Alexandria ſate the chiefe as by his owne right? They will take exception that it was no upright Councell, by which both the holy man Flavianus was condemned, and Eutyches acquited, and his ungodlineſſe allowed. But when the Synod was gathered, when the Biſhops tooke their places in order, verily the Legates of the Biſhop of Rome ſate there among the reſt none otherwiſe than in a holy and lawfull Councell. Yet they ſtrived not for the firſt place, but yeelded it to another: which they would never have done, if they had thought it to be theirs of right. For the Biſhops of Rome were never aſhamed to enter into the greateſt contentions for their honors: and for this onely cauſe oftentimes to vex and trouble the Church with many and hurtfull ſtrifes. But becauſe Leo ſaw that it ſhould be a too much unreaſonable requeſt, if he ſhould ſeeke to get the chiefe place for his Legates, therefore he ſurceaſed it.

Rome

2 Then followed the Councell of Chalcedon, in which by the grant of the Emperour the Legates of the Church of Rome ſate in the chiefe place. But Leo himſelfe confeſſeth that this was an extraordinarie priviledge. For when he made petition for it to the Emperor Marcianus, and Pulcheria the Empreſſe, he did not affirme that it was due to him, but onely pretended, that the Eaſterne Biſhops, which ſate as chiefe in the Councell at Epheſus, troubled all things and ill abuſed their power. Whereas therefore it was needfull to have a grave governour, and it was not likely that they ſhould be meete for it, which had once beene ſo light and diſordered: therefore he praied, that by reaſon of the default and unfitneſſe of other, the office of governing might be removed to him. Truly that which is gotten by ſingular priviledge and beſide order, is not by common law. Where this onely is pretended, that there needeth ſome new governour, becauſe the former governours had behaved themſelves ill, it is evident that it neither was ſo before, nor ought to continue ſo for ever, but is done onely in reſpect of preſent danger. The Biſhop of Rome therefore had the firſt place in the Councell of Chalcedon: not becauſe it was due to his ſea, but becauſe the Synode was at that time deſtitute of a grave and fit governour, while they that ought to have beene the chiefe, did through their owne intemperance and corrupt affection, thruſt themſelves out of place. And this that I ſay, Leos ſucceſſour did indeed prove. For when he ſent his Legates to the fift Synode at Conſtantinople, which was holden long time after, he brauled not for the firſt ſeate, but eaſily ſuffered Menna the Patriarch of Conſtantinople to ſit as chiefe. So in the Councell of Carthage, at which Auguſtine was preſent, we ſee that not the Legates of the ſea of Rome, but Aurelius Archbiſhop of that place ſat as chiefe: when yet the contention was about the authoritie of the Biſhop of Rome. Yea there was alſo a generall Councell holden in Italy it ſelfe, at which the Biſhop of Rome was not preſent. Ambroſe was chiefe there, which was in very great authoritie with the Emperour, there was no mention made of the Biſhop of Rome. Therefore at that time it came to paſſe by the dignitie of Ambroſe, that the ſea of Millane was more noble than the ſea of Rome.

The chiefeſt place in the Councell of Chalcedon granted by the Emperour, as requeſt upon ſpeciall occaſion for that time to the Biſhop of Rome, which place in Synodes afterwards held other Biſhops had as before.

The Councell at Aquileia.

3 As concerning the title of Supremacie, and other titles of pride, whereupon it now marvellouſly boaſteth it ſelfe, it is not hard to judge, when and in what ſort they crept in. Cyprian oftentimes maketh mention of Cornelius. He ſetteth him out with no other name, but by the name of brother, or fellow Biſhop, or fellow in office. But when he writeth to Stephen the ſucceſſor of Cornelius, he doth not only make him equall with himſelfe and the reſt, but alſo ſpeaketh more hardly to him, charging him ſometime with arrogancie, ſometime with ignorance. Since Cyprian we have with all the Church of Africa judged of that matter. The Councell at Carthage did forbid that any ſhould be called Prince of Prieſts or chiefe Biſhop, but onely biſhop of the chiefe ſea. But if Cap 47. a man turne over the ancienter monuments, hee shall finde that the Bishop of Rome at that time was content with the common name of Brother. Certainely so long as the face of the Church continued true and pure, all these names of pride, wherewith since that time the sea of Rome hath begun to waxe outragious, were utterly unheard of: it was not knowne, who was the higheſt Bishop and the onely head of the Church in earth. But if the Bishop of Rome had beene so bold to have taken such a thing upon him, there were stout and wise men that would have by and by repressed his folly. Hierom for asmuch as hee was a Priest at Rome, was not ill willing to set out the dignitie of his owne Church, so much as the matter and state of his time suffered: yet we see how he also bringeth it downe into fellowship with the rest. If authoritie (saith he) be sought for, the world is greater than a Citie. Why dost thou alleadge to me the custome of one Citie? Why dost thou defend smalnesse of number, out of which hath growne pride, against the lawes of the Church? Whersoever there be a Bishop, either at Rome, or at Eugubium, or at Constantinopl., or at Rhegium, he is of the same merit and of the same Priesthood. The power of riches, or basenesse of povertie maketh not a Bishop higher or lower.

Ep. ad Evag.

The Bishop of Constantinople challenging a supremacie, resisted by Gregorie.

4 About the title of universall Bishop the contention first began in the time of Gregorie, which was occasioned by the ambition of John Bishop of Constantinople. For he (which thing never any man before had attempted) would have made himselfe universall Bishop. In that contention Gregorie doth not alleadge that the right is taken away which was due to himselfe: but stoutly crieth out against it, that it is a prophane name, yea full of sacriledge, yea the fore warner of Antichrist. The whole Church (saith he) falleth downe from her state, if he fall which is called universall. In another place: It is very sorrowfull, to suffer patiently, that our brother and fellow Bishop, despising all other, should onely be named Bishop. But in this his pride what else is betokened but the times of Antichrist neere at hand? because verily hee followeth him, that despising the fellowship of Angels, went about to climbe up to the top of singularitie. In another place hee writeth to Eulolius of Alexandria and Anastasius of Antioch. None of my predecessours at any time would use that prophane word: for if one bee called universall Patriarch, the name of Patriarches is abated from all the rest. But farre may this be from a Christian minde, that any should have a will to take that upon him, whereby hee may in any part, be it never so little, diminish the honour of his brethren. To consent in this wicked word is nothing else but to loose the faith. It is one thing (saith he) that we owe to the preserving of the unitie of faith, and another thing that we owe to the keeping downe of pride. But I say it boldly, because whosoever calleth himselfe, or desireth to be called universall Bishop, hee doth in his proud advancing, run before Antichrist, because hee doth with shewing himselfe proud prefer himselfe above the rest. Againe to Anastius Bishop of Alexandria: I have said that hee cannot have peace with us, unlesse he amended the advancing of the superstitious and proud word, which the first Apostate hath invented. And (to speake nothing of the wrong done to your honour) if one be called universall Bishop, the universall Church falleth when that universall one falleth. But whereas hee writeth, that this honour was offered to Leo in the Synod at Chalcedon, it hath no colour of trueth. For neither is there any such thing read in the actes of that Synod. And Leo himselfe, which with many Epistles impugneth the decree there made in honour of the sea of Constantinople, without doubt would not have passed over this argument, which had beene most to be liked of all other, if it had beene true, that hee refused that which was given him: and being a man otherwise too much desirous of honour, he would not have omitted that which made for his praise. Therefore Gregorie was deceived in this, that hee thought that that title was offered to the sea of Rome by the Synod of Chalcedon: to speake nothing, how fond it is, that he both testifieth it to have proceeded from the holy Synod and also at the same time called it wicked, prophane, abhominable, proud, and full of sacriledge, yea devised by the Divell, and published by the crier of Antichrist. And yet he addeth that his predecessor refused it, least all Priests should be deprived of their due honour, when any thing were privately given to one. In another place: no man at any time hath willed to be called by that word. No man hath taken to himselfe that preſumptuous name: leaſt if he ſhould in the degree of Biſhoprieke take to himſelfe a glorie of ſingularitie, he ſhould ſeeme to have denied the ſame to all his brethren.

5 Now I come to the juriſdiction, which the biſhop of Rome affirmeth that he hath over all Churches. I know how great contentions have beene in old time about this matter: For there hath beene no time wherein the ſea of Rome hath not coveted to get an Empire over other Churches. And in this place it ſhall not be out of ſeaſon, to ſearch by what meanes it grew then by little and little to ſome power. I doe not yet ſpeake of that infinite Empire, which it hath not ſo long ago taken by force to it ſelfe: for we will deferre that to a place convenient. But heere it is good to ſhew briefly, how in old time and by what meanes it hath advanced it ſelfe, to take to it ſelfe any power over other Churches. When the Churches of the Eaſt vere divided and troubled with the factions of the Arrians under the Emperours Conſtantius, and Conſtans the ſonnes of Conſtantine the Great, and Athanaſius the chiefe defender there of the true faith was driven out of his ſea: ſuch calamitie compelled him to come to Rome, that with the authoritie of the ſea of Rome, he might both after a ſort repreſſe the rage of his enemies, and confirme the godly that were in diſtreſſe. He was honorably received of Julius then Biſhop, and obtained that the Biſhops of the Weſt tooke upon them the defence of his cauſe. Therefore when the godly ſtood in great need of forrain aid, and ſaw that there was very good ſuccour for them in the Church of Rome, they willingly gave unto it the moſt authoritie that they could. But all that was nothing elſe, but that the communion thereof ſhould be highly eſteemed, and it ſhould be counted a great ſhame to be excommunicate of it. Afterward evill and wicked men alſo added much unto it. For, to eſcape lawfull judgements, they fled to this ſanctuarie. Therefore if any Prieſt were condemned by his Biſhop, or any Biſhop by the Synode of his Province, they by and by appealed to Rome. And the biſhops of Rome received ſuch appellations more greedily than was meete: Becauſe it ſeemed to be a farme of extraordinarie power, ſo to entermeddle with matters farre and wide about them. So when Eutyches was condemned by Flavianus biſhop of Conſtantinople, hee complained to Leo that he had wrong done unto him. Leo without delay, no leſſe undiſcreetly than ſuddenly, tooke in hand the defence of an evill cauſe, hee grievouſly inveyed againſt Flavianus, as though he had, without hearing the cauſe, condemned an innocent: and by this his ambition he cauſed that the ungodlineſſe of Eutyches was for a certaine ſpace of time ſtrengthened. In Affrica it is evident that this oftentimes chanced. For ſo ſoone as any lewd man had taken a foyle in ordinary judgement, he by and by flew to Rome, and charged his countriemen with many ſlanderous reports: and the ſea of Rome was alway ready to entermeddle. Which lewdnes compelled the biſhops of Affrica to make a law, that none under paine of excommunication ſhould appeale beyond the ſea.

The ground whereupon the ſoveraigntie of the Biſhop of Rome did firſt take roote was his intermedling in thoſe cauſes, and his readineſſe to aide thoſe perſons, which being had were readie any where to ſeeke maintenance.

6 But whatſoever it were, let us ſee what authoritie or power the ſea of Rome then had. Eccleſiaſticall power is contained in theſe fower points, ordering of Biſhops, ſummoning of Councels, hearing of appeales or juriſdiction, chaſtiſing, admonitions or cenſures. All the old Synods command biſhops to be conſecrate by their owne Metropolitanes: and they never bid the biſhop of Rome to be called unto it, but in his owne Patriarchie. But by little and little it grew in uſe, that all the biſhops of Italie came to Rome to fetch their conſecration, except the Metropolitanes, which ſuffered not themſelves to be brought into ſuch bondage: but when any Metropolitane was to be conſecrate, the biſhop of Rome ſent thither one of his Prieſts, which ſhould onely be preſent, but not preſident. Of which thing there is an example in Gregorie: at the conſecration of Conſtantius biſhop of Millane after the death of Laurence. Howbeit I doe not thinke that that was a very ancient inſtitution: but when at the beginning for honour and good wils ſake they ſent one to another their Legates, to be witneſſes of the conſecration, and to teſtifie their communion with them, afterward that which was voluntarie, began to be holden for neceſſarie. Howſoever it be, it is evident that in old time the biſhop of Rome had not the power of conſecrating, but in the province of of his owne Patriarchie, that is to ſay, in the Churches adjoyning to the citie, as the Canon of the Nicene Synode ſaith. To the conſecration was annexed the ſending of a Synodicall Epiſtle, in which he was nothing above the reſt. For the Patriarches were woont immediately after their consecration, by solemne writing to declare their faith, whereby they professed that they subscribed to the holy and Catholike Councels. So rendring an account of their faith, they did approve themselves one to another. If the Bishop of Rome had received of other, and not himselfe given this confession, he had thereby beene acknowledged superiour, but when he was no lesse bound to give it, than to require it of other, and to be subject to the common law: truly that was a token of fellowship, not of dominion. Of this thing there is an example in Gregories Epistle to Anastasius and to Cyriacus of Constantinople, and in other places to all the Patriarches together.

Patriarches

Lib.1. Epist.25. Lib.6 ep 169. Lib.1.ep 24.

The Bishop of Rome as well censured by others, as others by him.

7 Then follow admonitions or censures: which as in old time the Bishops of Rome used toward other, so they did againe suffer them of other. Ireneus grievously reproved Victor, because he undiscreetly for a thing of no value, troubled the Church with a pernitious dissention. Victor obeied, and spurned not against it. Such a libertie was then in ure among the holy Bishops, that they used a brotherly authoritie toward the Bishop of Rome, in admonishing and chastising him if he at any time offended. He againe, when occasion required did admonish other of their dutie: and if there were any fault, rebuked it. For Cyprian, when he exhorteth Stephen to admonish the Bishops of France, fetcheth not his argument from the greater power, but from the common right that Priests have among themselves. I beseech you, if Stephen had then beene ruler over Fraunce, would not Cyprian have said: Restraine them, because they be thine? but he saith farre otherwise. This (saith he) the brotherly fellowship, wherwith we be bound one to another requireth that we should admonish one another. And we see also with how great sharpnesse of words he being otherwise a man of a milde nature inveieth against Stephen himselfe, when he thinketh him to be too insolent. Therefore in this behalfe also there appeareth not yet, that the Bishop of Rome had any jurisdiction over them that were not of his owne province.

Ad pomp. Contr.Epist. Stephani.

Generall Councels summoned onely by the Emperour: provinciall as well by other Bishops in their territories as by the Bishop of Rome.

Tripart.hist. lib.4.

8 As concerning the calling together of Synodes, this was the office of every Metropolitane, at certaine appointed times to assemble a provinciall Synode. There the Bishop of Rome had no authoritie. But a generall Councell the Emperour onely might summon. For if any of the Bishops had attempted it, not onely they that were out of his province, would not have obeied his calling, but also there would by and by have risen an uprore. Therefore the Emperour indifferently warned them all to be present. Socrates indeed reporteth, that Julius did expostulate with the Bishops of the East, because they called him not to the Synod of Antioch, whereas it was forbidden by the Canons, that any thing should be decreed without the knowledge of the Bishop of Rome. But who doth not see that this is to be understanded of such decrees as binde the whole universall Church? Now it is no marvell, if thus much be granted both to the antiquitie and honour of the citie, and to the dignitie of the sea, that there should be no generall decree made of religion, in the absence of the bishop of Rome, if he refuse not to be present. But what is this to the dominion over the whole Church? For we denie not that he was one of the chiefe: but we will not grant, that which the Romanists now affirme, that he had a dominion over all.

The bishop of Rome misliked, and withstood for overreaching his bounds, and receiving appeales which should not by order have beene brought unto him.

9 Now remaineth the fourth kinde of power, which standeth in appeales. It is evident that hee hath the chiefe power, to whose judgement seate appellation is made. Many oftentimes appealed to the Bishop of Rome, and hee himselfe also went about to draw the hearing of causes to himselfe: but he was alway laughed to scorne, when he passed his owne bounds. I will speake nothing of the East and of Grecia: but it is certain that the bishops of Fraunce stoutly withstood him, when he seemed to take to himselfe an Empire over them. In Affrica there was long debate about that matter. For where at the Millevitane Councell, at which Augustine was present, they were excommunicate that appealed beyond the sea, the bishop of Rome travailed to bring to passe, that that decree might be amended. Hee sent his Legates to shew that that priviledge was given to him by the Nicene Councell. The Legates brought forth the actes of the Nicene Councell, which they had fetched out of the storehouse of their owne Church. The Affricans withstood it, and denied that the bishops of Rome ought to be credited in their owne cause: and said that therefore they would send to Constantinople, and in-

to other cities of Greece, where coppies were to be had that were leſſe ſuſpicious. It was found, that therein was no ſuch thing written, as the Romans had pretended. So was that decree confirmed, which tooke the chiefe hearing of cauſes from the biſhop of Rome: In which doing the lewd ſhameleſneſſe of the biſhop of Rome appeared. For when he guilefully did thruſt in the Synode at Sardis in ſteed of the Nicene Synode, he was ſhamefully taken in a manifeſt falſehood. But yet greater and more ſhameleſſe was their wickedneſſe, that added a forged Epiſtle to the Councell, wherein I wot not what biſhop of Carthage, condemning the arrogance of Aurelius his predeceſſour, for that hee was ſo bold to withdraw himſelfe from the obedience of the ſea Apoſtolike, and yeelding himſelfe and his Church, humbly craveth pardon. Theſe be the goodly monuments of antiquitie, whereupon the majeſtie of the ſea of Rome is founded, while they ſo childiſhly lie, under the pretence of antiquitie, that very blinde men may finde it out by groping. Aurelius (ſaith he) puffed up with diveliſh boldneſſe and ſtubbornneſſe, rebelled againſt Chriſt, and ſaint Peter, and therefore to be condemned with curſe. What ſaid Auguſtine? But what ſaid ſo many fathers that were preſent at the Milevitane Councell? But what need is it to ſpend many words in confuting that fooliſh writing, which the Romaniſts themſelves, if they have any face left, cannot looke upon without great ſhame? So Gratian, I cannot tell whether of malice or of ignorance, where he rehearſed that decree that they ſhould be excommunicate that appeale beyond the ſea, addeth an exception: Unleſſe peradventure they appeale to the ſea of Rome. What may a man doe to theſe beaſts, which are ſo voide of common reaſon, that they except that onely thing out of the law, for whoſe cauſe every man ſeeth that the law was made? For the Councell when it condemneth appeales beyond the ſea, forbiddeth onely this, that none ſhould appeale to Rome. Here the good expoſitour excepteth Rome out of the common law. 2. quæſt. c. 4.

10 But (to determine this queſtion at once) one hiſtorie ſhall make plaine what manner of juriſdiction the biſhop of Rome had in old time. Donate of the black-houſes had accuſed Cecilian biſhop of Carthage. The man accuſed was condemned, his cauſe not heard. For when he knew that the biſhops had conſpired againſt him, hee would not appeare. Then the matter came to the Emperor Conſtantine. He for as much as hee willed to have the matter ended by eccleſiaſticall judgement, committed the hearing of it to Melciades biſhop of Rome. To whom he adjoined fellow commiſſioners, many biſhops of Italie, France and Spaine. If that belonged to the ordinary juriſdiction of the ſea of Rome, to heare an appeale in an Eccleſiaſticall cauſe: why doth hee ſuffer other to be joined with him at the will of the Emperour? Yea why did he himſelfe take the judgement upon him rather by the Emperours commaundement, than by his owne office? But let us heare what hapned afterward. There Cecilian got the victorie. Donate of the black-houſes was condemned for ſlaunder: he appealed: Conſtantine committed the judgement of the appeale to the biſhop of Orleance. He ſate as judge, to pronounce what he thought, after the biſhop of Rome. If the ſea of Rome hath the chiefe power without appellation: why doth Melciades ſuffer himſelfe to receive ſo great a ſhame, that the biſhop of Orleance ſhould bee preferred above him? And what Emperor doth this? even Conſtantine of whom they boaſt that hee employed not onely all his endevour, but in a manner all the riches of the Empire to increaſe the dignity of their ſea. We ſee therefore now, how farre the biſhop of Rome was at that time by all meanes from the ſupreme dominion, which he affirmeth to be given unto him by Chriſt over all the churches, and which he lyingly ſaith that hee hath in all ages poſſeſſed by the conſent of the whole world.

The Biſhop of Rome appointed and others joyned with him by Conſtantine to heare an appeale made by a biſhop of Carthage: and in the ſame cauſe the biſhop of Orleance appointed by the ſame Emperour to heare an appeale made from the biſhop of Rome. Aug. ep. 162.

11 *I know how many Epiſtles there be, how many writings and decrees, wherein the biſhops doe give much, and boldly chalenge much ur to it. But this alſo all men that have a very little wit and learning doe know, that the moſt part of thoſe are ſo unſavorie, that by the firſt taſte of them a man may ſoone finde out of what ſhop they came. For what man of ſound wit and ſober, will thinke that that goodly interpretation is Anacletus his owne, which is in Gratian reported under the name of Anacletus: that is, that Cephas is a head? The Romaniſts doe at this day abuſe for defence of their ſea, many ſuch trifles, which Gratian hath patched together without judgement:

* Forged helps to bolſter out the Romiſh ſupremacie, the ambitious humour of Leo, whoſe power notwithſtanding was not ſuch as the ſea of Rome now chalengeth. Diſt. 11. cap. Sacroſanct.

and yet ſtill in ſo great light they will ſell ſuch ſmokes, wherewith in old time they were wont to mocke out the ignorant in darkeneſſe. But I will not beſtow much labour in confuting thoſe things, which doe openly confute themſelves by reaſon of their unſavorie follie. I grant that there remaine alſo true Epiſtles of the old biſhops, wherein they ſet forth the honour of their ſea with glorious titles, of which ſort are ſome Epiſtles of Leo. For that man, as hee was learned and eloquent, ſo was hee alſo above meaſure deſirous of glorie and dominion: but whether the Churches then beleeved his teſtimonie when hee ſo advanced himſelfe, that indeed is it that is in controverſie. But it appeareth that many offended with his ambition, did alſo withſtand his greedy deſire. Sometimes hee appointed in his ſteed the biſhop of Theſſalonica throughout Grecia and other countries adjoyning, ſometime he appointed the biſhop of Orleance, or ſome other throughout France. So he appointed Hormiſda biſhop of Hiſpalis to be his vicar in Spain: but every where he excepteth, that he giveth out ſuch appointments upon this condition, that the Metropolitanes may have there ancient priviledges remaining ſafe and whole. But Leo himſelfe declareth, that this is one of their priviledges, that if any doubt happen about any matter, the Metropolitane ſhould firſt be asked his adviſe. Therfore thoſe appointments of vicars in his ſteed were upon this condition, that neither any biſhop ſhould be letted in his ordinarie juriſdiction, nor any Metropolitan in being judge of appeales, nor any provincial Councell in ordering of their Churches. What was this elſe but to abſtaine from all juriſdiction: but to intermeddle to the appeaſing of diſcordes, onely ſo farre as the law and nature of the communion of the Church ſuffereth?

The calamitie of other places in Gregories time exalted the dignitie of the Church of Rome, but without overthrowing the ordinary juriſdiction which others had.

12 In Gregories time that ancient order was already much changed. For when the Empire was ſhaken, and torne in peeces, when Fraunce and Spaine were afflicted with many overthrowes received, Slavonia waſted, Italy vexed, and Affrica in a manner deſtroied with continuall calamities, that in ſo great a ſhaking of civill affaires, at leaſt the integritie of Faith might remaine, or yet not utterly periſh, all the biſhops from each part did the rather joyne themſelves to the biſhops of Rome. Thereby it came to paſſe, that not onely the dignitie, but alſo the power of that Sea greatly increaſed. Howbeit I doe not ſo much paſſe by what meanes it was brought about. Truly it appeareth that it was then greater than in the ages before. And yet it then greatly differed from being an unbrideled dominion, that one man might beare rule over other after his owne will. But the Sea of Rome had this reverence, that it might with her authoritie ſubdue and repreſſe, the lewde and obſtinate that could not by the other biſhops be kept within their dutie. For Gregorie doth oftentimes diligently teſtifie this, that hee doth no leſſe faithfully preſerve to other men their rights, than hee requireth his owne of them. Neither doe I (ſaith he) pricked on by ambition, plucke from any man that which is his right: but I deſire in all things to honor my brethren. There is no ſaying in his writings wherein he doth more proudly boaſt of the largeneſſe of his Supremacie, than this: I know not what biſhop is not ſubject to the Sea Apoſtolike when he is found in fault. But he by and by adjoyneth. Where fault requireth, not all according to the order of humilitie are equall. He giveth to himſelfe power to correct them that have offended: if all doe their dutie, he maketh himſelfe equall with the reſt. But he himſelfe giveth himſelfe this power: and they aſſented to it that would: and other that liked it not, might freely gaineſay it, which it is well knowne that the moſt part of them did. Beſide that hee ſpeaketh there of the Primate of Conſtantinople: which when he was condemned by the principall Synode, refuſed the whole judgement. His fellow biſhops informed the Emperor of this ſtubbornneſſe of him. The Emperor willed Gregorie to be Judge of the cauſe. We ſee therefore that he both attempteth nothing, whereby he may breake the ordinarie juriſdiction, and the ſame thing that he doth for the helping of other, he doth not but by the Commandement of the Emperour.

Gregorie how farre unlike the Romane Biſhops at this day.

13 This therefore was then all the power of the biſhop of Rome, to ſet himſelfe againſt obſtinate and untamed heads, when there needed any extraordinarie remedie: and that to helpe and not to hinder other biſhops. Therefore he taketh no more to himſelfe over all other, than in another place hee granteth to all other over himſelfe, when when he confesseth that hee is readie to be corrected of all, to be amended of all. So in another place hee doth indeed command the bishop of Aquileia to come to Rome, to plead his cause in a controversie of Faith that was risen betweene him and other: but he doth not command him of his owne power, but because the Emperor had so commanded. Neither doth hee give warning that hee alone shall be Judge, but promised that hee will assemble a Synod by whom the whole matter may be judged. But although there was yet such moderation, that the power of the Sea of Rome had her certaine bounds, which it might not passe, and the bishop of Rome himselfe was no more above than under other: yet it appeareth how much Gregorie misliked such state. For hee now and then complaineth, that under colour of bishoprike hee was brought backe to the world: and that he was more entangled with earthly cares, than ever hee had beene while hee was a lay man: that hee was in that honor oppressed with tumult of worldly affaires. In another place: so great burdens (saith he) of businesse doe hold me downe, that my minde can nothing at all be raised up to things above. I am shaken with many waves of causes: and after those leasures of rest I am tossed with tempests of troublesome life, so that I may rightly say, I am come into the depth of the sea, and the tempest hath drowned me. Hereby gather, what hee would have said, if he had happened to be in these times. Although hee fulfilled not the office of a Pastor, yet he was doing it. Hee abstained from the government of the civill Empire, and confessed himselfe to be subject to the Emperor as other were. He did not thrust himselfe into the cure of other Churches, but being compelled by necessitie. And yet hee thinketh himselfe to be in a maze, because he cannot apply himselfe altogether onely to the office of a bishop.

Lib. 1. Epist. 7. & 15.

14 At that time the Bishop of Constantinople strived with the bishop of Rome for the Supremacie, as it is alreadie said. For after that the seate of the Empire was stablished at Constantinople, the majestie of the Empire seemed to require that that Church also should have the second place of honour after the Church of Rome. And truly at the beginning, nothing more availed to cause the Supremacie to be given to Rome, but because the head of the Empire was there at that time. There is in Gratian a writing under the name of Pope Lucius, where he saith, that Cities were no otherwise divided, where Metropolitanes and Primates ought to sit, than by the reason of the civill government that was before. There is also an other under the name of Pope Clement, where he saith, the Patriarches were ordained in those Cities that had had the chiefe Flamines in them. Which, although it be false, yet it is taken out of a truth. For it is certaine, that to the end there should be made as little change as might be, the Provinces were divided according to the state of things that then were: and that Primates & Metropolitanes were set in those Cities that excelled the other in honors and power. Therefore in the Councell at Taurinum it was decreed, that those Cities which in the civill government were the chiefe Cities of every Province, should be the chiefe Seas of Bishops. And if it happened the honor of the civill government to be removed from one Citie to another, that then the right of the Metropolitane citie should therewithall bee removed thither. But Innocentius bishop of Rome, when he saw the ancient dignitie of his citie to grow in decay, after that the seate of the Empire was removed to Constantinople, fearing the abacement of his Sea, made a contrarie law: wherein he denieth it to be necessarie that the Ecclesiasticall mother cities should be changed as the Imperiall mother cities change. But the authoritie of a Synod ought of right to be preferred above one mans sentence. Also we ought to suspect Innocentius himselfe in his owne cause. Howsoever it be, yet by his owne proviso he sheweth, that from the beginning it was so ordered, that the Metropolitane cities should be disposed according to the outward order of the Empire.

The Church of Rome risen by the Empire of Rome.

Cap. 1.

15 According to this ancient ordinance, it was decreed in the first Councell at Constantinople, that the bishop of the citie should have the priviledges of honor next after the bishop of Rome, because it was a new Rome. But a long time after, when a like decree was made at Chalcedon, Leo stoutly cryed out against it. And he not onely gave himselfe leave to esteeme as nothing that which fixe hundred bishops or moe had decreed: but also bitterly taunted them, for that they tooke from other Seas that honour which they were so bold to give to the Church of Constantinople. I beseech you, what other thing could move a man to trouble the world for so small a matter, but meere ambition? He sayeth that, that ought to be inviolable, which the Nicene Synod hath once decreed. As though forsooth the Christian faith were endangered, if one Church bee preferred before an other: or as though Patriarcheies were there divided to any other end, but for policies. But we know that policie receiveth, yea requireth divers changes, according to the diversitie of times. Therefore it is fond that Leo pretendeth, that the honour, which by the authoritie of the Nicene Synod was given to the sea of Alexandria, ought not to be given to the sea of Constantinople. For common reason telleth this, that it was such a decree, as might be taken away according to the respect of times. Yea none of the Bishops of the East withstood it, whom that thing most of all concerned. Truly Proterius was present, whom they had made Bishop of Alexandria in the place of Dioscorus. There were present other Patriarches, whose honour was diminished. It was their part to withstand it, not Leos which remained safe in his owne place. But when all they hold their peace, yea assent unto it, and onely the Bishop of Rome resisteth: it is easie to judge, what mooveth him: that is hee foresaw that which not long after happened, that it would come to passe, that, the glory of old Rome decaying, Constantinople not contented with the second place, would strive with Rome for the Supremacy. And yet with his crying out hee did not so much prevaile, but that the decree of the councill was confirmed. Therefore his successors, when they saw themselves overcome, quietly gave over that stiffenesse: for they suffered that he should be accounted the second patriarch.

The pride of the Bishop of Constantinople, seeking to equall his Bishopricke with the bounds of the Empire constantly resisted by Gregory.
Lib. 7. epi. 30.

16. But within a little after, Iohn which in Gregories time ruled the Church of Constantinople, brake forth so farre that he called himselfe the universall patriarch. Heere Gregorie, least hee should in a verie good cause faile to defend his owne sea, did constantly set himselfe against him. And truly both the pride and madnesse of Iohn was intollerable, which desired to make the bounds of his Bishopricke equall with the bounds of the Empire. And yet Gregorie doth not claime to himselfe, that which hee denieth to an other: but abhorreth that name as wicked, and ungodly, and abhominable, whosoever take it upon him. Yea and also in one place he is angrie with Eulolius Bishop of Alexandria, which had honoured him with such a title. Behold (saith he) in the Preface of the Epistle which ye directed to my selfe that have forbidden it, ye have cared to imprint the word of proud calling, in naming mee universall Pope, which I pray that your Holinesse will no more doe, because that is withdrawne from you, which is given to another more than reason requireth. I count it no honour, wherein I see the honour of my brethren to be diminished. For my honour is the honour of the universall Church, and the sound strength of my brethren. But if your holinesse call me the universall Pope, it denyeth it selfe to be that which it confesseth me to bee wholly. Truely Gregory stood in a good and honest cause. But Iohn holpen by the favour of Maurice the Emperour, could never be removed from his purpose. Cyriacus also his successor never suffered himselfe to be intreated in that behalfe.

The headship of the Church granted by Phocas to the bishop of Rome and the Churches of France by Pipin made subject to his authority.

17 At the last Phocas, which when Maurice was slaine, was set in his place (I wot not for what cause being more friendly to the Romans, but because he was there crowned without strife (granted to Boniface the third, that which Gregory never required, that Rome should bee the head of all Churches. After this manner was the controversie ended. And yet this benefit of the Emperour, could not so much have profited the Sea of Rome, unlesse other things also had afterward happened. For Grecia and all Asia were within a little after cut off from the communion of Rome. France so much reverenced him, that it obeyed no further than it lifted. But it was then first brought into bondage when Pipine usurped the kingdome. For when Zachary Bishop of Rome had beene his helper to the breach of his faith, and to robbery, that thrusting out the lawfull King, he might violently enter upon the kingdome as laid open for a prey: hee received this reward that the sea of Rome should have iurisdiction over the Churches of France: As robbers are wonted in parting to divide the common spoile: so these good men ordered the matter betweene themselues, that Pipine should have the earthly and civill dominion, spoyling the true king: and Zachary should bee made made head of all bishops and have the spirituall power: which, when at the beginning it was weake: (as it is wont to be in new things) was afterward confirmed by the authoritie of Charles, in manner for a like cause. For he was also indebted to the bishop of Rome, for that by his endevour he had attained to the honour of the Empire. But although it be credible, that churches ech where were before that time much deformed, yet it is certaine that the old forme of the Church was then first utterly defaced in Fraunce and Germanie. There remaine yet in the records of the Court of Paris, briefe notes of these times, which, where they intreat of the matters of the Church, make mention of the covenant both of Pipine and of Charles with the bishop of Rome. Thereby we may gather that then there was an alteration made of the old state.

18 Since that time, when things did each where daily fall from worse to worse, the tyrannie of the sea of Rome was now and then also stablished and increased, and that partly by the ignorance, and partly by the slothfulnesse of the bishops. For when one man tooke all things upon him, and without measure proceeded more and more to advance himselfe against law and right: the bishops did not with such zeale as they ought, endevour themselves to restraine his lust, and though they wanted not courage, yet they were destitute of true learning, and knowledge: so that they were nothing fit to attempt so great a matter. Therefore we see what and how monstrous an unholy defiling of all holy things, and a scattering abroad of the whole order of the Church, was in Bernards time. Hee complaineth that there resort by heapes to Rome out of all the world, ambitious men, covetous, Simonians, robbers of God, keepers of concubines, committers of incest, and all such monsters, to obtaine, or retaine ecclesiasticall honors by the Apostolike authoritie: and that fraud and undermineing, and violence were growne in force. He saith that that manner of judging which then was used, was abhominable, and unseemely, not onely for the Church, but also for a judiciall court. Hee crieth out that the Church is full of ambitious men: and that there is that more dreadeth to commit mischievous acts, than robbers doe in their caue, when they divide the spoiles of waifairing men. Few (saith hee) doe looke unto the mouth of the Law-giver, but unto his hands. But not without cause. For those hands doe all the Popes businesse. What a thing is this, that they are bought of the spoiles of Churches, that say to thee, oh well done, well done! The life of the poore is sowne in the streets of the rich: silver glistereth in the mire: men runne to it from all places: not the poore, but the stranger taketh it up, or hee peradventure that runneth fastest before. But this manner, or rather this death, came not of thee, I would to God it might end in thee. Among these things thou a Pastor goest forward, compassed with much and precious array. If I durst say it, these are rather the Pastors of divels, than of sheepe. Forsooth Peter did thus, Paul plaied thus. Thy court is more accustomed to receive men good, than to make men good. For the ill doe not there profit, but the good doe decay. Now as for the abuses of appeales that hee rehearseth, no godly man can read them without great horror. At the last hee thus concludeth of that unbridled greedinesse of the Sea of Rome, in the usurping of jurisdiction: I speake the murmur and common complaint of the Churches. They cry out that they be mangled and dismembred. There are either none or few, that doe not either bewaile, or feare this plague. Askest thou what plague? The Abbots are plucked from the bishops, the bishops from the Archbishops, &c. It is marvellous if this may be excused. In so doing, ye prove that yee have fulnesse of power, but not of righteousnesse. Yee doe this because ye can doe it: but whether ye also ought to doe it, is a question. Ye are set to preserve, not to envie to every man his honour and his owne degree. These few things of many I listed to rehearse, partly that the Readers may see, how sore the Church was then decayed, and partly that they may know in how great sorrow and mourning this calamitie held all the godly.

The state of the Church of Rome in Bernards time.

Li. 1. de consi. ad Eug.

Lib. 3.

19 But now, albeit that we graunt to the bishop of Rome at this day the preeminence and largenesse of jurisdiction, which that Sea had in the meane times, as in the times of Leo and of Gregorie: what is that to the present state of the Papacie? I doe not yet speake of the earthly dominion, nor of the civill power therof, which we will afterward consider in place fit for it: but the very spirituall government that they boast of, what what hath it like to the ſtate of thoſe times? For they define the Pope none otherwiſe than the Supreme head of the Church in earth, and the univerſall biſhop of the whole world. And the biſhops themſelves, when they ſpeake of their owne authoritie, doe with great ſtoutneſſe of countenance, pronounce that to them belongeth the power to command, and other are bound to the neceſſitie to obey, that ſo all their decrees are to be holden as confirmed with the divine voice of Peter, that the provinciall Synods are without force, becauſe they want the preſence of the Pope: that they may order clerks of any Church that they will: and may call them to their Sea that have been ordered elſe where. Innumerable of that ſort are in Gratians packe, which I doe not now rehearſe, leaſt I ſhould be too tedious to the Readers. But this is the ſumme of them, that onely the biſhop of Rome hath the ſupreme hearing and determining of all Eccleſiaſticall cauſes, whether it be in judging and defining of doctrines, or in making of lawes, or in ſtabliſhing of diſcipline, or in executing of judgements: It were alſo long and ſuperfluous to rehearſe the priviledges that they take to themſelves in reſervations, as they call them. But (which is moſt intollerable of all other) they leave no judgement in earth to reſtraine and bridle their outragious luſt, if they abuſe ſo immeaſurable power. It is lawfull for no man (ſay they) to revoke the judgements of that Sea, becauſe of the Supremacie of the Church of Rome. Againe, The judge ſhall bee judged neither by the Emperor, nor by Kings, nor by all the Clergie, nor of the people. That is indeed too imperiouſly done that one man maketh himſelfe judge of all men, and ſuffereth himſelfe to obey the judgement of no man. But what if he uſe tyrannie over the people of God? if he ſcatter abroad and waſte the kingdome of Chriſt? if hee trouble the whole Church? if he turne the office of Paſtor into robberie? Yea though he be never ſo miſchievous, he ſaith, that hee is not bound to yeeld account. For theſe be the ſayings of the biſhops: Gods will was to determine the cauſes of other men by men, but he hath without queſtion reſerved the biſhop of this Sea to his owne judgement. Againe, The doings of ſubjects are judged of us, but ours of God onely.

20 And that ſuch decrees might have the more weight, they have falſely thruſt in the names of the old biſhops, as though things had beene ſo ordained from the beginning: whereas it is moſt certaine, that it is new and lately forged whatſoever the biſhop of Rome giveth to himſelfe more than wee have rehearſed to be given him by the ancient Councels. Yea, they are come to ſo great ſhameleſneſſe, that they have ſet forth a writing under the name of Anaſtaſius Patriarch of Conſtantinople, wherein he teſtifieth that it was decreed by the old rulers, that nothing ſhould be done even in the furtheſt provinces, that were not firſt moved to the Sea of Rome. Beſide this, that it is certaine that is moſt vaine, what man ſhall thinke it likely, that ſuch a commendation of the Sea of Rome proceeded from the adverſarie and envier of honour and dignitie thereof? But verily it behooved that theſe Antichriſts ſhould be carried on to ſo great madneſſe and blindneſſe, that their lewdneſſe might be plaine for all men to ſee, at leaſt ſo many as will open their eies. But the decretall Epiſtles heaped together by Gregory the ninth, againe the Clementines, and Extravagants of Martine, doe yet more openly and with fuller mouth each where breath forth their outragious fierceneſſe, and as it were the tyrannie of barbarous kings. But theſe be the oracles, by which the Romaniſts will have their Papacie to be weighed. Hereupon aroſe thoſe notable principles, which at this day have every where in the Papacie the force of oracles: that the Pope cannot erre: that the Pope is above the Councels: that the Pope is the univerſall biſhop of all biſhops, and the ſupreme head of the Church in earth: I paſſe over the much abſurder follies, which the fooliſh Canoniſts babble in their Schooles, to which yet the Romiſh divines doe not onely aſſent, but doe alſo clap their hands at them, to flatter their idoll.

The ſorgeries uſed in the Papacie to make the world beleeve that they claime at this day no more than they have had in ancient times. Ibid ca. Ant.

21 * I will not deale with them by extremitie of right. Some other man would againſt this their ſo great inſolencie ſet the ſaying of Cyprian, which hee uſed among the biſhops, at whoſe Councell he ſat as chiefe. None of us calleth himſelfe biſhop of biſhops, or with tyrannous feare compelleth his fellow biſhops to neceſſitie to obey. He would object that, which a little after was decreed at Carthage. That none ſhould bee called Prince, Prieſt, or chiefe Biſhop. Hee would gather many teſtimonies out of Hiſtories, ſtories, Canons out of Synods, and many ſentences out of the bookes of old writers, by which the biſhop of Rome ſhould bee brought downe into the fellowſhip of the reſt. But I paſſe over all theſe, leaſt I ſhould ſeeme too preciſely to preſſe them. But leaſt the beſt Patrones of the Sea of Rome anſwer me, with what face they dare defend the title of univerſall biſhop, which they ſee ſo oft to be condemned with curſe by Gregorie. If Gregories teſtimonie ought to be of force, they doe thereby declare that Antichriſt is there biſhop, becauſe they make him univerſall. The name alſo of head was no more uſuall. For thus hee ſaith in one place: Peter is the chiefe member in the bodie, John, Andrew, and James the heads of particular peoples: yet they all are members of the Church under one head: yea the holie ones before the law, the holie ones under the law, and the holie ones under grace, are ſet among members, altogether making up the bodie of the Lord: and no man ever willed to have himſelfe called univerſall. But whereas the biſhop of Rome taketh upon himſelfe the power of commanding, that thing ſmally agreeth with that which Gregorie ſaith in another place. For whereas Eulolius biſhop of Alexandria, had ſaid that he was commanded by him, he anſwered in this wiſe, I pray yee, take away this word of commanding from my hearing. For I know what I am, and what ye be. In place, ye be to me brethren, in manners ye be to me Fathers. Therefore I commanded not, but I cared to tell you thoſe things that I thought profitable. Whereas he ſo extendeth his iuriſdiction without end, he doth therein great and hainous wrong, not onely to the other biſhops, but alſo to all particular Churches, which he ſo teareth and plucketh in peeces, that he may build his ſeate of their ruines. But whereas he exempteth himſelfe from all judgements, and will ſo raigne after the manner of Tyrants, that hee accounteth his owne onely luſt for law, that verily is ſo hainous, and ſo farre from Eccleſiaſticall order, that it may in no wiſe be borne: for it utterly abhorreth not only from all feeling of godlineſſe, but alſo from all humanitie.

* The Popes uſurpation not onely againſt the judgement of all antiquitie, againſt the mind of Gregorie, but even repugnant to all humanitie.

Lib.7.Epi.28.

22 But that I be not compelled to goe through and examine all things particularly, I doe againe appeale to them, that will at this day be accompted the beſt and moſt faithfull Patrones of the Sea of Rome, whether they be not aſhamed to defend the preſent ſtate of the Papacie: which it is certaine to be a hundred times more corrupt, than it was in the time of Gregorie and Bernard: which ſtate yet did then ſo much diſpleaſe thoſe holy men. Gregorie each where complaineth, that he is too much diverſly drawne away with forraine buſineſſe: that hee is under the colour of biſhopricke brought backe to the world: wherein he ſerveth ſo many cares of the world as he never remembreth that he ſerved when he was a Lay man: that he is preſſed downe with tumult of wordly affaires, that his minde is nothing raiſed up to things above, that he is ſhaken with many waves of cauſes, and toſſed with tempeſts of troubleſome life: ſo that hee may worthily ſay, I am come into the depth of the ſea. Truly among thoſe earthly buſineſſes, hee might yet teach the people with Sermons, privately admoniſh and correct ſuch as it behoved, order the Church, give counſell to his fellow biſhops and exhort them to their dutie: beſide theſe things there remained ſome time to write: and yet hee lamenteth his calamitie, that hee is drowned in the deepeſt ſea. If the government of that time was a ſea: what is to be ſaid of the Papacie at this time? For what likeneſſe have they together? Here bee no preachings, no care of diſcipline, no zeale to the Churches, no ſpirituall doing, finally nothing but the world. Yet this maze is praiſed, as though there could nothing be found more orderly and better framed. But what complaints doth Bernard poure out, what groanes doth he utter, when he looketh upon the faultes of his age: What then would he doe if he beheld this our age of iron, and worſe if any be worſe than iron? What obſtinate wickedneſſe is this, not onely ſtiffely to defend as holy and divine, that which all the holy men have with one mouth condemned: but alſo to abuſe their teſtimonie to the defence of the Papacie, which it is certaine that they never knew of? Howbeit of Bernards time I confeſſe, that then the corruption of all things was ſo great, that it was not much unlike our time. But they are without all ſhame, that fetch any pretence for it, out of that meane age, that is the time of Leo, Gregorie, and ſuch other. For they doe like as if one, to ſtabliſh the Monarchie of Emperors, would praiſe the old ſtate of the Empire of Rome: that is, would would borrow the praises of libertie, to set forth the honor of Tyrannie.

The ſtate of Rome an hundred times more corrupt now than in the daies of Gregorie or Bernard. Lib.1.epi.5.7. & 15 & alibi.

The Bishop of Rome no Bishop.

23 Finally, although all these things were granted them: yet there ariseth of fresh a new strife for them, when we denie that there is a Church at Rome, in which such benefits may be resident: when we denie that there is a bishop, which may beare these priviledges of dignitie. Admit therefore all those things to be true, (which yet we have already wrong from them) that Peter was by the mouth of Christ appointed head of the universall Church: and that hee left the honor that it was given him in the Sea of Rome: that the same was stablished by the authoritie of the ancient Church, and confirmed with long continuance: that the Supreme power hath beene alway by one consent given of all men to the bishop of Rome, that hee hath beene the Judge of all both causes and men, and himselfe subject to the judgement of none: let them have also more, if they will: yet I answere in one word, that none of these things availe, unlesse there be at Rome a Church and a bishop. This they must needs grant me, that it cannot be the mother of Churches, which is not it selfe a Church: that he cannot be chiefe of bishops, which is not himselfe a bishop. Will they therefore have the Sea Apostolike at Rome? Then let them shew me a true and lawfull Apostleship. Will they have the chiefe bishop? Then let them shew me a bishop. But what? where will they shew us any face of a Church? They name one indeed, and have it oft in their mouth. Truly the Church is knowne by her certaine marks: and bishoprike is a name of office. I speake not here of the people: but of the government it selfe, which ought continually to shine in the Church. Where is the ministerie in their Church, such as Christs institution requireth? Let us call to remembrance that which hath before beene spoken of the office of Priests and of a bishop. If we shall bring the office of Cardinals to be tried by that rule, wee shall confesse that they are nothing lesse than Priests. As for the chiefe bishop himselfe, I would faine know what one thing at all he hath bishoplike. First it is the principall point in the office of a bishop, to teach the people with the word of God: another and the next point to that is, to minister the Sacraments: the third is to admonish and exhort, yea and to correct them that offend, and to hold the people together in holy discipline. What of these things doth he? yea, what doth he faigne himselfe to doe? Let them tell therefore, by what meane they would have him to be counted a bishop, that doth not with his little finger, no not once so much as in outward shew, touch any part of a bishops office.

In the Bishop of Rome all things contrarie unto that which should be in a Bishop.

24 It is not so of a bishop as it is of a King. For a King although hee doe not execute that which belongeth to a King, doth nevertheless retaine the honor and title. But in judging of a bishop, respect is had to Christs commandement, which alway ought to be of force in the Church. Therefore let the Romanists loose me this knot. I denie that there high bishop is the chiefe of bishops, forasmuch as he is no bishop. They must needes prove this last point to be false, if they will have the victorie in the first. But how say they to this, that he not onely hath no propertie of a bishop, but rather all things contrarie? But here, O God, whereat shall I begin? at his learning, or at his manners? What shall I say, or what shall I leave unsaid? where shall I make an end? This I say: that whereas the world is at this day stuffed with so many perverse and wicked doctrines, full of so many kindes of superstitions, blinded with so many errors, drowned in so great idolatrie: there is none of these any where, that hath not either flowed from thence: or at least beene there confirmed. Neither is there any other cause, why the bishops are carried with so great rage against the doctrine of the Gospell newly springing up againe, why they bend all their strengthes to oppresse it, why they kindle up Kings and Princes to crueltie, but because they see that their whole kingdome decayeth and falleth downe, so soone as the Gospell of Christ cometh in place. Leo was cruell: Clement was bloodie: Paul is a fierce murtherer. But nature hath not so much moved them to fight against the truth, as for that this was their onely meane to maintaine their power. Therefore sith they cannot be safe, till they have driven away Christ, they travell in this cause, as if they did fight for their religion and countries, and for their owne lives. What then? Shall that be to us the Sea Apostolike, where wee see nothing but horrible Apostasie? Shall hee be Christs vicar which by persecuting the Gospell with furious enterprises, doth openly professe himselfe himselfe to be Antichrist? Shall he be Peters successor, that rangeth with sword and fire, to destroy all that ever Peter hath builded? Shall he be head of the Church that cutting off, and dismembring the Church from Christ the onely true head there of, doth in it selfe plucke and teare it in peices, Admit verily that in the old time Rome was the mother of all churches: yet since it hath begun to be the seat of Antichrist, it hath ceased to be that which it was.

25 We seeme to be too much evill speakers and railers, when we call the Bishop of Rome Antichrist. But they that so thinke, doe not understand that they accuse Paul of immodesty, after whom we so speake, yea out of whose mouth wee so speake. And lest any man object, that we doe wrongfully wrest against the Bishop of Rome these words of Paul that are spoken to another intent, I will briefly shew, that they cannot be otherwise understood, but of the Papacy. Paul writeth, that Antichrist shall sit in the Temple of God. In another place also the holy Ghost describing his image in the person of Antiochus, sheweth that his kingdome shall consist in hautinesse of speech, and blasphemings of God. Hereupon wee gather, that it is rather a Tyranny over soules, than over bodies, that it is raised up against the spirituall kingdome of Christ. Then, that it is such, as doth not abolish the name of Christ and the church: but rather should abuse the pretence of Christ, and lurcke under the title of the church, as under a disguised visor. But although all the heresies and sects that have beene from the beginning, belong to the kingdome of Antichrist: yet whereas Paul prophecieth, that there shall come a departing, by this discription he signifieth, that that seate of abhomination shall then be raised up, when a certaine universall departing shall possesse the church: howsoever many members of the church here and there continue in the true unity of faith. But where he addeth, that in his time he began in a mystery to set up the worke of iniquity, which he would afterward shew openly: thereby wee understand, that this calamity was neither to be brought in by one man, nor to be ended in one man. Now whereas he doth set out Antichrist by this marke, that hee should plucke away from God his due honour, to take it to himselfe: this is the chiefe token that wee ought to follow in seeking out of Antichrist, specially where such pride proceedeth even to the publike dissipation of the church. Sith therefore it is certaine that the Bishop of Rome hath shamelessly conveyed away to himselfe that which was the chiefe proper thing to God alone and Christ, it is not to be doubted that hee is the captaine and Standard-bearer of the wicked and abhominable kingdome.

The Pope Antichrist

2 Thes. 2.4. Dan. 7.25.

26 Now let the Romanists goe and object antiquity against us: As if in so great alteration of all things, the honour of the sea might stand where there is no sea. Eusebius telleth, how God, that there might be place for his vengeance, removed the church that was at Hierusalem to Pella. That which we heare to have been once done, might be ofter done. Therefore so to binde the honour of supremacy to a place, that he which is indeed the most hatefull enemy of Christ, the highest adversary of the Gospell, the greatest waster and destroyer of the church, the most cruel slaughterman and Butcher of the Saints, should never the lesse bee accounted the vicar of Christ, the successor of Peter, the chiefe Bishop of the church, only because he occupieth the Sea that was once the chiefest of all: that verily is too much to bee scorned and foolish. I speake not, how great difference there is betweene the Popes chancery, and a well framed order of the Church. Howbeit this one thing may well take away all doubt of this question. For no man that hath his right wit, will thinke the Bishoppricke enclosed in lead and buls: much lesse in that schole of fraud and deceits, in which things the Popes spirituall government consisteth. Therefore it was very well said by a certaine man, that church of Rome which is boasted of, is long agoe turned into a court, which onely is now seene at Rome. Neither doe I here accuse the faults of men: but I shew that the Papacy it selfe is directly contrary to the true order of the church.

Nothing left in the Papacie but onely the place where the order of a Church hath beene. Euseb. lib. 3. c. 5.

27 But if we come to the persons of men, it is well enough knowne what manner of Vicars of Christ we shall finde. Iulius forsooth, and Leo, and Clement, and Paul, shall bee pillers of the christian faith, and the chiefe expositors of religion, which never knew any other thing of Christ, than that which they had learned in Lucians schoole. But why doe I reckon up three or foure Popes? as though it were doubtfull, what manner of of forme of religion the Popes with their whole Colledge of Cardinals have since long agoe professed, and at this day doe professe. For first this is the principle article of that secret Divinitie that raigneth among them, That there is no God: the second, That all things that are written and taught concerning Christ, are lies and deceits: the third, That the doctrine of the life to come, and of the last resurrection are meere fables. They doe not all thinke so: and few of them speake so. I grant. But this hath long agoe begun to be the ordinarie religion of Popes. Whereas this is very well knowne to all that know Rome, yet the Romish Divines cease not to boast, that by Christs priviledge it is provided, that the Pope cannot erre, because it was said to Peter: I have praied for thee, that thy faith should not faint. What, I pray you, winne they by mocking so shamelessly, but that the whole world may understand, that they are come to that extremitie of wickednesse, that they neither feare God, nor stand in awe of men.

Luke 22.32.

The fall of Iohn the xxii.

28 But let us imagine, that the ungodlinesse of those Popes whom I have spoken of, is hidden, because they have neither published it by preaching, nor by writings: but onely have bewraied it at their table, and in their chamber, or at least within walles of houses. But if they will have this priviledge to be of force, which they pretend, they must needs wipe John the xxii. out of the number of Popes, who openly affirmed that soules are mortall, and that they die together with the bodies untill the day of resurrection. And that you may perceive that the whole sea with her principall stayes was then wholly fallen, none of all the Cardinals withstood so great a madnesse, but the Schoole of Paris moved the King of France to compell him to recant it. The King forbad his subjects to communicate with him, unlesse he did out of hand repent: and the same, as the manner is, he proclaimed by a Herald. The Pope compelled by this necessitie, abjured his errour. This example maketh that I neede not to dispute any more with my adversaries about this that they say, that the sea of Rome and the Bishops thereof, cannot erre in the faith, because it was said to Peter, I have praied for thee, that thy faith may not faint. Truly, hee fell with so foule a kinde of fall from the right faith, that he is a notable example to them that come after, that they are not all Peters which succeede after Peter in the Bishoprike. Howbeit this is also of it selfe so childish, that it needeth no answere. For if they will draw to Peters successors whatsoever was spoken to Peter, it shall follow that they are all Satans, forasmuch as the Lord said this also to Peter: Goe behind, thou Satan, because thou art an offence to me. For it shall be as easie for us to turne backe this latter saying against them, as it shall be for them to object the other against us.

Gerson which lived then.

Luke 22.32.

Mat 16.23.

The uncleane manners of the Romane Bishops.

29 But I list not to strive with them in playing the foole. Therefore I returne thither from whence I made digression. So to binde the place, and Christ, and the holy Ghost, and the Church together, that whosoever sit in that place, although hee be the Devill, yet he must be judged the Vicar of Christ and the head of the Church, because it was once the seate of Peter: I say this is not onely wicked and slanderous to Christ, but also too great an absurditie, and against common reason. It is alreadie long agoe since the Bishops of Rome are either without all religion, or the greatest enemies of Religion. Therefore they are no more made the Vicars of Christ, by reason of the seare which they occupie, than an Idol, when it is set in the Temple of God, is to be taken for God. Now if their manners be to be judged upon, let the Popes themselves answere for themselves: what one thing at all there is in them, wherein they may be knowne for bishops? First whereas there it such life at Rome, they not onely winking at it, but also as it were with secret countenance allowing it, this is utterly unmeete for bishops, whose dutie is with severitie of discipline to restraine the licentiousnesse of the people. But I will not be so rigorous against them, to charge them with other mens faults. But whereas they themselves, with their owne household, with almost the whole Colledge of Cardinals, with the whole flocke of their Cleargie, are so given forth to all wickednesse, filthinesse, uncleannesse, to all kindes of lewd and mischievous doings, that they resemble rather monsters than men: therein truly they bewray themselves to be nothing lesse than Bishops. And yet they neede not feare least I should further disclose their filthinesse. For both I am wearie to have to doe in so stinking mire, and I must favour chast eares, and I thinke that I have already enough and more proved that which I went about: that is, that although Rome had in old time beene the head of Churches, yet at this day she is not worthy to be judged one of the smallest toes of the Churches feete.

30 As concerning the Cardinals, (as they call them) I cannot tell how it is come to passe, that they be so suddenly risen up to so great dignitie. This name in Gregories time belonged to bishops onely. For so oft as hee maketh mention of Cardinals, hee meaneth it not of them of the Church of Rome, but of any other: so that briefely, a Cardinall Priest is nothing else but a Bishop. In the writers before that age I finde not this name at all. But I see that they were then lesse than Bishops, whom they be now farre above. This saying of Augustine is well knowne: Although according to the names of honour, which the use of the Church hath already obtained, Bishoprike is greater than Priesthood, yet in many things Augustine is lesse than Hierome. Here indeed hee maketh difference betwene a Priest of the Church of Rome and other: but he indifferently setteth them all behinde the Bishops. And that was so long observed, that in the Councell of Carthage, when there were present two Legates of the sea of Rome, the one a bishop, the other a Priest, the Priest was thrust backe into the last place. But not to follow too old examples, there remaineth a Councell holden under Gregorie at Rome, at which the Priests sate in the lowest place, and subscribed severally by themselves: as for the Deacons, they had no place at all in subscribing. And truly they had then no office, but to be present and under the bishop at ministring of doctrine and of the Sacraments. Now the case is so changed, that they are become the cousins of Kings and Emperors. And it is no doubt but that they grew up by little and little together with their head, till they were advanced to this high top of dignitie. But this also I thought good to touch shortly by the way that the Readers might the better understand, that the sea of Rome, such as it is at this day, doth much differ from that ancient one, under pretence whereof, it doth now maintaine and defend it selfe. But of what sort soever they were in old time, forasmuch as they have now nothing of the true and lawfull office in the Church, they retaine onely a deceitfull colour and vaine visour: yea forasmuch as they have all things utterly contrarie, it was necessary that that should happen to them, which Gregorie writeth so oft. I say it (saith he) weeping: I give warning of it, groning: that sith the order of Priesthood is fallen within, it shall also not be able to stand long without. But rather it behooved that this should be fulfilled in them which Malachie saith of such: Yee have gone backe out of the way, and have made many to stumble in the law. Therefore yee have made voide the covenant of Levi, saith the Lord. Therefore behold, I have given you out of estimation, and vile to all the people. Now I leave it to all the godly to thinke of what sort is that supreme height of the Hierarchie of Rome, whereunto the Papists with abhominable shamelesnesse sticke not to make subject the very word of God, which ought to have beene honorable and holy both to heaven, and earth, men and Angels.

The rising of Cardinals.

Lib. 4. Epist. 25. & 55. Lib. 5. Epist. 7. Mala. 2. 8.

THE EIGHT CHAPTER.

Of the power of the Church as touching the articles of faith: and with how unbridled licentiousnesse, it hath in the Papacie beene wrested to corrupt all pureuesse of doctrine.

NOw followeth the third place of the power of the Church, which partly consisteth in all the bishops, and partly in the Councels, and those either provinciall or generall. I speake onely of the spirituall power, which is proper to the Church. That consisteth either in doctrine, or in jurisdiction, or in making of Lawes. Doctrine hath two parts, the authoritie to teach articles of Doctrine, and the expounding of them. Before that we begin to discourse of every one of these in specialtie, wee will that the godly Readers bee warned, that whatsoever is taught concerning the power of the church, they must remember to apply it to that end, whereunto (as Paul testifieth) it was given: that is, to edification, and not to destruction: which who so lawfully use, they thinke themselves no more than the ministers of Christ, and therewithall the ministers of the people in Christ. Now of the edifying of the Church, this is the onely way, if

if the Ministers themselves endevour to preserve to Christ his authoritie, which cannot otherwise be safe unlesse that be left unto him, which he received of his Father: that is, that hee be the onely Schoolemaster of the Church. For it is written, not of any other Matt.17.5. but of him alone, Heare him. The power of the Church therefore is not to bee sparingly set forth, but yet to be enclosed within certaine bounds, that it be not drawne hither and thither after the lust of men. Hereunto it shall be much profitable to note, how it is described of the Prophets and Apostles. For if wee simply grant unto men such power as they list to take upon them, it is plaine to all men, what a slipperie readinesse there is to fall into tyrannie, which ought to be farre from the Church of Christ.

All the Priests authoritie depended wholy upon him whose Priests they were.

2 Therefore here it must bee remembred, that whatsoever authoritie or dignitie the holie Ghost in the Scripture giveth either to the Priests or to the Prophets, or to the Apostles, or to the successors of the Apostles, all that same is given, not properly to the men themselves, but to the ministerie over which they are appointed, or (to speake it more plainely in one word) whereof the ministerie is committed to them. For if we goe through them all in order, we shall not finde that they had any authoritie to teach or to answer, but in the name and word of the Lord. For when they are called to the office, it is also enjoyned them, that they should bring nothing of themselves, but speake
Exod.3 4. out of the mouth of the Lord. And he himselfe doth not bring them forth to be heard of the people, before that he have given them instructions what they ought to speake, Exod.14.31. Deut.16.9. to the intent that they should speake nothing beside his word. Moses himselfe, the prince of all the Prophets, was to be heard above the rest: but hee was first instructed with his commandements, that hee might not declare any thing at all, but from the Lord. Therefore it is said, that the people when they embraced his doctrine, beleeved in God, and in his servant Moses. Also that the authoritie of the Priests should not grow in contempt, it was stablished with most grievous penalties. But therewithall the Lord sheweth upon what condition they were to bee heard, when hee saith, that he hath Mala.2.4 & 6. made his covenant with Levi, that the law of the truth should be in his mouth. And a little after he addeth: The lips of the priest shall keepe knowledge, and they shall require the law at his mouth: because he is the Angell of the God of hosts. Therefore if the priest will be heard, let him shew himselfe the messenger of God: that is, let him faithfully report the commandements that hee received of his author. And where it is Deut.17.10. specially entreated of the hearing of them, this is expressely set, That they may answer according to the law of God.

The power of Prophets consisted in delivering that which God had given them in charge.

3 What manner of power the Prophets generally had, is very well described in Ezechiel: Thou sonne of man (saith the Lord) I have given thee to be a watchman to the house of Israel. Therefore thou shalt heare the word out of my mouth, and thou shalt declare it to them from me. He that is commanded to heare out of the mouth of Ezec.3.17. the Lord, is he not forbidden to invent any thing of himselfe? But what is to declare from the Lord, but so to speake as he may boldly boast, that it is not his owne, but the Hiere.23.28. Lords word that he hath brought? The selfe same thing is in Hieremie, in other words. Let the prophet (saith he) with whom is a dreame, tell a dreame: and let him that hath my word speake my word true. Certainely he appointeth a law to them all. And that is such, that he permitteth not any to teach more than he is commanded. And after he Esa.6.5. John 1.6. calleth it chaffe, all that is not from himselfe onely. Therefore none of the Prophets themselves opened his mouth, but as the Lord told him the words before. Whereupon these sayings are so oft found among them: the word of the Lord, the burden of the Lord, so saith the Lord, the mouth of the Lord hath spoken. And worthily. For Esay
Esa.6.5. Jere.1.6. cried out that hee had defiled lips. Jeremie confessed that he could not speake, because he was a childe: What could proceede from the defiled mouth of the one, and the foolish mouth of the other, but uncleane and unwise, if they had spoken their own speech? But his lips were holie and pure, when they began to be the instruments of the holie Ghost. When the Prophets are bound with this religion, that they deliver nothing, but that which they have received, then they be garnished with notable power and excellent titles. For when the Lord testifieth, that hee hath set them over nations and kingdomes, to pluck up and to roote out, to destroy and pluck downe, to build and to plant, Jere.1.10. he by and by adjoyneth the cause: because he hath put his words in their mouth.

4 Now

4 Now if you looke to the Apoſtles: they are indeed commended with many and notable titles, that they are the light of the world, and the ſalt of the earth, that they are to be heard in ſtead of Chriſt, that whatſoever they bind or looſe in earth, ſhall bee bound or looſed in heaven. But in their very name they ſhew how much is permitted them in their office: that is, if they be Apoſtles, that they ſhould not prate whatſoever they liſt: but ſhould faithfully report his commandements from whom they are ſent. And the words of Chriſt are plaine enough, in which he hath determined their embaſſage: when he commanded them to go and teach all nations, all thoſe things that he had commanded. Yea, and he himſelfe alſo received this law, and laid it upon himſelfe, that it ſhould be lawfull for no man to refuſe it. My doctrine (ſaith he) is not mine, but his that ſent mee, my Fathers. Hee that was alway the onely and eternall counſeller of the Father, and he that was appointed by the Father the Lord and ſchoolmaſter of all men, yet becauſe he executed the miniſterie of teaching, preſcribed by his owne example to all miniſters, what rule they ought to follow in teaching. Therefore the power of the Church is not infinite, but ſubject to the word of the Lord, and as it were encloſed in it.

The Apoſtles authoritie reſtrained and limited within the bounds of his Commandement which gave them authoritie. Mat. 28. 9.

John 7. 16.

5 But ſith this hath from the beginning beene of force in the Church, and at this day ought to be in force, that the ſervants of God ſhould teach nothing which they have not learned of him: yet according to the diverſitie of times they have divers orders of learning. But that order which is now, much differeth from thoſe that were before. Firſt if it be true which Chriſt ſaith, that none hath ſeene the Father, but the Sonne, and he to whom it hath pleaſed the Sonne to ſhew him, it behooved verily that they ſhould be alway directed by the eternall wiſedome of the Father, which would come to the knowledge of God. For how ſhould they either have comprehended in minde, or uttered the myſteries of God, but by his teaching to whom alone the ſecrets of the Father are open? Therefore the holy Fathers in old time knew God no otherwiſe but beholding him in the Sonne as in a glaſſe. When I ſay this, I meane that God did never by any other meane diſcloſe himſelfe to men but by the Sonne, that is, his onely wiſedome, light and truth. Out of this fountaine did Adam, Noe, Abraham, Iſaac, Jacob, and the other draw all the knowledge that they had of heavenly doctrine. Out of the ſame fountaine have alſo all the Prophets themſelves drawne all the heavenly Oracles that they uttered. For verily this wiſedome hath alway diſcloſed it ſelfe by moe waies than one. To the Patriarches hee uſed ſecret revelations: but therewithall to confirme their mindes, hee adjoyneth ſuch ſignes, that it could not be doubtfull to them, that it was God that ſpake. The Patriarches conveied over from hand to hand to poſteritie, that which they had received. For the Lord left it with them to this intent, that they ſhould ſo ſpread it abroad. But the children and childrens children, by God ſecretly informing them, did know that that which they heard was from heaven, and not from the earth.

Mat. 11. 27.

Mala. 2. 7.

6 But when it pleaſed God, to raiſe a more apparant forme of a Church hee willed to have his word put in writing and noted, that the Prieſts ſhould fetch from thence what they might deliver to the people, and that all the doctrine that ſhould be taught ſhould be tried by that rule. Therefore after the publiſhing of the law, when the Prieſts are commanded to teach out of the mouth of the Lord, the meaning is, that they ſhould teach nothing ſtrange or differing from that kinde of learning, which the Lord comprehended in the law: and to adde and to diminiſh was unlawfull for them. Then followed the Prophets, by whom indeed the Lord publiſhed new Oracles to bee added to the law: but yet not ſo new, but that they came out of the Law, and had reſpect unto it: For, as touching doctrine, they were onely expoſitors of the Law, and added nothing unto it, but Prophecies of things to come. Thoſe excepted, they uttered nothing elſe but a pure expoſition of the Law. Becauſe it pleaſed the Lord that there ſhould be a plainer and larger doctrine, that weake conſciences might be the better ſatisfied: hee commanded that the Prophecies alſo ſhould be put in writing, and accounted part of his word. And hereunto were added the hiſtories which are alſo the works of the Prophets, but made by the enditing of the holy Ghoſt. I reckon the Pſalmes among the Prophecies, becauſe that which we attribute to the Prophecies is also common to the Psalmes. Therefore that whole bodie compacted of the Law, Prophecies, Psalmes and Histories, was the word of the Lord to the old people, by the rule whereof the Priests and Teachers even unto Christs time were bound to examine their doctrine: neither was it lawfull for them to swarve either to the right hand or to the left: because all their office was inclosed within these bounds, that they should answere the people out of the mouth of God. Which is gathered of a notable place of Malachie, where he biddeth them to be mindfull of the law, and to give heede to it, even to the preaching of the Gospell. For thereby hee forbiddeth them all new found doctrines, and granteth them no leave to swarve never so little out of the way which Moses had faithfully shewed them. And this is the reason why David so honorably setteth out the excellencie of the law, and rehearseth so many praises of it: that is, that the Jewes should covet no forren thing without it, sith within it was all perfection inclosed.

Mala. 4. 4.

Christ manifested in the flesh hath added the last hand to the revelation of truth.

7 But when at last the wisedome of God was openly shewed in the flesh, that same wisedome with full mouth declared unto us all that ever can with mans wit bee comprehended, or ought to be thought concerning the heavenly Father. Now therefore, since Christ the Son of righteousnes hath shined, we have a perfect brightnesse of the truth of God, such as the clearenesse is wont to be at mid-day, when the light was before but dim. For verily the Prophet meant not to speake of any meane thing, when he wrote that God in old time spake diversly and many waies to the Fathers by the Prophets: but that in these last daies hee began to speake to us by his beloved Sonne.

Heb. 1. 1.

For he signifieth, yea he openly declareth, that God will not hereafter, as he did before, speake sometime by some, and sometime by other, nor will adde Prophecies to Prophecies, or revelations to revelations: but that he hath so fulfilled all the parts of teaching in the Sonne, that they must have this of him for the last and eternall testimonie. After which sort all this time of the new Testament wherein Christ hath appeared to us with the preaching of his Gospell even to the day of judgement, is expressed by the last houre, the last times, the last daies: to the end verily that contented with the perfection of the doctrine of Christ, we should learne neither to faigne us any new beside it, or receive it faigned of other. Therefore not without cause the Father hath by singular prerogative ordained the Sonne to bee our teacher: commanding him, and not any man, to be heard. He did indeed in few words set out his schoole-mastership unto us, when he said, Heare him: but in which there is more weight and force than men commonly thinke. For it is as much in effect, as if leading us away from all doctrines of men, he should bring us to him onely, and command us to looke for all the doctrine of salvation at him alone, to hang upon him alone, to cleave to him alone: finally (as the very words doe sound) to hearken to the voice of him alone. And truly what ought there now to be either looked for or desired at the hand of man, when the very word of life hath familiarly and openly disclosed himselfe unto us? Yea but it is meete that the mouthes of all men be shut, after that hee, in whom the heavenly Father willed to have all the treasures of knowledge and wisedome to be hidden, hath once spoken, and so spoken as became both the wisedome of God (which is in no part unperfect) and Messias at whose hand the revelation of all things is hoped for: that is to say, that he left nothing afterward for other to be spoken.

Matth. 17. 5.

John 4. 25.

The written word the onely rule of sound teaching.

8 Let this therefore be a stedfast principle: that there is to be had no other word of God, whereunto place should be given in the Church, than that which is contained first in the Law and the Prophets, and then in the writings of the Apostles: and that there is no other manner of teaching rightly, but according to the prescription and rule of that word. Hereupon also we gather, that there was no other thing granted to the Apostles, but that which the Prophets had had in old time: that is, that they should expound the old Scripture, and shew that those things that are therein taught are fulfilled in Christ: and yet that they should not doe the same but of the Lord, that is to say, the spirit of Christ going before them, and after a certaine manner enditing words unto them. For Christ limited their embassage with this condition when he commanded them to goe and teach, not such things as they themselves had rashly forged, but all those things that hee had commanded them, and nothing could be more plainly spoken, than that which he saith in another place: but be not ye called maſters, for onely one is your maſter, Chriſt. Then, to imprint this more deepely in their minde, he repeateth it twiſe in the ſame place. And becauſe their rudeneſſe was ſuch, that they could not conceive thoſe things that they had heard and learned of the mouth of their maſter; therefore the ſpirit of truth is promiſed them by whom they ſhould be directed to the true underſtanding of all things. For that ſame reſtraining is to be diligently noted, where this office is aſſigned to the holy Ghoſt, to put them in minde of all thoſe things that he before taught them by mouth. Mat. 23 8. John 14.26. & 16.13.

9 Therefore Peter who was very well taught how much hee might lawfully doe, leaveth nothing either to himſelfe or other, but to diſtribute the doctrine delivered of God. Let him that ſpeaketh (ſaith hee) ſpeake as the words of God, that is to ſay, not doubtingly, as they are wont to tremble whoſe owne conſcience miſgiveth them, but with ſure confidence, which becommeth the ſervant of God furniſhed with aſſured inſtructions. What other thing is this, but to forbid all invention of mans minde, from what head ſoever they have proceeded, that the pure word of God may be heard and learned in the Church of the faithfull? to take away the ordinances or rather the faigned deviſes of all men, of what degree ſoever they be, that the decrees of God onely may remaine in force? Theſe bee thoſe ſpirituall armours, mightie through God to caſt downe holds: by which the faithfull ſervants of God may throw downe counſels, and all height that advanceth it ſelfe againſt the knowledge of God, and may lead all knowledge captive to obey Chriſt. Loe this is the ſoveraigne power, wherewith it behooveth the Paſtors of the Church to be endued, by what name ſoever they bee called, that is, that by the word of God they may with confidence bee hold to doe all things: may compell all the ſtrength, glorie, wiſedome and height of the world to yeeld and obey to his majeſtie: being upholden by his power, may command, all even from the higheſt to the loweſt: may build up the houſe of Chriſt and pull downe the houſe of Satan: may feede the ſheepe and drive away the wolves: may inſtruct and exhort the willing to learne: may reprove, rebuke and ſubdue the rebellious and ſtubborne: may binde and looſe: finally may thunder and lighten, if need be: but all things in the word of God. Howbeit there is, as I have ſaid, this difference betweene the Apoſtles and their ſucceſſors, that the Apoſtles were the certaine and authentike ſecretaries of the holy Ghoſt, and therefore their writings are to be eſteemed for the oracles of God: but the other have none other office, but to teach that which is ſet forth and written in the holy Scriptures. We determine therefore, that this is not now left to faithfull miniſters, that they may coine any new doctrine, but that they ought ſimply to cleave to the doctrine, whereunto the Lord hath made all men without exception ſubject. When I ſay this, my meaning is not onely to ſhew what is lawfull for all particular men, but alſo what is lawfull for the whole univerſall Church. Now as touching all particular men: Paul verily was ordained by the Lord Apoſtle to the Corinthians: but he denieth that hee hath dominion over their faith. Who now dare take a dominion upon himſelfe, which Paul teſtifieth that it belonged not to him? If hee had acknowledged himſelfe to have this liberrie of teaching, that whatſoever the Paſtor teacheth he may therein of right require to be beleeved: he would never have taught the Corinthians this diſcipline, that while two or three Prophers ſpeake, the reſt ſhould judge, and if it were revealed to any that ſate, the firſt ſhould hold his peace. For ſo hee ſpared none, whoſe authority he made not ſubject to the judgement of the word of God. But, will ſome man ſay, of the univerſall church the caſe is otherwiſe. I anſwere that in another place Paul meeteth with this doubt alſo, where he ſaith, that faith is by hearing, & hearing by the word of God. Truly, if faith hang of the word of God onely, if it hath reſpect unto & reſteth upon it alone, what place is there now left to the word of the whole world? For herein no man may doubt that hath well knowne what faith is. For Faith ought to bee ſtayed upon ſuch aſſuredneſſe, whereby it may ſtand invincible againſt Satan, and all the engines of the hels, and againſt the whole world. This aſſuredneſſe we ſhall no where finde but in the onely word of God. Againe, it is a generall rule which wee heere ought to have reſpect unto: that God doth therefore take from men the power to ſet forth a new doctrine, that hee onely may bee our ſchoolemaſter in heavenly learning, as hee onely is true which can neither lie nor deceive deceive. This rule belongeth no leſſe to the whole Church than to every one of the faithfull.

Their Tyranny who binde the world to beleeve whatſoever pleaſeth them to teach.

10 But if this power of the Church, which we have ſpoken of, be compared with that power, whereof the ſpirituall tyrants, that have falſly called themſelves Biſhops and Prelates of Religion, have in certaine ages paſt boaſted themſelves among the people of God, the agreement ſhall be no better than Chriſt hath with Belial. Yet it is not in this place my purpoſe to declare in what ſort and with how wicked meanes they have exerciſed their tyrannie: I will but rehearſe the doctrine, which at this day they defend, firſt with writings, and then with ſword and fire. Becauſe they take it for a thing confeſſed, that a generall Councell is the true image of the church, when they have taken this principle, they doe without doubt determine, that ſuch Counſels are immediately governed of the holy Ghoſt, and that therefore they cannot erre. But whereas they themſelves doe rule the Councels, yea and make them, they doe indeed challenge to themſelves whatſoever they affirme to be due to the Councels, Therfore they will have our faith to ſtand and fall at their will that whatſoever they ſhall determine on the one ſide, or the other, may be ſtabliſhed and certaine to our mindes: ſo that if they allow any thing we muſt allow the ſame without doubting: if they condemne any thing we muſt alſo hold it for condemned. In the meane time after their owne luſt, and deſpiſing the word of God, they coine doctrines, to which afterward they require by this rule to have faith given. For they alſo ſay, that he is no Chriſtian, that doth not certainely conſent to all their doctrine as well affirmative as negative: if not with expreſſed yet with unexpreſſed faith: becauſe it is in the power of the Church to make new articles of the Faith.

Promiſes made to the Church abuſed to bolſter up a moſt unlawfull power in the church.

11 Firſt let us heare, by what arguments they prove that this authority is given to the church: and then we ſhall ſee how much that maketh for them which they alleadge of the church. The church (ſay they) hath notable promiſes, that it ſhall never be forſaken of Chriſt her ſpouſe, but that it ſhall be guided by his ſpirit into all truth. But of the promiſes which they are wont to alleadge, many are given no leſſe to every one of the faithfull particularly, than to the whole church univerſally. For though the Lord ſpake to the twelve Apoſtles, when he ſaid: Behold, I am with you even to the end of the world: Againe: I will aske my father, and hee ſhall give you an other comforter, namely the Spirit of truth: yet hee made the promiſe not only to the whole number of the twelve, but alſo to every one of them: yea to the other diſciples likewiſe, either thoſe that hee had alreadie received, or thoſe that ſhould afterward be added to them. But when they expound ſuch promiſes full of ſingular comfort, as though they were given to none of the Chriſtians, but to the whole church together: what doe they elſe, but take away from all Chriſtians that confidence which they all ought to receive thereby to encourage them? Yet I doe not here denie, but that the whole fellowſhip of the faithfull furniſhed with manifold diverſitie of gifts, is endued with much larger and more plentifull treaſure of the heavenly wiſedome, than each one ſeverally: neither is it my meaning, that this is ſpoken in common to the faithfull, as though they were all alike endued with the ſpirit of underſtanding and doctrine: but becauſe it is not to bee granted to the adverſaries of Chriſt, that they ſhould for the defence of an evill cauſe wreſt the Scripture to a wrong ſenſe. But, omitting this, I ſimply confeſſe that which is true, that the Lord is perpetually preſent with his, and ruleth them with his Spirit. And that this ſpirit is not the ſpirit of error, ignorance, lying or darkneſſe: but of ſure revelation, wiſedome, truth, and light, of whom they not deceitfully may learne thoſe things that are given them, that is to ſay, what is the hope of their calling, and what be the riches of the glorie of the inheritance of God in the Saints. But whereas the faithfull, even they that are endued with more excellent gifts above the reſt, doe in this fleſh receive onely the firſt fruits and a certaine taſte of that Spirit: there remaineth nothing better to them than knowing their owne weakneſſe, to hold themſelves carefully within the boundes of the word of God: leaſt, if they wander farre after their owne ſenſe, they by and by ſtray out of the right way, inſomuch as they be yet voide of that Spirit, by whoſe only teaching truth is diſcerned from falſhood. For all men doe confeſſe with Paul, that they have not yet attained attained to the marke. Therefore they more endevour to daily profiting, than glorie of perfection.

12 But they will take exception, and say that whatsoever is particularly attributed to every one of the holie ones, the same doth throughly and fully belong to the church it selfe. Although this hath some seeming of truth, yet I denie it to be true. God doth indeed so distribute to every one of the members the gift of his spirit by measure, that the whole body wanteth nothing necessarie, when the gifts are given in common. But the riches of the Church are alway such, that there ever wanteth much of that highest perfection, which our adversaries doe boast of. Yet the Church is not therefore so left destitute in any behalfe, but that she alway hath so much as is enough. For the Lord knoweth what her necessitie requireth. But, to hold her under humility and godly modestie, he giveth her no more than he knoweth to be expedient. I know what here also they are wont to object, that is, that the church is clensed with the washing of water in the word of life, that it might be without wrinckle and spot, and that therefore in another place it is called the pillar and stay of truth. But in the first of these two places is rather taught, what Christ dayly worketh in it, than what hee hath already done. For if he daily sanctifieth, purgeth, polisheth, wipeth from spots all them that be his: truly it is certaine that they are yet besprinkled with some spots and wrinckles, and that there wanteth somewhat of their sanctification. But how vaine and fabulous is it, to judge the Church already in every part holy and spotles, whereof all the members are spotty and very uncleane? It is true therefore that the church is sanctified of Christ. But onely the beginning of that sanctifying is heere seene: but the end and full accomplishment shall be, when Christ the holiest of holy ones shall truly and fully fill it with his holinesse. It is true also that the spots and wrinkles of it are wiped away: but so that they be daily in wiping away, untill Christ with his comming doe utterly take away all that remaineth. For unlesse wee grant this, we must of necessity affirme with the Pelagians, that the righteousnesse of the Faithfull is perfect in this life: and with the Catharie and Donatists we must suffer no infirmitie in the Church. The other place, as we have else where seene, hath a sense utterly differing from that which they pretend. For when Paul hath instructed Timothy, and framed him to the true office of a Bishop, he saith that hee did it to this purpose, that hee should know how he ought to behave himselfe in the Church. And that he should with the greater religiousnesse and endevour bend himselfe thereunto, he addeth that the church is the very pillar and stay of truth. For what else doe these words meane, but that the truth of God is preserved in the church, namely by the ministery of preaching? As in another place hee teacheth, that Christ gave Apostles, Pastors, and Teachers, that wee should no more bee carried about with every winde of doctrine, or be mocked of men: but that being enlightened with the true knowledge of the Sonne of God, we should altogether meete in unitie of Faith. Whereas therefore the truth is not extinguished in the world, but remaineth safe, that same commeth to passe because it hath the Church a faithfull keeper of it, by whose helpe and ministery it is sustained. But if this keeping standeth in the Ministery of the Prophets and Apostles, it followeth that it hangeth wholly hereupon, if the word of the Lord be faithfully preserved and doe keepe his puritie.

The Church not so perfect by vertue of any promise made unto it but that still it remaineth in this world subject as to other infirmities so to errour.

1 Tim. 3. 15.

Ephe. 4. 11.

13 But that the readers may better understand, upon what point this question chiefly standeth, I will in few words declare what our adversaries require, and wherein we stand against them. Where they say that the Church cannot erre, it tendeth hereunto, and thus they expound it, that forasmuch as it is governed by the Spirit of God, it may goe safely without the word: that whether soever it goeth, it cannot thinke nor speake any thing but truth: that therefore if it determine any thing without or beside Gods word, the same is no otherwise to be esteemed than as a certaine Oracle of God. If we grant that first point, that the church cannot erre in things necessary to salvation, this is our meaning, that this is therefore because forsaking all her owne wisedome, she suffereth herselfe to bee taught of the Holy Ghost by the word of God. This therefore is the difference. They set the authority of the church without the word of God, but wee will that it be annexed to the word, and suffer it not to be severed from it. And what marvell is it, if the spouse and scholler of Christ bee subject to her husband and schoolemaster, that she continually and earnestly hangeth of his mouth? For this is the order of a well governed house, that the wife should obey the authoritie of the husband: and this is the rule of a well ordered schoole, that the teaching of the scoolemaster alone should there bee heard. Wherefore let the Church not be wise of her selfe, nor thinke any thing of her selfe: but determine the end of her wisedome where he hath made an end of speaking. After this manner she shall also distrust all the inventions of her owne reason: but in those things wherein it standeth upon the word of God, she shall waver with no distrustfulnesse or doubting, but shall rest with great assurednesse and stedfast constancie. So also trusting upon the largenesse of those promises that she hath, she shall have whereupon abundantly to sustaine her faith: that she may nothing doubt that the best guide of the right way, the holie spirit, is alway present with her: but therewithall she shall keepe in memorie what use the Lord would have us to receive of his holie spirit. The spirit (saith he) which I will send from my father shall lead you into all truth. But how? because (saith he) hee shall put you in mind of all those things that I have told you. Therefore he giveth warning that there is nothing more to be looked for of his spirit, but that he should enlighten our minds to perceive the truth of his doctrine. Therefore Chrysostome saith excellently well. Many (saith he) doe boast of the holie spirit: but they which speake their owne doe falsly pretend that they have him. As Christ testified that hee spake not of himselfe: because he spake out of the law and the Prophets: so if any thing beside the Gospell be thrust in under the title of the spirit, let us not beleeve it, because as Christ is the fulfilling of the law and the Prophets: so is the spirit of the Gospell. These be his words. Now it is easie to gather how wrongfully our adversaries doe, which boast of the holy Ghost to no other end but to set forth under his name strange and forraine doctrines from the word of God, whereas he will with unspeakable knot be conjoined with the word of God, and the same doth Christ professe of him when hee promiseth him to his Church. So is it truly. What sobrietie the Lord hath once prescribed to his Church, the same he will have to be perpetually kept. But he hath forbidden her, that she should not adde any thing to his word, nor take any thing from it. This is the inviolable decree of God and of the holy Ghost, which our adversaries goe about to abrogate, when they faigne that the church is ruled of the spirit without the word.

In doctrine nothing to be added by the Church unto that which the Apostles have left in writing. John 16.2.

14 Here againe they murmure against us, and say that it behooved that the church should adde some things to the writings of the Apostles, or that they themselves should afterward with lively voyce supply many things which they had not clearly enough taught, namely sith Christ said unto them. I have many things to be said to you, which you cannot now beare, and that these be the ordinances, which without the scripture have beene received onely in use and manner. But what shamelesnesse is this? I grant the disciples were yet rude, and in a manner unapt to learne, when the Lord said this unto them. But were they then also holden with such dulnesse, when they did put their doctrine in writing, that they afterward needed to supply with lively voyce that which they had by fault of ignorance omitted in their writings. But if they were already led by the spirit of truth into all truth when they did set forth their writings: what hindered that they have not therein contained, and left written a perfect knowledge of the doctrine of the Gospel? But go to: let us grant them that which they require. Only let them point out what be those things that it behooved to be revealed without writing. If they dare enterprise that, I will assaile them with Augustines words: that is, When the Lord had said nothing of them, which of us dare say, these they be, or those they be? or if any dare say so, whereby doth hee prove it? But why doe I strive about a superfluous matter? For a very child doth know, that in the writings of the Apostles, which these men doe make in a manner lame and but halfe perfect, there is the fruite of that revelation which the Lord did then promise them.

Hom. in John 96.

The Church not authorised to trine new doctrines, because Christ doth.

15 What? say they, did not Christ put out of controversie whatsoever the church teacheth and decreeth, when hee commandeth him to be taken for a heathen man and a Publicane that dare say against her? First in that place is no mention made of doctrine, but onely the authoritie of the censures is established for correcting of vices, that they which have beene admoniſhed or rebuked ſhould not reſiſt her judgement. But omitting this, it is much marvell, that thoſe loſels have ſo little ſhame, that they dare be proud of that place. For what ſhall they get thereby, but that the conſent of the church is never to be deſpiſed, which never conſenteth but unto the truth of the word of God? The church is to be heard, ſay they. Who denieth it? foraſmuch as it pronounceth nothing but out of the word of the Lord. If they require any more let them know that theſe words of Chriſt doe nothing take their part therein. Neither ought I to bee thought too much contentious becauſe I ſtand ſo earneſtly upon this point, That it is not lawfull for the church to make any new doctrine, that is, to teach and deliver for an Oracle any more than that which the Lord hath revealed by his word. For men of ſound wit doe ſee how great a danger there is, if ſo great authoritie be once granted to men. They ſee alſo how wide a window is opened to the mockings and cavillations of the wicked, if we ſay that that which men have judged is to bee taken for an Oracle among Chriſtians. Beſide that, Chriſt ſpeaking according to the conſideration of his owne time, giveth this name to the Synagogue, that his Diſciples ſhould afterward learne to reverence holie aſſemblies of the church. So ſhould it come to paſſe that every citie and village ſhould have equall authoritie in coyning of doctrines.

that

number them with heathens that deſpiſe the judgement of the Church. Mat. 18. 17.

16 The examples which they uſe, doe nothing helpe them. They ſay that the Baptiſing of Infants, proceeded not ſo much from the expreſſe commandement of the Scripture as from the decree of the church. But it were a very miſerable ſuccour, if we were compelled to flee to the bare authoritie of the church for defence of the Baptiſme of Infants: but it ſhall in another place ſufficiently appeare that it is farre otherwiſe. Likewiſe whereas they object that that is no where found in the Scripture, which was pronounced in the Nicene Synod, that the Sonne is conſubſtantiall with the Father: therein they doe great wrong to the Fathers, as though they had raſhly condemned Arrius, becauſe hee would not ſweare to their words, when he profeſſed all that doctrine which is comprehended in the writings of the Prophets, and Apoſtles. This word, I grant, is not in the Scripture: but when therein is ſo oft affirmed, that there is but one God: againe, Chriſt is ſo oft called the true and eternall God, one with the Father: what other thing doe the Fathers of the Nicene Councell when they declare that he is of one ſubſtance, but ſimply ſet out the naturall ſenſe of the Scripture? But Theodorite reporteth that Conſtantine uſed this preface in their aſſemblie, In diſputations (ſaith hee) of Divine matters, there is a preſcribed doctrine of the holie Ghoſt: the Bookes of the Goſpels and of the Apoſtles, with the Oracles of the Prophets, doe fully ſhew us the meaning of God. Therefore laying away diſcord, let us take the diſcuſſings of queſtions out of the words of the Spirit. There was at that time no man that ſpake againſt theſe holy monitions. No man tooke exception, that the church might adde ſomewhat of her owne: that the Spirit revealed not all things to the Apoſtles, or at leaſt uttered them not to thoſe that came after: or any ſuch thing. If it be true which our adverſaries would have: firſt, Conſtantine did evill, that tooke from the Church her authoritie: then, whereas none of the Biſhops at that time roſe up to defend it, this was not without breach of their Faith? for ſo they were betrayers of the right of the Church. But ſith Theodorite rehearſeth that they willingly embraced that which the Emperor ſaid, it is certaine that this new doctrine was then utterly unknowne.

Baptizing of infants and the conſubſtantialitie of Chriſt with God the Father, are not warranted by the ſole authoritie of the Church, but have their ſufficient grounds in Scripture.

Hiſto. Eccle. lib. 1. cap. 5.

THE NINTH CHAPTER.

Of Councels and of their authoritie.

NOw, although I grant them all things concerning the Church: yet they ſhall thereby not much prevaile for their intent. For whatſoever is ſaid of the Church, the ſame they by and by give to the Councels, foraſmuch as in their opinion thoſe repreſent the Church. Yea, where they ſo ſtiffely contend for the power of the Church, they doe it of no other purpoſe, but to give all that they can get to the Biſhop of Rome and his guard. But ere I beginne to diſcuſſe this queſtion, I muſt needs here make proteſtation testation of two things aforehand. First, that where I shall in this point be somewhat rough, it is not because I lesse esteeme the old Councels than I ought to doe. For I reverence them from my heart, and wish them to be had in their due honour with all men. But herein is some meane, that is, that there be nothing withdrawne from Christ. Now this is the right of Christ, to be the head in all Councels, and to have no man fellow with him in this dignitie. But I say that then onely he is the head, when he governeth the whole assembly with his word and spirit. Secondly, whereas I give lesse to Councels than the adversaries require: I doe it not for this cause that I am afraid of the Councels, as though they did make for their side, and were against ours. For as we are abundantly furnished with the word of the Lord to the full proofe of our doctrine, and to the overthrow of the whole Papistrie that wee neede not much to desire any other thing beside it: so if the matter require, the old Councels doe for a great part minister unto us so much as may suffice for both.

Christ in the midst of Councels, but not except they be gathered in his name.

2 Now let us speake of the thing it selfe. If it be sought of the Scriptures, what is the authoritie of Councels: there is no plainer promise than in this saying of Christ: Where two or three shall bee gathered together in my name, there I am in the middest of them. But that doth no lesse belong to every particular assembly than to a generall Councell. But the doubt of the question standeth not therein: but because there is a condition added, that God will so onely be in the middest of the Councell, if it be gathered together in his name. Therefore although our adversaries doe a thousand times name Councels of Bishops, they shall little prevaile: neither shall they make us to beleeve that which they affirme, that is, that they be governed of the holy Ghost, untill they have proved that they are gathered together in the name of Christ. For it is as possible that wicked and evill Bishops may conspire against Christ, as good and honest Bishops may come together in his name. For a very cleare proofe hereof are many decrees that have proceeded from such Councels. But this shall be seene hereafter. Now I doe but answere in one word that Christ promiseth nothing, but to them that are gathered together in his name. Let us therefore define what that is. I denie that they bee gathered together in the name of Christ, which casting away the commandement of God, wherein he forbiddeth any thing to be added to his word, or taken from it, doe decree every thing after their owne will: which being not contented with the Oracles of the Scripture, that is to say the onely rule of perfect wisedome, doe imagine some new thing of their owne head. Surely, sith Christ hath not promised that he will be present at all Councels, but hath adjoyned a peculiar marke, whereby to make true and lawfull Councels different from other: it is meete that wee should not neglect this difference. This is the covenant, which in old time God made with the Leviticall Priests, that they should teach out of his mouth. This he alway required of the Prophets: this law also we see to have beene laid upon the Apostles. Who so breake this covenant, God doth not vouchsafe, to let them have the honour of priesthood, nor any authoritie. Let the adversaries undoe me this knot, if they will make my faith bound to the decrees of men beside the word of God.

Mala.2.7.

Truth may be in the Church, although the Pastors of the Church be corrupt as in the times of the Prophets they were.

3 For whereas they thinke not that that remaineth in the Church unlesse it bee among the Pastors: and that the church it selfe standeth not, unlesse it appeare in generall Councels: that is farre from having beene alway true, if the Prophets have left unto us true testimonies of their owne times. There was in the time of Esay a church at Hierusalem, which God had not yet forsaken. But of the Pastors he saith thus: The watchmen are blinde, neither know they any thing. They are all dumbe dogs, neither are they able to barke. They lie along and sleepe, and love sleeping: and the Pastors themselves know nothing, nor doe understand: and they doe altogether looke backe unto their owne waies. After the same manner Osee saith: The watchman of Ephraim with God, the snare of the fouler, hatred in the house of God. Where joyning them with God by way of mockage, he teacheth that their pretence of the Priesthood is vaine. The Church also endured unto the time of Hieremie. Let us heare what hee saith of the Pastors. From the Prophet even to the Priest, every one followeth lying. Againe: The Prophets doe prophecie a lie in my name, when I have not sent them nor commanded them. And least we should be too long in reciting his words, let those things be read that hee hath written in the whole xxiij. and xl. Chapters. At that time on the other side Ezechiel did no more gently invey against the same men. The conspiracy (saith he) of the Prophets in the mids of hir as a roaring Lion, & that violently taketh his prey. Hir Priests have broken my law, and have defiled my holy things, and have made no difference betweene holy and prophane: and the rest that he adjoyneth to the same effect. Like complaints are every where in the prophets, so that nothing is ofter found in them.

4 But perhaps it might be that it was so among the Jewes: but our age is free from so great an evill. I would to God indeed it were so: but the holy Ghost hath given warning that it shall be farre otherwise. The words of Peter are plaine. As (saith he) there were in the old people false Prophets, so shall there also be among you false Teachers slily bringing in sects of perdition, see you not how he saith, that there is danger to come, not by men of the common people, but by them that shall boast themselves with the title of Teachers and Pastors? Moreover how often hath it been foretspoken by Christ and his Apostles, that there should very great dangers hang over the Church by the Pastors? Yea, Paul plainely sheweth, that Antichrist shall sit in no other place than in the Temple of God. Whereby hee signifieth, that the horrible calamitie of which hee there speaketh, shall come from no where else but from them that shall sit in steed of Pastors in the Church. And in another place hee sheweth, that the beginnings of so great a mischiefe are even already neere at hand. For when he speaketh to the Bishop of Ephesus, I know (saith he) that after my departure there shall enter into you ravening wolves not sparing the flocke. And they shall be of your owne selves, that shall speake perverse things, to lead away disciples after them. How much corruption might a long course of yeeres bring among Pastors, when they could so far goe out of kind in so small a space of time? And, not to fill much paper with rehearsing them by name: wee are admonished by the examples in a manner, of all ages, that neither the truth is alway nourished in the bosome of the Pastors, nor the safety of the church doth hang upon their state. They ought indeed to have beene the governors and keepers of the peace and safety of the church, for preservation whereof, they are ordained: but it is one thing for a man to performe that which he ought, and another thing to owe that which he performeth not.

Act. 20. 15.

5 Yet let no man take these our words in such part, as though I would every where and rashly without any choise diminish the authority of Pastors. I doe but onely admonish that even among Pastors themselves there is a choise to be had, that wee should not immediately thinke them to be Pastors that are so called. But the Pope withall his flocke of Bishops, upon none other reason, but because they are called Pastors, shaking away the obedience of the word of God, do tumble and tosse all things after their owne lust: and in the meane time they travaile to perswade, that they cannot be destitute of the light of truth, that the spirit of God perpetually abideth in them, that the Church consisteth in them and dieth with them. As though there be now no judgements of the Lord, whereby he may punish the world at this day with the same kinde of punishment wherewith sometime he tooke vengeance of the unthankefulnesse of the old people, that is, to strike the pastors with blindnesse and amazed dulnesse. Neither doe they, most foolish men understand, that they sing the same song, which those in old time did sing that warred against the word of God. For the enemies of Hieremie did thus prepare themselves against the truth: Come, and wee will imagine imaginations against Hieremy: forasmuch as the law shall not perish from the Priest, nor Counsell from the wise man, nor the word from the Prophet.

Her. 18. 18.

6 Hereby it is easie to answere to that other objection concerning generall Councels. It can not be denied but that the Jewes had a true Church in the time of the Prophets. But if there had then beene a generall Councell gathered together of the Priests, what manner face of the Church had there appeared? We heare what God saith, not to one or two of them but to the whole order: The Priests shall be astonied, and the Prophets shall bee made afraid. Againe, the law shall perish from the Priest, and counsell from the Elders. Againe, Night shall be to you in steed of a vision, and darknesse in steed of prophecying: and the sun shall fall downe upon the prophets and be darkned upon upon these daies &c. Well: if all such had then beene gathered together in one, what Spirit should have governed in that assembly? Of that thing we have a notable example in that Counsell which Achab called together. There were present foure hundred Prophets. But because they were come together of no other minde but to flatter the wicked King: therefore Satan was sent of the Lord to be a lying spirit in the mouth of them all. There, by all their voices the truth was condemned. Miche was condemned for an heretike, striken and cast in prison: So was done to Hieremy, so to the other Prophets.

A Counsell of Bishops and Pharisies assembled ogther against Christ in Ierusalem. Joh. 11. 47.

7 But let one example suffice for all, which is more notable than the rest. In that Councell which the Bishops and Pharisees gathered at Hierusalem against Christ, what can a man say that there wanted, in so much as pertained to the outward shew? For if there had not then beene a Church at Hierusalem, Christ would never have communicate with their sacrifices and other ceremonies. There was made a solemne summoning of them together: the high Bishop sat as chiefe: the whole order of Priests sate by him: yet Christ was there condemned, and his doctrine driven away. This doing is a proofe that the church was not enclosed in that Councell. But there is no perill that any such thing should happen to us. Who hath given us assurance thereof? For it is not without fault of sluggishnesse, to be too careles in so great a matter. But where the holy Ghost doth with expresse words prophecy by the mouth of Paul, that there shall come a departing (which cannot come but that the Pastors must be the first that shall forsake God) why are we herein willfully blinde to our owne destruction? Wherefore it is in no wise to be granted, that the Church consisteth in the company of Pastors, for whom the Lord hath no where undertaken that they shall perpetually be good, but hee hath pronounced that they shall sometime be evill. But when he warneth us of the danger, he doth it to this intent to make us the waryer.

2 Thes. 2. 3.

How far Councels to be received.

8 What then? wilt thou say: Shall the Councels have no authority in determining? Yes forsooth. For neither doe I here argue that all Councels are to be condemned, or all their actes to be repelled, or (as the saying is) to bee defaced with one blot. But (thou wilt say to me) thou bringest them all into subjection, that it may be free for every man to receive or refuse that which the Councels have determined. Not so. But so oft as the decree of any Councell is brought forth, I would have it first to be diligently weighed, at what time it was holden, for what cause it was holden, what manner of men were present: and then the very thing that is intreated of, to be examined by the rule of the Scripture: and that in such sort as the determination of the Councell may have his force, and be as a forejudged sentence, and yet not hinder the aforesaid examination. I would to God all men did keepe that moderation which Augustine prescribeth in the third booke against Maximinus. For when hee minded briefly to put to silence this heretike contending about the Decrees of Counsels: Neither (saith he) ought I to object against thee the Synode of Nice, nor thou against me the Synode of Ariminum, as to the entent to conclude one another by forejudged sentence, neither am I bound by the authority of the one, nor thou of the other. By authorities of Scriptures, not such as are proper to either one, but such as are common to both, let there strive matter with matter, cause with cause, reason with reason. So should it come to passe, that Councels should have the majesty that they ought: but in the meane season the Scripture should be alone in the higher place that there might be nothing that should not be subject to the rule thereof. So these old Synodes, as of Nice, of Constantinople, the first of Ephesus, of Chalcedon, and such other, which were holden for confuting of errours, we willingly embrace and reverence as holy, so much as belongeth to the doctrines of faith: for they containe nothing but the pure and naturall exposition of Scripture, which the holy Fathers with spirituall wisedome applied to the subduing of the enemies of Religion that then rose up. In some of the latter Councels also, we see to appeare a true zeale of godlinesse, and plaine tokens of wit, learning, and wisdome. But as things are wont commonly to grow to worse, wee may see by the latter Councels, how much the Church hath now and then degenerate from the pureuesse of that golden age. And I doubt not but that in these corrupter ages also, Councels have had some Bishops of the better sort. But in these the same happened which the Senators themthemſelves complained to be not well done in making of ordinances of the ſenate of Rome. For while the ſentences are numbred, not weighed, it is of neceſſitie that oftentimes the better part is overcome of the greater. Truly they brought forth many wicked ſentences. Neither is it here needfull to gather the ſpeciall examples, either becauſe it ſhould be too long, or becauſe other have done it ſo diligently, that there cannot much be added.

The diſagreement betweene the Councell of Conſtantinople and Nice, of Chalcedon and Epheſus.

9 Now, what neede I to rehearſe, Councels diſagreeing with Councels? And it is no cauſe that any ſhould murmure againſt me, and ſay, that of thoſe Councels that diſagree the one is not lawfull. For, how ſhall we judge that? By this, if I be not deceived, that we ſhall judge by the Scriptures, that the decrees therof are not agreable with true doctrine. For this is the onely certaine law to diſcerne them by. It is now about nine hundred yeeres agoe, ſince the Synode of Conſtantinople gathered together under Leo the Emperor, judged that images ſet up in Churches ſhould be overthrowne, and broken in peeces. A little afterward, the Councell of Nice, which Irene the Empreſſe aſſembled in ſpite of him, decreed that they ſhould be reſtored. Whether of theſe two ſhall wee acknowledge for a lawfull Councell? The latter which gave images a place in Churches, hath prevailed among the people. But Auguſtine ſaith that that cannot be done without moſt preſent perill of idolatrie. Epiphanius which was before in time, ſpeaketh much more ſharpely: for hee ſaith that it is wickedneſſe and abhomination to have images ſeene in a Church of Chriſtians. Would they that ſo ſpeake, allow that Councell, if they were alive at this day? But if both the Hiſtorians tell truth, and the very actes be beleeved, not onely images themſelves, but alſo the worſhipping of them was there received. But it is evident that ſuch a decree came from Satan. How ſay you to this, that in depraving and tearing the Scripture, they ſhew that they made a mocking ſtocke of it? Which thing I have before ſufficiently made open. Howſoever it be, we ſhall no otherwiſe be able to diſcerne betweene contrary and diſagreeing Synodes, which were many, unleſſe we trie them all by that balance of all men and Angels, that is, by the word of the Lord. So we imbrace the Synode of Chalcedon, refuſing the ſecond Synode of Epheſus, becauſe in this latter one the wickedneſſe of Eutiches was confirmed, which the other former condemned. This thing holy men have judged none otherwiſe but by the ſcripture: whom we ſo follow in judging; that the word of God which gave light to them doth alſo now give light to us. Now let the Romaniſts goe and boaſt, as they are wont, that the Holy Ghoſt is faſtned and bound to their Councels.

The great weakneſſe of the Fathers aſſembled in the Councell of Nice againſt Arrius.

10 Howbeit there is alſo ſomewhat which a man may well thinke to be wanting in thoſe ancient and purer Councels: either becauſe they that then were at them, being otherwiſe learned and wiſe men, wholy bent to the buſineſſe then in hand, did not foreſee many other things, or for that many things of lighter importance eſcaped them being buſied with weightier and more earneſt matters: or for that ſimply, as being men they might be deceived with unskilfulneſſe: or for that they were ſometime carried headlong with too much affection. Of this laſt point (which ſeemeth the hardeſt of all) there was a plaine example in the Nicene Synode, the dignitie whereof hath by conſent of all men, as it was worthy, beene received with moſt high reverence. For when the principall article of our faith was there in danger, Arrius the enimie was preſent in readineſſe, with whom they muſt fight hand to hand, and the chiefe importance lay in the agreement of them that came prepared to fight againſt the errour of Arrius, this notwithſtanding, they careleſſe of ſo great dangers, yea, as it were having forgotten gravity, modeſty & all humanity, leaving the battell that they had in hand, as if they had come thither of purpoſe to doe Arrius a pleaſure, began to wound themſelves with inward diſſentions, and to turne againſt themſelves the ſtile that ſhould have been bent againſt Arrius. There were heard foule objectings of crimes, there were ſcattered bookes of accuſations, and there would have beene no end made of contentions, untill they had with mutuall wounds one deſtroyed another, unleſſe the Emperour Conſtantine had prevented it, which profeſſing that the examining of their life was a matter above his knowledge, and chaſtiſed ſuch intemperance rather with praiſe than with rebuking. How many waies is it credible that the other Councels alſo failed, which followed afterward? Neither doth this matter neede long proofe. For if a man [illegible] over the actes of the Councels, hee shall note therein many infirmities: though I speake of nothing more grievous.

The Synode of Chalcedon charged with ambition and unadvised rashnesse infirmities apparent in holy Synods least we should too much rest upon men.

11 And Leo Bishop of Rome sticketh not to charge with ambition and unadvised rashnesse, the Synode of Chalcedon, which yet he confesseth to be sound in doctrines. Hee doth indeed not denie that it was a lawfull Synode: but he openly affirmeth, that it might erre. Some man peradventure will thinke me fond, for that I busie my selfe in shewing such errors: for as much as our adversaries doe confesse, that Councels may erre in those things that are not necessary to salvation. But this labour is not yet superfluous. For although because they are compelled, they doe indeed confesse it in word: yet when they thrust unto us the determination of all Councels in every matter whatsoever it be, for an Oracle of the holy Ghost, they do therin require more than they tooke at the beginning. In so doing what doe they affirme, but that Councels cannot erre: or if they erre, yet it is not lawfull for us to see the truth, or not to sooth their errors? And I intend nothing else, but that it may thereby be gathered that the holy Ghost, so governed the godly and holy Synodes, that in the meane time hee suffered some what to happen to them by the nature of men, least we should too much trust to men. This is a much better sentence, than that of Gregory Nazianzene that he never saw a good end of any Councell. For hee that affirmeth that all without exception ended ill doth not leave them much authoritie. It is now nothing needfull to make mention severally of provinciall Councels: forasmuch as it is easie to judge by the generall, how much authority they ought to have to make new articles of faith and to receive what kinde of doctrine soever it pleaseth them.

Spiritual rulers no further to be followed than themselves doe follow the conduct of their heavenly guide. Iohan. 7.

12 But our Romanists, when they see that in defence of their cause all helpe of reason doth faile them, doe resort to that extreame and miserable shift: that although the men themselves be blockish in wit and Counsell, and most wicked in minde and will, yet the word of God remaineth, which commandeth to obey Rulers. Is it so? what if I denie that they be Rulers that are such? For they ought to take upon themselves no more than Iosua had, which was both a Prophet of the Lord, and an excellent Pastor. But let us heare with what words he is set by the Lord into his office. Let not (saith he) the volumne of this law depart from thy mouth: but thou shalt studie upon it daies and nights. Thou shalt neither bow to the right hand nor to the left: then shalt thou direct thy way and understand it. They therefore shall be to us spirituall Rulers which shall not bow from the law of the Lord, neither to the one side nor to the other. But if the doctrine of all Pastors whatsoever they be, is to be received without any doubting, to what purpose was it that we should so oft and so earnestly be admonished not to harken to the speech of false Prophets. Heare not (saith he by Hieremy) the words of the Prophets that Prophecie unto you. For they teach you vanitie, and not out of the mouth of the Lord. Againe, Beware you of false Prophets, that come unto you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves. And Iohn should in vaine exhort us, that we should prove the spirits, whether they be of God. From which judgement the very Angels are not exempted, much lesse Satan with all his lies. What is to be said of this saying: if the blinde leade the blinde they shall both fall into the ditch? Doth it not sufficiently declare, that it is of great importance what manner of Prophets be hard, and that not all are rashly to be heard. Wherefore there is no reason that they should make us afraid with their titles, thereby to draw us into partaking of their blindnesse: forasmuch as we see on the other side, that the Lord had a singular care to fray us away from suffering our selves to be led with other mens errour, under what visor of name soever it lurketh. For if the answer of Christ be true, then all blinde guides, whether they be called Fathers of the Church, or Prelates, or Bishops, can doe nothing but draw their partners into the same headlong downefall. Wherefore let no names of Councels, Pastors, Bishops (which may as well bee falsely pretended as truly used) hinder us, but that being taught by lessons both of words and examples, we may examine all spirits of all men by the rule of the word of God, that we may prove whether they be of God or no.

The use of Councels is setting downe the 13 For as much as wee have proved that there is not given to the Church a power to set up a new doctrine, now let us speake of the power which they attribute unto it in

in expounding of Scripture. Truly wee doe willingly graunt, that if there happen debate about any doctrine, there is no better, nor surer remedie than if a Synod of true bishops assemble together, where the doctrine in controversie may be discussed. For such a determination, whereunto the Pastors of Churches shall agree in common together, calling upon the spirit of Christ, shall have much greater force, than if every one severally should conceive it at home, and so teach it to the people; or if a few private men should make it. Againe, when bishops are gathered in one, they doe the more commodiously take advise in common, what and in what forme they ought to teach, least diversity should breed offence. Thirdly Paul prescribeth this order in discerning of doctrines For whereas hee giveth to every severall Church a power to discerne, hee sheweth what is the order of doing in weightier causes, that is, that the Churches should take upon them a common triall of the matter together. And so doth the very feeling of godlinesse instruct us, that if any man trouble the Church with an unwonted doctrine, and the matter proceed so farre that there be perill of greater dissention, the Churches should first meete together, and examine the question propounded: at last, after iust discussing had, bring forth a determination taken out of the Scriptures, such as may both take away doubting out of the people, and stop the mouthes of wicked and greedy men, that they may not bee so hardy to proceed any further: So when Arius was risen, the Nicene Synod was gathered together, which with the authority thereof both did breake the wicked endevours of the ungodly man, and restored peace to the Churches which hee had vexed, and defended the eternall godhead of Christ, against his blasphemous doctrine. When afterward Eunomius and Macedonius stirred up new troubles, their madnesse was resisted with like remedy by the Synod of Constantinople. In the Councell at Ephesus the wickednesse of Nestorius was banished. Finally this hath beene from the beginning the ordinary meane in the Church to preserve unitie, so oft as satan began to worke any thing. But let us remember, that not in all ages or in all places are found Athanasies, Basiles, Cyrilles, and such defenders of true doctrine whom the Lord then raised up. But let us thinke what hapned at Ephesus in the second Synode, where the heresie of Eutiches prevailed, the man of holy memory Flavianus was banished with certaine other godly men, and many such mischiefes committed: even because Dioscorus a seditious man and of a very naughty nature, was there the chiefe, and not the spirit of the Lord. But there was not the Church. I grant. For this I determine utterly that the truth doth not therefore die in the Church, although it bee oppressed of one Councell: but that the Lord marvellously preserveth it, that it may againe in due time rise up, and get the overhand. But I denie that this is perpetuall, that that is a true and certaine exposition of Scripture which hath beene received by consents of a Councell.

true sense of Scripture when controversies rise and trouble the Church.

1 Cor. 14. 29.

14 But the Romanists shoot at another marke, when they teach that the power to expound the Scripture belongeth to the Councells, yea and that without appellation from them. For they abuse this colour, to call it an exposition of the Scripture whatsoever is decreed in the Councels. Of purgatory, of the intercession of Saints, of auricular confession, and such other there cannot bee found one syllable in the Scriptures. But because all these things have beene stablished by the authoritie of the Church, that is to say (to speake truly) received in opinion and use, therefore every one of them must bee taken for an exposition of Scripture. And not that only: But if a Councell decree any thing, though Scripture cry out against it, yet it shall beare the name of an exposition thereof. Christ commandeth all to drinke of the cup, which hee reacheth in the Supper. The Councell of Constance forbad that it should bee given to the lay people, but willed that the Priest onely should drinke of it. That which so directly fighteth against the institution of Christ, they will have to be taken for an exposition of it. Paul calleth the forbidding of marriage, the hypocrisie of devils: And the holy Ghost in another place pronounceth that marriage is in all men holy and honorable. Whereas they have afterward forbidden Priests to marrie, they require to have that taken for the true and naturall exposition of the Scripture, when nothing can bee imagined more against it. If any dare once open his mouth to

Not every determination of a Councell to be received as a true and sound exposition of the Scripture, some Councels having expressly defined things against Scripture: so far off it is that Councels should have power to authorise Scripture.

Heb. 13. 4.

the contrary, he shall be judged an heretike: because the determination of the Church is without appellation: and to doubt of her exposition, that it is not true, is a hainous offence. Why should I inveigh against so great shamelesnesse? For the very shewing of it is an overcomming of it. As for that which they teach of the power to allow the Scripture, I wittingly passe it over. For in such sort to make the Oracles of God subject to the judgement of men, that they should therefore bee of force because they have pleased men, is a blasphemie unworthie to bee rehearsed: and I have before touched the same matter alreadie. Yet I will aske them one thing: If the authoritie of the Scripture bee founded upon the allowance of the Church, what Councels decree will they alleadge of that matter? I thinke they have none. Why then did Arius suffer himselfe to be overcome at Nice with testimonies brought out of the Gospell of John? For after these mens saying, it was free for him to have refused them, for as much as there had no allowance of a generall Councell gone before. They alleadge the old roll, which is called the Canon, which they say to have proceeded from the judgement of the Church. But I aske them againe, in what Councell that Canon was set forth. Here they must needs bee dumbe. Howbeit I desire further to know, what manner of Canon they thinke that was. For I see that the same was not very certainely agreed among the old writers. And if that which Hierom saith ought to bee of force, the bookes of Machabees, Tobie, Ecclesiasticus and such other shall bee thrust among the Apochrypha: which those Canons doe in no wise suffer to be done.

THE TENTH CHAPTER.

Of the power in making of Lawes: wherein the Pope and his, have used a most cruell tyrannie and butcherie upon soules.

The tyranny of the Church of Rome in charging the consciences of men with the burden of their lawes. Math. 23. 4.

NOw followeth the second part, which they will have to consist in making of lawes, out of which spring have flowed innumerable traditions of men, even so many snares to strangle poore soules. For they have had no more conscience, than had the Scribes and Pharisees to lay burdens upon other mens shoulders, which they themselves would not touch with one finger. I have in another place taught how cruell a butcherie is that which they command concerning auricular confession. In other lawes there appeareth not so great violence: but those which seeme the most tolerable of all, doe tyrannously oppresse consciences. I leave unspoken how they corrupt the worship of God, and doe spoile God himselfe of his right, which is the onely Law-maker. This power is now to be intreated of, whether the Church may binde consciences with her lawes. In which discourse the order of policie is not touched, but this onely is intended, that God bee rightly worshipped according to the rule which himselfe hath prescribed, and that the spirituall libertie, which hath regarde unto God, may remaine safe unto us. Use hath made that all those decrees bee called traditions of men, whatsoever they bee that have concerning the worshipping of God proceeded from men beside his word. Against these doe we strive, not against the holy and profitable ordinances of the Church which make for the preservation either of discipline, or honestie, or peace. But the end of our striving is, that the immeasurable and barbarous Empire may be restrained, which they usurpe upon soules, that would bee counted Pastors of the Church, but in very deed are most cruell butchers. For they say that the lawes which they make are spirituall, and pertaining to the soule, and they affirme them to be necessarie to eternall life. But so (as I have even now touched) the kingdome of Christ is invaded, so the libertie by him given to the consciences of the faithfull is utterly oppressed and throwne downe. I speake not now with how great ungodlinesse they stablish the observing of their lawes, while out of it they teach men to seeke both forgivenes of sins, and righteousnes and salvation, while they set in it the whole summe of religion and godlines. This one thing I earnestly hold that there ought no necessitie to bee laid upon consciences in those things wherein they are made free by Christ, and unlesse they be made free, as we have before taught, they cannot rest with God. They must acknowledge one onely king Christ their deliverer, and bee governed by one law of libertie, even the holy word of the Gospell, if they they will ſtill keepe the grace which they have once obtained in Chriſt: they muſt bee holden with no bondage, and bound with no bonds.

2 Theſe Solons doe indeed faine that their conſtitutions are lawes of libertie, a ſweete yoke, a light burden: but who cannot ſee that they be meere lies? They themſelves indeed doe feele no heavineſſe of their owne lawes, which caſting away the feare of God, doe careleſly and ſtoutly neglect both their owne and Gods lawes. But they that are touched with any care of their ſalvation, are farre from thinking themſelves free ſo long as they be intangled with theſe ſnares. We ſee with how great warineſſe Paul did deale in this behalfe, that he durſt not ſo much as in any one thing lay upon men any ſnare at all, and that not without cauſe. Truly hee foreſaw with how great a wound conſciences would be ſtriken, if they ſhould be charged with a neceſſity of thoſe things whereof the Lord had left them libertie. On the other ſide the conſtitutions are almoſt innumerable, which theſe men have moſt grievouſly ſtabliſhed with threatning of eternall death, which they moſt ſeverely require as neceſſary to ſalvation. And among thoſe there are many moſt hard to bee kept, but all of them (if the whole multitude of them bee laid together) are impoſſible: ſo great is the heape. How then ſhall it bee poſſible, that they upon whom ſo great a weight of difficultie lieth, ſhould not be vexed in perplexitie with extreme anguiſh and terrour? Therefore my purpoſe is here to impute ſuch conſtitutions, as tend to this end, inwardly to bind ſoules before God, and charge them with a religion, as though they taught them of things neceſſarie to ſalvation.

The libertie which Chriſt hath given abridged in the Church of Rome by many hard and heavie conſtitutions: which notwithſtanding they call ſweete and eaſie burthen.

2 Cor. 7. 1. 5.

3 This queſtion doth therefore incumber the moſt part of men, becauſe they doe not ſubtlely enough put difference betweene the outward court (as they call it) and the court of conſcience. Moreover this increaſeth the difficultie, that Paul teacheth that the magiſtrate ought to bee obeyed not onely for feare of puniſhment, but for conſcience ſake. Whereupon followeth, that conſciences are alſo bound with the politike lawes. But if it were ſo, then all ſhould fall that wee have ſpoken in the laſt Chapter, and intend now to ſpeake concerning the ſpirituall government. For the looſing of this knot, firſt it is good to learne what is conſcience. The definition is to be gathered of the proper derivation of the word. For as when men doe with minde and underſtanding conceive the knowledge of things, they are thereby ſaid ſcire, to know, whereupon is derived the name of ſcience Knowledge: ſo when they have a feeling of Gods judgements as a witneſſe adjoyned with them which doth not ſuffer them to hide their ſinnes, but that they be brought accuſed to the judgement ſeat of God, that ſame feeling is called conſcience. For it is a certaine meane betweene God and man: becauſe it ſuffereth not man to ſuppreſſe that which hee knoweth, but purſueth him ſo farre till it bring him to guiltineſſe. This is it that Paul meaneth when he teacheth that conſcience doth together witneſſe with men, when their thoughts doe accuſe or acquite them in the judgement of God. A ſimple knowledge might remaine in man as incloſed. Therefore this feeling which preſenteth man to the judgement of GOD, is as it were a keeper joyned to man, to marke and watch all his ſecrets, that nothing ſhould remaine buried in darkeneſſe. Whereupon alſo commeth that old proverbe, conſcience is a thouſand witneſſes. For the ſame reaſon alſo Peter hath ſet the examination of a good conſcience, for quietneſſe of minde, when wee being perſwaded of the grace of Chriſt, doe without feare preſent our ſelves to God. And the authour of the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes uſeth theſe words, to have no more conſcience of ſinne, in ſteed of, to be delivered or acquited, that ſinne may no more accuſe us.

What conſcience is.

Rom. 13. 1.

Rom. 12. 15.

1 Pet. 3. 21.

Heb. 10. 2.

4 Therefore as workes have reſpect to men, ſo the conſcience is referred to God: ſo that conſcience is nothing elſe but the inward pureneſſe of the heart. In which ſenſe Paul writeth that charitie is the fulfilling of the law, out of a pure conſcience, and faith not fained. Afterward alſo in the ſame Chapter hee ſheweth how much it differeth from underſtanding, ſaying that ſome had ſuffered ſhipwrack from the faith, becauſe they had forſaken a good conſcience. For in theſe words he ſignifieth, that it is a lively affection to worſhip God, and a ſyncere deſire to live godlily & holily. Sometime indeed it is referred alſo to men, as in Luke, when the ſame Paul teſtifieth, that hee indevoured himſelfe that hee might walke with a good conſcience toward God and men. But this was therefore ſaid, becauſe the fruites of good conſcience doe flow and come even to men. But in ſpeaking properly, it hath reſpect to God onely, as I have already ſaid. Hereupon commeth that a law is ſaid to binde conſcience, which ſimply bindeth a man, without regard of men, or not having any conſideration of them. As for example. God commaunded not onely to keepe the minde chaſte and pure from all luſts, but alſo forbiddeth all manner of filthineſſe of words and outward wantonneſſe whatſoever it be. To the keeping of this law my conſcience is ſubject, although there lived not one man in the world. So hee that behaveth himſelfe intemperately, doth not onely ſinne in this that he giveth evill example to his brethren, but he hath his conſcience bound with guiltineſſe before God. In things that are of themſelves meane, there is another conſideration. For wee ought to abſtaine from them, if they breed any offence: but the conſcience ſtill being free. So Paul ſpeaketh of fleſh conſecrate to idols. If any (ſaith hee) make doubt, touch it not, for conſciences ſake. I ſay for conſcience, not thine own, but the others. A faithfull man ſhould ſinne, which being firſt warned, ſhould nevertheleſſe eate of ſuch fleſh. But howſoever in reſpect of his brother, it bee neceſſarie for him to abſtaine, as it is preſcribed of God, yet he ceaſeth not to keepe ſtill the libertie of conſcience. Wee ſee how this law binding the outward worke, leaveth the conſcience unbound.

How a law is ſaid to binde the conſcience.

1 Tim. 1. 5.

Act 24.16.

1 Cor. 10 28.

How men for conſcience ſake are bound to obey the lawes of men.

5 Now let us returne to the lawes of men. If they be made to this end, to charge us with a religion, as though the obſerving of them were of it ſelfe neceſſarie, then we ſay that that is laid upon conſcience which was not lawfull to be laid upon it. For our conſciences have not to doe with men, but with God onely: whereunto pertaineth that common difference betweene the earthly court and the court of conſcience. When the whole world was wrapped in a moſt thicke miſt of ignorance, yet this ſmall ſparkle of light remained, that they acknowledged a mans conſcience to be above all judgements of men. Howbeit the ſame thing that they did with one word confeſſe, they did afterward indeed overthrow: yet it was Gods will that there ſhould then alſo remaine ſome teſtimonie of Chriſtian libertie, which might deliver conſciences from the tyrannie of men. But that difficultie is not yet diſſolved, which ariſeth out of the words of Paul. For if we muſt obey Princes not onely for penalties ſake, but alſo for conſcience, it ſeemeth thereupon to follow that Princes lawes have alſo dominion over conſcience. If this be true, then the ſame alſo ought to bee ſaid of the lawes of the Church: I anſwer, that firſt heare wee muſt put a difference betweene the generaltie and ſpecialtie. For though all ſpeciall lawes do not touch the conſcience, yet wee are bound by the generall commandement of God, which commendeth unto us the authoritie of Magiſtrates. And upon this point ſtandeth the diſputation of Paul, that Magiſtrates are to bee honored becauſe they are ordained of God. In the meane time hee teacheth not that thoſe lawes that are preſcribed by them, doe belong to the inward government of the ſoule: whereas he each where extolleth both the worſhipping of God, and the ſpirituall rule of living righteouſly, above all the ordinances of men whatſoever they be. Another thing alſo is worthie to be noted, (which yet hangeth upon the former) that the lawes of men, whether they be made by the magiſtrate or by the Church, although they bee neceſſarie to be kept, (I ſpeake of the good and righteous lawes) yet therefore doe not by themſelves binde conſcience, becauſe the whole neceſſitie of keeping them is referred to the generall end, but conſiſteth not in the things commanded. From this ſort doe farre differ both thoſe that preſcribe a new forme of the worſhipping of God, and thoſe that appoint neceſſitie in things that be at libertie.

Rom. 13.1.

The authoritie which the popiſh prelacie challengeth in making lawes.

6 But ſuch are thoſe that at this day bee called Eccleſiaſticall conſtitutions in the Papacie, which are thruſt in, in ſteede of the true and neceſſarie worſhipping of God. And as they bee innumerable: ſo are there infinite bonds to catch and ſnare ſoules. But although in the declaration of the law we have ſomewhat touched them: yet becauſe this place was fitter to intreate fully of them, I will now travell to gather together the whole ſumme in the beſt order that I can. And becauſe wee have alreadie diſcourſed ſo much as ſeemed to be ſufficient, concerning the tyranny which the the false Bishops doe take upon themselves, in libertie to teach whatsoever they list. I will now omit all that part: and I will here tarrie onely upon declaring the power, which they say they have, to make lawes. Our false Bishops therefore doe burden consciences with new lawes, under this pretence, that they are ordained of the Lord spirituall law-makers, since the government of the Church is committed unto them. Therefore they affirme that whatsoever they command and prescribe, ought necessarily to be observed of the Christian people: and that hee that breaketh it, is guiltie of double disobedience, for that hee is rebellious both to God and to the Church. Certainly, if they were true Bishops, I would in this behalfe grant to them some authority, not so much as they require, but so much as is requisite to the well ordering of the policie of the Church. Now sith they are nothing lesse than that which they would bee accounted, they cannot take any thing to them, be it never so little, but that they shall take too much. But because this hath beene elsewhere considered, let us grant them at this present, that whatsoever power true Bishops have, the same rightly belongeth to them also: yet I denie that they be therefore appointed law-makers over the faithfull, that may of themselves prescribe a rule to live by, or compell to their ordinances the people committed unto them. When I say this, I meane, that it is not lawfull for them, to deliver to the Church to bee observed of necessitie, that which they have devised of themselves without the word of God. For as much as that authoritie both was unknowne to the Apostles, & so oft taken away from the ministers of the church by the Lords owne mouth: I marvell who have beene so bold to take it upon them, and at this day are so bold to defend it, beside the example of the Apostles, and against the manifest prohibition of God.

All things in effect to the perfect rule of well living contained in the law.

7 As touching that, that pertained to the perfect rule of well living, the Lord hath so contained all that in his law, that he hath left nothing for men that they might adde to that summe. And this he did first for this purpose, that because the whole uprightnesse of living standeth in this point, if all workes be governed by his will as by a rule, hee should be holden of us the onely master and directer of life: then, to declare that he requireth of us nothing more than obedience. For this reason James saith: Jam.4.12. he that judgeth his brother judgeth the law: he that judgeth the law, is not an observer of the law, but a judge. But there is one onely law-maker, that can both save and destroy. We heare that God doth claime this one thing as proper to himselfe, to rule us with the government and lawes of his word. And the same thing was spoken before of Esay, although somewhat more darkly: the Lord is our King, the Lord is our law- Esay 33.22. maker, the Lord is our judge, he shall save us. Truly in both these places is shewed, that he that hath power over the soule, hath the judgement of life and death. Yea James pronounceth this plainly: Now, no man can take that upon him. Therefore God must be acknowledged to be the onely king of soules, to whom alone belongeth the power to save and destroy, as those words of Esay expresse, and to be the king, and judge, and law-maker and Saviour. Therefore Peter, when he admonisheth the Pa- 1 Pet.5.2. stors of their dutie, exhorteth them so to feede the flocke, not as using a Lordship over the Clergie, by which word Clergie hee signifieth the inheritance of God, that is to say, the faithfull people. That if we rightly weigh, that it is not lawfull, that that should be transferred to man, which God maketh his owne onely: wee shall understand that so all the power is cut off whatsoever it bee, that they challenge, which advance themselves to command any thing in the Church without the word of God.

The way to judge what ordinances of men be repugnant to the word of God.

8 Now, for as much as the whole cause hangeth thereupon, that if God bee the onely law-maker, it is not lawfull for men to take that honour to themselves: it is meete also therewithall to keepe in minde those two reasons which we have spoken, why the Lord claimeth that to himselfe alone. The first is that his will may be to us a perfect rule of all righteousnesse and holinesse: and that so in the knowing of him may bee the perfect knowledge to live well. The other is, that (when the manner is sought how to worship him rightly and well) he onely may have authoritie over our soules, whom we ought to obey, and upon whose becke we ought to hang. These two reasons being well marked, it shall be easie to judge, what ordinances of men are contrarie to the word of God. Of that sort be all those which are fained to belong to the true worshipping of God, and to the observing whereof consciences are bound, as though they were necessary to be observed. Let us therefore remember that all lawes of men ought to bee weighed with this balance, if wee will have a sure triall that may never suffer us to erre. The first of these reasons Paul in the Epistle to the Colossians useth in contending against the false Apostles that attempted to oppresse the churches with new burthens. The second reason hee more useth with the Galathians in the like case. This therefore hee travelleth to prove in the Epistle to the Colossians, that the doctrine concerning the true worshipping of God is not to bee sought at mens hands: because the Lord hath faithfully, and fully instructed us how he ought to be worshipped. To prove the same in the first Chapter, hee saith that in the Gospell is contained all wisedome, whereby the man of God may bee made perfect in Christ. In the beginning of the second Chapter he saith, that all the treasures of wisedome and understanding are hidden in Christ. Thereupon hee afterward concludeth, let the faithfull beware that they be not by vaine Philosophie led from the flocke of Chhist, according to the constitutions of men. But in the end of the Chapter, hee doth yet with greater boldnesse condemne all Ethelothreskian, that is to say, all fained worshippings, which men devise to themselves, or receive of other, and whatsoever precepts they dare of themselves give concerning the worshipping of God. Wee have therefore, that all those ordinances are wicked, in observing whereof the worshipping of God is fained to be. As for the places in the Galathians wherewith hee earnestly affirmeth that consciences, which ought to be ruled of God only, ought not to bee intangled with snares, they are open enough, specially in the fift Chapter. Therfore let it be sufficient to have but noted them.

Col. 1. 8.

The cause why the Ecclesiasticall constitutions of the Pope as well concerning ceremonies as discipline are impugned.

9 But because the whole matter shall better bee made open by examples, before that wee goe any further, it is good also to apply this doctrine to our owne times. We say that the constitutions which they call Ecclesiasticall, wherewith the Pope and his doe burden the Church, are pernitious and wicked: our adversaries defend that they bee holy and availeable to salvation. There be two kinds of them: for some concerne Ceremonies and rites, other some pertaine more to discipline. Is there then a just cause to move us to impugne them both? Truly a juster than we would. First doe not the authors themselves cleerly define, that the very worshipping of God is contained in them? To what purpose doe they apply their ceremonies, but that God should bee worshipped by them? And that commeth to passe not by the only errour of the ignorant multitude, but by their allowance that have the place of teaching. I doe not touch the grosse abhominations, wherewith they have gone about to overthrow all godlinesse. But it should not be imagined among them to be so hainous an offence, to have failed in any of the least petty traditions, unlesse they did make the worshipping of God subject to their fained devises. What doe we then offend, if at this day we cannot beare that which Paul taught to be intollerable, that the lawfull order of the worshipping of God should be reduced to the will of men: specially when they command men to worship according to the elements of the world, which Paul testifieth to bee against Christ? Againe, it is not unknowne, with how precise necessitie they bind consciences to keepe whatsoever they command. Here when we crie out to the contrarie, we have all one cause with Paul, which in no wise suffereth faithfull consciences to be brought into bondage of men.

Colos 2. 20.
Gal. 5. 1.

A lesse fault in the Papacie to transgresse the law of God than to misse in the keeping of humane constitutions.

10 Moreover this worst of all is added, that when religion hath once begun to bee defiled with such vaine inventions, there ever followeth after that perversnesse, another abhominable frowardnesse, whereof Christ reproched the Pharisies that the commandement of God is made voide for the traditions of men. I will not use mine own words in fighting against our law-makers at these daies. Let them have the victorie, if they can by any meane purge themselves from this accusation of Christ. But how should they excuse them, when among them it is thought infinitly more hainous, to have omitted auricular confession when the time of yeere commeth about, than to have continued a most wicked life a whole yeere together? to have infected their tongue with a little tasting of flesh on a Friday, than to have defiled their body with wh[illegible]edome all the daies of the weeke? to have put their hand to an honest work upon a day consecrate to I wot not what petty Saints, than to have continually exercised their members in most wicked offences? for a Priest to be coupled with one lawfull marriage, than to be entangled with a thousand adulteries? not to have performed a vowed pilgrimage, than to breake faith in all promises? not to have wasted somewhat upon monstrous and no lesse superfluous, and unprofitable excessive gorgeousnesse of Temples, than to have failed to helpe the extreme necessities of the poore? to have passed by an Idoll without honour, than to have despightfully intreated all kinds of men? not to have mumbled up at certaine howres a great number of words without understanding, than never to have conceived a true praier in their heart? What is to make void the commandement of God for the traditions of men, if this bee not: when commending the keeping of Gods commandements, but coldly and as it were lightly by the way, they doe no lesse earnestly and busily exact the obeying of their owne, than if they contained in them the whole pith of godlinesse? when revenging the transgressing of Gods law, with light penalties of satisfactions, they punish the very least offence of one of their owne decrees with no lesse paine than with prisonment, banishment, fire or sword? Being not so sharpe and hard to entreat against the despisers of God, they persecute the despisers of themselves with unappeasable hatred to the extremitie, and doe so instruct all those, whose simplicity they hold captive, that they would with more contented mind see the whole law of God overthrowne, then one small title (as they call it) in the commandements of the Church to bee broken. First in this point is grievous offence committed, that for small matters, and such as (if it should be tried by Gods judgement) are at liberty, one man despiseth, judgeth and casteth away another. But now as though that were not evill enough, those trifling elements of the world (as Paul calleth them in writing to the Galathians) are weighed of more value than the oracles of God. And hee that is in a manner acquited in adulterie, is judged in meat: hee that hath leave to use a harlot, is forbidden to have a wife. This profit verily is gotten by that transgressing obedience, which is so much turned from God as it declineth to men. Gal. 4. 9.

11 There bee also other two not slender faults, which wee disallow in the same ordinances. First, because they prescribe for the most part unprofitable, and sometime also fond observations: then, because godly consciences are oppressed with the infinit multitude of them, and being rowled backe into a certaine Jewishnesse, they so cleave to shadowes, that they cannot attaine to Christ. Whereas I call them fond and unprofitable, I know that that will not seeme credible to the wisedome of the flesh, which so well liketh them, that it thinketh the Church to be utterly deformed when they be taken away. But this is it, that Paul writeth of, to have a resemblance of wisedome in counterfet worshipping, in humility, and in this that they thinke that with their sharpnesse they bee able to tame their flesh. This is truly a most wholesome admonition, such as ought never to slip away from us. Mens traditions (saith he) doe deceive under the shew of wisedome, whence have they this colour? because they are fained of men: therefore the wit of man doth therein acknow his owne, and acknowing it doth more, gladly embrace it, than any thing were it never so good, that le[ss]e agreed with his vanitie. Againe they have hereby another commendation, because they seeme to be fit introductions to humility, for that with their yoke they hold the minds of men pressed downe to the ground. Last of all, because they seeme to tend to this end to restraine the daintinesse of the flesh, and to subdue it with rigor of abstinence, therefore they are thought to be wisely devised. But what saith Paul to these things? doth he not shake off those visors: lest the simple should be deceived with false pretense? Because hee judged this enough for confutation of them, that hee had said that they were the inventions of men, he passeth over all these things without confutation, as though hee esteemed them for nothing: Yea, because hee knew that all fained worshippings in the Church were condemned, and are so much more suspitious to the faithfull as they more delight the wit of man: because he knew that the fained image of outward humility doth so much differ from true humility, as it might easily be discerned: finally because hee knew that that childish introduction was no more esteemed than an exercise of the body: therefore hee willed that the very same things should be to the faithfull in stead

Humane ordinances though unprofitable in respect of their quality, and/or their number burdensome, yet embraced by man because they are most agreeable to his vanity, because they seeme introductions to humility, and because they make a shew of restraining fleshly daintinesse. Col. 2. 23.

of a confutation of mens traditions, by favour of which they were commended among the ignorant.

Vaine men, hypocrites and fooles delighted, the wiser sort offended with the toyish ceremonies of the Church of Rom.

12 So at this day not onely the unlearned common people, but every man as hee is most puffed up with worldly wisdome, so is hee most marvellously delighted with beholding of ceremonies. But hypocrites and fooliſh women thinke that there can be nothing deviſed more glorious nor better. But they which doe more deeply ſearch, and more truly weigh according to the rule of godlineſſe, of what value ſo many and ſuch ceremonies are, doe underſtand firſt that they are trifles, becauſe they have no profit: then, that they are deceits, becauſe they doe with vaine pompe beguile the eies of the beholders. I ſpeake of thoſe ceremonies, under which the Romiſh maſters will that there be great myſteries: but wee find them by experience to be nothing elſe but meere mockeries. And it is no marvell that the Authors of them have fallen ſo far as to mocke both themſelves and other with trifling follies: becauſe they partly tooke their examplar out of the dotages of the Gentiles, and partly after the manner of apes did undiſcreetly counterfet the old uſages of the law of Moſes; which no more pertained to us than the ſacrifices of beaſts and ſuch other things. Truly although there were none other argument, yet no man that hath his ſound wit will looke for any goodnes of a heape ſo ill patched together. And the thing it ſelfe plainly ſheweth that many ceremonies have no other uſe but to amaze the people rather than to teach them. So in theſe new found Canons, that doe rather pervert than preſerve diſcipline, the hypocrites repoſe great importance: but if a man doe better looke into them hee ſhall find that they are nothing elſe but a ſhadowiſh and vaniſhing ſhew of diſcipline.

The number of ceremonies growne intolerable in the Church.

Ad Jan. Epi. 119.

13 But now (to come to the other point) who doth not ſee that traditions with heaping one upon another, are overgrowne into ſo great a number, that the Chriſtian Church may in no wiſe beare them. Hereby it is come to paſſe, that in ceremonies there appeareth I wot not what Iewiſhneſſe, and the other obſervations bring a grievous butchery to Chriſtian ſoules. Auguſtine complained that in his time, the commandements of God neglected, all things were full of ſo many preſumptions, that hee was more grievouſly rebuked that in his Octaves had touched the ground with bare foot, than hee that had buried his wit with drunkenneſſe. Hee complaineth that the Church, which the mercy of God willed to be free, was ſo burdened, that the ſtate of the Iewes was much more tolerable. If that holy man had hapned to live in our age, with what complaints would hee have bewailed the bondage that now is? For both the number is ten times greater, and every ſmall title is a hundred times more rigorouſly looked unto, than at that time. So is wont to be done: when theſe perverſe lawmakers have gotten the dominion, they make no end of bidding and forbidding, till they come to extreme peeuiſhneſſe. Which thing Paul hath alſo very well declared in theſe words: If ye be dead to the world, why are ye holden as though ye were living with traditions, as eat not, taſt not, handle not? For whereas the Greek word apteſthai, ſignifieth both to eat and to touch, doubtles in this place it is taken in the firſt of theſe two ſignifications, leaſt there ſhould be a ſuperfluous repetition. Therefore hee doth here excellently well deſcribe the proceedings of the falſe Apoſtles. They begin at ſuperſtition, ſo that they doe not onely forbid to eat, but alſo even ſlenderly to chaw: when they have obtained this, they then alſo forbid to taſt. When this is alſo granted them, they reckon it not lawfull ſo much as to touch with a finger.

Col. 2. 20.

Chriſtianitie buried under heapes of ceremonies.

Epi. 118. ad Januar.

14 This tyrannie in the ordinances of men we doe at this day worthily blame, by which it is come to paſſe that poore conſciences are marvellouſly tormented with innumerable decrees and immeaſurable exacting of keeping of them. Of Canons pertaining to diſcipline wee have ſpoken in another place. Of the ceremonies what ſhall I ſay, by which it is brought about that Chriſt being halfe buried, we are turned to Iewiſh figures? Our Lord Chriſt (ſaith Auguſtine) hath bound together the fellowſhip of the new people, with Sacraments very few in number, moſt excellent in ſignification, moſt eaſie in obſerving. How far the multitude and diverſitie of uſages wherewith at this day wee ſee the Church to be intangled, doth differ from this ſimplicitie, it cannot be ſufficiently declared. I know with what crafty ſhift ſome ſubtle men doe excuſe this perverſneſſe. They ſay that among us there are many as rude as they were in the people of Israell : that such introduction was ordained for their sakes, which although the stronger may well want, yet they ought not to neglect it, for as much as they see it to be profitable for the weak brethren. I answer, that we are not ignorant, what we owe to the weakenesse of our brethren : but on the other side we take exception and say, that this is not the way whereby the weake may be provided for, that they should be overwhelmed with great heapes of ceremonies. The Lord did not in vaine put this difference betweene us and the old people, that his will was to instruct them like children with signes and figures, but us more simply without such outward furniture. As (saith Paul) a child is ruled of his schoolemaster, and kept under custody, according to the capacity of his age : so the Jewes are kept under the law. But wee are like unto full growne men, which being set at liberty from tutorship and government, have no more need of childish introductions. Truly the Lord did foresee what manner of common people there should be in his Church, and how they should be ruled. Yet he did in this manner as wee have said, make difference betweene us and the Jewes. Therefore it is a foolish way, if we will provide for the ignorant, in raising up Jewishnesse which is abrogate by Christ : Christ also touched in his owne words this difference of the old and new people, when hee said to the woman of Samaria, that the time was come, wherein the true worshippers should worship God in spirit and truth. This verily had alway been done : but the new worshippers differed from the old in this point, that under Moses the spirituall worshipping of God was shadowed and in a manner intangled with many ceremonies, which being abolished, he is now more simply worshipped. Therefore they that confound this difference, doe overthrow the order instituted and stablished by Christ. Shall there then (wilt thou say) no ceremonies bee given to the ruder sort to helpe their unskilfulnesse ? I say not so : for I verily thinke that this kind of helpe is profitable for them. I doe here travell only that such a meane may be used, as may brightly set out Christ and not darken him. Therefore there are given us of God few ceremonies, and those not laboursome, that they should shew Christ being present. The Jewes had moe given them, that they should be images of him being absent. Absent I say he was, not in power, but in manner of signifying. Therefore, that meane may be kept, it is necessary to keepe that fewnesse in number, easinesse in observing, and dignity in signifying, which also consisteth in clearnesse. What need I to say that this hath not been done ? For the thing it selfe is in all mens eies.

G 14 2.

15 Here I omit with how pernitious opinions mens mindes are filled in thinking that they bee sacrifices wherewith oblation is rightly made to God, whereby sinnes are clensed, whereby righteousnesse and salvation is obtained. They will denie that good things are corrupted with such forraine errours : forasmuch as in this behalfe a man may no lesse offend in the very works also commanded of God. But this hath hainousnesse, that so much honor is given to works rashly fained by the will of man, that they are thought to be things deserving eternall life. For the workes commanded of God have reward therefore, because the law-maker himselfe in respect of obedience accepteth them. Therefore they receive not their value of their owne worthinesse, or of their owne deserving, but because God so much esteemeth our obedience toward him. I speake here of the perfection of workes which is commanded of God, and is not performed of men. For therefore the very works of the law which we doe, have no thanke but of the free goodnesse of God, because in them our obedience is weake and lame. But because wee doe not here dispute, of what value works are without Christ, therefore let us passe over that question. I come backe againe to that which properly belongeth to this present argument, that whatsoever commendation works have in them, they have it in respect of the obedience, which only the Lord doth looke upon, as hee testifieth by the Prophet ; I gave not commandement of sacrifices and burnt offrings, but onely that ye should with hearing heare my voice. But of fained works he speaketh in another place, saying ? Ye weigh you silver and not in bread. Againe, They worship me in vaine with the precepts of men. This therefore they can by no waies excuse, that they suffer the silly people to seeke in those outward trifles the righteousnesse whereby they may stand against God and uphold themselves before the heavenly judgement seat. Moreover, is not this a fault worthy to be inveied against, that they Righteousnesse sought in the Church of Rome by the observation of ceremoniall ordinances severed from the doctrine that should direct men unto Christ, and invented many of them only to make money of.

Hier. 7 22. Esa. 55 2. & 29. 13. Mat. 15 9.

they shew forth ceremonies not understanded, as it were a stage play, or a magicall inchantment? For it is certaine that all ceremonies are corrupt and hurtfull, unlesse men be by them directed to Christ. But the ceremonies that are used under the Papacie, are severed from doctrine, that they may the more hold men in signes without all signification: Finally (such a cunning craftsman is the belly) it appeareth that many of them have been invented by covetous sacrificing Priests, to bee snares to catch money. But what beginning soever they have, they are all so given forth in common for filthy gaine, that wee must needs cut off a great part of them, if wee will bring to passe that there be not a prophane market, and full of sacriledge used in the Church.

What humane ordinances are, and the inconveniences wherunto they are subject.

16 Although I seeme not to teach a continuall doctrine concerning the ordinances of men, because this speaking is altogether applied to our owne time: yet there is nothing spoken that shall not be profitable for all times. For so oft as this superstition creepeth in, that men will worship God with their owne fained devises, whatsoever the lawes be that are made to that purpose, they doe by and by degenerate to those grosse abuses. For the Lord threatneth not this curse to one or two ages, but to all ages of the world, that hee will strike them with blindnesse and amazed dulnesse, that worship him with the doctrines of men. This blinding continually maketh that they flie from no kind of absurdity, which despising so many warnings of God, doe willfully wrap themselves in those deadly snares. But if, setting aside circumstances, you will have simply shewed what be the mens traditions of all ages, which it is meet to be rejected of the Church, and to be disallowed of all the godly, that same shall be a sure and plaine definition which we have above set: that all lawes without the word of God are made by men to this end, either to prescribe a manner of worshipping God, or to bind consciences with religion, as though they gave commandement of things necessary to salvation. If to the one or both of these there bee adjoined other faults: as, that with the multitude they darken the brightnesse of the Gospell: that they nothing edifie, but be rather unprofitable and trifling occupations than true exercises of godlinesse: that they bee laid abroad to filthinesse and unhonest gaine: that they bee too hard to bee kept: that they be defiled with evill superstitions: these shall be helps that we may the more easily find how much evill is in them.

Esa 29.13.

The defence which the Church of Rome maketh for traditions, that a great part of them were delivered by Christ and his Apostles, that for the rest the Church is authorized to make ordinances, and to injoine men to observe them as the Apostles did injoine the Gentiles.
Act. 15.20. & 29.
Deut. 12.32.
Pro. 30.6.

17 I heare what they answer for themselves, that their traditions are not of themselves, but of God. For, they say that the Church is governed of the holy Ghost, that it cannot erre: and that the authority thereof remaineth with them. When this is obtained, it therewithall followeth, that their traditions are the revelations of the holy Ghost, which cannot be despised but wickedly and with the contempt of God. And that they should not seeme to have attempted any thing without great authority, they will have it beleeved that a great part of their observations came from the Apostles: and they affirme that by one example is sufficiently declared what the Apostles did in other things, when being assembled in one Councell, they did by the decree of the Councell command the Gentiles to abstaine from things offered to idols, from blood and strangled. Wee have already in another place declared, how falsly for boasting of themselves they lyingly usurpe the title of the Church. So much as concerning this present cause: if, plucking away visors, and deceitfull colours, we truly looke upon that which we ought principally to care for, and which chiefly is for our behoofe, that is, what manner of Church Christ will have, that we may fashion and frame our selves to the rule thereof: it shall easily bee evident unto us, that it is not the Church, which passing the bounds of the word of God, doth outrage and runne at riot in making of new lawes. For doth not that law which was once prescribed to the Church, remaine eternall? What I command thee, that thou shalt keepe that thou maist doe it. Thou shalt not adde any thing nor take any thing from it. And in another place: Adde not to the word of the Lord, nor minish any thing: lest he peradventure reprove thee, and thou be found a lyer. Sith they cannot denie that this was spoken to the Church, what doe they else but report the stubbornesse of that Church, which they boast to have been so bold as after such prohibitions nevertheless to adde and mingle of her owne with the doctrine of God? But God forbid that we should assent to their lies, whereby they burden the Church with so great a slander: but let us understand, that the name of the Church

Church is falſly pretended, ſo oft as this luſt of mens raſhneſſe is ſpoken of, which cannot hold it ſelfe within the preſcribed bounds of God, but that it wildly rangeth and runneth out into her own inventions? There is nothing intangled, nothing darke, nothing doubtfull in theſe words, in which the whole Church is forbidden to adde to the word of God, or to take any thing from it, when the worſhipping of God, and precepts concerning ſalvation, are intreated of. But this (ſay they) was ſpoken of the law only, after which followed the prophecies and the whole miniſtration of the Goſpell. I grant indeed: and I adde alſo, which are rather fulfillings of the law, than additions or diminiſhings. But if the Lord ſuffered nothing to be added to, or taken from the miniſtery of Moſes, which was (as I may ſo terme it) darke by reaſon of many doubtfull inwrappings, till by his ſervants, the Prophets, and at length by his beloved ſonne, hee miniſtred a cleerer doctrine: why ſhould wee not thinke it much more ſeverely forbidden us, that wee ſhould adde nothing to the law, the Prophets, the Pſalmes, and the Goſpell? The Lord is not gone out of kind from himſelfe, which hath long agoe declared, that hee is with nothing ſo highly offended, as when hee is worſhipped with the inventions of men. Whereof came thoſe notable ſayings in the Prophets, which ought to have continually ſounded in our eares: I ſpake no words to your fathers, in the day that I brought them out of Ægypt, concerning ſacrifice and burnt offering. But this word I commanded them, ſaying: With hearing heare my voice: And I will be your God, and you ſhall be my people, and you ſhall walke in all the way that I ſhall command you. Againe, I have with proteſting proteſted unto your fathers, Heare my voice. And other like ſayings: but this is notable above the reſt. Will God have burnt offerings and ſacrifices, and not rather that his voice be obeied? For obedience is better than ſacrifice, and to harken is better than to offer the fat of Rams. For, to reſiſt is as the ſinne of ſoothſaying: and not to obey is as the wickedneſſe of idolatry. Therefore whatſoever inventions of men are in this behalfe defended with the authority of the Church, foraſmuch as the ſame cannot be excuſed from the crime of ungodlines, it is eaſie to prove that it is falſly imputed to the Church.

Jer. 7. 22.

1 Sam. 15. 22.

18 After this ſort wee freely inveigh againſt this tyrannie of mens traditions, which is proudly thruſt in among us, under the title of the Church. For neither doe we ſcorne the Church (as our adverſaries, to bring us in hatred, doe unjuſtly lie upon us) but we give unto her the praiſe of obedience, than which ſhe knoweth no greater praiſe. They rather are very ſore wrong doers to the Church, which make her obſtinate againſt her Lord, while they faine that ſhe hath proceeded further than ſhe lawfully might doe by the word of God: though I ſpeake nothing how it is a notable ſhameleſneſſe joined with as great malice, continually to cry out of the authority of the Church, and in the meane time diſſemblingly to hide both what is commanded by the Lord, and what obedience ſhe oweth to the commandement of the Lord. But if we have a mind, as it is meet we ſhould have, to agree with the Church, this pertaineth rather to the purpoſe, to have an eie unto, and remember what is commanded by the Lord both to us and the Church, that we ſhould with one agreement obey him. For there is no doubt but we ſhall very well agree with the Church, if we doe in all things ſhew our ſelves obedient to the Lord. But now to Father upon the Apoſtles, the originall of the traditions wherwith the Church hath been hitherto oppreſſed, was a point of meere deceit: foraſmuch as the doctrine of the Apoſtles travelleth wholly to this end, that conſciences ſhould not be burdened with new obſervations, nor the worſhipping of God be defiled with our inventions. Moreover, if there be any faithfulneſſe in hiſtories and ancient monuments, the Apoſtles not only never knew, but alſo never heard of this that they attribute unto them. Neither let them prate, that the moſt part of their decrees were received in uſe and in mens behaviours, which never were put in writing: even thoſe things forſooth, which, while Chriſt was yet living, they could not underſtand, after his aſcending they learned by the revelation of the holy Ghoſt. Of the expoſition of that place wee have elſewhere already ſeene. So much as is ſufficient for this preſent cauſe: truly they make themſelves worthy to be laughed at, while they faine that thoſe great myſteries, which ſo long time were unknowne to the Apoſtles, were partly obſervations either Jewiſh or Gentile (of which all the one ſort had been long before published among the Jewes, and all the other sort among the Gentiles, and partly fooliſh geſturings and vaine petty ceremonies, which fooliſh ſacrificing Prieſts that can neither skill of ſwimming nor of letters, uſe to doe very trimly: yea ſuch as children and fooles doe ſo aptly counterfeit that it may ſeeme that there bee no fitter miniſters of ſuch holy myſteries. If there were no hiſtories at all: yet men that have their ſound wit might conſider by the thing it ſelfe, that ſo great a heape of ceremonies and obſervations did not ſuddenly burſt into the Church, but by little and little crept in. For when thoſe holier biſhops, which were next in time to the Apoſtles, had ordained ſome things that belonged to order and diſcipline, afterward there followed men, ſome after other, not diſcreet enough, and too curious and greedy, of which the later that every one was, ſo hee more ſtrived with his predeceſſors in fooliſh envious counterfaitings, not to give place in inventing of new things. And becauſe there was perill leſt their deviſes would ſhortly grow out of uſe, by which they coveted to get praiſe among their poſteritie, they were much more rigorous in exact calling upon the keeping of them. This wrongfull zeale hath bred us a great part of theſe ceremonies which they ſet out unto us for Apoſtolike. And this alſo the hiſtories doe teſtifie.

The acceſſe of ceremonies unto that which the Apoſtles themſelves uſed and preſcribed unto others concerning the Supper of the Lord.

19 Leaſt in making a regiſter of them we ſhould be too tedious: we will be content with one example. In the miniſtring of the Lords Supper, there was in the Apoſtles time great ſimplicitie. The next ſucceſſors, to garniſh the dignitie of the myſtery, added ſomewhat that was not to bee diſallowed. But afterward there came thoſe fooliſh counterfaiters, which with now and then patching of peeces together, have made us this apparrell of the Prieſts which we ſee in the Maſſe, thoſe ornaments of the altar, thoſe geſturings, and the whole furniture of unprofitable things. But they object, that this in old time was the perſwaſion, that thoſe things which were with one conſent done in the univerſall Church, came from the Apoſtles themſelves, whereof they cite Auguſtine for witneſſe. But I will bring a ſolution from no other where than out of the words of Auguſtine himſelfe. Thoſe things (ſaith he) that are kept in the whole world, wee may underſtand to have been ordained either of the Apoſtles themſelves, or of the generall Councels, whoſe authoritie is moſt healthfull in the Church: as, that the Lords paſſion, and reſurrection, and his aſcending into heaven, and the comming of the holy Ghoſt, are celebrate with yeerly ſolemnity: and whatſoever like thing bee found, that is kept of the whole Church, which way ſoever it be ſpread abroad. When hee reckoneth up ſo few examples, who doth not ſee that hee meant to impute to authors worthy of credit and reverence, the obſervations that then were uſed, even none but thoſe ſimple, rare, and ſober ones, with which it was profitable that the order of the Church ſhould bee kept together? But how far doth this differ from that which the Romiſh maſters would inforce men to grant, that there is no petty ceremony among them that ought not to be judged Apoſtolike.

The inſtitution of holy water.

20 That I be not too long, I will bring forth only one example. If any man aske them, whence they have their holy water: they by and by anſwer, from the Apoſtles. As though the hyſtories doe not attribute this invention to I wot not what Biſhop of Rome, which truly, if he had called the Apoſtles to councell, would never have defiled baptiſme with a ſtrange and unfit ſigne. Albeit I doe not thinke it like to be true, that the beginning of that hallowing is ſo old as it is there written. For, that which Auguſtine ſaith, that certaine Churches in his time did ſhun that ſolemne following of Chriſts example in waſhing of feete, leſt that uſage ſhould ſeeme to pertaine to baptiſme, ſecretly ſheweth that there was then no kind of waſhing that had any likeneſſe with baptiſme. Whatſoever it bee, I will not grant that this proceeded from an Apoſtolike ſpirit, that baptiſme, when it is with a daily ſigne brought into remembrance, ſhould after a certaine manner be repeated. And I paſſe not upon this, that the ſelfe ſame Auguſtine in another place aſcribeth other things alſo to the Apoſtles. For ſith hee hath nothing but conjectures, judgement ought not upon them to bee given of ſo great a matter. Finally, admit that wee grant them alſo, that thoſe things which hee rehearſeth came from the time of the Apoſtles: Yet there is great difference betweene inſtituting ſome exerciſe of godlineſſe, which the faithfull with a free conſcience may uſe, or if the uſe of it ſhall not bee profitable for them, they may forbeare forbeare it: and making a law that may snare consciences with bondage. But now, from what authour soever they proceeded, sith wee see that they are slidden into so great abuse, nothing withstandeth, but that wee may without offence of him abolish them: forasmuch as they were never so commended, that they must be perpetually immoveable.

21 Neither doth it much helpe them, that to excuse their tyranny they pretend the example of the Apostles. The Apostles (say they) and the Elders of the first Church, made a decree beside the commandement of Christ, wherein they commanded all the Gentiles to abstaine from things offered to idols, from strangled, and from blood. If that was lawfull for them, why is it not also lawfull for their successors, to follow the same so oft as occasion so requireth? I would to God, they did both in all other things and in this thing follow them. For I denie that the Apostles did there institute or decree any new thing, which is easie to be proved by a strong reason. For whereas Peter in that Councell pronounceth that God is tempted, if a yoake be laid upon the neckes of the Disciples: hee doth himselfe overthrow his owne sentence, if hee afterward consent to have any yoke laid upon them. But there is a yoke laid, if the Apostles doe decree of their owne authoritie that the Gentiles should be forbidden, that they should not touch things offered to idols, blood, and strangled. Indeed there yet remaineth a doubt, for that they doe nevertheless seeme to forbid. But this doubt shall easily bee dissolved, if a man doe more neerely consider the meaning of the decree it selfe: in the order and effect whereof the chiefe point is, that to the Gentiles there liberty is to bee left, and that they ought not to be troubled, nor accombered about the observations of the law. Hitherto it very well maketh of our side. But the exception that immediatly followeth, neither is any new law made by the Apostles, but the divine and eternall commandement of God that charity ought not to be broken, nor doth diminish one title of that liberty: but onely admonish the Gentiles, how they should temper themselves to their brethren, that they abuse not their liberty to the offence of them. Let this therefore bee the second point, that the Gentiles should use a harmeless liberty, and without offence of their brethren. But yet they prescribe some certaine thing: that is, they teach and appoint, so far as was expedient for the time, by what things they might run into the offence of their brethren, that they might beware of those things: but they adde no new thing of their owne to the eternall law of God, which forbiddeth the offending of brethren.

The Church of Rome in her ordinances nothing lesse than a follower of the Apostles in theirs.

22 Like as if the faithfull Pastors which governe the Churches not yet well reformed, should command all their people, that till the weake with whom they live doe grow stronger, they should not openly eat flesh on Friday, or openly labour upon holy daies, or any such thing. For although these things setting superstition aside, are by themselves indifferent: yet when there is added offence of brethren, they cannot bee done without a fault. But the times are such, that the faithfull cannot shew such a sight to the weake brethren, but that they shall sore wound their consciences. Who, but a caviller, will say that so they make a new law, whereas, it is certaine that they doe onely prevent offences, which are expressely enough forbidden of the Lord: And no more can it be said of the Apostles, whose purpose was nothing else, but in taking away the matter of offences, to call upon the law of God concerning the avoiding of offence: as if they had said: It is the Lords commandement that yee offend not a weake brother. Yee cannot eat things offered to images, strangled and blood, but that the weake brethren shall bee offended. Therefore we command you in the word of the Lord, that yee eat not with offence. And that the Apostles had respect to the same thing, Paul himselfe is a very good witnesse, which writeth thus, verily none otherwise than according to the meaning of the Councell: Concerning meats that are offered to idols, wee know that the idoll is nothing. But some with conscience of the Idoll, doe eat it as offered to idols, and their conscience, forasmuch as it is weake, is defiled. See that your liberty bee not made an offence to the weake. Hee that shall have well weighed these things, shall not afterward be deceived with such a false colour as they make, that pretend the Apostles for defence of their tyranny, as though the Apostles had begun with their decree to breake the liberty of the Church. But, that

The Apostles in their constitution about the Gentiles, made no new law of their owne, but applied to the times a law which God had made before.

1 Cor. 8. 4.

they may not be able to escape, but be driven even with their owne confession to allow this solution, let them answer me, by what right they were so bold to abrogate the same decree. Because there was no more perill of those offences and dissentions : which the Apostles meant to provide for, and they know that the law was to be weighed by the end thereof. Forasmuch as therefore this law was made in respect of charitie, there is nothing prescribed in it, but so much as pertaineth to charitie. When they confesse that the transgressing of this law is nothing but a breaking of charitie, doe they not therewithall acknowledge, that it is not a forged addition to the law of God, but a naturall and simple appliance to the times and manners whereunto it was directed?

The commandement of God strictly to bee observed in things appertaining to his honour and service.

23 But although such lawes bee a hundred times unjust and injurious unto us, yet they affirme that they must be heard without exception : for they say that this is not here intended, that we should consent to errours, but onely that being subjects we should beare the hard commandements of our governours, which it is not our parts to refuse. But here also the Lord very well resisteth them with the truth of his word, and delivereth us out of such bondage into the liberty, which hee hath purchased for us with his holy blood, the benefite whereof hee hath more than once confirmed with his word. For that it is not here onely intended (as they maliciously faigne) that wee should suffer some grievous oppression in our body, but that our consciences being spoiled of their libertie that is of the benefite of the blood of Christ, should be sillwishly tormented. Howbeit let us passe over this also, as though it made little to the matter. But of how great importance doe wee thinke it is, that the Lords kingdome is taken away from him, which hee claimeth to himselfe with so great severity? But it is taken away so oft as he is worshipped with the lawes of mens inventions, whereas hee will be holden for the onely Law-maker of his owne worship. And least any man should thinke it to be a matter of nothing, let us heare how much the Lord esteemeth it? Because (saith hee) this people hath feared me with the commandement and doctrine of men : behold I will astonish them with a great and wonderous miracle. For wisedome shall perish from the wisemen thereof, and understanding shall depart from the elders. In another place, They worship me in vaine, teaching doctrines, the commandements of men. And truly whereas the children of Israel defiled themselves with many idolatries, the cause of all that evill is ascribed to this uncleane mixture, that transgressing the commandements of God, they have forged new worshippings. And therefore the holy History rehearseth that the new strangers that had beene transplanted by the King of Babilon to inhabite Samaria; were torne in peeces and consumed of wilde beasts, because they knew not the judgements or statutes of the God of that land. Although they had nothing offended in the Ceremonies, yet God would not have allowed a vaine pompe : but in the meane time hee ceased not to take vengeance of the defiling of his worship, for that men did thrust in devises strange from his word. Whereupon it is afterward said, that they being made afraid with that punishment, received the Ceremonies prescribed in the law : but because they did not yet purely worship the true God, it is twise repeated that they did feare him and did not feare him. Whereupon we gather, that the part of reverence which is given to him, consisteth in this, while in worshipping him we simply follow what he commandeth with mingling none of our inventions. And therefore the godly Kings are oftentimes praised, because they did according to all the commandements, and declined not to the right hand nor to the left. I goe yet further : although in some fained worshipping there doe not openly appeare ungodlinesse, yet it is severely condemned of the holy Ghost, so soone as men depart from the commandement of God. The Altar of Achaz, the paterne whereof was brought out of Samaria, might have seemed to increase the garnishment of the Temple, whereas his devise was to offer Sacrifices thereupon to God onely, which he should doe more honourably than upon the first and old Altar : yet wee see how the spirit detesteth that boldnesse, for none other cause but for that the inventions of men in the worshipping of God are uncleane corruptions. And how much more cleerely the will of God is opened unto us, so much the lesse excusible is our forwardnes to attempt any thing. And therefore worthily with this circumstance the crime of Manasses is inforced, for that he builded a new Altar in Jerusalem, of which God had pronounced, I will there set my name, because the authority of God is now as it were of set purpose refused. 2 King. 21. 3.

24 Many doe marvell why God so sharply threatneth that hee will doe things to be wondered at to the people, of whom he was worshipped with the commandements of men, and pronounceth that hee is worshipped in vaine with the precepts of men. But if they considered, what it is in the cause of religion, that is to say of heavenly wisedome, to hang upon the onely mouth of God, they would therewithall see, that it is no slender reason why God so abhorreth such perverse services, that are done to him according to the lust of mans wit. For although they that obey such lawes for the worshipping of God, have a certaine shew of humility in this their obedience, yet they are not humble before God, to whom they prescribe the same lawes which they themselves doe keepe. This is the reason why Paul willeth us so diligently to be ware, that we be not deceived by the traditions of men, and that which he calleth Ethelothreskian, that is, Will-worship invented of men beside the doctrine of God. This is verily true, both our owne wisedome, and all mens wisdome must be foolish unto us, that we may suffer him alone to be wise. Which way they keepe not which doe study with petty observations framed by the will of men to commend themselves unto him, and doe thrust unto him as it were against his will a transgressing obedience toward him, which is indeed given to men. As it hath beene done both in many ages heretofore, and in the time within our owne remembrance, and is also at this day done in those places where the authoritie of the creature is more esteemed than of the Creator: where religion (if yet the same be worthy to bee called religion) is defiled with more and more unsavoury superstitions, than ever was any Paynim wickednesse. For what could the wit of men breed but all things carnall and foolish and such as truly resemble their authors? The reason why God abhorreth services where with men devise to please him. Col. 2. 4.

25 Whereas also the Patrons of superstitions alleadge, that Samuel sacrificed in Ramatha, and although the same was done beside the law, yet it pleased God: the solution is easie, that it was not a certaine second Altar to set against the one onely Altar: but because the place was not yet appointed for the Arke of the covenant, hee appointed the towne where he dwelled for sacrifices, as the most convenient place. Truly the minde of the holy Prophet was not to make any innovation in holy things, whereas God had so straitly forbidden any thing to be added or minished. As for the example of Manoah, I say that it was an extraordinary and singular case. He being a private man offered sacrifice to God and not without the allowance of God: verily because he enterprised it not of a rash motion of his owne minde, but by a heavenly instinction. But how much the Lord abhorreth those things that men devise of themselves to worship him withall, another not inferior to Manoah Gideon is a notable example, whose Ephod turned to distruction not onely to him and his family, but to the whole people. Finally, every new fond invention, wherewith men covet to worship God, is nothing else but a defiling of true holinesse. Samuel and Manoah no examples to justifie the Church of Rome in her boldnesse, but rather Gideon to condemne her. 1 Sam. 7. 17. Jud. 13 19. Jud. 8. 27.

26 Why then (say they) did Christ will that those intollerable burdens should be borne, which the Scribes and Pharisees bound upon men? But why in another place did the same Christ will that men should beware of the leaven of the Pharisees: calling leaven (as Matthew the Evangelist expoundeth it) all their owne doctrine that they mingled with the pureneſſe of the word of God? What would we have more plaine, than that wee be commanded to flee and beware of all their doctrine? Whereby it is made most certaine unto us, that in the other place also the Lord willed not, that the consciences of his, should be vexed with the Pharisees owne traditions. And the very words, if they bee not wrested, sound of no such thing. For the Lord purposing there to enveigh sharply against the manners of the Pharisees, did first simply instruct them that heard him, that although they saw nothing in their life meete for them to follow, yet they should not cease to doe those things which they taught in words, while they sat in the chaire of Moses, that is, to declare the law. Therefore hee meant nothing else but to provide that the common people should not with the evill examples of the teachers be brought to dispise the doctrine. But for as much as many The ministeriall authority of Scribes and Pharisees confirmed by Christ but not their presumption to burthen men with what they lusted. Matt. 23. 3. & 16. 6.

are nothing at all moved with reasons, but alway require authority, I will alleadge Augustines words, in which the very same thing is spoken. The Lords sheepefold hath governours, some faithfull, and some hirelings. The governours that are faithfull, are true Pastors: but heare ye, that the hirelings also are necessary: for many in the Church following earthly profits, doe preach Christ, and by them the voice of Christ is heard: and the sheepe doe follow, not a hireling, but a Pastor by the meanes of a hireling. Heare yee that hirelings are shewed by the Lord himselfe. The Scribes (saith he) and the Pharisees sit in the chaire of Moses. Doe yee those things that they say, but doe not those things that they doe. What other thing said hee, but heare the voice of the Pastor by the hirelings? For in sitting in the chaire they teach the law of God: therefore God teacheth by them. But if they will teach their owne, heare it not, doe it not. This saith Augustine.

In Joh. Tract. 46.

In forbidding mens consciences to be charged with humane traditions, lawes whereby the Church is set in order are not prejudiced.

27 But whereas many unskilfull men, when they heare that consciences are wickedly bound and God worshipped in vaine with the traditions of men, doe at once blot out altogether all lawes whereby the order of the Church is set in frame: therefore it is convenient also to meete with their errour: Verily in this point it is easie to be deceived, because at the first sight it doth not by and by appeare what difference is betweene the one sort and the other. But I will so plainely in few words set out the whole matter, that the likenesse may deceive no man. First let us hold this, that if we see in every fellowship of men some policy to be necessary, that may serve to nourish common peace, and to retaine concord: if we see that in the doing of things there is alway some orderly forme, which is behoovefull for publike honesty and for very humanity not to be refused, the same ought chiefely to bee observed in Churches, which are both best maintained by a well framed disposition of all things, and without agreement are no Churches at all. Therefore if we will have the safety of the Church well provided for, we must altogether diligently procure that which Paul commandeth, that all things be done comely and according to order. But forasmuch as there is so great diversity in the manners of men, so great variety in mindes, so great disagreement in judgements and wits: neither is there any policy stedfast enough, unlesse it be stablished by certaine lawes, nor any orderly usage can be observed without a certaine appointed forme: Therfore we are so farre off from condemning the lawes that are profitable to this purpose, that we affirme that when those be taken away, Churches are dissolved from their sinewes, and utterly deformed and scattered abroad. For this which Paul requireth, that all things be done decently and in order, cannot be had, unlesse the order it selfe and comelinesse bee established, with observations adjoyned as with certaine bonds. But this onely thing is alway to bee excepted in those observations, that they be not either beleeved to bee necessary to salvation, and so binde consciences with religion, or bee applied to the worshipping of God, and so godlinesse be reposed in them.

1 Cor. 14. 40.

The difference betweene wicked observations and the lawfull constitutions of the Church.

28 Wee have therefore a very good and most faithfull marke, which putteth difference betweene those wicked ordinances, by which wee have said that true religion is darkened and consciences subverted, and the lawfull observations of the Church: if we remember that the lawful observations tend alway to one of these two things or to both together, that in the holy assembly of the faithfull all things be done comely and with such dignitie as beseemeth: and that the very common fellowship of men should bee kept in order as it were by certaine bonds of humanitie and moderation. For when it is once understood that the Law is made for publike honesties sake, the superstition is now taken away, into which they fall, that measure the worshipping of God by the inventions of men. Againe, when it is knowne that it pertaineth to common use, then that false opinion of bond and necessity is overthrowne, which did strike a great terrour into consciences, when traditions were thought necessary to salvation. For herein is nothing required but that charitie should with common dutifull doing bee nourished among us. But it is good yet to define more plainely, what is comprehended under that comelinesse which Paul commendeth, and also what under order. The end of comelinesse is, partly that when such Ceremonies are used as may procure a reverence to holy things, wee may by such helpes be stirred stirred up to godlinesse: partly also that the modestie and gravitie which ought to bee seene in all honest doings may therein principally appeare. In order this is the first point, that they which governe may know the rule and law to rule well: and the people which are governed may bee accustomed to obeying of God, and to right discipline: Then, that the state of the Church being well framed, peace and quietnesse may be provided for.

29 Therefore wee shall not say that comelinesse is, wherein shall bee nothing but vaine delectation: such as wee see in that player-like apparell, which the Papists use in their ceremonies, where appeareth nothing else, but an unprofitable visor of gaynesse, and excesse without fruit. But wee shall account that to bee comelinesse which shall so bee meete for the reverence of holy mysteries, that it be a fit exercise to godlinesse, or at the least such as shall serve to convenient garnishing for the celebrating thereof: and the same not without fruit, but that it may put the faithfull in minde with how great modestie, religiousnesse and reverence, they ought to handle holy things. Now, that ceremonies may bee exercises of godlinesse, it is necessarie that they lead us the straight way to Christ. Likewise wee may not say that order consisteth in those trifling pompes that have nothing else than a vanishing gaynesse: but that it standeth in such an orderly framing as may take away all confusion, barbarousnesse, obstinacie, and all strifes and dissentions. Of the first sort are these examples in Paul: that prophane banketings should not bee mingled with the holy Supper of the Lord: that women should not come abroad, but covered: and many other which wee have in common use: as this, that wee pray kneeling and bare headed: that wee minister the Lords Sacraments not uncleanly, but with some dignitie: that in the burying of the dead we use some honest shew: and other things that are of the same sort. Of the other kinde are the houres appointed for publike prayers, Sermons, and celebrations of mysteries: at Sermons, quietnesse and silence, places appointed, singing together of Hymnes, daies prefixed for celebrating of the Lords Supper, that Paul forbiddeth that women should teach in the Church, and such like. But specially those things that concerne discipline, as the teaching of the Catechisme, the censures of the Church, excommunication, fastings, and such as may bee reckoned in the same number. So all the constitutions of the Church, which we receive for holy and wholesome, wee may referre to two chiefe titles: for some pertaine to rites, and ceremonies, and the other to discipline and peace.

What things they be that serve for comelinesse and order in the Church.

1 Cor.11.21. & 5.

1 Cor.14.34.

30 But because here is perill, least on the one side the false Bishops should thereby catch a pretence to excuse their wicked and tyrannous lawes, and least on the other side there bee some men too fearefull, which admonished with the foresaid evils doe leave no place to lawes be they never so holie: here it is good to protest, that I allow onely those ordinances of men which be both grounded upon the authoritie of God, and taken out of the Scripture, yea and altogether Gods owne. Let us take for an example the kneeling which is used in time of common praier. It is demanded, whether it be a tradition of man, which every man may lawfully refuse or neglect, I say that it is so of men, that it is also of God. It is of God, in respect that it is a part of that comlinesse, the care and keeping whereof is commended unto us by the Apostle: it is of men, in respect that it specially betokeneth that which had in generaltie rather beene pointed to, than declared. By this one example we may judge, what is to be thought of that whole kinde: verily because the Lord hath in his holy Oracles both faithfully contained and clearely set forth both the whole summe of true righteousnesse, and all the parts of the worshipping of his divine Majestie, and whatsoever was necessarie to salvation: therefore in these things hee is onely to be heard as our Schoolemaster. But because in outward discipline and Ceremonies his will was not to prescribe each thing particularly what we ought to follow (because he foresaw this to hang upon the state of times, and did not thinke one forme to bee fit for all ages) herein wee must flee to those generall rules which he hath given, that thereby all those things should be tried which the necessitie of the Church shall require to bee commanded for order and comelinesse. Finally, forasmuch as hee hath therefore taught nothing expressely, because these things both are not necessarie to salvation, and according to

A rule for Church ordinances.

1 Cor.14.40.

the manners of every nation and age ought diverſly to bee applied to the edifying of the Church: therefore as the profit of the Church ſhall require, it ſhall bee conuenient as well to change and abrogate thoſe that be uſed, as to inſtitute new. I grant indeed, that wee ought not raſhly, nor oft, nor for light cauſes to runne to innovation. But what may hurt or edifie, charitie ſhall beſt iudge: which if we will ſuffer to be the gouerneſſe, all ſhall be ſafe.

The obedience required vnto lawfull ordinances of the Church.

31 Now it is the dutie of Chriſtian people, to keepe ſuch things as have beene ordained according to this rule, with a free conſcience and without any ſuperſtition, but yet with a goodly and eaſie readineſſe to obey, not to deſpiſe them, not to paſſe them over with careleſſe negligence: ſo farre is it off, that they ought by pride and obſtinacie openly to breake them. What matter of libertie of conſcience (wilt thou ſay) may there bee in ſo great obſeruation and warineſſe? Yea, it ſhall ſtand excellently well when wee ſhall conſider, that they are not ſtedfaſt and perpetuall ſtayed lawes, whereunto wee be bound, but outward rudiments for the weakneſſe of men: which although we doe not all needs, yet we doe all uſe them, becauſe wee are mutually one bound to another, to nourish charitie among us. This wee may reknowledge in the examples above reheatſed. What? Doth religion ſtand in a womans vaile, that it is not lawfull to goe out of dores with her head uncouered? Is that holy decree of his concerning ſilence, ſuch as cannot be broken without moſt hainous offence? Is there any myſterie in kneeling, or in burying of a dead carcaſe; that may not bee omitted without ſinne? No. For if a woman needs, for the helping of her neighbour, to make ſuch haſt as may not ſuffer her to cover her head, ſhe offendeth not if ſhe runne thither with her head uncouered. And it may ſometime befall that it may be no leſſe conuenient for her to ſpeake, than at another time to hold her peace. And there is no cauſe to the contrarie, but that hee which by reaſon of diſeaſe cannot bow his knees may pray ſtanding. Finally, it is better to burie a dead man ſpeedily in time, than when they lacke a winding ſheete, or when there be not men preſent to convey him, or tarrie till he rot unburied. But nevertheleſſe in theſe things there is ſomewhat which the manner and ordinances of the country, and finally very naturall honeſtie, and the rule of modeſtie appointeth to bee done or avoided: wherein if a man ſwarve any thing from them, by unwarineſſe, or forgetfulneſſe, there is no crime committed: but if upon contempt, ſuch ſtubbornneſſe is to be diſallowed. Likewiſe the daies themſelves, which they be, and the houres, and how the places be builded, and what Pſalmes be ſong upon which day, it maketh no matter. But it is meete that there be both certaine daies, and appointed houres, and a place fit to receive all, if there be regard had of the preſervation of peace. For how great an occaſion of brawlings ſhould the confuſion of theſe things be, if it were lawfull for every man as he liſt, to change thoſe things that belong to common ſtate: forasmuch as it will never come to paſſe that one ſame thing ſhall pleaſe all men, if things be left as it were in the middeſt to the choiſe of every man? If any man doe carpe againſt us, and will herein be more wiſe than he ought, let him ſee himſelfe by what reaſon he can defend his owne preciſeneſſe to the Lord. As for us, this ſaying of Paul ought to ſatisfie us, that we have not an uſe to contend, not the Churches of God.

1 Cor. 11. 16.

Cautions touching Church ordinances.

32 Moreover it is with great diligence to bee endevoured, that no errour creepe in, that may corrupt or obſcure this pure uſe. Which ſhall be obtained, if all obſeruations, whatſoever they ſhall be, ſhall have a ſhew of manifeſt profit, and if very few be received: but principally if there be adjoyned a faithfull doctrine of the Paſtor, that may ſtop up the way to perverſe opinions. This knowledge maketh that in all theſe things every man may have his owne libertie preſerved, and nevertheleſſe ſhall willingly chage his owne libertie with a certaine neceſſitie, ſo farre as either this comelineſſe that we have ſpoken of, or the order of charitie ſhall require. Secondly that both we our ſelves ſhould without any ſuperſtition be buſied in the obſerving of thoſe things, and ſhould not too preciſely require them of other, ſo as wee ſhould thinke the worſhipping of God to bee the better for the multitude of ceremonies that one Church ſhould not deſpiſe another for the diverſitie of diſcipline: laſt of all that ſetting herein no perpetuall law to our ſelves, wee ſhould referre the whole uſe and end of obſeruations observations to the edification of the Church, that when it requireth we may without any offence suffer not only somewhat to be changed, but all the observations that were before in use among us, to be altered. For this age is a present experience, that certaine rites, which otherwise are not ungodly nor uncomely, may according to the fit occasion of the matter, be conveniently abrogate. For (such hath beene the blindnesse and ignorance of the former times) Churches have heretofore, with so corrupt opinion and with so stiffe affection, sticked in ceremonies, that they can scarcely be sufficiently purged from monstrous superstitions, but that many ceremonies must bee taken away, which in old time were peradventure ordained not without cause, and of themselves have no notable ungodlinesse in them.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

Of the jurisdiction of the Church, and the abuse thereof, such as is seen in the Papacie.

NOw remaineth the third part of the power of the Church, yea and the chiefe part in a well ordered state, which wee have said to consist in iurisdiction. The whole iurisdiction of the Church pertaineth to the discipline of manners, of which we shall intreate by and by. For as much as no Citie nor towne can stand without magistrate and policie: so the Church of God (as I have already taught, but now I am compelled to repeat it againe) needeth her certaine spirituall policie: but such as is utterly severed from the civill politie, and doth so nothing hinder or minish it, that it rather doth much helpe and further it. Therefore this power of iurisdiction shall in summe be nothing else but an order framed for the preservation of spirituall policie. To this end from the beginning were ordained iudiciall orders in Churches, which might use examination of manners, correct vices and exercise the office of the keies. This order Paul speaketh of in the Epistle to the Corinthians, when he nameth governments. Againe, to the Romans, when he saith: let him that ruleth, rule in carefulnesse. For he speaketh not to the magistrates, (for at that time there were no Christian magistrates) but to them that were ioyned with the Pastors for the spirituall government of the Church. Also in the Epistle to Timothy, hee maketh two sorts of Elders: some, that labour in the word: other some, that doe not use the preaching of the word, and yet doe rule well. By this latter sort it is no doubt that he meaneth them that were appointed to looke unto manners, and to the whole use of the keies. For this power of which we now speake, hangeth wholy upon the keies which Christ gave to the Church, in the xviij. Chapter of Matthew: where hee commandeth, that they should be sharply admonished in the name of the whole Church, that have despised private monitions: but if they goe forward in their obstinacy, he teacheth that they should be put out of the fellowship of the faithfull. But these monitions and corrections cannot be without knowledge of the cause: therefore there needeth both some iudgement and order. Wherefore unlesse we will make voide the promise of the keies, and take utterly away excommunication, solemne motions and all such things whatsoever they be: we must needs give to the Church some iurisdiction. Let the readers marke that that place intreateth not of the generall authority of doctrine as in the xvj. Chapter of Mathew, and the xx. of John: but that the power of the Synagogue is for the time to come transferred to the flocke of Christ. Untill that day the Jewes had their order of governing, which Christ stablisheth in his Church, and that with great penalty, so much as concerneth the pure institution of it. For so it behooved, forasmuch as otherwise the iudgement of an unnoble and unregarded congregation might be despised of rash and proud men. And that it should not encomber the readers, that Christ doth in the same words expresse things somewhat differing one from the other, it shall bee profitable to dissolve this doubt. There bee therefore two places, that speake of binding and loosing. The one is in the xvj. Chapter of Mathew, where Christ, after that he had promised that he would give to Peter the keies of the kingdome of heaven, immediately addeth, that whatsoever he shall binde or loose in earth, shall be confirmed in heaven. In which words he meaneth none other thing, than he doth by other words in John, when sending his Disciples to preach preach, after that he had breathed upon them hee ſaid: whoſe ſinnes yee forgive, they ſhall bee forgiven: and whoſe yee retaine they ſhall be retained in heaven. I will bring an expoſition not ſubtle, not enforced, not wreſted: but naturall, flowing, and offering it ſelfe. This commandement of forgiving and retaining ſinnes, and that promiſe of binding and looſing made to Peter, ought to be referred to no other thing but to the miniſterie of the word: which when the Lord committed to the Apoſtles, hee did therewith alſo arme them with this office of binding and looſing. For what is the ſumme of the Goſpell, but that we all being bond ſervants of ſinne and of death, are looſed and made free by the redemption that is in Chriſt Jeſus: and that they which doe not receive nor acknowledge Chriſt their deliverer and redeemer, are damned and adjudged to everlaſting bonds? When the Lord delivered this meſſage to his Apoſtles, to be carried into all Nations: to approve that it was his owne and proceeding from himſelfe, he honoured it with this noble teſtimony: and that to the ſingular ſtrengthening both of the Apoſtles themſelves, and of all thoſe to whom it ſhould come. It behooved that the Apoſtles ſhould have a ſteadfaſt and ſound certainty of their preaching, which they ſhould not onely execute with infinite labours, cares, troubles and dangers, but alſo at the laſt, ſeale it with their blood. That they might (I ſay) know the ſame to be not vaine nor voide, but full of power and force: it behooved that in ſo great carefulneſſe, in ſo great hardneſſe of things, and in ſo great dangers, they ſhould be perſwaded that they did the buſineſſe of God: that when all the world withſtood them, and fought againſt them they ſhould know that God ſtood on their ſide: that having not Chriſt the authour of their doctrine preſent by ſight in earth, yet they ſhould underſtand him to be in heaven to confirme the truth of the doctrine which hee had delivered them. It behooved againe that it ſhould alſo bee moſt certainely proved by teſtimony to the hearers, that that doctrine of the Goſpell was not the word of the Apoſtles, but of God himſelfe: not a voice bread in earth, but come downe from heaven. For theſe things, the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, the promiſe of everlaſting life, the meſſage of ſalvation, cannot be in the power of man. Therefore Chriſt hath teſtified, that in the preaching of the Goſpell there is nothing of the Apoſtles, but the onely Miniſtery: that it was hee himſelfe that ſpake and promiſed all things by their mouthes as by inſtruments: and therefore that the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes which they preached, was the true promiſe of God: and the damnation which they pronounced, was the certaine judgement of God. But this teſtifying is given to all ages, and remaineth in force, to certifie and aſſure all men: that the word of the Goſpell, by what man ſoever it bee preached, is the very ſentence of God, publiſhed at the ſoveraigne judgement ſeat, written in the booke of life, ratified, firme and fixed in heaven. This we ſee that in thoſe places the power of the keies is nothing but the preaching of the Goſpell: and that it is not ſo much a power as a Miniſtery, if wee have reſpect to men. For Chriſt hath not given this power properly to men, but to his owne word, whereof he hath made men Miniſters.

The use of a policie in the church different from that which is civill: the antiquity of ecclesiasticall judgements: the difference of authority given to the Church in the 18. of Mat. from that which is given in the 16. of Matt. and the 21. of Iohn.

The power of binding and looſing by diſcipline committed to the Church.

Mat. 18.17.

2 The other place which wee have ſaid to be concerning the power of binding and looſing, is in the xviij. chapter of Matthew, where Chriſt ſaith: If any brother heare not the Church, let him bee to thee as a Heathen man or Publican. Verily I ſay unto you: whatſoever yee binde upon earth, ſhall be bound alſo in heaven: whatſoever yee looſe ſhall be looſed. This place is not altogether like the firſt, but is a little otherwiſe to be underſtood. But I doe not ſo make them diverſe, that they have not great affinity together. This firſt point is like in both, that either of them is a generall ſentence, that in both, their is alway all one power of binding and looſing, namely by the word of God, all one commandement, all one promiſe. But herein they differ, that the firſt place peculiarly belongeth to preaching, which the miniſters of the word doe execute: this latter place to the diſcipline of Excommunication, which is committed to the Church. The Church bindeth, whom ſhe excommunicateth, not that ſhee throweth him into perpetuall ruine and deſperation, but becauſe ſhe condemneth his life and manners, and unleſſe he repent, doth already warne him of his damnation. She looſeth whom ſhe receiveth into communion: becauſe ſhe doth make him as it were partaker of the unity which ſhee hath in Chriſt Jeſus. Therefore that no man ſhould obſtinately diſpiſe the judgement of the Church, or little regard that hee is condemned by the consenting voyces of the faithfull: the Lord testifieth that such judgement of the faithfull is nothing else but a publishing of his owne sentence: and that whatsoever they doe in earht is confirmed in heaven. For they have the word of God, whereby they may condemne the perverse: they have the word, whereby they may receive the repentant into grace. And they cannot erre, nor dissent from the judgement of God: because they judge not but after the law of God, which is not an uncertaine or earthly opinion, but the holy will of God, and a heavenly Oracle. Out of these two places, which I thinke I have both briefely, familiarly, and truly expounded, those furious men without difference as they be carried with their owne giddinesse, goe about to stablish sometime confession, sometime excommunication, sometime jurisdiction, sometime the power to make lawes, sometime pardons. But the first place they alledge the supremacie of the Sea of Rome: they can so well skill to fit their keies to all locks and doores, that a man may say they have practised Smithes-craft all their life.

3 For whereas many thinke that those things endured but for a time, when the Magistrates were yet strangers from the profession of our religion: they are deceived in this, that they consider not, how great difference and what manner of unlikenesse there is of the Ecclesiasticall and civill power. For the Church hath not the power of the sword to punish or restraine, no Empire to command, no prison, no other paines which the Magistrate is wont to lay upon men. Againe, it tendeth not to this end, that hee that hath sinned should bee punished against his will, but should with willing chastisement professe his repentance. Therefore there is a farre diverse order because neither doth the Church take to it selfe any thing which properly belongeth to the Magistrate, nor the Magistrate can execute that which the Church doth. This shall be made plainer by an example. Is any man drunke? In a well ordered Citie, prison shall be his punishment. Hath he committed fornication? He shall have like or rather greater punishment. So shall both the lawes, and the Magistrate, and outward judgement be satisfied: But it may be that hee shall give no signification of repentance, but rather murmure and grudge against it. Shall the Church in this case doe nothing? But such cannot bee received to the Supper, without doing wrong both to Christ and his holy institution. And reason requireth this, that he which offendeth the Church with an evill example, should with solemne declaration of repentance take away the offence which he hath raised. The reason which they bring that are of contrarie opinion, is too cold: Christ say they committed these doings to the Church, when there was no Magistrate to execute them. But it happeneth oftentimes that the Magistrate is more negligent, yea sometime peradventure that himselfe is to be chastised, which happened to the Emperour Theodosius. There may beside this as much be said of the ministerie of the word. Now therefore after their sentence, let Pastors cease to blame manifest wicked doings, let them cease to chide, to reprove, to rebuke, for there be Christian Magistrates, which ought to correct these things with the law and with the sword. But as the Magistrate ought by punishing, and by restraining with force, to purge the Church of offences: so likewise the Minister of the word for his part ought to helpe the Magistrate that there may not so many offend. So ought their workings to be conjoyned that the one may be a helpe, not a hinderance to the other.

The difference betwixt an ecclesiasticall judgement and civill, and the necessitie as well for the one as the other to continue.

4 And truly if a man more nearely weigh the words of Christ, he shall easily perceive that in these places, is described a stayed state, and a perpetuall order of the Church, not such as endureth but for a time. For it is not meete that wee should accuse them to the Magistrate, that will not obey our monitions: which yet should be necessarie if the Magistrate succeeded into the office of the Church. What is this promise? Shall wee say that it is a promise of one or a few yeares? Verily verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye binde on earth, &c. Moreover Christ did here institute no new thing, but followed the custome alway observed in the ancient Church of his owne nation: whereby he signified that the Church cannot want the spirituall iurisdiction, which had beene from the beginning. And this hath beene confirmed by the consent of all times. For when Emperors and Magistrates began to professe Christ, the spirituall iurisdiction was not by and by abolished: but only so ordered, that it should diminish nothing of the civill jurisdiction, or be confounded with it. And rightfully. For the magistrate, if he be godly, will not exempt himselfe from the common subjection of the children of God, wherof it is not the last part to submit himselfe to the Church, judging by the word of God: so far is it off, that he ought to take away that order of judgment. For what is more honorable (saith Ambrose) for the Emperor, than to be called the Son of the Church? For a good Emperor is within the Church, not above the Church. Therfore they, which to honor the Magistrate doe spoile the Church of her power, doe not only with false exposition corrupt the sentence of Christ, but also doe not slenderly condemne so many holy Bishops which have beene from the time of the Apostles, that they have by false pretence usurped the honor and office of the Magistrate.

Epi 32 ad Valent.

Spirituall power severed from the power of the sword.

5 But on the other side it is good to see this, what was in old time the true use of the jurisdiction of the Church, and how great abuse is crept in, that we may know what is to be abrogate, and what is to be restored of antiquitie, if we will overthrow the kingdome of Antichrist, and set up the true kingdome of Christ againe. First this is the marke to be shot at, that offences be prevented, and if any offence be risen up, that it may be abolished. In the use two things are to be considered: first, that this spirituall power be altogether severed from the power of the sword: then, that it be not executed by the will of one man, but by a lawfull assembly. Both these things were observed in the purer Church. For the holy Bishops did not exercise their power with fines, or imprisonments, or other civill punishments: but they used the onely word of the Lord, as they ought to doe. For the severest revenge, and as it were the uttermost thunderbolt of the Church is excommunication, which is not used but in necessitie. But this requireth neither force nor strong hand, but is content with the power of the word of God. Finally, the jurisdiction of the old Church was nothing else but a declaration in practise (as I may so call it) of that which Paul teacheth concerning the spirituall power of Pastors. There is (saith he) power given to us, whereby wee may throw downe strong holdes, whereby wee may make low all height that lifteth up it selfe against the knowledge of God, whereby wee may subdue all thought, and may lead it captive into the obedience of Christ, and wee have in readinesse a revenge against all disobedience. As this is done by the preaching of the doctrine of Christ: so least the doctrine should be scorned, according to that which is taught ought they to be judged which professe themselves of the household of faith. But that cannot bee done, unlesse there be ioyned with the ministerie a power to call them that are to be privately admonished; or to bee more sharpely corrected, and also a power to exclude them from the communion of the Supper; which cannot bee received without prophaning of so great a mysterie. Therefore when in another place hee saith, that it belongeth not to us to judge strangers, hee maketh the children subject to the censures of the Church, which may chastice their faultes, and hee secretly signifieth that there were then judiciall orders in force from which none of the faithfull were free.

1 Cor. 5 12.

Spirituall jurisdiction executed by the will not of one: but of many in the time of Cyprian and Ambrose.

6 But such authoritie (as wee have declared) was not in the power of one man, to doe every thing according to his owne will: but in the power of the assembly of the Elders, which was the same thing in the Church that a Senate is in a Citie. Cyprian, when hee maketh mention by whom it was exercised in his time, useth to joyne the whole Cleargie with the Bishop. But in another place also he sheweth, that the very Cleargie so governed, that in the meane time the people was not excluded from the hearing of matters. For thus he writeth: Since the beginning of my Bishoprick I have determined to doe nothing without the counsell of the Cleargie and consent of the people. But this was the common and usuall manner, that the jurisdiction of the Church should be exercised by a Senate of Elders: of whom (as I have said) there were two sorts: For some were ordained to teaching, and others some were onely Judges in manners. By little and little this institution grew out of kinde from the first beginning of it: so that even in the time of Ambrose onely Clearkes were Judges in Ecclesiasticall judgements. Which thing he himselfe complaineth of in these words: The old Synagoge (saith hee) and since that time the Church hath had Elders, without whose counsell nothing was done. Which by what negligence it is growne out of use I know not, unlesse peradventure by the slothfulnesse or rather the pride of the teachers, while while they alone would bee thought to be somewhat. We see how much the holy man is displeased, that any thing of the better state is decayed, when notwithstanding they had yet continuing an order that was at the least tolerable. What then would he doe if hee saw these deformed ruines that shew almost no signe of the old building? What bewailing would hee use? First, against law and right, the bishop hath claimed to himselfe alone, that which was given to the whole Church. For it is like as if the Consull, driving out the Senate, should take the Empire upon himselfe alone. But as he is above the rest in honour, so in the whole assembly in more authoritie than is one man. Therefore it was too wicked a deed, that one man, removing the common power to himselfe, hath both opened an entry to tyrannous lust, and hath taken from the Church that which belonged unto her, and hath suppressed and put away the assembly ordained by the Spirit of Christ.

The abuse of spirituall Courts.

7 But (as of one evill alway groweth another) Bishops disdaining it as a thing unworthy of their care, have committed it over to other. Hereupon are created Officials to serve that roome: I doe not yet speake what kinde of men they be, but onely this I say, that they nothing differ from prophane Iudges. And yet they still call it a spirituall jurisdiction, where men contend about nothing but earthly matters. Although there were no more evill, with what face dare they call a brawling court the judgement of the Church? But there are monitions, there is excommunication. So verily they mocke with God. Doth a poore man owe a little money? he is cited: if he appeare, he is condemned. When hee is condemned, if hee doe not satisfie it, hee is monished: after the second monition they proceed one step toward excommunication: if hee appeare not, hee is monished to come and yeeld himselfe to judgement: if he then make delay, he is monished, and by and by excommunicate. I beseech you, what is there any thing like either to the institution of Christ, or to the ancient manner, or to an Ecclesiasticall order? But there is also correction of vices. But how? verily they not onely suffer but with secret allowance doe after a certaine manner cherish and confirme adulteries, wantonnesse, drunkennesse and such kinde of mischievous doings: and that not onely in the common people, but also in the Cleargie themselves. Of many they call a few before them, either that they should not seeme slothfull in winking at them, or that they may milke out some money. I speake not of the pillages, robberies, briberies, and sacriledges that are gathered thereby, I speake not what manner of men are for the most part chosen to this office. This is enough and too much, that when the Romanists doe boast that there jurisdiction is spirituall, it is easie to shew that there is nothing more contrarie to the order institute by Christ, and that it hath no more likenesse to the ancient custome than darknesse hath to light.

Spirituall power abused, & still usurped by the Pope.

8 Although wee have not spoken all things that might bee alleadged for this purpose, and those things that wee have spoken of, are knit up in few words: yet I trust that wee have so sought it out, that there is now no more cause why any man should doubt, that the spirituall power whereof the Pope with all his kingdome proudly glorieth, is wicked against God, and an unjust tyrannie over his people. Under the name of spirituall power I comprehend both boldnesse in framing new doctrines, wherewith they have turned away the silly people from the naturall pureness of the word of God, and the wicked traditions wherewith they have snared them, and also the false Ecclesiasticall jurisdiction which they execute by Suffrages and Officials. For if wee grant unto Christ a kingdome among us, it is not possible but that all this kinde of dominion must immediately bee overthrowne and fall downe. As for the power of the sword which they also give to themselves, because it is not exercised upon consciences, it pertaineth not to our present purpose to entreat of it. In which behalfe yet it is also to note, that they be alway like themselves, verily nothing lesse than that which they would bee taken for, that is to say, Pastors of the Church. Neither doe I blame the peculiar faults of men, but the common wickednesse of the whole order, yea the very pestilence of the order: forasmuch as it is thought that the same should be maimed, unlesse it be gloriously set forth with wealth and proud titles. If we require the authoritie of Christ concerning this matter, it is no doubt but that his minde was to debar the ministers of his word from civill dominion and earthly government, when he hee said. The Kings of the Gentiles beare rule over them: but you shall not [illegible] signifieth not onely that the office of a Pastor is distinct from the office of a [illegible] that they be things so severed, that they cannot meete together in one man. For [illegible] as Moses did beare both the offices together: First that was done by a [illegible] against; it was but for a time till things were better set in order. But when a certaine forme was once prescribed of God, the civill government was left unto him, and hee was commanded to resigne the Priesthood to his brother. And worthily. For it is above nature, that one man should suffice to beare both burdens. And this hath in all ages beene diligently observed in the Church. And there was never any of the Bishops, so long as the true forme of the Church endured, that once thought of usurping the power of the sword: so that this was a common Proverbe in the time of Ambrose, that Emperors rather coveted the Priesthood, than Priests the Empire. For this which hee afterward saith, was imprinted in the mindes of all men, that Palaces pertained to the Emperor, and Churches to the Priest.

Exod.18.16.

Hom. de Basilic. traden.

Neither honorable for the Church, nor if performance of duty be respected profitable, for Romish Prelates to be both Bishops and Kings.

9 But since that a way hath beene devised, whereby Bishops might hold the title, honour and riches of their office without burden or care: least they should be left altogether idle, the power of the sword was given them, or rather they did by usurpation take it upon themselves. By what colour will they defend this shamelesnesse? Was this the duty of Bishops to wrap themselves with judiciall hearing of causes, with the governments of Cities and Provinces, and through large circuits to meddle in busines so unpertaining to them: which have so much worke and businesse in their owne office, that if they were wholy and continually occupied in it, and were withdrawne with no callings away from it, yet they were scarcely able to satisfie it? But (such is their waiwardnesse) they sticke not to boast, that by this meane the Church doth florish according to her worthinesse, and that they themselves in the meane time are not too much drawne away from the duties of their vocation. As touching the first point: if this be a comely ornament of the holy office, that they be advanced to such height, that the highest Monarches may stand in feare of them: then they have cause to quarrell with Christ, which hath in such sort grievously pinched their honor. For, at least in their opinion what could have beene spoken more dishonorably than those words: The Kings of the Gentiles and Princes beare rule over them, but you shall not so? And yet he laid no harder Law upon his servants than he first laid and received upon himselfe. Who (saith he) hath made me a Iudge or divider among you? We see that hee plainly putteth away from himselfe the office of Iudging, which he would not doe if it were a thing agreeing with his office: will not the servants suffer themselves to bee brought into that order, whereunto the Lord hath yeelded himselfe subiect? As for the other point, I would to God they could so prove it in experience as it is easie to speake it. But forasmuch as the Apostles thought it not good, to leave the word of God and minister at tables: thereby, because they will not be taught, they are convinced, that it is not all one mans worke to be both a good Bishop and a good Prince. For if they (which according to the largenesse of the gifts wherewith they were endued, were able to satisfie moe and greater cares than any men that have beene borne since them) have yet confessed that they cannot at once apply the ministerie both of the word and of tables, but that they should faint under the burden: how could these that be men of no valour in comparison of the Apostles a hundred fold excell the industrie of the Apostles? Truly, to attempt it was a point of most shamelesse and too presumptuous boldnesse: yet we see that it hath beene attempted: but with what successe, it is evident. For it could not otherwise come to passe, but that forsaking their owne office they should remove into other mens charge.

Mat.20.25. Luke 22.25. Luke 12.14.

Act.6.2.

The steps and occasions whereby Romish Bishops have risen unto more than convenient power.

10 And it is no doubt but that of small beginning they have by little and little growne to so great increases. For it was not possible that they should at the first step climbe up so high. But sometime with subtletie and crooked craftie meanes they privily advanced themselves, so as no man could foresee that it would come to passe till it was done: sometime when occasion served they did by terror, and threatnings wring from Princes some augmentation of their power: sometime when they saw Princes not hard laced to give, they abused their fond and unadvised gentlenesse. In old time if any controverſie hapned, the godly to eſcape the neceſſitie of going to law, committed the arbitrement to the Biſhop, becauſe they doubted not his uprightneſſe. With ſuch arbitrements the old Biſhops were oftentimes encombred, which indeed greatly diſpleaſed them (as Auguſtine in one place teſtifieth) but leaſt the parties ſhould runne to contentious lawing, they did though againſt their willes take that encumbrance upon them. Theſe men have of voluntarie arbitrements, which were altogether differing from the noiſe of judiciall courts, made an ordinarie juriſdiction. In a little while after, when cities and countries were troubled with divers hard diſtreſſes, they reſorted to the protection of Biſhops, to be ſafegarded by their faithfull ſuccour: the Biſhops by marvellous ſubtlety, of protectors made themſelves Lords. Yea, and it cannot be denied that they have gotten the poſſeſſion of a great part by violent ſeditious partakings. As for the Princes, that willingly gave juriſdiction to Biſhops, they were by divers affections moved thereunto. But admitting that their gentleneſſe had ſome ſhew of godlineſſe: yet with this their wrongfull liberalitie, they did not very well provide for the profit of the Church, whoſe ancient and true diſcipline they have ſo corrupted, yea (to ſay truth) have utterly aboliſhed. But thoſe Biſhops that have abuſed ſuch goodneſſe of Princes to their owne commoditie, have by ſhewing of this one example enough and too much teſtified that they are not Biſhops. For if they had had any ſparkle of an Apoſtolike ſpirit, they would without doubt have anſwered out of the mouth of Paul: the weapons of our warfare are not carnall, but ſpirituall. But they being raviſhed with blinde greedineſſe, have deſtroied both themſelves, their ſucceſſors, and the Church.

11 At length the Biſhop of Rome not contented with meane Lordſhips, firſt laid hand upon kingdomes, and afterward upon the very Empire. And that he may with ſome colour whatſoever it be, retaine the poſſeſſion gotten by meere robberie, he ſometime boaſteth that hee hath it by the law of God, he ſometime pretendeth the gift of Conſtantine, ſometime ſome other title. Firſt I anſwer with Bernard. Admit that he doe by any other reaſon whatſoever, claime this unto him, yet he hath it not by apoſtolike right. For Peter could not give that which he had not: but hee gave to his ſucceſſors that which hee had, the care of Churches. But when the Lord and maſter ſaith, that hee is not appointed iudge betweene two, a ſervant and ſcholler ought not to thinke ſcorne if he be not judge of all men. But Bernard ſpeaketh of civill iudgements. For he addeth: Therefore your power is in crimes, not in poſſeſſions: becauſe for thoſe and not for theſe yee have received the keies of the kingdome of heaven. For which ſeemeth to thee the greater dignitie to forgive ſinnes, or to divide lands? There is no compariſon. Theſe baſe and earthly things have Kings and Princes of the earth their judges. Why doe yee invade the bounds of other? &c. Againe, Thou art made a ſuperiour: (hee ſpeaketh of Pope Eugenius) but whereunto? Not to beare Lordſhip, I thinke. Therefore how much ſoever we thinke of our ſelves, let us remember that there is a miniſterie laid upon us, not a Lordſhip given us. Learne that thou haſt need of a weed-hooke, not of a ſcepter, that thou maiſt doe the worke of a Prophet. Againe, it is plaine: Lordſhip is forbidden to the Apoſtles. Goe thou therfore, and preſume to uſurpe to thy ſelfe either being a Lord, an Apoſtleſhip: or being an Apoſtle, a Lordſhip. And by and by after: the forme of an Apoſtleſhip is this, Lordſhip is forbidden them, miniſtery is bidden them. Whereas theſe things are ſo ſpoken by that man, that it is evident to all men that the very truth it ſelfe ſpeaketh to them, yea whereas the very thing it ſelfe is manifeſt without all words: yet the Biſhop of Rome was not aſhamed in the Councell at Orleance to decree that the ſupreme power of both the ſwords belong to him in the law of God.

The ſhifts which the Biſhops of Rome uſeth to hold the power which by robbery h hath gotten.

12 As for the gift of Conſtantine, they that be but meanely practiſed in the hiſtories of thoſe times need not to be taught how much this is not onely fabulous, but alſo to bee laughed at. But to paſſe over hiſtories, Gregory himſelfe is both a ſufficient and moſt full witneſſe hereof. For ſo oft as hee ſpeaketh of the Emperour, he calleth him moſt noble Lord, & himſelfe his unworthy ſervant. them, that he alſo give them due reverence. Wee ſee how in common ſubjection hee would be accounted as one of the people. For he there pleadeth not any other mans cauſe but his owne. In another place, I truſt in the almightie God, that he will give a long life to our godly Lords, and will diſpoſe us under your hand according to his mercy. Neither have I therefore alleadged theſe things, for that it is my purpoſe throughly to diſcuſſe this queſtion concerning the gift of Conſtantine: but onely that the Readers ſhould ſee by the way how childiſhly the Romaniſts doe lie, when they goe about to challenge an earthly Empire to their Biſhop. And ſo much the more foule is the ſhameleſneſſe of Auguſtine Steuchus, which in ſuch a deſpaired cauſe hath beene ſo bold to ſell his travell and tongue to the Biſhop of Rome. Valla (as it was not heard for a man learned and of a ſharpe wit) had ſtrongly confuted that fable. And yet (as a man little exerciſed in eccleſiaſticall matters) hee had not ſaid all that might have made for that purpoſe. Steuchus burſt in, and ſcattered ſtinking trifles to overpreſſe the cleere light. And truly he doth no leſſe coldly handle the cauſe of his maſter, than if ſome merrie conceited fellow faining himſelfe to doe the ſame, would indeed take Vallas part. But verily it is a worthie cauſe, for which the Pope ſhould hire ſuch patrons for money: and no leſſe worthy are thoſe hired loſels to be deceived of their hope of gaine, as it hapned to Eugubinus.

The time when the Pope began firſt to overtop the Emperour.

13 But if any man require to know the time, ſince his fained Empire began to riſe up, there are not yet paſſed five hundred yeeres, ſince the Biſhops yet remained in ſubiection of the Princes, neither was the Pope created without authoritie of the Emperour. The Emperour Henry the fourth of that name, a light and raſh man, and of no forecaſt, of great boldneſſe and diſſolute life, gave firſt occaſion to Gregory the ſeventh to alter this order. For when he had in his court the Biſhopricks of all Germany partly to be ſold, and partly laid open for ſpoile: Hildebrand, which had received diſpleaſure at his hand, caught hold of a goodly colour to revenge himſelfe. But becauſe hee ſeemed to purſue an honeſt and godly cauſe, hee was furthered with the favour of many. And Henry was otherwiſe, by reaſon of his inſolent manner of governing, hated of the moſt part of Princes. At the length Hildebrand, which called himſelfe Gregory the ſeventh, as he was a filthie and naughtie man, bewraied the malice of his heart: which was the cauſe that hee was forſaken of many that had conſpired with him. But he thus much prevailed, that his ſucceſſors might freely without puniſhment not onely ſhake off the yoke, but alſo bring the Emperours in ſubjection to them. Hereunto was added that from thence forth there were many Emperors liker to Henry than to Julius Cæſar: whom it was no hard thing to ſubdue, while they ſate at home careleſſe of all things and ſlothfull, when they had moſt need with vertue and lawfull meanes to repreſſe the greedineſſe of the Biſhops. Thus wee ſee with what colour that ſame godly gift of Conſtantine is ſhadowed, wherby the Pope faineth that the Empire of the Weſt was delivered unto him.

The violent meanes whereby the power of the Pope hath grown Reg. lib 4. ca. 8.

14 In the meane time the Popes ceaſed not, ſometime with fraud, ſometime with treaſon, and ſometime with force to invade other mens dominions: and the very citie it ſelfe, which before was free, within a hundred and thirtie yeeres, or there about they brought into their ſubjection, till they grew to the ſame power which they have at this day: and for the obtaining or encreaſing whereof, they have ſo troubled Chriſtendome by the ſpace of two hundred yeeres, (for they began before that they tooke to them the dominion of the citie) that they have almoſt deſtroied it. In the old time when under Gregorie the keepers of the goods of the Church, did take poſſeſſion of the lands which they reckoned to belong to the Church, and after the manner, of the ſeaſing to the uſe of the Prince, did ſet titles upon them for token of claime. Gregory aſſembling a Councell of Biſhops, inveighing ſore againſt that prophane manner, asked whether they did not judge that Clerke accurſed which did of his own will by writing of any title attempt to enter upon any poſſeſſion. They all pronounced accurſed. If to claime a peece of ground by writing of a title be in a Clearke an offence worthie of accurſing: when whole two hundred yeeres together Popes doe practiſe nothing elſe but battels, ſhedding of blood, deſtructions of armies, ſackings of ſome cities, racing of other, overthrowes of nations, waſtings of kingdomes, onely that they might catch catch hold of other mens poſſeſſions: what curſings can bee enough to puniſh ſuch examples? Truly it is very plaine that they ſeeke nothing leſſe than the glorie of Chriſt. For if they of their owne will doe wholy reſigne all the ſecular power that they have, therein is no danger to the glory of God, no danger to ſound doctrine, no danger to the ſafetie of the Church: but they are carried blinde and headlong with only greedineſſe of dominion: becauſe they thinke nothing ſafe, unleſſe they may beare rule with rigorouſneſſe (as the Prophet ſaith) and with power. Ezech. 34.4.

15 To juriſdiction is annexed immunitie, which the Romiſh Cleargie tooke to themſelves. For they thinke it againſt their dignitie, if they anſwer in perſonall cauſes before a temporall judge: and therein they thinke both the libertie and dignitie of the Church to conſiſt, if they bee exempt from common judgement and lawes. But the old Biſhops, which otherwiſe were moſt rigorous in defending the right of the Church, judged themſelves and their order to be nothing hurt, if they were ſubject to them. And the godly Emperours, without gainſaying of any man, did alway call Clearkes to their judgement ſeats ſo oft as neede required. For thus ſaith Conſtantine in his Epiſtle to the Nicomedians: If any of the Biſhops ſhall undiſcreetely diſorder himſelfe, his boldneſſe ſhall be reſtrained by the execution of the miniſter of God, that is by my execution. And Valentinian ſaith: Good Biſhops doe not ſpeake againſt the power of the Emperour, but doe ſincerely both keepe the commandements of God their great King, and alſo obey our lawes. At that time all men were perſwaded of this without controverſie. But Eccleſiaſticall cauſes were referred to the judgement of the Biſhop. As if any Clearke had offended nothing againſt the lawes, but onely was accuſed by the Canons: hee was not cited to the common judgement ſeate, but in that cauſe had the Biſhop for his judge. Likewiſe if there were a queſtion of Faith in controverſie, or ſuch a matter as properly pertained to the Church, the judgement thereof was committed to the Church. So is that to be underſtanded, which Ambroſe writeth to Valentinian: Your father of honourable memorie, not onely anſwered in word, but alſo decreed by lawes, that in a cauſe of Faith he ought to be judge that is neither unfit in office nor unlike in right. Againe: If we have regard to the Scriptures, or old examples, who is there that can denie that in a cauſe of Faith, in a cauſe (I ſay) of Faith, Biſhops are wont to judge of Chriſtian Emperours, and not Emperours of Biſhops? Againe: I would have come, O Emperour, to your conſiſtorie, if either the Biſhops or the people would have ſuffred me to goe: ſaying, that the cauſe of Faith ought to be debated in the Church before the people. Hee affirmeth verily that a ſpirituall cauſe, that is to ſay, the cauſe of religion, ought not to bee drawne into the temporall court where prophane cauſes are pleaded. Worthily doe all men praiſe his conſtancie in this behalfe. And yet in a good cauſe hee proceedeth but thus farre, that if it come to violence and ſtrong hand, hee ſaith that hee will give place. Willingly (ſaith he) I will not forſake the place committed unto me: but when I am enforced, I know not how to reſiſt: for our armour are prayers and teares. Let us note the ſingular modeſtie and wiſedome of the holy man, joyned with ſtoutneſſe of courage and boldneſſe. Juſtina the Emperours mother, becauſe ſhe could not drawe him to the Arrians ſide, practiſed to drive him from the government of the Church. And ſo ſhould it have come to paſſe, if hee had come when hee was called to the palace to pleade his cauſe. Therefore hee denieth the Emperour to bee a competent judge of ſo great a controverſie. Which manner of doing both the neceſſitie of that time, and the continuall nature of the matter required. For hee judged that hee ought rather to die, than that ſuch an example ſhould by his conſent bee given to poſteritie: and yet if violence be offred, hee thinketh not of reſiſtance. For hee denieth it to bee Biſhoprike, to defend the Faith and right of the Church with armes. But in other cauſes he ſheweth himſelfe readie to doe whatſoever the Emperour ſhall commaund him. If hee demand tribute (ſaith he) we denie it not: the lands of the Church doe pay tribute. If he aske lands hee hath power to claime them, none of us reſiſteth. After the ſame manner alſo ſpeaketh Gregorie: I am not ignorant (ſaith hee) of the minde of our moſt noble ſoveraigne Lord, that hee uſeth not to intermeddle in cauſes pertaining to Prieſts, leaſt he ſhould in any thing bee burdened with our ſinnes. Hee doth not generally exclude the Emperour from judging of Priests: but he saith that there be certaine causes, which he ought to leave to the judgement of the Church.

The immunitie of Romish cleargie men from secular courts in the time of Gregorie not stood upon.

16 And by this very exception the holy men sought nothing else, but that Princes lesse zealous of religion should not with tyrannous violence and wilfulnesse interrupt the Church in doing her office. For neither did they disallow, if Princes sometime did use their authoritie in Ecclesiasticall matters, so that it were done to preserve the order of the Church, not to trouble it, to stablish discipline, not to dissolve it. For sith the Church hath not the power of compelling, nor ought to require it (I speake of civill constraining:) it is the office of godly Kings and Princes to maintaine religion with laws proclamations, and judiciall proceedings. After this manner, when the Emperour Maurice had commanded certaine Bishops that they should receive their fellow Bishops that were neighbours and driven out of the barbarous nations: Gregorie confirmeth that commandement, and exhorteth them to obey it. And when hee himselfe is admonished by the same Emperour to come to attonement with John the Bishop of Constantinople, he doth indeed render a reason why he ought not to be blamed: yet he doth not boast of immunitie from the secular Court, but rather promiseth that hee will be obedient, so farre as his conscience will give him leave: and therewithall he saith this, that Maurice did as became a godly Prince, when hee gave such commandements to the Priests.

THE TVVELFTH CHAPTER.

Of the discipline of the Church, whereof the chiefe use is in the censures and excommunication.

The necessity of discipline in the Church.

THE discipline of the Church, the entreating whereof wee have deferred unto this place, is briefly to bee declared, that we may at length passe over to the rest. But that same for the most part hangeth upon the power of the keyes and spirituall jurisdiction. That this may bee the more easily understood, let us divide the Church into two principall degrees, that is to say the Cleargie, and the people. Clearkes I call by the usuall name those that execute publike ministerie in the Church. First we will speake of common discipline, to which all ought to bee subject: then we will come to the Cleargie, which beside that common discipline, have a severall discipline by themselves. But because many for hatred of discipline doe abhorre the very name thereof, let them heare this: If no fellowship, yea no house, though it have but a small household, can be kept in right state without discipline, the same is much more necessarie in the Church, whose state ought to be most orderly of all. Therefore as the doctrine of Christ which bringeth salvation, is the soule of the Church, so discipline is in steede of sinewes therein: whereby it is brought to passe, that the members of the body hang together every one in his fit place. Wherefore whosoever doe either desire to have discipline taken away, or hinder the restoring thereof, whether they doe it of set purpose or by unadvisednesse, verily they seeke the extreme dissipation of the Church. For what shall be tide, if what is lustfull be lawfull to every man? But so would it be, if there were not with the preaching of doctrine adjoyned private admonishments, corrections, and such other helpes which sustaine doctrine and suffer it not to be idle: discipline therefore is as it were a bridle wherewith they may be holden backe and tamed, which coltishly resist againe Christ: or as it were a pricke, wherewith they that are not willing enough may be stirred up: and sometime, as a fatherly rodde, wherewith they which have more grievously fallen, may be chastised mercifully and according to the mildenesse of the spirit of Christ. Sith therefore wee doe now see at hand certaine beginnings of a horrible wastnesse in the Church, because there is no care nor order to keepe the people in awe, very necessitie crieth out that there is neede of remedie. But this is the onely remedie, which both Christ hath commanded, and hath alway beene used among the godly.

The use of admonition towards them that be offenders.

2 The first foundation of discipline is, that private monitions should have place: that is to say, that if any man of his owne accord doe not his dutie, if he behave himselfe licentiously, or live not honestly, or have committed any thing worthie of blame, blame, hee ſhould ſuffer himſelfe to bee admoniſhed: and that every man ſhould ſtudie to admoniſh his brother when occaſion ſhall require. But ſpecially let the Paſtors and Prieſts bee watchfull to doe this, whoſe office is not onely to preach to the people, but in every houſe to admoniſh and exhort if at any time they doe not ſufficiently prevaile by generall doctrine: as Paul teacheth, when he rehearſeth that hee taught privately and in houſes, and proteſteth that he is cleane from the blood of all men, becauſe hee hath not ceaſed with teares day and night to admoniſh every one. For doctrine doth then obtaine force and authoritie, when the miniſter not onely doth declare to all together what their dutie is to Chriſt, but alſo hath power and order to require the keeping thereof of them whom hee marketh to be either not obedient to doctrine, or ſlothfull. If any man doe either ſtubbornly refuſe, or in going forward in his faults, doe deſpiſe ſuch admoniſhments: when hee hath beene the ſecond time admoniſhed with witneſſes called to it, Chriſt commandeth them to be called to the judgement of the Church, which is the aſſemblie of Elders: and that there they ſhould be more grievouſly admoniſhed as it were by publike authority, that if he reverence the Church he may ſubmit himſelfe and obey. But if hee be not hereby ſubdued, but doe continue in his wickedneſſe, then hee commandeth him, as a deſpiſer of the Church, to be put away from the fellowſhip of the faithfull.

Act. 20. 20. & 26.

Math. 18. 15. & 17.

3 But becauſe hee ſpeaketh here onely of ſecret faults, we muſt make this diviſion: that ſome ſinnes bee private, and ſome publike or openly manifeſt. Of the firſt ſort Chriſt ſaith to everie private man, Reprove him betweene thee and him alone. Of manifeſt ſinnes, Paul ſaith to Timothie. Reprove him before all men, that the reſt may have feare. For Chriſt had ſaid before, If thy brother have offended againſt thee. Which words (againſt thee) unleſſe thou wilt bee contentious, thou canſt not otherwiſe underſtand than under thine owne ſecret knowledge, ſo that there bee no moe privie to it. But the ſame thing which the Apoſtle teacheth Timothie concerning the rebuking of them openly that ſinne openly, hee himſelfe followed in Peter. For when Peter ſinned even to publike offence, he did not admoniſh him apart by himſelfe, but brought him forth into the ſight of the Church. Therefore this ſhall be the right order of doing, if in ſecret faults we goe forward according to thoſe degrees that Chriſt hath ſet: but in manifeſt faults, wee immediately proceed to the Churches ſolemne rebuking, if the offence be publike.

The difference of dealing in faults ſecretly and in faults openly committed.

Mat. 18. 15. 1 Tim. 5. 22.

Gal. 2. 14.

4 Let this alſo be another diſtinction: that of ſinnes ſome be defaults, other ſome be wicked doings, or hainous offences. To the correcting of this latter ſort, not onely admoniſhment or rebuking is to bee uſed, but alſo a ſevere remedie: as Paul ſheweth which not onely chaſtiſed with word the Corinthian that had committed inceſt, but alſo puniſhed him with excommunication, ſo ſoone as hee was certified of his wicked deed. Now therefore wee begin better to ſee how the ſpirituall juriſdiction of the Church: which puniſheth ſinnes according to the word of the Lord, is the beſt maintenance of health, and foundation of order, and bond of unitie. Therefore when the Church doth baniſh out of her company manifeſt adulterers, whoremongers, theeves, robbers, ſeditious perſons, perjured men, falſe witneſſes, and ſuch other, againe, obſtinate men, which being orderly admoniſhed even of ſmall faults doe ſcorne God and his judgement, ſhe taketh nothing upon herſelfe without reaſon, but executeth the juriſdiction given her of the Lord. Moreover, that none ſhould deſpiſe ſuch judgement of the Church, or lightly regard that hee is condemned by the conſenting voices of the faithfull: the Lord hath teſtified, that the ſame is nothing elſe but a pronouncing of his owne ſentence, and that whatſoever they doe in earth is confirmed in heaven. For they have the word of the Lord, whereby they may condemne the froward: they have the word, whereby they may receive the repentant into favour. They I ſay that truſt that without this bond of diſcipline Churches may long ſtand, are deceived in opinion: unleſſe perhaps wee may want that helpe which the Lord foreſaw that it ſhould be neceſſarie for us. And truly how great is the neceſſitie thereof, ſhall bee better perceived by the manifold uſe of it.

Not one and the ſame proceeding againſt meane, and hainous offenders.

1 Cor. 5. 4.

Matt. 16. 19. and 18. 18. Joh. 20. 23.

5 There bee three ends which the Church hath reſpect unto in ſuch corrections and excommunication. The firſt is, that they ſhould not, to the diſhonour of God,

To what ends corrections and excommunications were ordained in the Church. Ephe. 5.25. Col. 1.24.

bee named among Christians, that lead a filthy and sinfull life, as though his holy Church were a conspiracie of naughty and wicked men. For sith the Church is the body of Christ, it cannot bee defiled with such filthy and rotten members, but that some shame must come to the head. Therefore that there should not bee any such thing in the Church, whereby his holy name may be spotted with any reproach, they are to be driven out of her household, by whose dishonesty any slander might redound to the name of Christians. And herein also is consideration to bee had of the Supper of the Lord, that it be not prophaned with giving it to all without choise. For it is most true, that he to whom the distribution of it is committed, if hee wittingly and willingly admit an unworthy man whom he might lawfully put backe, is as guilty of sacriledge, as if he did give abroad the Lords body to dogs. Wherefore Chrysostome grievously inveigheth against the Priests, which while they feare the power of great men, dare debar no man. The blood (saith he) shall be required at your hands. If ye feare man, hee shall laugh you to scorne: but if ye feare God, ye shall be reverenced also among men. Let us not feare maces, nor purple, nor crownes: we have here a great power. I verily will rather deliver mine owne body to death, and suffer my blood to bee shed, than I will bee made partaker of this defiling. Therefore lest this most holy mysterie bee spotted with slander, in the distributing thereof choise is greatly requisite: which yet cannot be had but by the jurisdiction of the Church. The second end is, lest (as it is wont to come to passe) with the continuall company of the evill, the good should be corrupted. For (such is our ready inclination to goe out of the way) there is nothing easier than for us to be led by evill examples from the right course of life. This use the Apostle touched, when hee commanded the Corinthians to put the incestuous man out of their company. A little leaven (saith he) corrupteth the whole lumpe of dough. And hee foresaw herein so great danger, that hee forbad him even from all fellowship. If any brother (saith he) among you be named either a whoremonger, or a covetous man, or a worshipper of Idols, or a drunkard, or an evill speaker, with such a one I grant you not leave so much as to eat. The third end is, that they themselves confounded with shame may begin to repent of their filthinesse. So it is profitable for them also to have their owne wickednesse chastised, that with feeling of the rod they may bee awaked, which otherwise by tender bearing with them would have become more obstinate. The same thing doth the Apostle meane when hee saith thus: If any doe not obey our doctrine, marke him, and keepe no company with him, that hee may be ashamed. Againe in another place, when he writeth that hee hath delivered the Corinthian to satan, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord: that is (as I expound it) that he went into a damnation for a time, that he might be saved for ever. But he therefore saith that hee delivereth him to Satan, because the divell is out of the Church as Christ is in the Church. For whereas some doe refer it to a certaine vexing of the flesh, I thinke that to be very uncertaine.

The manner of Ecclesiasticall correction.

6 When these ends bee set forth, now it remaineth to see how the Church executeth this part of discipline which consisteth in jurisdiction. First let us keepe the division above set, that of sins some bee publike, and other some be private or more secret. Publike are those that have not onely one or two witnesses, but are committed openly and with the offence of the whole Church. Secret I call those, not which are altogether hidden from men, as are the sinnes of hypocrites, for those come not into the judgement of the Church, but those of the meane kind which are not without witnesses, and yet are not publike. The first kind requireth not those degrees which Christ rehearseth: but when any such thing appeareth, the Church ought to doe her duty in calling the sinner and correcting him according to the proportion of the offence. In the second kind according to the rule of Christ, they come not to the Church till there be also obstinacie added. When it is once come to knowledge, than is that other division to be noted between wicked doings and defaults. For in lighter sinnes there is not to be used so great severity, but chastisement of words sufficeth, and the same gentle and fatherly, which may not harden nor confound the sinner, but bring him home to himselfe, that hee may more rejoice than bee sory that bee was corrected. But it is meet that hainous offences bee chastised with sharper remedy. For it is not enough, if he that that by doing a wicked deed of evill example hath grievously offended the Church, should be chastised onely with words, but hee ought for a time to bee deprived of the communion of the supper, till hee have given assurance of his repentance. For against the Corinthian Paul useth not onely rebuking of words, but driveth him out of the Church, and blameth the Corinthians that they had so long borne him. The old and better Church kept this order, when rightfull government flourished. For if any man had done any wicked deed whereupon was growne offence, first hee was commanded to abstaine from partaking of the holy supper, then both to humble himselfe before God, and to testifie his repentance before the Church. There were also certaine solemne usages, which were enjoined to them that had fallen, to be tokens of their repentance. When they had so done, that the Church was satisfied, then by laying on of hands hee was received into favour. Which receiving is oftentimes called of Cyprian peace, who also briefly describeth this usage. They doe penance (saith he) in a certaine full time: then they come to confession, and by the laying on of hands of the Bishop and the Clergie they receive power to come to the communion. Howbeit the Bishop and his Clergie had so the ruling of reconciliation, that they did therewithall require the consent of the people: as he sheweth in another place.

Epi. 2. lib. 7. Lib. 3. Epi. 14 & 16.

7 From this discipline there was no man exempted, that even the Princes together with the common people did submit themselves to beare it. And rightfully, sith it was evident that it was the discipline of Christ, to whom it is meet that all sceptres and crownes of Kings be submitted. So when Theodosius was deprived by Ambrose of power to come to the communion because of the slaughter committed at Thessalonica, hee threw downe all the roiall ornament wherewith hee was clothed: hee openly in the Church bewailed his sinne, which had crept upon him by fraud of other men: hee craved pardon with groning and teares. For great Kings ought not to thinke this to bee any dishonour to them, if they humbly throw downe themselves before Christ the King of Kings, neither ought it to displease them that they bee judged by the Church. For sith in their court they heare nothing else but meere flatteries, it is more then necessary for them to bee rebuked of the Lord by the mouth of the Priests. But rather they ought to wish, that the Priests should not spare them, that the Lord may spare them. In this place I omit to speake by whom this jurisdiction is to be exercised, because it is spoken of in another place. This only I adde that that is the lawfull manner of proceeding in excommunicating a man which Paul sheweth: if the Elders do it not only by themselves, but with the Church knowing and allowing it: that is, in such sort that the multitude of the people may not governe the doing, but may marke it as a witnesse and a keeper that nothing should bee done of a few by wilfull affection. But the whole manner of doing, beside the calling upon the name of God, ought to have such gravity, as may resemble the presence of Christ, that it may bee undoubted that he there sitteth for ruler of his owne judgement.

All men subject unto Church discipline, which to execute belongeth unto some, but unto all to see executed not as doers but as beholders of that which is done.

Ambros. in lib. 1. Epi. 3. in orat. habita in fun. Theodosii.

8 But this ought not to bee passed over, that such severity becommeth the Church as is joined with the spirit of mildnesse. For wee must alway diligently beware (as Paul teacheth) that hee which is punished bee not swallowed up of sorrow: for so should of a remedy be made a destruction. But out of the end may better bee gathered a rule of moderation. For whereas this is required in excommunication that the sinner should bee brought to repentance, and evill examples taken away, lest either the name of Christ should bee evill spoken of, or other men bee provoked to follow them: if we shall have an eie to these things, we shall be able easily to judge how far severity ought to proceed, and where it ought to end. Therefore when the sinner giveth a testimony of his repentance, and doth by his testimony as much as in him lieth, blot out the offence: hee is not to be enforced any further: but if he be enforced, rigorousnesse doth then exceed measure. In which behalfe the immeasurable severity of the old fathers cannot bee excused, which both disagreed from the prescribed order of the Lord, and also was marvellously dangerous. For when they charged a sinner with solemne penance, and deprivation from the holy communion sometime for seven yeeres, sometime foure yeeres, sometime three yeeres, sometime for their whole life: what other thing could follow thereof, but either great hypocrisie or most great desperation? Likewise wise whereas no man that had fallen the second time was admitted to second penance but was cast out of the Church even to the end of his life: that was neither profitable nor agreeing to reason. Therefore whosoever shall weigh the matter with sound judgement, shall herein perceive want of their discretion. Howbeit I doe here rather disallow the publike manner, than accuse all them that used it, whereas it is certaine that many of them misliked it: but they did therefore suffer it, because they could not amend it. Truly, Cyprian declareth, how much beside his owne will he was so rigorous. Our patience (saith he) and easines and gentlenesse is ready to them that come. I wish all to returne into the Church: I wish all our fellow souldiers to be inclosed within the tents of Christ and in the houses of God the Father. I forgive all things, I dissemble many things, for zeale and desire to gather brotherhood together, I examine not with full judgement those things that are committed against God, in pardoning defaults more than I ought, I am my selfe almost in default, I doe with ready and full love imbrace them that returne with repentance, confessing their sinnes with humble and plaine satisfaction. Chrysostome is somewhat harder, and yet he saith thus: If God bee so kind, why will his Priest seeme so rigorous? Moreover wee know what gentlenesse Augustine used toward the Donatists, insomuch that he sticked not to receive into Bishopricke those that had returned from schisme, even immediately after their repentance. But because a contrary order had growne in force, they were compelled to leave their owne judgement to follow it.

Men severed from the Church by excommunication not rashly to be condemned in the judgement of men.

9 But as this mildnesse is required in the whole body of the Church, that it should punish them that are fallen, mercifully and not to the extremity of rigour, but rather according to the precept of Paul, should confirme charity toward them: so every private man for himselfe ought to temper himselfe to this mercifulnesse and gentlenesse. Therefore it is not out part to wipe out of the number of the elect such as are driven out of the Church, or to despaire of them as though they were already lost. Wee may indeed judge them strangers from the Church, and therefore strangers from Christ: but that is only during the time that they abide in divorce. But if then also they shew a greater resemblance of stubbornesse than of gentlenesse, yet let us commit them to the judgement of the Lord, hoping better of them in time to come than we see in time present, and let us not therefore cease to pray to God for them, and (to comprehend all in one word) let us not condemne to death the person it selfe, which is in the hand and judgement of God alone, but let us rather weigh by the law of the Lord of what sort every mans works be. Which rule while we follow, we rather stand to the judgement of God than pronounce our owne. Let us not take to our selves more libertie in judging, unlesse we will binde the power of God within bounds, and appoint a law to his mercy, at whose pleasure when he thinketh it good, very evill men are turned into very good, strangers are graffed and forraines are chosen into the Church. And this the Lord doth, thereby to mocke out the opinion of men, and rebate their rashnesse: which if it be not restrained, presumeth to take to it selfe power of judging more than it ought.

The difference betweene excommunicating and accursing. Matt. 18. 18.

10 For whereas Christ promiseth that that shall be bound in heaven, which they that be his shall bind in earth, he limiteth the power of binding, to the censure of the Church: by which they that are excommunicate, are not throwne into everlasting ruine and damnation: but hearing their lives and manners to be condemned, they are also certified of their owne everlasting condemnation, unlesse they repent. For excommunication herein differeth from accursing, that accursing taking away all pardon doth condemne a man and adjudge him to eternall destruction: excommunication rather revengeth and punisheth manners. And though the same doe also punish the man, yet it doth so punish him, that in forewarning him of his damnation to come, it doth call him backe to salvation. If that be obtained, reconciliation and restoring to the communion is ready. But accursing is either very fildome or never in use. Therefore, although Ecclesiasticall discipline, permitteth not to live familiarly, or to have friendly conversation with them that bee excommunicate: yet we ought to endevour by such meanes as we may, that returning to amendment, they may returne to the fellowship and unity of the Church: as the Apostle also teacheth. Doe not (saith he)

he) thinke them as enemies, but correct them as brethren. Unleſſe this gentleneſſe be kept as well privately as in common, there is danger leſt from diſcipline wee forthwith fall to butchery. a Theſ. 3.15.

11 This alſo is principally required to the moderation of diſcipline, which Auguſtine intreateth of in diſputing againſt the Donatiſts: that neither private men, if they ſee faults not diligently enough corrected by the Councell of Elders, ſhould therefore by and by depart from the Church: nor the Paſtors themſelves, if they cannot according to their hearts deſire purge all things that neede amendment, ſhould therefore throw away the miniſtery, or with unwonted rigorouſneſſe trouble the whole Church. For it is moſt true which hee writeth: that he is free and diſcharged from curſe, whoſoever hee be that either by rebuking amendeth what hee can: or what hee cannot amend, excludeth, ſaving the bond of peace: or what hee cannot exclude, ſaving the bond of peace, he doth diſallow with equity, and beare with ſtedfaſtneſſe. He rendereth a reaſon thereof in another place: becauſe all godly order and manner of Eccleſiaſticall diſcipline ought alway to have reſpect unto the unity of the ſpirit in the bond of peace: which the Apoſtle commandeth to bee kept by our bearing one with another, and when it is not kept, the medicine of puniſhment beginneth to bee not only ſuperfluous, but alſo hurtfull, and therefore ceaſeth to be a medicine. He that (ſaith he) doth diligently thinke upon theſe things doth neither in preſerving of unity neglect the ſeverity of diſcipline, nor doth with immeaſurableneſſe of correction breake the bond of fellowſhip. Hee granteth indeed that not only the Paſtors ought to travaile to this point, that there may remaine no fault in the Church, but alſo that every man ought to his power to endeavour thereunto: and hee plainly declareth that hee which neglecteth to moniſh, rebuke, and correct the evill, although hee doe not favour them, nor ſinne with them, yet is guilty before the Lord. But if hee be in ſuch degree, that he may alſo ſever them from the partaking of Sacraments, and doth it not, now hee ſinneth not by anothers evill, but by his owne. Only he willeth it to be done, with uſing of diſcretion, which the Lord alſo requireth, leſt while the tares be in rooting out, the corne be hurt. Hereupon he gathereth out of Cyprian, Let a man therefore mercifully correct what he can: and what hee cannot, let him patiently ſuffer, and with love grone and lament it.

Mat. 13. 29.

12 This he ſaith becauſe of the preciſeneſſe of the Donatiſts, who when they ſaw faults in the Churches which the Biſhops did indeed rebuke with words, but not puniſh with excommunication, (becauſe they thought that they could this way nothing prevaile) did ſharply inveigh againſt the Biſhops as betrayers of diſcipline, and did with an ungodly ſchiſme devide themſelves from the flocke of Chriſt. As the Anabaptiſts doe at this day, which when they acknowledge no congregation to bee of Chriſt, unleſſe it doe in every point ſhine with Angelike perfection, doe under pretence of their zeale overthrow all edification. Such (ſaith Auguſtine) not for hatred of other mens wickedneſſes, but for deſire to maintaine their owne contentions, doe covet either wholly to drawaway, or at leſt to devide the weake people ſnared with the boaſting of their name: they ſwelling with pride, mad with ſtubborneſſe, traiterous with ſlanders, troubleſome with ſeditions, leſt it ſhould openly appeare that they want the light of truth, doe pretend a ſhadow of rigorous ſeverity: and thoſe things which in Scripture are commanded to bee done with moderate healing for correcting of the faults of brethren, preſerving the ſincereneſſe of love, and keeping the unity of peace, they abuſe to ſacriledge of ſchiſme and occaſion of cutting off. So doth Satan transforme himſelfe into an Angell of light, when by occaſion as it were of juſt ſeverity hee perſwadeth unmercifull cruelty, coveting nothing elſe but to corrupt and breake the bond of peace and unity: which bond remaining faſt among Chriſtians, all his forces are made weake to hurt, his traps of treaſons are broken, and his councels of overthrowing doe vaniſh away.

2 Cor. 11. 13.

13 This one thing hee chiefly commendeth, that if the infection of ſinne have entred into the whole multitude, then the ſevere mercy of lively diſcipline is neceſſary. For (ſaith he) the deviſes of ſeparation are vaine, and hurtfull and full of ſacriledge, becauſe they are ungodly and proud, and doe more trouble the weake good ones, than they they amend the stout evill ones. And that which he there teacheth other, hee himselfe also faithfully followed. For writing to Aurelius Bishop of Carthage, he complaineth that drunkennesse which is so sore condemned in Scriptures, doth range unpunished in Affrica: and he adviseth him, that assembling a Councell of Bishops hee should provide remedy for it. Hee addeth by and by after, These things (as I thinke) are taken away not roughly, not hardly, not after an imperious manner, but more by teaching than by commanding, more by admonishing than by threatning. For so must wee deale with a multitude of sinners, but severity is to be exercised upon the sinnes of few. Yet hee doth not meane that Bishops should therefore winke or hold their peace at publike faults, because they cannot severely punish them: as hee himselfe afterward expoundeth it: But hee willeth that the measure of correction bee so tempered, that so far as may be, it may rather bring health than destruction to the body. And therefore at length hee concludeth thus: Wherefore both this commandement of the Apostle is in no wise to bee neglected, to sever the evill, when it may bee done without perill of breaking of peace: and this is also to be kept, that bearing one with another, we should endeavour to preserve unity of the spirit, in the bond of peace.

1 Cor. 5. 7. Ephes. 4. 2.

The use of exhortation to publike exercises of humility in the Church.

14 The part that remaineth of discipline, which properly is not contained in the power of keyes, standeth in this, that according to the necessity of times the Pastors should exhort the people either to fasting, or to common supplications, or to other exercises of humility, repentance, and faith, of which things there is neither time, nor measure, nor forme prescribed by the word of God, but is left in the judgement of the Church. The observing of this part also, as it is profitable, so hath alway been used of the old Church even from the very Apostles. Howbeit the Apostles themselves were not the first authors of them, but they tooke example out of the law and the Prophets. For wee see that there so oft as any waighty businesse hapned, the people were called together, common prayers enjoyned, and fasting commanded. Therefore the Apostles followed that which both was not new to the people of God, and they foresaw that it should be profitable. Likewise is to be thought of other exercises, wherewith the people may either bee stirred up to their duty, or bee kept in awe and obedience. There are examples each where in holy histories, which we need not to gather together. In summe this is to be holden, that so oft as there hapneth any controversie of religion, which must be determined either by a Synod or by Ecclesiasticall judgement, so oft as they be about choosing of a minister, finally, so oft as any hard matter or of great importance is in doing: againe, when there appeare tokens of the wrath of God, as pestilence, and war, and famine: this is a holy ordinance and profitable for all ages that the Pastors should exhort the people to common fasting, and to extraordinary prayer. If any man doe not allow the testimonies which may be alleadged out of the old Testament, as though they were not meet for the Christian Church, it is certaine that the Apostles also did the same. Howbeit of prayers I thinke there will scarcely any bee found that will move any question. Therefore let us say somewhat of fasting: because many when they understand not what profit it hath, doe judge it not so necessary: some also doe utterly refuse it as superfluous: and when the use of it is not well knowne, it is easie to slide into superstition.

A triple use of fasting.

15 Holy and true fasting hath three ends. For wee use it, either to make leane and subdue the flesh, that it should not wax wanton, or that we may be better disposed to prayers and holy meditations, or that it should be a testimony of our humbling before God, when wee be willing to confesse our guiltinesse before him. The first end hath not so often place in common fasting, because all men have not like estate of bodie, nor like health: therefore it rather agreeth with private fasting. The second end is common to both, for as well the whole Church as every one of the faithfull hath need of such preparation to prayer. The third also is likewise common. For it shall sometime befall that God shall strike some nation with war, or pestilence, or with some calamity. In such a common scourge the whole people must accuse themselves, and openly confesse their owne guiltinesse. But if the hand of the Lord doe strike any private man, he ought to doe the same, either alone, or with his owne family. That standeth chiefly in the affection of the mind. But when the mind is affected as it ought to be, it is ſcarcely poſſible, but that it will breake out into outward teſtifying: and then chiefly if it turne to common edifying, that altogether in openly confeſſing their ſinne ſhould yeeld praiſe of righteouſneſſe to God, and every one mutually exhort other with their example.

16 Wherefore faſting, as it is a ſigne of humbling, hath more often uſe publikely, than among private men, howſoever it be common, as is already ſaid. Therefore as touching the diſcipline whereof we now intreat: ſo oft as we muſt make ſupplication to God for any great matter, it were expedient to command faſting together with praier. So when the Antiochians laid hands upon Paul and Barnabas, that they might the better commend to God their miniſterie which was of ſo great importance, they joined faſting with praier: So both they afterward, when they made miniſters over Churches, were wont to pray with faſting. In this kind of faſting they had regard to none other thing, but that they might be made freſher and more uncombred to pray. Verily this we find by experience, that when the belly is full, the mind is not ſo lifted up to God, that it can both with hearty and fervent affection bee carried to praier, and continue in it. So is that to be underſtood which Luke rehearſeth of Anna, that ſhee ſerved the Lord in faſtings and prayers. For hee doth not ſet the worſhipping of God in faſting: but ſignifieth that the holy woman did after that manner exerciſe her ſelfe to continuance of prayer. Such was the faſting of Nehemias when he did with earneſtly bent zeale pray to God for the deliverance of his people. For this cauſe Paul ſaith that the faithfull doe well, if they abſtaine for a time from their wedding bed, that they may the more freely apply praier and faſting. Where joining faſting to praier in ſtead of a helpe, he putteth us in mind that it is of no value but ſo far as it is referred to this end. Againe, when in the ſame place hee giveth a rule to married folkes, that they ſhould mutually render good will one to another, it is plaine that he doth not ſpeake of daily praiers, but of ſuch praiers as require a more earneſt intentiveneſſe.

17 Againe, if either peſtilence, or famine, or war begin to range abroad, or if any calamity otherwiſe ſeeme to hang over any country and people: then alſo it is the duty of Paſtors to exhort the Church to faſting, that they may humbly beſeech the Lord to turne away his wrath. For hee giveth warning that hee is prepared and in a manner armed to revenge, when he maketh any danger to appeare. Therefore as accuſed men in time paſt with long hanging beard, with uncombed haire, with black array, were wont humbly to abaſe themſelves, to procure the mercy of the judge: ſo when we are accuſed before the judgement ſeat of God, it behooveth both for his glory, and for common edification, and alſo is profitable and healthfull for us, that wee ſhould in piteous array crave to eſcape his ſeverity. And that this was uſed among the people of Iſraell, it is eaſie to gather by the words of Joel. For when he commandeth a trumpet to be ſounded, the congregation to be gathered together, faſting to be appointed, and the reſt that follow: he ſpeaketh of things received in common cuſtome. Hee had a little before ſaid, that examination is appointed of the wicked deeds of the people, and had declared that the day of judgement was now at hand: and had ſummoned them being accuſed to plead their cauſe: then hee crieth out that they ſhould haſte to ſackcloth and aſhes, to weeping and faſting: that is, that they ſhould alſo with outward teſtifyings throw themſelves downe before the Lord. Sackcloth and aſhes peradventure did more agree with thoſe times: but there is no doubt that the calling together, and weeping, and faſting and ſuch like doe likewiſe pertaine alſo to our age, ſo oft as the ſtate of our things doth ſo require. For ſith it is a holy exerciſe, both to humble men, and to confeſſe humility, why ſhould we leſſe uſe it than the old people did in like neceſſity? We read that not only the people of Iſraell, which were informed and inſtructed by the word of God, but alſo the Niniviites which had no doctrine, but the preaching of Jonas, faſted in token of ſorrow. What cauſe is there therefore why we ſhould not doe the ſame? But it is an outward ceremony, which was with the reſt ended in Chriſt. Yea rather even at this day it is, as it alway hath been, a very good helpe to the faithfull, and a profitable admonition, to ſtir up themſelves, that they ſhould not with too great careleſneſſe and ſluggiſhneſſe more and more provoke God when they they are chastised with his scourges. Therefore Christ when hee excuseth his Apostles for that they fast not, doth not say that fasting is abrogate: but hee appointeth it to times of calamity, and joineth it with mourning. The time shall come (saith he) when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them.

In fasting, time, quality, and quantity of meats to be respected.

18 But that there should be no errour in the name, let us define what fasting is. For wee doe not here understand by it onely abstinence and sparing in meat and drinke, but a certaine other thing. The life of the godly ought indeed to be tempered with honest sparing and sobriety, that so neere as is possible, it may in the whole course thereof beare a certaine resemblance of fasting. But beside this there is another fasting for a time, when wee withdraw any thing of our wonted diet, either for one day or for a certaine time, and doe charge our selves with a straighter and severer abstinence in diet than ordinary. This consisteth in three things, in time, in quality of meats, and in smalnesse of quantity. I meane by time, that wee should use those doings fasting, for which fasting is ordained. As for example, if a man fast for common praier: that he come empty unto it. Quality standeth in this, that all daintinesse should be absent, and being content with common and baser meats, wee should not stir up appetite with delicates. The rule of quantity is in this, that we eat more sparingly and lesse than we be wont, only for necessity, and not also for pleasure.

Superstition and the opinion of merit in fasting to be taken heed of.

19 But we must alway principally beware, that no superstition creepe upon us, as it hath heretofore hapned to the great hurt of the Church. For it were much better that there were no use at all of fasting than that it should bee diligently kept, and in the meane time be corrupted with false and hurtfull opinions, whereunto the world sometime falleth, unlesse the Pastors doe with great faithfulnesse and wisedome prevent it. The first point therefore is, that they should alway inforce that which Joel teacheth, that they should cut their harts and not their garments: that is, that they should admonish the people, that God doth not greatly esteeme fasting of it selfe, unlesse there be inward affection of the heart, a true misliking of sinne and of himselfe, true humbling, and true sorrow through the feare of God: yea that fasting is profitable for no other cause, but for that it is joined to these as an inferior helpe. For God abhorreth nothing more than when men in setting signes and an outward shew in stead of innocencie of heart, doe labour with false colour to deceive themselves. Therefore Esay most sharply inveigheth against this hypocrisie, that the Jewes thought they had satisfied God, when they had only fasted, howsoever they did nourish ungodlinesse and uncleane thoughts in their heart. Is is (saith he) such a fasting which the Lord requireth? and so forth as followeth. Therefore the hypocriticall fasting is not only an unprofitable and superfluous wearying, but also a great abomination. Another evill neere unto this is chiefly to be taken heed of, that it bee not taken for a meritorious worke, or a forme of worshipping God. For sith it is a thing of it selfe indifferent, and hath no value but by reason of those ends which it ought to have respect unto, it is a most hurtfull superstition, to confound it with the works commanded of God and necessary of themselves without other respect. Such was in old time the dotage of the Manichees: whom when Augustine confuteth, he doth plainly enough teach, that fasting is to be judged by no other ends than those which I have spoken of, and is no otherwise allowed of God, unlesse it be referred to the same. The third error is indeed not so ungodly, yet it is perillous: to require the keeping of it more precisely and rigorously as it were one of the chiefe duties, and so to advance it with immeasurable praises, that men should thinke they have done some excellent thing when they have fasted. In which behalfe I dare not altogether excuse the old fathers, but that they have sowed some seeds of superstition, and given occasion to the tyranny which hath risen since. There are found indeed sometimes in them sound and wise sentences, of fasting, but afterward we now and then meet with immeasurable praises of fasting which advance it among the chiefe vertues.

The fast of Lent superstitious if it be used under colour.

20 And at that time the superstitious observing of Lent was each where growne in use: because both the common people thought that they therein did some notable service to God, and the Pastors did commend it for a holy following of Christ: whereas it is plaine, that Christ did not fast to prescribe an example to other, but that in so

bolishing the preaching of the Gospell, he might in very deede prove that it was not a doctrine of men, but descended from heaven. And it is marvellous, that so grosse an errour, which is confuted with so many and so evident reasons, could creepe into men of so sharp judgement. For Christ did not fast oft (which hee must needs have done if hee would have set forth a law of yeerely fasting) but onely once when he prepared himselfe to the publishing of the Gospell. And hee fasted not after the manner of men, as it was meete that hee should have done if he would have provoked men to follow him: but rather he sheweth an example, whereby hee may rather draw men to wonder at him than stirre them up to follow him. Finally there is none other cause of this fasting, than of that which Moses fasted when hee received the law at the hand of the Lord. For sith that miracle was shewed in Moses to stablish the authoritie of the Law, it ought not to have beene omitted in Christ, least the Gospell should seeme to give place to the law. But since that time it never came in any mans minde under colour of following of Moses to require such a forme of fasting in the people of Israel. Neither did any of the holy Prophets and Fathers follow it, when yet they had mind and zeale enough to godly exercises. For, that which is said of Helias, that he passed forty daies without meate and drinke, tended to no other end but that the people should know that hee was stirred up to bee a restorer of the law from which almost all Israel had departed. Therefore it was a meere wrongfull zeale and full of superstition, that they did set forth fasting with the title and colour of following of Christ. Howbeit in the manner of fasting there was then great diversitie, as Cassiodorus rehearseth out of Socrates in the ninth booke of his historie. For the Romanes (saith he) had but three weekes, but in these three there was a continuall fasting, except on the Sunday, and Saturday. The Slavonians and Grecians had six weekes: other had seven: but their fasting was by divided times. And they disagreed no lesse in difference of meates. Some did eate nothing but bread and water: some added herbes: some did not forbeare fish and fowles: some had no difference in meates. Of this diversitie Augustine also maketh mention in the latter Epistle to Ianuarie.

21 Then followed worse times, and to the preposterous zeale of the people was added both ignorance and rudenesse of the Bishops, and a lust to beare rule, and a tyrannous rigour. There were made wicked lawes, which straine consciences with pernicious bonds. The eating of flesh was forbidden, as though it defiled a man. There were added opinions full of sacriledge one upon an other, till they came to the bottome of all errours. And that no perversnesse should bee omitted, they began with a most fond pretence of abstinence to mocke with God. For in the most exquisite daintinesse of fare is sought the praise of fasting: no delicates doe then suffice, there is never greater plentie, or diversitie or sweetnesse of meates. In such and so gorgious preparation they thinke that they serve God rightly. I speake not how they never more fouly glut themselves, than when they would bee counted most holie men. Briefely, they count it the greatest worshipping of God to abstaine from flesh, and (these excepted) to flow full of all kinde of dainties. On the other side they thinke this the extremest ungodlinesse, and such as scarcely may bee recompensed with death, if a man taste never so little a peece of bacon or unsavorie flesh with browne bread. Hierome telleth, that even in his time were some that with such follies did mocke with God: which because they would not eate oyle, caused most daintie meates from every place to bee brought them: yea to oppresse nature by violence, they abstained from drinking of water, but caused sweete and costly suppings to be made for them, which they did not drinke out of a cup, but out of a shell. Which fault was then in a few, at this day it is a common fault among all rich men that they fast to no other end but that they may banket more sumptuously and daintily. But I will not waste many words in a matter not doubtfull. Onely this I say, that both in fasting and in all other parts of discipline, the Papists so have nothing right, nothing pure, nothing well framed and orderly, whereby they may have any occasion to be proud, as though there were any thing remaining among them worthie of praise.

The grosse abuse of fasting.

Ad Nepotian.

22 There followeth another part of discipline, which peculiarly belongeth to the Clergie. That is contained in the Canons which the old Bishops have made

The ancient Canons & orders of the Church for

over themselves and their order. As these bee: that no Clearke should give himselfe to hunting, to dicing, nor to banketting: that none should occupie usurie, or marchandise: that none should bee present at wanton dancings: and such other ordinances. There were also added penalties whereby the authoritie of the Canons was stablished, that none should breake them unpunished. For this end to every Bishop was committed the government of his owne Cleargie, that they should rule their Clearks according to the Canons, and hold them in their dutie. For this end were ordained yearely overseeings and Synods, that if any were negligent in his dutie, hee should bee admonished: if any had offended, hee should bee punished according to the measure of his offence. The Bishops also themselves had yearely their provinciall Syodes, and in the old time yearely two Synodes, by which they were judged if they had done any thing beside their duty. For if any Bishop were too hard or violent against his Cleargie, they might appeale to those Synodes, although there were but one that complained. The severest punishment was that he which had offended should bee removed from his office, and for a time bee deprived of the communion. And because that same was a continuall order, they never used to dismisse any Synode, but that they appointed a place and time for the next Synode. For, to gather a generall Councell, pertained to the Emperour onely, as all the old summonings of Councels do testifie. So long as this severitie flourished, the Clearkes did require in word no more of the people, than themselves did performe in example and deed. Yea they were much more rigorous to themselves than to the people. And verily so it is meet, that the people should bee ruled with a gentler and looser discipline, as I may so terme it: but the Clearkes should use sharper judgements among themselves, and should lesse beare with themselves, than with other men. How all this is growne out of use, it is no need to rehearse, when at this day nothing can bee imagined more unbridled and dissolute than the Cleargie, and they are broken forth to so great licentiousnesse, that the whole world crieth out of it. That all antiquitie should not seeme to be utterly buried among them, I grant indeed that they doe with certaine shadowes deceive the eies of the simple: but those are such as come no neerer to the ancient manners, than the counterfaiting of an Ape approacheth to that which men doe by reason and advise. There is a notable place in Xenophon, where hee teacheth how fouly the Persians had swarved from the ordinances of their Elders, and were fallen from the rigorous kinde of life, to softnesse and daintinesse, that yet they covered this shame, saying that they diligently kept the ancient usages. For when in the time of Cyrus, sobrietie and temperance so farre flourished, that men needed not to weepe, yea and it was accounted a shame: with posteritie this continued a religious observation, that no man should draw snot out of his nostrils, but it was lawfull to sucke it up, and feede within even till they had rotten the stinking humours which they had gathered by gluttonous eating. So by the old order it is unlawfull to bring wine-pots to the boord: but to swill in wine that they need to bee carried away drunken is tolerable. It was ordained to eat but once in a day: this these good successours have not abrogate, but they gave leave to continue their surfettings from mid-day to mid-night. The custome was that men should make an end of their daies journey fasting. But it was at libertie and usedly the custome for avoyding of wearinesse, to shorten their journey to two houres. Whensoever the Papists shall pretend their bastard rules, to shew themselves to be like to the holy Fathers: this example shall sufficiently reprove their fond counterfaiting, that no Painter can more lively expresse it.

The Cleargie forbidden marriage in the Church of Rome.

23 In one thing they bee too rigorous and unentreatable, that they give not leave to Priests to marrie. But how great libertie there is among them to use whoredome unpunished, is not needfull to bee spoken: and bearing them bold upon their stinking unmaried life, they have hardened themselves to all wicked doings: But this forbidding doth plainly shew, how pestilent all their traditions are, for as much as it hath not onely spoiled the Church of good and fit Pastours, but also hath brought in a horrible sinke of mischiefes, and throwne many soules into the gulfe of desparation. Truly whereas marriage hath beene forbidden to Priests, that same hath beene done by wicked tyrannie, not onely against the word of God, but also against all equitie equitie. First to forbid that which the Lord had left at libertie, was by no meanes lawfull for men. Againe, that God hath expreſly provided by his word that this libertie ſhould not be broken, is ſo evident that it needeth no long demonſtration. I ſpeake not how Paul in many places willeth a Biſhop to bee the husband of one wife. But what could bee more vehemently ſpoken, than where hee pronounceth by the holy Ghoſt, that there ſhall be in the laſt times wicked men that ſhall forbid marriage: and he calleth them not onely deceivers, but Divels? This therefore is a Prophecie, this is a holy Oracle of the holy Ghoſt, wherwith he willed to arme the Church aforehand againſt dangers, that the forbidding of marriage is the doctrine of Divels. But they thinke that they have gaily eſcaped when they wreſt this ſentence to Montanus, the Tatians, Encratites, and other old Heretikes. They onely (ſay they) condemned marriage: but we doe not condemne it, but debarre the Cleargie from it, for whom wee thinke it not to bee convenient. As though albeit this Prophecie was firſt fulfilled in thoſe aforeſaid men, it might not alſo bee applyed to theſe: or as though this childiſh fond ſubtltie were worth the hearing, that they ſay that they forbid it not, becauſe they forbid it not to all. For it is all one as if a Tyrant would affirme that it is not an unjuſt law, with unjuſtice whereof one part alone of the Citie is oppreſſed.

1 Tim. 3 2. Tit. 1.6. 1 Tim 4.3.

24 They object, that the Prieſt doth by ſome marke differ from the people. As though the Lord did not alſo foreſee this, with what ornaments Prieſts ought to excell. So they accuſe the Apoſtle of troubling the order and confounding the comelineſſe of the Church, which when hee portrayed out the abſolute forme of a good Biſhop durſt ſet matriage among the other gifts which hee required in him. I know how they expound this, namely that none is to bee choſen that hath had a ſecond wife. And I grant that this is not a new expoſition: but that it is a falſe expoſition, appeareth by the text it ſelfe, becauſe he by and by after ſetteth out, of what qualities the wives of Biſhops and Deacons ought to be. Paul reckoneth marriage among the vertues of a Biſhop, theſe men teach that it is an intollerable fault in the order of the Clergie. And, on Gods name, not contented with this generall diſpraiſe they call it in their Canons, uncleaneneſſe and defileing of the fleſh. Let every man thinke with himſelfe out of what worke-ſhop theſe things be come: Chriſt vouchſafeth ſo to honour mariage that he willeth it to be n image of his holy conjoyning with the Church. What could bee ſpoken more honorably to ſet out the dignitie of Marriage? With what face therefore ſhall that be called uncleane or defiled wherein ſhineth a likeneſſe of the ſpirituall grace of Chriſt.

Mariage in the Cleargie allowed by the Apoſtle, by the Church of Rome not onely diſallowed, but diſgraced by unſeemly ſpeech.

Sirici. ad Epiſco. Hiſpa.

25 But now when their forbidding ſo evidently fighteth with the word of God, yet they finde in the Scriptures wherewith to defend it. The Leviticall Prieſts were bound to lie aſunder from their wives, ſo oft as it came to their turnes to miniſter, that they might handle the holy things pure and undefiled. Therefore it were very uncomly, that our holy things, ſith they bee both much more noble, and daily, ſhould be handled of married men. As though there were all one perſon of the Miniſter of the Goſpell, as was of the Leviticall Prieſthood. For they, as figures, repreſented Chriſt, which being the Mediatour of God and men ſhould with moſt abſolute pureneſſe reconcile the Father unto us. But when ſinners could not in every behalfe expreſſe the figure of his holineſſe, yet that they might with certaine groſſe draughts yeeld a ſhadow of him, they were commanded to purifie themſelves beyond the manner of men, when they came to the Sanctuarie: namely becauſe they then properly figured Chriſt, for that as pacifiers to reconcile the people to God they appeared at the Tabernacle, the image of the heavenly judgement ſeate. Foraſmuch as the Paſtours of the Church doe not beare this perſon at this day, therefore they are vainly compared with them. Wherefore the Apoſtle doth without exception boldly pronounce, that marriage is honourable among all men, but that for whoremongers, and adulterers abideth the judgement of God. And the Apoſtles themſelves did with their owne example approve that marriage is not unmeet for the holineſſe of any office be it never ſo excellent. For Paul witneſſeth that they did not onely keepe wives, but alſo carried them about with them.

The ſeparation of Levites from their wives when they miniſtred in the Temple, proveth but ſlenderly the forbidding of mariage in the Cleargie under the Goſpell.

neſſe of chaſtitie for a neceſſarie thing, to the great reproch of the old Church: which when it abounded with ſingular learning of God, yet excelled more in holineſſe. For if they paſſe not upon the Apoſtles, (as they are wont ſometime ſtoutly to deſpiſe them) what I beſeech you will they doe to all the old Fathers, whom it is certaine to have not onely ſuffered but alſo allowed marriage in the order of Biſhops? They forſooth did nouriſh a filthy prophaning of holy things, for as much as ſo the myſteries of the Lord were not rightly reverenced among them. It was moved indeed in the Nycene Synode to have unmaried life commanded: as there alway want not ſome ſuperſtitious men, which doe ever invent ſome new thing, to bring themſelves in admiration. But what was decreed? The ſentence of Paphnutius was aſſented to, which pronounced that a mans lying with his owne wife is chaſtitie. Therefore marriage remained holy among them: neither did it turne them to any ſhame, nor was thought to ſpot the miniſterie.

Hiſt. tripart. Lib. 2. cap. 14.

How ſingle life grew to be ſo much advanced in the Clergy.

27 Then followed times, in which too ſuperſtitious obſervation of ſingle life grew in force. Hereupon came thoſe often and unmeaſurable advanced praiſes of Virginitie, ſo that ſcarcely any other vertue was thought among the people to bee compared with it. And although marriage was not condemned for uncleane, yet the dignitie thereof was ſo diminiſhed, and the holineſſe of it obſcured, that hee ſeemed not to aſpire with a courage ſtrong enough to perfection, that did not refraine himſelfe from it. Hereupon came thoſe Canons whereby it was firſt forbidden that they which were come to the degree of Prieſthood ſhould not contract marriage: then, that none ſhould bee taken into that order but unmaried men, or ſuch as did forſake mariage together with their wives. Theſe things, becauſe they ſeemed to procure reverence to Prieſthood, were (I grant) even from antiquitie received with great well liking. But if the adverſaries obiect antiquitie againſt me, firſt I anſwere that this libertie remained both under the Apoſtles and in certaine ages after them, that Biſhops might bee married: that the Apoſtles themſelves, and other Paſtours of great authoritie which ſucceeded in their places, uſed the ſame without ſticking at it. The example of that ancienter Church ought worthily to bee of great weight with us, than that wee ſhould thinke that to bee either unlawfull or uncomely for us which was then with praiſe received and uſed. Secondly I ſay that that age which for immeaſurable affection to Virginitie began to bee partiall againſt marriage, did not ſo lay upon Prieſts the law of unmaried life, as though it were a thing neceſſarie of it ſelfe, but becauſe they preferred unmaried men above the married. Finally I anſwere that they did not ſo require it that they did with force and neceſſitie conſtraine them to continence which were not fit to keepe it. For when they puniſhed whoredomes with moſt ſevere lawes, of them that contracted marriage they decreed no more but that they ſhould give over the execution of their office.

Two Items to the Church of Rome concerning the ſingle life which they require in the order of Prieſts.

28 Therefore whenſoever the defenders of this new tyrannie ſhall ſeeke the pretence of antiquitie to defend their unmarried life: ſo oft wee ſhall anſwere them with requiring them, that they reſtore the old chaſtneſſe in their Prieſts: that they remove adulterers and whoremongers: that they ſuffer not thoſe in whom they ſuffer not honeſt and chaſte uſe of marriage bed, to run unpuniſhed into all kinde of luſt: that they call againe the diſcontinued diſcipline, whereby all wantonneſſes may be reſtrained: that they deliver the Church from this ſo wicked filthineſſe, wherewith it hath beene long deformed. When they have granted this, then they muſt againe bee put in mind that they boaſt not that thing for neceſſarie, which being of it ſelfe at libertie hangeth upon the profit of the Church. Yet I ſay not this for that I thinke that in any condition place is to be given to thoſe Canons which lay the bond of unmarried life upon the order of Prieſts: but that the wiſer ſort may underſtand with what face our enemies doe ſlander holy marriage in Prieſts by objecting the name of antiquitie. As touching the Fathers, whoſe writings remaine, even they when they ſpeake of their owne judgement, except Hierome, did not with ſo great ſpitefulneſſe deface the honeſtie of mariage. We ſhall be content with one commendation of Chryſoſtome: becauſe he, ſith hee was a principall eſteemer of Virginitie, cannot be thought to have beene more laviſh than other in commendation of marriage. Thus hee ſaith. The firſt degree of chaſtitie is pure virginitie: the ſecond is faithfull marriage. Therefore the ſecond kinde of virginitie is the chaſte love of matrimonie.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of Vowes, by raſh promiſing whereof, each man hath miſerably entangled himſelfe.

The hurt that hath come to the Church by vowes.

IT is verily a thing to be lamented, that the Church, for whom libertie was purchaſed with the ineſtimable price of the bloud of Chriſt, hath beene ſo oppreſſed with cruell tyrannie, and almoſt overwhelmed with a huge heape of traditions: but in the meane time every mans private madneſſe ſheweth, that not without moſt juſt cauſe there hath beene ſo much permitted of God to Satan and his miniſters. For they thought it not enough, neglecting the commandement of Chriſt, to beare any burdens whatſoever were laid upon them by falſe teachers, unleſſe they did alſo each man procure to himſelfe ſeverall burdens of his owne, and ſo with digging pits for themſelves ſhould drowne themſelves deeper. This was done while they ſtrived in deviſing of vowes, by which there might bee added to the common bonds a greater and ſtraighter binding. Sith therefore wee have taught, that by their boldneſſe which have borne rule under the title of Paſtours in the Church, the worſhipping of God hath beene corrupted, when they ſnared ſilly conſciences with their unjuſt lawes: here it ſhall not bee out of ſeaſon to adjoyne another evill which is neere unto it, that it may appeare that the world according to the perverſneſſe of his owne diſpoſition, hath alway, with ſuch ſtops as it could, put away the helps whereby it ſhould have beene brought to God. Now, that it may the better appeare that very grievous hurt hath beene brought in by vowes, let the Readers keepe in minde the principles above ſet. For firſt wee have taught, that whatſoever may be required to the framing of life godlily and holily, is comprehended in the law. Againe, wee have taught that the Lord, that he might thereby the better call us away from deviſing of new works, hath encloſed the whole praiſe of righteouſneſſe in the ſimple obedience of his will. If theſe things bee true, it is eaſie to judge that all faigned worſhippings, which wee invent to our ſelves to deſerve the favour of God, are not acceptable to him how much ſoever they pleaſe us. And truly the Lord himſelfe in many places doth not onely openly refuſe them, but alſo grievouſly abhorre them. Hereupon ariſeth a doubt of thoſe vowes which are made beſide the expreſſe word of God, what account is to bee made of them, whether they may rightly bee vowed of Chriſtian men, and how farre they binde them. For the ſame which among men is called a promiſe, in reſpect of God is called a Vow. But to men wee promiſe thoſe things either which wee thinke will bee pleaſant unto them, or which wee owe of dutie. Therefore there ought to bee a much greater heedfull obſervation in Vowes which are directed to God himſelfe, with whom wee ought to deale more earneſtly. In this point ſuperſtition hath in all ages marvellouſly ranged, ſo that men without judgement, without choiſe, did by and by vow unto God whatſoever came in their minde, or into their mouth. Hereupon came thoſe follies, yea monſtrous abſurdities of Vowes among the Heathen, wherewith they did too inſolently mocke with their Gods. And I would to God that Chriſtians alſo had not followed this their boldneſſe. It ought not indeed to have been ſo: but wee ſee that in certaine ages paſt nothing hath been more uſuall than this wickedneſſe, that the people each where deſpiſing the Law of God did wholy burne with madde greedineſſe to vow whatſoever had pleaſed them in their dreame. I will not hatefully enforce, nor particularly rehearſe how hainouſly and how many waies herein men have offended: But I thought good to ſay this by the way, that it may the better appeare that wee doe not move queſtion of a needleſſe matter, when wee intreat of Vowes.

The firſt thing to be reſpected in vowes, is the

2 Now if wee will not erre in judging which Vowes bee lawfull, and which bee wrongfull, it behoveth to weigh three things: that is to ſay, who it is to whom the Vow is made: who we be that make the Vow: laſt of all, with what minde we vow. The firſt point hath reſpect to this, that wee ſhould thinke that wee have to doe with person of God to whom they are made.

Colos. 22, 3.

God, whom our obedience so much delighteth, that he pronounceth all wil-worships to bee accursed, how gay and glorious soever they be in the eyes of men. If all voluntarie worships, which wee our selves devise without commandement, be abhominable to God, it followeth that no worship can be acceptable to him but that which is allowed by his word. Therefore let us not take so great libertie to our selves that wee dare vow to God that which hath no testimonie how it is esteemed of him. For whereas that which Paul teacheth, that it is sinne whatsoever is done without Faith, extendeth to all doings, then verily it chiefly hath place, when thou directest thy thought the straight way to God. But if wee fall and erre even in the smallest things, (as Paul there disputeth of the difference of meates) where certaintie of faith shineth not before us: how much more modestie is to be used, when wee attempt a thing of greatest weight? For nothing ought to bee more earnest unto us than the duties of Religion. Let this therefore be the first consideration in vowes, that wee never come to the vowing of any thing, but that conscience have first certainely determined that it attempteth nothing rashly. But it shall then be free from danger of rashnesse, when it shall have God going before it, and as it were informing it by his word what is good and profitable to be done.

Rom. 14. 23.

The second thing to be regarded, in the making of a vow, is the measure of their strength that make it.

3 In the other thing which wee have said to bee here to be considered, this is contained, that wee measure our owne strengthes, that we have an eye to our vocation, that wee neglect not the benefit of libertie which God hath given us. For hee that voweth that which either is not in his power, or disagreeth with his vocation, is rash: and hee that despiseth the bountifulnesse of God, whereby hee is appointed Lord of all things, is unthankfull. When I say thus, I doe not meane that any thing is so set in our owne hand, that standing upon confidence of our owne strength we may promise the same to God. For it was most truly decreed in the Councell at Arausium, that nothing is rightly vowed to God but that which we have received of his hand, forasmuch as all things that are offered him are his meere gifts. But sith some things are by Gods goodnesse given us, and other some things by his equitie denied us: let every man (as Paul commandeth) have respect to the measure of grace given unto him. Therefore I doe here meane nothing else, but that vowes must be tempered to that measure which the Lord prescribeth there in his giving: least if thou attempt further than hee permitteth, thou throw thy selfe downe headlong with taking too much upon thee. As for example. When those murtherers, of whom mention is made in Luke, vowed that they would taste of no meate till Paul were slaine: although the device had not beene wicked, yet the rashnesse it selfe was not to be suffered, that they made the life and death of a man subject to their power. So Jephthe suffered punishment for his folly, when with headlong heate hee conceived an unadvised vow. In which kinde unmarried life hath the chiefe place of madde boldnesse. For sacrificing Priests, Monks, and Nunnes, forgetting their owne weakenesse, thinke themselves able to keepe unmarried life. But by what Oracle are they taught that they shall have chastitie throughout all their life, to the very end whereof they vow it? They heare the word of God concerning the universall state of men, It is not good for man to bee alone. They understand, and would to God that they did not feele, that sinne remaining in us is not without most sharpe prickes. With what confidence dare they shake off that generall calling for all their life long: whereas the gift of continencie is oftener granted for a certaine time as opportunitie requireth? In such stubbornesse let them not looke for God to bee their helper: but let them rather remember that which is said. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. And this is to tempt God, to endevour against the nature put in us by him, and to despise his present gifts as though they nothing belonged unto us. Which they not onely doe: but also marriage it selfe, which, God thought it not against his Majestie to institute, which hee hath pronounced honorable in all men, which Christ our Lord hath sanctified with his presence, which hee vouchsafed to honour with his first Miracle, they dare call defileing, onely to advance with marvellous commendations a certaine unmarried life of what sort soever it be. As though they themselves did not shew a cleare example in their life, that unmarried state is one thing, and virginitie an another : which their life yet they moſt ſhameleſſy call Angellike, doing herein verily too great injury to the Angels of God, to whom they compare whoremongers, adulterers, and ſomewhat elſe much worſe and filthier. And truly here need no arguments when they are openly confuted by the thing it ſelfe. For wee plainly ſee, with how horrible paines the Lord doth commonly take vengeance of ſuch arrogancie, and contempt of his gifts by too much truſt in themſelves. I ſpare for ſhame to ſpeake of the more ſecret faults, of which even this that is already perceived is too much. It is out of controverſie that we ought to vow nothing, that may hinder us from ſerving of our vocation. As if a houſholder ſhould vow, that he will leave his wife and his children and take other charges in hand: or if he that is fit to beare office, when he is choſen, do vow that he will be a private man. But what is meant by this, that we ſaid that our liberty ſhould not be deſpiſed, hath ſome difficulty if it be not declared. Therefore thus in few words I expound it. Sith God hath made us Lords of all things, and hath ſo made them ſubject unto us that we ſhould uſe them all for our commodity: there is no cauſe why wee ſhould hope that it ſhall be an acceptable worke to God if we yeeld our ſelves into bondage to the outward things which ought to be a helpe unto us. I ſay this for this purpoſe, becauſe many doe hereby ſeeke praiſe of humility, if they ſnare themſelves with many obſervations, from which God not without cauſe willed us to be free and diſcharged. Therefore if wee will eſcape this danger, let us alway remember that we ought not to depart from that order which the Lord hath ordained in the Chriſtian Church.

4 Now I come to that which I did ſet in the third place: that it is much materiall with what minde thou makeſt a vow, if thou wilt have it allowed of God. For ſith the Lord regardeth the heart, not the outward ſhew, it commeth to paſſe that the ſelfe ſame thing, by changing the purpoſe of the minde, doth ſometime pleaſe him and is acceptable unto him, and ſometime highly diſpleaſeth him. If thou ſo vow the abſtaining from wine, as though there were any holineſſe in it, thou art ſuperſtitious: if thou have reſpect to any other end which is not evill, no man can diſallow it. But in my judgement there be foure ends, to which our vowes ſhall be rightly directed: of which for teachings ſake I refer two to the time paſt, and the other two to the time to come. To the time paſt belong thoſe vowes, whereby we doe either teſtifie our thankfulneſſe to God for benefits received: or to crave the turning away of his wrath, we our ſelves doe puniſh our ſelves for the offences that we have committed. Let us call the firſt ſort, if you will, the exerciſes of thankfulneſſe, the other of repentance. Of the firſt kind we have an example in the tithes which Jacob vowed, if the Lord did bring him home ſafe out of baniſhment into his Country, Againe, in the old Sacrifices of the peace offerings, which godly Kings and Captaines, when they tooke in hand righteous war, did vow that they would pay if they had obtained the victory, or at leaſt when they were oppreſſed with any great diſtreſſe, if the Lord had delivered them. So are all thoſe places in the Pſalmes to bee underſtood which ſpeake of vowes. Such vowes at this day may alſo bee in uſe among us, ſo oft as the Lord hath delivered us either out of any calamity, or from a hard ſickneſſe, or from any other danger. For it is then not againſt the duty of a godly man, to conſecrate to God his vowed oblation, as a ſolemne token of his recknowledging, leaſt he ſhould ſeeme unthankfull toward his goodneſſe. Of whom ſort the ſecond kinde is, it ſhall ſuffice to ſhew with one onely familiar example. If any by the vice of gluttony bee fallen into any offence, nothing withſtanderh but that to chaſtice his intemperance hee may for a time forſake all daintie meates, and may doe the ſame with a vow adjoyned, that hee may bind himſelfe with the ſtraiter bond. Yet I doe not ſo make a perpetuall law to them that have likewiſe offended: but I ſhew what is lawfull for them to doe, which ſhall thinke ſuch a vow profitable for themſelves. I doe therefore ſo make ſuch a vow lawfull, that in the meane time I leave it at liberty.

5 The vowes that are applyed to the time to come, partly (as we have already ſaid) doe tend to this end that we may be made the warier: and partly that as it were by certaine ſpurres we may be pricked forward to our duty. Some man ſeeth himſelfe to be ſo inclined to ſome certaine vice, that in a thing which otherwiſe is not evill he cannot temper

The third thing to be reſpected in a vow, is the minde of the vower which in vowes that have relation to the time paſt hath two ends to be directed by.

Gen. 28. 20. Pſa. 22. 27. & 56. 12. & 116. 14, 18.

Two other ends of vowes which have relation to the time to come temper himselfe from falling forthwith into an evill: he shall doe nothing inconveniently if he doe for a time by vow cut off from himselfe the use of that thing. As if a man know that this or that apparell of body is perillous unto him, and yet entised with desire he earnestly covets it, what can he doe better, than if in putting a bridle upon himselfe, that is in charging himselfe with necessitie of abstaining from it, he deliver himselfe from all doubting? Likewise if a man be forgetfull or slow to necessary duties of godlinesse, why may hee not by taking a vow upon him both awake his memory and shake off his slothfulnesse? In both I grant that there is a forme of childish schooling: but even in this that they are helpes of weaknesse, they are not without profit used of the raw and unperfect. Therefore we shall say that those vowes are lawfull which have respect to one of these ends, specially in outward things, if they both be upholden with the allowance of God, and doe agree with our vocation, and be measured by the power of grace given us of God.

How to judge of vowes as well those which generally all men or particularly some doe make unto God.

6 Now also it is not hard to gather what is generally to be thought of all vowes. There is one common vow of all the faithfull, which being made in baptisme wee doe confirme and as it were stablish by Catechisme and receiving of the Supper. For the Sacraments are as Charters, by which the Lord delivereth to us his mercie and thereby everlasting life, and wee againe on our behalfes doe promise him obedience. But this is the forme or verily the summe of the vow, that forsaking Sathan we yeeld our selves into service to God, to obey his holy commandements, and not to follow the perverse desires of our flesh. It ought not to be doubted but that this vow, sith it hath testimony of the Scripture, yea and is required of all the children of God, is both holy and profitable to salvation. And it maketh not to the contrary, that no man in this life performeth the perfect obedience of the law which God requireth of us. For sith this forme of covenanting is comprised within the covenant of grace, under which is contained both forgivenesse of sinnes and the Spirit of sanctification: the promise which wee there make is joyned both with beseeching of pardon and with craving of helpe. In judging of particular vowes, it is necessary to keepe in minde the three former rules, whereby we may safely weigh of what sort every vow is. Neither yet thinke, that I so commend the very same vow, which I affirme to bee holy, that I would have them to bee daily. For though I dare teach no certaine rule of the number of time: yet if any man obey my councell, he shall take upon him none but sober and for a time. For if thou oftentimes breake forth into making of many vowes, all religiousnesse will with very continuance grow out of estimation with thee, and thou shalt come to a bending readinesse to fall into superstition. If thou bind thy selfe with a perpetuall vow, either for great paine and tediousnesse thou shalt undoe it, or being wearied with long continuance thou shalt at one time or other be bold to breake it.

Superstitious vowes of fastings, pilgrimages and such like.

7 Now also it is plaine with how great superstition in this behalfe the world hath in certaine ages past beene possessed. One man vowed that hee would abstaine from wine: as though abstaining from wine were of it selfe a worship acceptable to God. An other bound himselfe to fasting, another to abstaining from flesh for certaine daies, in which he had with vaine opinion fained to be a singular holinesse above the rest And some things also were vowed much more childish, although not of children. For this was holden for a great wisedome, to take upon them vowed pilgrimages to holier places, and sometime either to goe all their journey on foot, or with their body halfe naked, that by their wearinesse the more merit might be gotten. These and such other, with incredible zeale whereof the world hath a while swelled, if they be examined by those rules, which wee have above set, shall be found not onely vaine and trifling, but full of manifest ungodlinesse. For howsoever the flesh judge, God abhorreth nothing more than fained worshippings. There are beside this those pernitious and damned opinions, that hypocrites when they have such trifles thinke that they have gotten no small righteousnesse: they repose the summe of godlinesse in outward observations, they despise all other that are lesse carefull of such things.

Monkish vowes and the end why Monkeries were first instituted.

8 To reckon up all the particular formes is nothing to purpose. But for as much as the Monkish vowes are had in greater reverence, because they seeme allowed by the common judgement of the Church: of those it is good to speake briefely. First least any should by prescription of long time defend Monkery, such as it is at this day, it is to bee noted that in old time there was in Monasteries a far other order of living. Such as were disposed to exercise themselves to greatest severity and patience, went thither. for what manner of discipline they say that the Lacedemonians had under the lawes of Lycurgus, such was at that time among the Monkes, yea and much more rigorous. They slept upon the ground: their drinke was water: their meate was bread, herbs, and roots: their chiefe dainties were in oyle and ciches. They abstained from all delicate dyet and trimming of body. These things might seeme above truth, if they were not written by witnesses that saw and proved them, as Gregory Nazianzene, Basile, and Chrysostome. But with such introductions they prepared themselves to great offices. For, that the Colledges of Monkes were then as it were the seede-plots of the order of Ministers of the Church, both these whom we have now named are a proofe plaine enough (for they were all brought up in Monasteries and from thence called to the office of Bishops) and also many other singular and excellent men in their time. And Augustine sheweth that this was also used in his time, that Monasteries yeelded Clearkes to the Church. For he speaketh thus to the Monkes of the isle of Caprarea: But you brethren we exhort in the Lord, that ye keepe your purpose and continue to the end: and if at any time our mother the Church shall require your travaile doe ye neither with greedy pride take it upon you, nor with flattering slothfulnesse refuse it: but with a meeke heart obey to God. Neither prefer ye your owne quiet leasure above the necessities of the Church: to whom if no good men would have ministred in her travaile, you should not have found how you should have beene borne. He speaketh there of the Ministery, by which the faithfull are spiritually borne againe. Also to Aurelius. There is both occasion of falling given to themselves, and most haynous wrong done to the order of the Clergy, if forsakers of Monasteries be chosen to the soldiership of the Clergy: when even of those that remaine in the Monastery, wee use to take into the Clergie none but the most approved and best. Vnlesse perhaps as the common people say, he is an evill piper but a good fidler: so it shall also be jestingly said of us, he is an evill Monke, but a good Clearke. It is too much to be lamented, if we lift up Monkes into such a ruinous pride, and thinke the Clearkes worthy of so great reproch, whereas sometime even a good Monke maketh not a good Clearke, if hee have sufficient continence and yet want necessary learning. By these places it appeareth, that godly men were wont with the discipline of Monkes to prepare themselves to the government of the Church, that they might the fitter and better instructed, take so great an office upon them. Not that they all attained to this end, or yet tended toward it, when for the most part they were unlearned men, but such were chosen out as were meete for it.

any

The orders and exercises of auncient Monks.

9 But chiefly in two places hee painteth out unto us the forme of the old Monkerie. In the booke of the manners of the Catholike Church, where hee setteth the holinesse of that profession against the slanders of the Manichees: and in another booke which he entituled of the worke of Monks, where he inveyeth against certaine degenerate Monks, which began to corrupt that order. I will here so gather a summe of those things which hee saith, that so neere as I may I will use his owne words. Despising (saith hee) the intisements of this world, gathered into one most chaste and holy life, they spend their time together, living in prayers, readings, and disputations, not swelling with pride, not troublesome with stubbornnesse, not wanne with enviousnesse. None possesseth any thing of his owne, none is burdenous to any man. They get by working with their hands those things wherewith both their body may bee fed, and their minde may not bee hindred from God. Their worke they deliver to them whom they call Deanes. Those Deanes disposing all things with great carefulnesse make account thereof to one whom they call Father. These Fathers not onely most holy in manners, but also most excellent in godly doctrine, high in all things, doe with no pride provide for them whom they call children, with great authority of them in commanding, and great willingnesse of the other in obeying: They come together at the very last time of the day, every one from his dwelling, while they bee yet fasting, to heare that Father, and there meete together to every one of these fathers at the last three thousand men, (he speaketh chiefely of Egypt, and of the East) then they refresh their body, ſo much as ſufficeth for life and healthfulneſſe, every man reſtraining his deſire, not to take largely even of thoſe things that they have preſent very ſpare and vile. So they doe not onely abſtaine from fleſh and wine, ſo much that they may be able to tame their luſts, but from ſuch things which doe ſo much more greedily provoke appetite of the belly and throat, how much they ſeeme to other, to be as it were cleaner, by colour whereof the filthy deſire of exquiſite meates, which is not in fleſh, is wont to be fondly and fouly defended. Whatſoever remaineth above neceſſary foode (as there remaineth oftentimes much of the works of their hands and pinching of their fare) is with greater care diſtributed to the poore, than it was gotten by them that diſtribute it. For they doe in no wiſe travaile that they may have abundance of theſe things, but they by all meanes endeavour that that which they have abounding may not remaine with them. Afterward when he hath rehearſed the hardneſſe, whereof he himſelfe had ſeene examples both at Millaine, and elſe where: among theſe things (ſaith hee) no man is inforced to hard things which hee cannot beare: no man is charged with that which he refuſeth: neither is he therefore condemned of the reſt, becauſe he confeſſeth himſelfe to want ſtrength in following of them: for they remember how much charity is commended: they remember that all things are cleane to the cleane. Therefore all their diligence watcheth, not to the refuſing of kinds of meat as uncleane, but to tame luſt, and to retaine the love of brethren. They remember, meat for the belly, and the belly for meates, &c. Yet many ſtrong doe abſtaine for the weaks ſake. Many of them have no neede to doe thus: but becauſe it pleaſeth them to ſuſtaine themſelves with baſer diet and nothing ſumptuous. Therefore they themſelves, which being in health doe forbeare, if conſideration of their health compell, when they are ſicke doe take without any feare. Many drinke no wine, and yet they thinke not themſelves defiled with it: for they moſt gently cauſe it to bee given to the fainter, and to them that cannot get the health of their bodie without it: and ſome which fooliſhly refuſe it, they doe brotherly admoniſh that they bee not with vaine ſuperſtition ſooner made weaker than holier. So they diligently exerciſe godlineſſe: but they know that the exerciſing of the body pertaineth but to a ſhort time. Charitie is chiefly kept: to charitie the diet, to charitie the ſpeech, to charitie the apparell, to charitie the countenance is fitted. They meet and conſpire into one charitie. To offend it, is accounted as hainous as to offend God. If any reſiſt charitie, hee is caſt out and ſhunned. If any offend charity, hee is not ſuffred to abide one day. For as much as in theſe words, as in a painted table, that holy man ſeemeth to have ſet out what manner of life Monkery was in old time, although they were ſomewhat long, yet I was content to interlace them here: becauſe I ſaw that I ſhould have beene ſomewhat longer if I had gathered the ſame things out of divers, how much ſoever I ſtudied for briefeneſſe.

1 Cor. 6. 13.

The difference betweene Popiſh Monkes, and the Monks of the old Church.

10 But my purpoſe here is not to goe thorow this whole matter, but only by the way to point out, not onely what manner of Monkes the old Church had, but what manner of thing the profeſſion of Monkes was at that time: ſo as the ſound witted readers may judge by the compariſon, what face they have which alleadge antiquitie to maintaine the preſent Monkerie. Auguſtine when hee depainteth unto us a holy and true Monkerie, would have to be abſent all rigorous exacting of thoſe things which by the word of the Lord are left us at liberty. But there is nothing that is at this day more ſeverely required. For they count it a miſchiefe that can never be purged, if any doe never ſo little ſwarve from the preſcribed rule in colour or faſhion of garment, in kinde of meate, or in other trifling and cold ceremonies. Auguſtine ſtoutly maintaineth, that it is not lawfull for Monkes to live idle upon other men. He denieth that there was ever in his time any ſuch example of a well ordered Monaſtery. Our men ſet the chiefe part of their holineſſe in idleneſſe. For if you take idleneſſe from them, where ſhall be that contemplative life whereby they boaſt that they excell all other men, and approch neere unto Angels? Finally Auguſtine requireth ſuch a Monkery, as ſhould be nothing but an exerciſe and helpe to the duties of godlineſſe which are commended to all Chriſtians. What? when hee maketh charitie the chiefe, yea and almoſt onely rule thereof doe wee thinke that hee praiſeth a conſpiring, whereby a few men being bound together, together, are severed from the whole body of the Church? But rather he willeth them with their example to give light to other to keepe the unity of the Church. In both these points there is so much difference of the Monkery at this present, that a man can scarcely finde any thing more unlike, I will not say contrary. For our Monkes not contented with that godlinesse, to the study of which alone, Christ commandeth them that are his, continually to apply, doe imagine I wot not what new godlinesse, by meditation whereof they may be perfecter than other.

18 If they denie this, I would know of them why they vouchsafe to give to their order alone the title of perfection, and take away the same from all the callings of God. Neither am I ignorant of that sophisticall solution, that it is not therefore so called because it doth contain perfection in it, but because it is the best of all other to attaine perfection. When they are disposed to boast themselves before the people, when to snare unskilfull and unwate young men, when to maintaine their priviledges, when to advance their owne dignitie to the reproach of other, then they boast that they are in the state of perfection. When they are so nigh driven that they cannot defend this vaine arrogancie, then they flee to this starting hole, that they have not yet attained perfection, but that they are in the same state wherein they aspire unto it above other. In the meane time that admiration among the people remaineth, as though the onely Monkish life were Angell-like, perfect, and clensed from all fault. By this pretence they make most gainfull markets, but that same moderation lieth buried in a few bookes. Who doth not see that this is an intollerable mockery? But let us so reason with them, as though they gave no more to their profession than to call it a state of attaining perfection. Verily in giving it this name, they do as by a speciall marke make it differing from other kinds of life. And who can abide this, that so great honour should be given away to an ordinance that is no where by any one syllable allowed: and that by the same all other callings of God, which are by his owne holy mouth not only commanded, but also commended with notable titles of praise, are by the same accounted unworthy? And how great wrong (I beseech you) is done to God, when I wot not what new found thing is preferred above all the kinde of life ordained by himselfe, and praised by his owne testimonie?

Only Monkish life learned perfection in the Papists.

12 But goe to, let them say that it is a slander which I have before said, that they are not contented with the rule prescribed of God. Yet though I hold my peace, they themselves doe more than enough accuse themselves? For they openly teach, that they take upon them more burden than Christ laid upon his: because forsooth they promise to keepe the Councels of the Gospell concerning loving their enemies, not coveting of revenge, nor swearing, &c. To which things Christians are not generally bound. Herein what antiquitie will they shew forth against us? This never came in any of the old fathers minds. They all crye out with one voice that there was no one little word at all uttered of Christ, which ought not necessarily to bee obeyed. And without any doubting they doe each where teach, that these very same things by name were commandements, which these good expositours triflingly say, that Christ did but counsell. But forasmuch as we have before taught that this is a most pestilent errour, let it suffice here to have briefly noted, that the Monkery which is at this day, is grounded upon the same opinion, which all the godly ought worthily to abhor: which is, that there should be imagined some perfecter rule of life, than this common rule which is given of God to the whole Church. Whatsoever is builded upon this foundation, cannot be but abhominable.

Popish Monkes proud and vainglorious as if their obedience did extend unto further perfection than the law of Christ doth require to be in all men. Mat. 5. 14.

13 But they bring another proofe of their perfection, which they thinke to be most strong for them. For the Lord said to the young man that asked him of the perfection of righteousnesse. If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast and give it to the poore. Whether they doe so or no, I do not yet dispute: but grant them that for this present. Therefore they boast that they be made perfect by forsaking all their's. If the sum of perfection stand in this, what meaneth Paul when he teacheth that he which hath distributed all his goods to the poore, unlesse hee have charity, is nothing? What manner of perfection is this, which if charity bee absent, is brought with man to nothing? Here they must needs answer, that this is the chiefest indeed, but not the onely worke

Nothing lesse than Monkish perfection meant by Christ in saying, if thou wilt be perfect, sell all and give. Matt. 19. 21.

Col.3.14. worke of perfection. But here also Paul crieth against them, which thinck not to make charitie the bond of perfection, without any such forsaking. If it be graunted that betweene the master and the disciple is no disagreement, and the one of them cleerely denieth the perfection of man to consist in this that he should forsake all his goods, and againe affirmeth, that perfection is without it: we must see how that saying of Christ is to be taken, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast. Now, it shall be no darke sense, if we weigh (which we ought alway to marke in all the preachings of Christ) to Luk.20.25. whom these words bee directed. A young man asketh, by what works hee shall enter into everlasting life. Christ, because hee was asked of works, sendeth him to the law, and rightfully: for it is the way of eternall life, if it be considered in it selfe, and is no otherwise unable to bring salvation unto us but by our owne perverseness. By this answer Christ declareth, that hee teached no other rule to frame life by, than the same that hee had in old time beene taught in the law of the Lord. So did he both give witnesse to the law of God, that it was the doctrine of perfect righteousnesse: and therewithall did meete with slanders, that he should not seeme by a new rule of life to stirre the people to forsaking of the law. The young man being indeede not of an evill mind, but swelling with vaine confidence, answered that he had from his childhood kept all the commandements of the law. It is most certaine that he was an infinite space distant from that to which hee boasteth that he had attained. And if his boasting had beene true, he had wanted nothing to the highest perfection. For we have before shewed, that the law containeth in it selfe perfect righteousnesse: and the same appeareth hereby that the keeping of it is called the way of eternall salvation. That he might bee taught to know how little he had profited in that righteousnesse, which he had too boldly answered that hee had fulfilled, it was profitable to shake out a familiar fault of his. When hee aboundeth in riches, hee had his heart fastened upon them. Therefore because he felt not this secret wound, Christ launced him. Goe (saith he) sell all that thou hast. If hee had beene so good a keeper of the law as he thought he was, hee would not have gone away sorrowfull when hee heard this word. For who so loveth God with all his heart, whatsoever disagreeth with the love of him, he not onely taketh it for dung, but abhorreth as bringing destruction. Therefore whereas Christ commandeth the covetous rich man to leave all that he hath, it is all one, as if he should command the ambitious man to forsake all honours, the voluptuous man all delightes, and the unchaste man all the instruments of lust. So consciences that are touched with no feeling of generall admonition, must bee called backe to the particular feeling of their owne evill. Therefore they doe in vaine draw this speciall case to generall exposition, as though Christ did set the perfection of a man in forsaking of goods, whereas hee meant nothing else by this saying, than to drive the young man that stood too much in his owne conceit, to feele his owne sore, that he might understand that he was yet a great way distant from perfect obedience of the law, which otherwise he did falsely take upon him. I grant that this place hath beene evill understood of some of the Fathers, and that thereupon grew this coveting of willfull povertie, whereby they onely were thought to bee blessed, which forsaking all earthly things, did dedicate themselves naked to Christ. But I trust that all the good and not contentious men will be satisfied with this my exposition, so that they shall no more doubt of the meaning of Christ.

Popish Monks how unlike to the Monks of old even in respect of their very order and profession.

14 Howbeit the Fathers thought nothing lesse, than to stablish such perfection, as hath since been framed by the couled sophisters, thereby to raise up a double Christianitie. For that doctrine full of sacriledge was not yet borne, which compareth the profession of monkerie to baptisme, yea and openly affirmeth, that it is a forme of second baptisme. Who can doubt that the Fathers with all their heart abhorred this blasphemie? Now as touching that last thing, which Augustine saith to have been among the old Monks, that is, that they applyed themselves wholy to Charitie: what neede I to shew in words that it is most far from this new profession? The thing it selfe speaketh, that all they that goe into Monasteries, depart from the Church. For why? Do not they sever themselves from the lawful fellowship of the faithfull in taking to themselves a peculiar ministerie & private ministration of Sacraments? What is it to dissolve the communion of the Church, if this bee not it? And that I may follow the comparison which I began to make, and may once conclude it, what have they in this behaue like to the old Monks? They, although they dwelt severally from other men, yet had not a severall Church: they did partake of the Sacraments together with other: they appeared at solemne assemblies; there they were a part of the people. These men in erecting to themselves a private Altar, what have they else done, but broken the bond of unity? For they have both excommunicate themselves from the whole body of the Church, and have despised the ordinary Ministery, whereby the Lord willed to have peace and charity kept among his. Therefore how many Ministeries there be at this day, I say that there be so many assemblies of schismaticks, which troubling the order of the Church, are cut off from the lawfull fellowship of the faithfull. And that this departing should not be secret, they have given to themselves divers names of Sects. Neither were they ashamed to boast of that, which Paul doth so detest, that he cannot sufficiently amplifie the hainousnesse of it. Unlesse perhaps wee thinke that Christ was divided of the Corinthians, when one gloried of one teacher, and another of another: and that now it is done without any injury to Christ, that in stead of Christians, wee heare some called Benedictines, some Franciscanes, some Dominicanes: and that they are so called, that they themselves when they covet to be severally knowne from the common sort of Christians, doe with great pride take these titles to them, for the possession of their Religion.

15. These differences which I have hitherto rehearsed betweene the old Monks, and the Monks of our age, are not differences in manners, but in the profession it selfe. Therefore let the Readers remember, that I have rather spoken of Monkery, than of Monks, and have touched those faults, not which sticke in the life of a few of them, but which cannot be severed from their very order of living it selfe. But what difference is in their manners, what need I particularly to declare? This is certaine, that there is no degree of men more defiled with all filthinesse of vices; no where more are factions, hatreds, affections of parties, ambitions hotter than among them. Indeed in a few Monasteries they live chastly, if it bee to bee called chastity where lust is so farre kept downe, that it be not openly spoken off: yet a man shall scarcely finde every tenth Monastery, which is not rather a Stew, than a holy house of chastity. But what honest sparing is in their diet? Swine bee none otherwise fatted in styes. But lest they should complaine that I handle them too ungently, I goe no further. Howbeit in those few things which I have touched, whosoever knoweth the thing it selfe will confesse that there is nothing spoken accuser-like. Augustine, when according to his testimony, Monks excelled in so great chastity, yet complaineth that there were many vagabonds, which with evill crafts and deceits wiped simple men from their money, which with carrying about the reliques of Martyrs, did use filthy merchandizings, yea, and in stead of the reliques of Martyrs, did shew forth the bones of any other dead men, and which with many such wicked doings slandered the order. As hee reporteth that hee saw no better men than them which have profited in Monasteries, so hee lamenteth that he had seene no worse men than those that disprofited in Monasteries. What would he say if at this day he saw all Monasteries to swell, and in a manner to burst with so many and so despaired vices? I speake nothing but that which is well knowne to all men. Yet doth not this dispraise pertaine to all without any exception at all. For as there was never rule and discipline of living so holily stablished in Monasteries, but that there remained some Drones much unlike the rest; so I doe not say that Monks are at this day so runne out of kinde from that holy antiquity, but that they have yet some good men in their flocke. But they lie hidden, a few, and scattered in that huge multitude of naughty and wicked men; and they are not onely despised, but also lewdly railed at, and sometime cruelly handled of other, which (as the Milesians proverb is) thinke that there ought to be no place for any honest men among them.

16. *By this comparison of the old and present Monkery, I trust I have brought to passe that which I purposed, that it may appeare that our cowled men doe falsly pretend the example of the first Church for defence of their profession; for as much as they

A greater difference in the manners of these new, and those ancient Monks.

 Somewhat amisse even in the very profession of Monkery which was of old.*

they no lesse differ from them, than Apes from men. In the meane time I sticke not to declare, that even in which old forme that Augustine commendeth, there is somewhat which little pleaseth mee. I grant that they were not superstitious in exacting the outward exercises of rougher discipline, but I say that there wanted not too much affectation and wrongfull zeale. It was a goodly thing, forsaking their goods, to be without all earthly carefulnesse: but God more esteemeth care to rule a household godlily, when an holy householder, being loose and free from all covetousnesse, ambition, and other desires of the flesh, travelleth to this purpose to serve God in a certaine vocation. It is a godly thing to play the Philosopher in Wildernesse farre from the company of men: but it agreeth not with Christian gentlenesse, as it were for hatred of mankinde, to flie into desart and solitarinesse, and therewithall to forsake those duties which the Lord hath chiefly commanded. Although we grant that there was no other evill in that profession, yet this verily was no small evill, that it brought an unprofitable and perillous example into the Church.

The vowes wherewith Monks at this day enter into that order; as first perpetuall virginity.

17. Now therefore let us see what manner of vowes they be, wherewith Monks at this day are professed into this goodly order. First, because their minde is to institute a new and faigned worshipping, to deserve Gods favour: I concluded by the things afore spoken, that whatsoever they vow is abominable before God. Secondly, without any regard of Gods calling, without any his allowance, they invent for them such a kinde of living as pleaseth themselves. I say that it is a rash, and therefore an unlawfull enterprize; because their conscience hath nothing whereupon it may uphold it selfe before God; and whatsoever is not of faith, is sinne. Moreover, when they binde themselves to many perverse and wicked worshippings, which the Monkery at this day containeth in it, I affirme that they bee not consecrate to God, but to the Devill. For why was it not lawfull for the Prophet to say, that the Israelites offered their children to Devils and not to God, onely for this that they had corrupted the true worshipping of God with prophane Ceremonies: and shall it not bee lawfull for us to say the same of Monks, which with their Cowle doe put upon themselves a snare of a thousand wicked superstitions? Now what sorts of vowes are there? They promise to God perpetuall virginity, as though they had bargained with God before, that hee should deliver them from need of marriage. There is no cause why they should alleage, that they doe not make this vow, but trusting upon the grace of God. For sith hee pronounceth that he giveth it not to all men, it is not in us to conceive a confidence of a speciall gift. Let them that have it use it. If at any time they feele themselves to bee troubled of their flesh, let them flee to this helpe, by whose onely power they may resist. If they prevaile not, let them not despise the remedy that is offered them. For they by the certaine Word of God are called to marriage, to whom power of continence is denied. Continence I call, not whereby the body is onely kept cleane from whoredome, but whereby the minde keepeth chastity undefiled. For Paul commandeth not onely outward wantonnesse, but also the burning of the minde to bee avoided. This (say they) hath from furthest time of memory beene observed, that they which would dedicate themselves wholly to the Lord, should binde themselves to the vow of continence. I grant indeed that this manner hath also beene of ancient time received; but I doe not grant that this age was so free from all fault, that whatsoever was then done must bee taken for a rule. And by little and little this unappeaseable severity crept in, that after a vow made there was no roome for repentance. Which is evident by Cyprian. If Virgins have of faith dedicated themselves to God, let them continue shamefastly and chastly without any faining. So being strong and stedfast, let them looke for the reward of virginity. But if they will not or cannot continue, it is better that they should marry, than with their delights fall into the fire. What reproaches would they now spare to teare him withall, that would with such equity temper the vow of continencie? Therefore they are departed farre from that ancient manner, which will not onely admit no moderation or pardon, if any be found unable to performe his vow: but they doe without all shame pronounce that hee sinneth more grievously if he remedie the intemperance of the flesh with taking a wife, than if he defile both his body and soule with whoredome.

18. But

18 But they ſtill enforce the matter, and goe about to ſhew that ſuch a vow was uſed in the Apoſtles time : becauſe Paul ſaith that the widdowes which having beene once received into the publike miniſtery did marrie, denied their firſt faith. But I doe not denie to them, that the widdowes, which bound themſelves and their ſervices to the Church, did therewithall take upon them the bond of continuall unmarried life : not becauſe they repoſed any religion therein, as it afterward began to be uſed : but becauſe they could nor beare that office but being at their owne libertie and looſe from yoke of marriage. But if, when they had once given their faith, they looked backe to new marriages, what was this elſe but to ſhake off the calling of God? Therefore it is no marvell that with ſuch deſires he ſaith that they waxe wanton againſt Chriſt. Afterward to amplifie the matter he ſaith, that they doe ſo not performe that which they have promiſed to the Church, that they doe alſo breake and make voide their firſt faith given in Baptiſme : in which this is comprehended, that every man ſhould anſwer his calling. Unleſſe perhaps you had rather underſtand it thus, that having as it were loſt all ſhame, they did from thenceforth caſt away all care of honeſtie, did give forth themſelves to all wantonneſſe and unchaſtitie, and did in licencious and diſolute life reſemble nothing leſſe than Chriſtian women : which ſenſe I like very well. Therefore we anſwer, that thoſe widowes which were then received to publike miniſtery, did lay upon themſelves a bond to continue unmarried : if they afterward married, we eaſily perceive that that happened to them which Paul ſpeaketh of, that caſting away ſhame they became more wanton than beſeemed Chriſtian women. That ſo they not onely ſinned, in breaking their faith given to the Church, but ſwarved from the common law of godly women. But firſt I denie that they did profeſſe unmarried life for any other reaſon, but becauſe marriage agreed not with that miniſterie which they tooke in hand : and I denie that they did binde themſelves at all to ſingle life, but ſo farre as the neceſſity of their vocation did beare. Againe I doe not grant that they were ſo bound, but that it was then alſo better for them to marrie, than either to be troubled with the prickings of the fleſh, or to fall into any uncleanneſſe. Thirdly I ſay that that age is appointed of Paul, which is commonly out of danger : ſpecially ſith he commandeth them onely to bee choſen, which contented with one marriage have alreadie ſhewed a token of their continencie. And we doe for no other reaſon diſalow the vow of unmarried life, but becauſe it is wrongfully taken for a ſervice of God, and it is raſhly vowed of them to whom power of continence is not given.

The bond of continuall ſingle life otherwiſe than now undertaken of old.
1 Tim. 5. 12.

19 For how was it lawfull to draw this place of Paul to Nuns ? For there were created deaconiſſes, not to delight God with ſinging and with mumbling not underſtoode, and live the reſt of their time idle : but that they ſhould execute publike miniſtration toward the poore, that they ſhould with all ſtudie, earneſtneſſe and diligence endevour themſelves with the duties of charitie. They did not vow unmarried life, to yeeld thereby any worſhip to God, becauſe they abſtained from marriage : but onely becauſe they were thereby the more uncombred to execute their office. Finally they did vow it, neither in the beginning of their youth, nor yet in the middeſt of their flowing age, that they might afterward learne too late by experience into how great a headlong downefall they had throwen themſelves : but when they ſeemed to have paſſed all danger, then they vowed a no leſſe ſafe than holy vow. But (not to enforce their firſt two points) I ſay it was not lawfull to have women received to vow continencie before the age of threeſcore yeeres : foraſmuch as the Apoſtle admitteth onely women of ſixtie yeeres old, and commandeth the younger to marry and bring forth children. Therefore, neither that releaſe made of twelve yeeres, and then twentie, and afterwards of thirtie yeeres can be any way excuſed : and muchleſſe is it tolerable, that ſilly maides, before that they can by age know themſelves, or have any experience of themſelves, are not onely trained by fraud, but conſtrained by force and threatnings to put on thoſe curſed ſnares. I will not tarie upon confuting the other two vowes. Onely this I ſay : beſides this that they be entangled with not a few ſuperſtitions, (as the matter is now a daies) they ſeeme to bee made to this purpoſe, that they which vow them ſhould mocke both God and men. But leaſt wee should seeme too maliciously to shake up every small parcell, we will be content with that generall confutation which is above set.

The way for consciences intangled with rash vowes to unwinde themselves.

20 What manner of vowes be lawfull and acceptable to God, I thinke is sufficiently declared. Yet because sometime unskilfull and fearefull consciences, even when they mislike or disallow any vow, doe nevertheless doubt of the binding, and are greevously tormented, when they both dread to breake their Faith given to God, and on the other side they feare least they should more sinne in keeping it: heere they are to be succoured, that they may winde themselves out of this distresse, But, to take away all doubt at once: I say that all vowes being not lawfull, nor rightly made, as they are nothing worth before God, so ought to be voide to us. For if in contracts of men those promises onely doe bind, in which he with whom we contract, would have us bound: it is an absurditie, that wee should bee driven to the keeping of those things which God doth not require of us: specially sith our workes are no otherwise right, but when they please God, and when consciences have this testimonie that they please him. For this remaineth certaine, whatsoever is not of faith is sinne. Whereby Paul meaneth, that the worke which is taken in hand with doubting, is therefore faultie, because Faith is the root of all good workes, by which we are assured that they be acceptable to God. Therefore if it bee lawfull for a Christian man to goe about nothing without this assuredneſse: if by fault of ignorance they have taken any thing in hand, why should they not afterward give it over when they be delivered from errors? Sith vowes unadvisedly made are such, they doe not onely nothing bind, but are necessarily to be undone. Yea, if they are not onely nothing esteemed, but also are abhominable in the sight of God, as is above shewed? It is needlesse to discourse any longer of a matter not needfull. This one argument seemeth to mee to bee enough to pacifie godly consciences and deliver them from all doubt: that whatsoever works doe not flow out of the pure fountaine and bee not directed to the lawfull end, are refused of God: and so refused that hee no lesse forbiddeth us to goe forward in them, than to begin them. For hereupon followeth, that those vowes which proceed of error and superstition, are both of no value before God, and to be forsaken of us.

Rom. 14 23.

Departure from Monkerie to some other honest kind of life justifiable.

21 Moreover hee that shall know this solution, shall have wherewith hee may defend against the slanders of the wicked, them that depart from Monkerie to some honest kinde of life. They are grievously accused for breach of Faith and perjurie, because they have broken (as it is commonly thought) the insoluble bond wherewith they were bound to God and to the Church. But I say that there was no bond where God doth abrogate that which man confirmeth. Moreover, admitting that they were bound, when they were holden entangled with not knowing of God, and with error: now since they are lightened with the knowledge of the truth, I say that they are therewithall free by the grace of Christ. For if the crosse of Christ have so great effectualneſse, that it looseth us from the curse of the law of God, wherewith wee were holden bound, how much more shall it deliver us from forraine bonds, which are nothing but the snaring nets of Satan? To whomsoever therefore Christ shineth with the light of his Gospell, it is no doubt that he looseth them from all snares which they had put upon themselves by superstition. Howbeit they want not yet another defence, if they were not fit to live unmarryed. For if an impossible vow be a sure destruction of the soule, whom the Lord would have saved and not destroyed: it followeth that we ought not to continue therein. But how impossible is the vow of continence to them that are not indued with a singular gift, we have already taught, and experience speaketh it though I hold my peace. For neither is it unknowne with how great filthineſse almost all monasteries doe swarme. And if any of them seeme honester, and more shamefast than the rest, yet they are not therefore chaste because they suppresse and keepe in the fault of unchastity. So verily God doth with horrible examples take vengeance on the boldneſse of men, which forgetting their owne weakneſse, doe against nature covet that which is denied them, and despising the remedies which the Lord had given them at hand, doe trust that they can with stubbornneſse and obstinacy overcome the disease of incontinencie. For what else shall we call it but stubbornneſse, when one being warned that he needeth marriage, and that the same is given him of the Lord for a remedy, doth not onely despise it, but also bindeth himselfe with an oath to the despising of it?

THE FOVRTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of Sacraments.

BEside the preaching of the Gospell, another helpe of like sort is in the Sacraments: of which to have some certaine doctrine taught, is much behovefull for us, whereby wee may learne both to what end they were ordained, and what is now the use of them. First it is meete to consider what is a Sacrament. It seemeth to me that this shall be a plaine and proper definition, if we say that it is an outward signe, wherewith the Lord sealeth to our consciences the promises of his good will toward us, to sustaine the weakenesse of our faith: and we againe on our behalfes doe testifie our godlines toward him as well before him and the Angels as before men. Wee may also with more briefeneſſe define it otherwise: as to call it a testimony of Gods favour toward us confirmed by an outward signe, with a mutuall testifying of our godlineſſe toward him. Whethersoever you choose of these definitions, it differeth nothing in sense from that definition of Augustine, which teacheth that a Sacrament is a visible signe of a holy thing, or a visible forme of invisible grace: but it doth better and more certainely expresse the thing it selfe. For whereas in that briefeneſſe there is some darkeneſſe, wherein many of the unskilfuller sort are deceived: I thought good in moe words to give a fuller sentence, that there should remaine no doubt.

The definition of a Sacrament.

2 For what reason the old writers used this word in that sense, it is not hard to see. For so oft as the old translator would render in Latine this Greeke word Misterion mysterie, specially when divine matters were intreated of, hee translated it Sacrament. So to the Ephesians, that he might make knowne unto us the Sacraments of his will. Againe, if yet ye have heard the destribution of the grace of God, which is given to me in you, because according to revelation the Sacrament was made knowne to me. To the Colossians, The mystery which hath beene hidden from ages and generations, but now is manifested to his Saints, to whom the Lord would make knowne the riches of this Sacrament, &c. Againe to Timothy, A great Sacrament of Godlineſſe: God is openly shewed in the flesh. He would not say a secret, lest he should seeme to say somewhat under the greatneſſe of the things. Therefore hee hath put Sacrament instead of Secret, but of a holy thing. In that signification it is sometime found among the ecclesiasticall writers. And it is well enough knowne, that those which in Latine are called Sacraments, in Greeke are mysteries: which expressing of one thing in two severall words endeth all the contention. And hereby it came to passe that it was drawne to those signes which had a reverend representation of high and spirituall things. Which Augustine also noteth in one place. It were long (saith he) to dispute of the diversity of signes, which when they pertaine to divine things, are called Sacraments.

The ancient use of the word Sacrament.

Eph. 1. 9. & 3. 2.

Col. 1. 26.

1 Tim. 3. 16.

Epi. 5. ad Marcel.

3 Now of this definition which we have set, we understand that a Sacrament is never without a promise going before it, but rather is adjoyned as a certaine addition hanging to it, to this end that it should confirme and seale the promise it selfe, and make it more approved unto us, yea after a certaine manner ratified. Which meane the Lord foreseeth to bee needfull first for our ignorance and dulneſſe, and then for our weakneſſe: and yet (to speake properly) not so much to confirme his holy word, as to stablish us in the faith thereof. For the truth of God is by it selfe sound and certaine enough, and cannot from any other where receive better confirmation than from it selfe: But our faith, as it is small and weake, unleſſe it bee staid on every side, and bee by all meanes upholden, is by and by shaken, wavereth, staggereth, yea, and fainteth. And herein verily the mercifull Lord according to his great tender kindeneſſe tempereth himselfe to our capacity: that, whereas wee bee naturall men, which alway creeping upon the ground, and sticking fast in the flesh, doe not thinke, nor so much as conceive any spirituall thing, hee vouchsafeth even by these earthly elements

Sacraments ordained of God as seales of his promises, not that they: but we stood in need of confirmation by such meanes.

to guide us unto himselfe, and in the flesh it selfe to set forth a mirror of spirituall good things. For if we were unbodily (as Chrysostome saith) he would have given us the very same things naked and unbodily. Now because we have soules put within bodies, he giveth spirituall things under visible things. Not because there are such gifts planted in the natures of the things which are set forth to us in the Sacraments: but because they were signed by God to this signification.

Hom. 60. ad popul.

With the Sacraments the word of promise to be joyned, not as they joyne it in the Church of Rome, but as Christ, did and taught his disciples after him to doe.

4 And this is it which they commonly say, that a Sacrament consisteth of the word and the outward signe. For we must understand the word to be, not that which being whispered without meaning and Faith, with onely noise as it were with a magicall enchantment hath power to consecrate the element: but which being preached maketh us to understand what the visible signe meaneth. Therefore that which was usually done under the tyranny of the Pope, was not without a great prophaning of the mysteries. For thy thought it enough, if the Priest, while the People stood amazedly gazing at it without understanding, did mumble up the forme of consecration. Yea, they of set purpose provided this, that no whit of doctrine should thereof come to the people: for they speake all things in Latine before unlearned men. Afterward superstition brake out so farre, that they beleeved that the consecration was not formally made, unlesse it were with a hoarse whispering sound which few might heare. But Augustine teacheth farre otherwise of the Sacramentall word. Let the word (saith he) be added to the element, and there shall be made a Sacrament. For whence commeth this so great strength to the water, to touch the body and wash the soule. but by the word making it? not because it is spoken, but because it is beleeved. For in the very word it selfe the sound which passeth is one thing, and the power which abideth is an other. This is the word of Faith which wee preach, saith the Apostle. Whereupon in the Acts of the Apostles it is said, by faith cleansing their hearts. And Peter the Apostle said, by faith, So baptisme also saveth us: not the putting away of the filthinesse of the flesh, but the examination of a good conscience, this is the word of faith which we preach: by which without doubt, that it may be able to cleanse, Baptisme is also hallowed. You see how it requireth preaching, whereupon faith may grow. And we neede not to travell much in prose hereof, forasmuch as it is cleare what Christ did, what he commanded us to doe what the Apostles followed, what the purer Church observed. Yea even from the beginning of the world it is knowne, that so oft as God offered any signe to the holy fathers, there was added an unseparable knot of doctrine, without which our senses should be made amazed with bare beholding. Therefore when we heare mention made of the Sacramentall word, let us understand the promise, which being with a loud voyce preached of the minister, may lead the people thither as it were by the hand, whether the signe tendeth and directeth us.

Hom. in Iohn 13.

Rom. 10. 8. Act. 15. 9. 1 Pet. 3. 21.

A sophisticall dilemma to exclude the use of Sacraments.

5 Neither are some to bee heard which travell to fight against this, with a double horned argument rather subtile than sound. Either (say they) we know. or we know not, that the word of God which goeth before the Sacrament, is the true will of God. If we know it, then we learne no new thing of the Sacrament which followeth after. If we know it not, then neither will the Sacrament teach it: whose whole force standeth in the word. Whereunto let this briefly be for an answer: that the seales which are hanged at patents and other publike instruments, taken by themselves are nothing, forasmuch as they should be hanged in vaine if the parchment had nothing written, in it: yet they doe not therefore not confirme and seale that which is written, when they be added to writings. Neither can they say that this similitude is lately fained by us, which Paul himselfe used, calling circumcision a seale, where he purposely travelleth to prove, that circumcision was not righteousnesse to Abraham, but a sealing of that covenant, by faith whereof hee had already beene justified before. And what, I beseech you is there that may much offend any man, if we teach that the promise is sealed with Sacraments, when of the promises themselves it is evident that one is confirmed with another? For as every one is manifester, so is it more fit to uphold faith. But the Sacraments do both bring most cleare promises, and have this peculiar more than the word, that they lively represent them to us as it were painted out in a table. Neither ought that distinction any thing to move us, which is wont to bee objected,

Rom. 4. 11.

betweene Sacraments and ſeales of patents: that whereas both conſiſt of carnall elements of this world, thoſe cannot ſuffice or be meete to ſeale the promiſes of God, which are ſpirituall and everlaſting, as theſe are wont to be hanged to, for ſealing of the grants of Princes concerning fading and fraile things. For a faithfull man, when the Sacraments are preſent before his eyes, ſticketh not in that fleſhly ſight, but by thoſe degrees of proportion, which I have ſpoken of, he riſeth up with godly conſideration to the high miſteries which lie hidden in the Sacraments.

6 And ſith the Lord calleth his promiſes, covenants: and his Sacraments ſeales of covenants: a ſimilitude may well be brought from the covenants of men. What can a ſow killed worke, if words were not uſed, yea unleſſe they went before: For ſowes are many times killed without any more inward or higher miſterie. What can the giving of a mans right hand doe, ſith oftentimes hands are matched with enmitie? But when words have gone before, by ſuch ſignes the lawes of leagues are eſtabliſhed, although they were firſt conceived, made, and decreed in words. Therefore Sacraments are exerciſes which make the credit of the word of God certainer unto us: and becauſe we are carnall, they are delivered under carnall things, that ſo they ſhould inſtruct us according to the capacitie of our dulneſſe, and guide us by the hand as ſchoolmaſters guide children. For this reaſon Auguſtine calleth a Sacrament, a viſible word: becauſe it repreſenteth the promiſes of God: as it were painted in a table, and ſetteth them before our ſight cunningly expreſſed and as in an image. Other ſimilitudes alſo may be brought, whereby Sacraments may be more plainly ſet out, as if we call them pillars of our faith. For a building ſtandeth and reſteth upon the foundation: yet by ſetting under of pillars, it is more ſurely ſtabliſhed: ſo, Faith reſteth upon the word of God, as upon a foundation: but when Sacraments are added: it ſtaieth yet more ſoundly upon them as upon pillars. Or if we call them looking glaſſes, in which we may behold the riches of the grace of God, which he giveth us. For (as wee have alreadie ſaid) he doth in them manifeſtly ſhew himſelfe to us, ſo much as is given to our dulneſſe to know, and doth more expreſly teſtifie his good will and love toward us than by his word.

Sacraments as ſeales, pictures, pillars, glaſſes. Gen. 6. 18. & 9. 9. & 17. 11.

In Ioh. hom. lib. 19. cont. Fauſt.

7 Neither doe they reaſon fitly enough to the purpoſe, when they labour to prove hereby that they are not teſtimonies of the grace of God, becauſe they are alſo given to the wicked, which yet doe thereby feele God nothing more favourable to them but rather procure to themſelves more grievous damnation. For by the ſame argument neither ſhould the Goſpell, which is heard and deſpiſed of many, bee the teſtimonie of the grace of God: nor yet Chriſt himſelfe, which was ſeene and knowne of many, of whom very few received him. The like wee may alſo ſee in patents. For a great part of the multitude laugheth at and ſcorneth that authentike ſeale, howſoever they know that it proceeded from the Prince to ſeale his will withall: ſome regard it not, as a thing not pertaining to them: ſome alſo abhor it: ſo that conſidering this ſo equall relation to both, the ſame ſimilitude which I have above uſed, ought more and more to be liked. Therefore it is certaine that the Lord doth offer vnto us mercie and a pledge of his grace both in his holy word and in the Sacraments: but the ſame is not received but of them which receive the word and Sacraments with ſure faith: like as Chriſt is offered of the Father unto ſalvation to all, yet hee is not acknowledged and received of all. Auguſtine in one place minding to declare the ſame, ſaid that the effectualneſſe of the word is ſhewed forth in the Sacrament: not becauſe it is ſpoken, but becauſe it is beleeved. Therefore Paul, when he ſpeaketh to the faithfull, ſo intreateth of Sacraments that he includeth the communion of Chriſt in them, as when he ſaith: all yee that are Baptiſed, have put on Chriſt. Againe, we are all one body and one ſpirit, which are Baptiſed in Chriſt. But when he ſpeaketh of the wrongfull uſe of the Sacraments, hee giveth no more to it than to cold and void figures. Whereby he ſignifieth, that howſoever the wicked and hypocrites with their perverſeneſſe doe either oppreſſe or darken or hinder the effect of the grace of God in the Sacraments, yet that withſtandeth not but that where and ſo oft as it pleaſeth God, both they may bring a true teſtimonie of the communicating of Chriſt, and the Spirit of God himſelfe may deliver and performe that which which they promise. Wee determine therefore that Sacraments are truly called testimonies of the grace of God, and as it were certaine seales of the good will which hee beareth towards us: which by sealing it unto us, doe by this meanes sustaine, nourish, confirme, and increase our faith. As for the reasons which some are wont to object against this sentence, they are too trifling and weake. They say that if our faith be good it cannot be made better: for they say that it is no faith, but which without shaking,

Luke 17.5. stedfastly, and without withdrawing, resteth upon the mercy of God. It had beene better for such to pray with the Apostles that the Lord would increase their faith, than carelessly to pretend such a perfection of faith, which never any of the sonnes of men hath obtained, nor any shall obtaine in this life. Let them answer, what manner of faith they Marke 9.24. thinke that hee had which said. I beleeve Lord, helpe my unbeleevingnesse. For even that faith, howsoever it was but a begun faith, was a good faith, and might bee made better when unbeleevingnesse were taken away. But they are confuted by no more certaine argument than by their owne conscience. For if they confesse themselves sinners, (which whether they will or no they cannot deny) they must needs impute the same to the imperfection of their faith.

Although we beleeve with all our hearts, and although it be the worke of the holy Ghost to begin, maintaine and make perfect faith, yet are not the Sacraments hereby proved uneffectuall to the increase of faith.
Act 8 37. Eph 4.13. Psall. 119.10. & 111.1.&c. 138.1. Psal.12.3.

8 But (say they) Philip answered the Eunuch, that he might be baptized, if he beleeved with all his heart. What place here hath the confirmation of Baptisme, where faith filleth the whole heart? Againe, I aske them whether they doe not feele a good part of their heart voide of faith: whether they doe not daily acknowledge new increases. The heathen man gloried that he waxed old with learning. Therefore we Christians bee thrise miserable, if wee wax old with profiting nothing, whose faith ought to goe forward by all degrees of ages, till it grow into a perfect man. Therefore in this place to beleeve with all the heart, is not perfectly to beleeve Christ, but onely from the heart and with a sincere minde to embrace him: not to be full with him, but with fervent affection to hunger, and thirst, and sigh toward him. This is the manner of the Scripture, to say that that is done with the whole heart, which it meaneth to be done sincerely and heartily. Of this sort are these sayings: I have in all my heart sought thee: I will confesse to thee in all my heart, and such other. As on the other side, where hee rebuketh guilefull and deceitfull men, he useth to reproch them with heart and heart. Then they say further, that if faith be increased by Sacraments, the holy Ghost is given in vaine, whose strength and worke it is to begin, maintaine, and make perfect faith. To whom indeed I grant, that faith is the proper and whole worke of the holy Ghost, by whom being inlightened wee know God and the treasure of his goodnesse, and without whose light our minde is so blinde, that it can see nothing, so senseless, that it can smell nothing of spirituall things. But for one benefit of God which they set forth, we confider three. For first the Lord teacheth and instructeth us with his word: then he strengtheneth us with Sacraments: Last of all hee shineth into our minds with the light of his holy spirit, and openeth an entry for the word and Sacraments into our hearts, which otherwise should but strike our eares, and be present before our eies, and nothing move the inward parts.

How Sacraments are said to confirme faith.

9 Wherefore as touching the confirmation and increase of faith, I would have the reader warned (which I thinke I have already in plaine words expressed) that I doe so assigne that ministery to the Sacraments, not as though I thought that there is perpetually in them I wot not what secret force, by which they may of themselves be able to further or confirme faith: but because they are ordained of the Lord to this end, that they should serve to the stablishing and increasing of faith. But then only they do truly perform their office, when that inward schoolemaster the spirit is come to them, with whose onely power both the hearts are pearced, and affections are moved, and the entry is set open for the Sacraments into our soules. If he be absent, Sacraments can doe no more to our mindes, than if either the brightnesse of the sunne should shine upon blind eyes, or a voyce sound to deafe eares. Therefore I to make devision betweene the spirit and Sacraments, that the power of working remaine with the spirit, and to the Sacraments bee left only the ministration, yea and the same voide and trifling without the working of the spirit: but of much effectualnesse, when he inwardly worketh and putteth forth his force. Now it is plaine in what sort according to this sentence, a godly mind is confirmed in the faith by Sacraments: that is to say, even as the eyes see by the brightnesse of the Sunne, and the eares heare by the sound of a voice: of which neither the eyes should any whit perceive any light, unlesse they had a sight in themselves that might naturally bee inlightned, and the eares should in vaine be knocked at with any crying whatsoever it were, unlesse they were naturally made fit to heare. But if it be true, which ought at once to be determined among us, that what the sight worketh in our eies to seeing of the light, what the hearing worketh in our eares to the perceiving of a voice, the same is the worke of the holy Ghost in our hearts, both to the conceiving, and sustaining, and cherishing and stablishing of faith: then both these things doe likewise follow: that the Sacraments doe nothing at all profit without the power of the holy Ghost: and that nothing withstandeth but that in hearts already taught of that schoolemaster, they may make faith both stronger and more increased. Only this difference there is, that the power of hearing and seeing is naturally set in our eares and eyes: but Christ beside the measure of nature doth by speciall grace worke the same in our mindes.

By this doctrine concerning the force of Sacraments nothing taken from the power of the holy Ghost.

10 Whereby those objections also, which comber some men, are dissolved: That if we ascribe to creatures either the increase or confirmation of faith, there is wrong done to the spirit of God, whom we ought to acknowledge the onely author thereof. For neither doe we in the meane time take from him either the praise of confirming or increasing it: but rather we affirme, that even this that he encreaseth and confirmeth faith, is nothing else but with his inward enlightning to prepare our minds to receive that confirming which is set forth by the Sacraments. But if it bee yet too darkly spoken, it shall bee made very cleere by a similitude which I will bring. If thou purpose with words to perswade a man to doe any thing, thou wilt search out all the reasons, whereby he may be drawen to thy opinion, and may be in a manner subdued to obey thy counsell. But thou hast hitherto nothing prevailed, unlesse hee likewise have a pearcing and sharp judgement, whereby he may weigh what pith is in thy reasons, unlesse also he have a tractable wit and ready to hearken to teaching: finally unlesse hee have conceived such an opinion of thy faithfulnesse and wisedome, as may bee to him like a certaine fore-judgement to cause him to subscribe. For both there are many stubborne heads, which a man can never bow with any reasons: and also where credit is suspected, where authoritie is despised little good is done even with the willing to learne. On the other side let all those things bee present, they will truly bring to passe that the hearer, to whom thou giveest counsell, will obey the selfe same counsels which otherwise he would have laughed to scorne. The same worke also the spirit worketh in us. For least the word should beate our eares in vaine, lest the Sacraments should strike our eyes in vaine, hee sheweth us that it is God which speaketh therein, he softeneth the stubbornnesse of our heart, and frameth it to the obedience which is due to the word of the Lord. Finally he conveyeth those outward words and Sacraments from the eares into the soule. Therefore both the word and the Sacraments doe confirme our faith, when they set before our eyes the good will of the heavenly Father toward us, by knowledge of whom both the whole stedfastnesse of our faith standeth fast, and the strength of it encreaseth: the spirit confirmeth it, when in ingraving the same confirmation in our minds hee maketh it effectuall. In the meane time the father of lights cannot bee forbidden, but as he enlightneth the bodily eyes with the beames of the Sunne, so he may enlighten our mindes with Sacraments, as with a brightnesse set meane betweene.

As by the Sacraments so also by the word, faith sowne increased and brought to ripenesse through the forcable operation of the spirit Matt 13.4. Luk.8.15.

11 Which property the Lord taught that there was in his outward word, when in the parable he calleth it seed. For as seed, if it fall upon a desert and untilled piece of ground, will doe nothing but die: but if it be throwen upon arable land well manured and tilled, it will bring forth her fruit with very good increase: so the word of God, if it light upon a stiffe necke, it will grow barren as that which is sowen upon sand: but if it light upon a soule manured with the hand of the heavenly spirit, it will bee most fruitfull. But if there be like reason of seed and of the word: as we say that out of seed corne both springeth and increaseth, and groweth up to ripenesse: why may we not say that faith taketh out of the word of God both beginning, increase, and perfection? Paul very well expreſſeth both theſe things in ſundry places, For when he goeth about to put the Corinthians in remembrance how effectually God uſed his travaile, he glorieth that hee hath the miniſtery of the Spirit, as though the power of the holy Ghoſt, were with an unſeparable knot ioyned with his preaching, to inlighten and throughly move the mind. But in another place when hee mindeth to admoniſh them, of what force the word of God is of it ſelfe being preached by man, hee compareth the miniſters themſelves to husbandmen, which when they have beſtowed their labour and travaile in tilling the earth have no more to doe. But what ſhould tilling, and ſowing, and watering profit unleſſe that which is ſowen ſhould receive livelineſſe by heavenly benefit? Therefore he concludeth, that both hee that planteth and he that watereth are nothing: but that all things are to bee aſcribed to God, which alone giveth the increaſe Therefore the Apoſtles doe in their preaching utter the power of the ſpirit, ſo farre as God uſeth the inſtruments ordained by himſelfe to the ſetting forth of his ſpirituall grace. Yet wee muſt keepe ſtill that diſtinction, that we remember, what man is able to doe by himſelfe, and what is proper to God,

When Sacraments are removed to take away men's confidence in thoſe things which thereby were confirmed: this doth ſhew them to be meanes whereby faith groweth, yet ſo that no power proper unto God be tranſcribed from him to them.

Epheſ. 2. 12.

12 Sacraments are ſo confirmations of our faith, that many times when the Lord meaneth to take away the confidence of the very things that are by him promiſed in the Sacraments, hee taketh away the Sacraments themſelves. When hee ſpoileth and thruſteth away Adam from the gift of immortalitie, hee ſaith: Let him not eat of the fruit of life, leſt he live for ever. What ſaith hee? Could that fruit reſtore to Adam his uncorruption, from which he was now fallen? No. But this is all one as if he had ſaid: Leſt he ſhould enjoy a vaine confidence if hee keepe ſtill the ſigne of my promiſe, let that bee ſhaken away from him which might bring him ſome hope of immortalitie. After this manner when the Apoſtle exhorteth the Epheſians to remember that they were forraine gueſts of the Teſtaments, ſtrangers from the fellowſhip of Iſrael, without God, without Chriſt, he ſaith, that they were not partakers of circumciſion. Whereby hee doth (by figure of tranſnomination) ſignifie that they were excluded from the promiſe it ſelfe. which had not received the ſigne of the promiſe, To their other objection, that the glory of God is conveyed to creatures, to whom ſo much power is aſcribed, and that thereby it is ſo farre diminiſhed, we have in readineſſe to anſwer that we ſet no power in creatures. Only this we ſay, that God uſeth meanes and inſtruments, which hee himſelfe ſeeth to bee expedient: that all things may ſerve his glory, foraſmuch as hee is Lord and judge of all. Therefore as by bread and other nouriſhments he feedeth our body: as by the Sunne hee enlightneth the world: as by fire he warmeth: yet neither Bread, nor the Sunne, nor fire, are any thing but ſo far as by thoſe inſtruments hee doth diſtribute his bleſſings unto us: ſo ſpiritually hee nouriſheth Faith by the Sacraments, whoſe onely office is to ſet his promiſes before our eyes to bee looked upon, yea to bee pledges unto us of them. And as it is our dutie to faſten none of our affiance in other creatures, which by the liberality and bountifulneſſe of God are ordained to our uſes, and by the miniſtery whereof he giveth us his giftes, nor to have them in admiration, and praiſe them as cauſes of our good: ſo neither ought our confidence to ſticke faſt in the Sacraments, nor the glory of God to bee remooved unto them: but leaving all things, both our faith and confeſſion ought to riſe up to him the Author both of the Sacraments and of all things.

The word ſacrament tranſlated from military unto Chriſtian profeſſion: the power which Sacraments have in augmenting Faith not there by diſproved.

13 Whereas ſome bring an argument out of the very name of a Sacrament, it is nothing ſtrong. A Sacrament (ſay they) whereas it hath among allowed Authors many ſignifications yet it hath but one which agreeth with the ſignes: that is, whereby it ſignifieth that ſolemne oath which the ſouldier maketh to his Captaine when he entreth into profeſſion of a ſouldier. For as by that oath of warfare new ſouldiers doe bind their faith to the Captaine, and profeſſe to be his ſouldiers: ſo by our ſignes we profeſſe Chriſt our Captaine, and doe teſtifie that we ſerve under his banner. They adde ſimilitudes to make thereby the matter more plaine. As a gowne made the Romans ſeverally knowne from the Greekes which did weare cloakes: as the very degrees of men at Rome were diſcerned by their ſeverall ſignes: the degree of Senators from the degree of Knights, by purple coat and picked ſhooes: againe a Knight from a Commoner, moner, by a Ring: so wee beare our signes that may make us severally knowne from prophane men. But by the things above said it is evident enough, that the old Writers, which gave to the signes the name of Sacraments, had no regard how this word was used among Latine Writers, but for their owne purpose feigned this signification, whereby they signified only holy signes. But if we will search the matter more deeply, it may seeme that they have with the same relation applied the word to the same signification, wherewith they have removed the name of Faith to that sense wherein it is now used. For whereas Faith is a truth in performing promises; yet they have called Faith an assuredneſse, or sure perswasion which is had of the truth it selfe. Likewise, whereas a Sacrament is the souldiers part whereby hee voweth himselfe to his Captaine; they have made it the Captaines part, whereby he receiveth souldiers into rooms of service. For by the Sacrament the Lord doth promise that hee will bee our God. and that we shall be his people. But we passe over such subtilties, for as much as I thinke I have proved with arguments plaine enough, that they had respect to nothing else but to signifie that these are signes of holy and spirituall things. We receive indeed the similitudes which they bring of outward tokens; but wee allow not that that which is the last point in the Sacrament, is by them set for the chiefe, yea and onely thing. But this is the first point, that they should serve our faith before God; the latter point, that they should testifie our confession before men. According to this latter consideration those similitudes have place. But in the meane time let that first part remaine; because otherwise (as we have already proved) the mysteries should be but cold, unlesse they were helps to our faith, and additions to doctrine, ordained to the same use and end.

14. Againe, we must be warned, that as these men doe weaken the force, and utterly overthrow the use of Sacraments; so on the contrary side there be some, which feigne to Sacraments I wot not what secret vertues, which are no where read to be put in them by God. By which errour the simple and unskilfull are dangerously deceived, while they are both taught to seeke the gifts of God where they cannot bee found, and are by little and little drawne away from God, to embrace meere vanity in stead of his verity. For the Sophisticall Schooles have taught with great consent, that the Sacraments of the new law, that is to say, those which are now in use in the Christian Church doe justifie and give grace, so that we doe not lay a stop of deadly sinne. It cannot bee expressed how pernitious and pestilent this opinion is, and so much the more, because in many ages heretofore, to the great losse of the Church, it hath prevailed in a great part of the world. Truly it is utterly devillish. For when it promiseth righteousneſse without faith, it driveth soules headlong into destruction; then because it fetcheth the cause of righteousneſse from the Sacraments, it bindeth the miserable minds of men, already of their owne accord too much bending to the earth, with this superstition, that they rather rest in the sight of a bodily thing, than of God himselfe. Which two things I would to God we had not so proved in experience, so little need they any long proofe. But what is a Sacrament taken without faith, but the most certaine destruction of the Church? For whereas nothing is to be looked for thereof without the promise, and the promise doth no lesse threaten wrath to the unfaithfull, than it offereth grace to the faithfull: he is deceived that thinketh that there is any more given to him by the Sacraments, than that which being offered by the Word of God, he receiveth by faith. Whereupon another thing also is gathered, that the assurance of salvation hangeth not upon the partaking of the Sacrament, as though Justification consisted therein, which we know to be reposed in Christ onely, and to be communicated unto us no lesse by the preaching of the Gospell, than by the sealing of the Sacrament; and that without that it cannot wholly stand. So true is that which Augustine also writeth, that invisible sanctification may be without a visible signe; and againe, that a visible signe may bee without true sanctification. For (as hee also writeth in another place) men doe put on Christ sometime untill the receiving of a Sacrament, sometime even untill the sanctification of life. And that first point may be common both to good and to evill; but this other is proper to the good and godly.

As by some too little, so by others too much force is ascribed unto Sacraments.

15. Hereupon commeth that distinction if it bee well understood, which the same same Augustine hath often noted, betweene a Sacrament, and the thing of the Sacrament. For it not onely signifieth, that the figure and truth are there contained, but that they doe not so hang together, but that they may be severd; and that even in the very conjoyning the thing must alway be discerned from the signe, that wee give not to the one that which belongeth to the other. He speaketh of the separation, when he writeth that the Sacraments doe worke in the onely Elect that which they figure. Againe, when he writeth thus of the Jewes: When the Sacraments were common to all, the grace was not common, which is the power of the Sacraments. So now also the washing of regeneration is common to all; but the grace it selfe, whereby the members of Christ are regenerate with their head, is not common to all. Againe, in another place of the Supper of the Lord, wee also at this day receive visible meat. But the Sacrament is one thing, and the power of the Sacrament another thing. What is this, that many receive of the Altar and die, and in receiving doe die? For the Lords morsell was poyson to Judas; not because he received an evill thing, but because he being evill, received a good thing evilly. A little after: The Sacrament of this thing, that is, of the unity of the body and bloud of Christ, is somewhere prepared on the Lords Table dayly, somewhere by certaine distances of dayes; and thereof is received unto life to some, and unto destruction to some. But the thing it selfe whereof it is a Sacrament, is received unto life to all men, but unto destruction to no man, whosoever is partaker of it. And a little before he had said; Hee shall not die which eateth: but he which pertaineth to the power of the Sacrament, not to the visible Sacrament: which eateth within, not without: which eateth with heart, not he which presseth with tooth. Thus you heare every where, that a Sacrament is so severed from his owne truth by the unworthinesse of the receiver, that there remaineth nothing but a vaine and unprofitable figure. But that thou maist have not a signe void of truth, but the thing with the signe, thou must conceive by faith the word which is there enclosed. So how much thou shalt by the Sacraments profit in communicating of Christ, so much profit shalt thou take of them.

Christ the substance of all Sacraments, and the onely cause of righteousnesse: the Sacraments effectuall meanes to nourish the knowledge of Christ, though the wicked lacking faith be not nourished by them.
Lib. 4. senten. dist. 1.

16. If this bee somewhat darke because of the shortnesse, I will set it out in moe words. I say that Christ is the matter, (or if thou wilt) the substance of all Sacraments: for as much as in him they have all their perfectnesse, and doe promise nothing without him. So much lesse tolerable is the errour of Peter Lombard, which doth expressly make them causes of righteousnesse and salvation, whereof they bee parts. Therefore bidding all causes farewell which mans wit doth feigne to it selfe, wee ought to stay in this one cause. Therefore how much wee bee by their ministery holpen to the nourishing, confirming, and increasing of the true knowledge of Christ in us, and to the possessing of him more fully, and to the enjoying of his riches, so much effectualnesse they have with us. But that is done when wee doe with true faith receive that which is there offered. Doe the wicked then (wilt thou say) bring to passe by their unthankfulnesse, that the ordinances of God be void, and turne to nothing? I answer, that that which I have said, is not so to be taken, as though the force and truth of the Sacrament did hang upon the state or will of him that receiveth it. For that which God hath ordained, remaineth stedfast, and keepeth still his nature, howsoever men doe varie. But sith it is one thing to offer, another to receive, nothing withstandeth, but that the signe hallowed by the Word of God, may be indeed that which it is called, and keep his owne force; and yet that there come thereby no profit to an evill doer, and wicked man. But Augustine doth in few words well assoile this question. If (saith he) thou receivest carnally, it ceaseth not to be spirituall; but it is not to thee. But as Augustine hath in the aforesaid places shewed, that a Sacrament is a thing nothing worth, if it be severed from the truth thereof; so in another place he giveth warning, that even in the very conjoyning needeth a distinction, lest wee sticke too much in the outward signe. As (saith he) to follow the letter, and so take the signes in stead of the things, is a point of servile weaknesse: so to expound the signes unprofitably, is a point of evill wandering errour. Hee nameth two faults which are here to bee avoided: The one when wee so take the signes, as though they were given in vaine, and when with abasing or diminishing their secret significations by our enviousnesse, wee bring

bring to passe that they bring us no profit at all. The other, when in not raising our minds beyond the visible signe, we give away to the Sacraments the praise of all those good things which are not given us but of Christ onely, and that by the holy Ghost, which maketh us partakers of Christ himselfe: and indeed by the helpe of the outward signes: which if they allure us to Christ, when they be wrested another way, the whole profit of them is unworthily overthrowne.

17 Wherefore let this remaine certaine, that there is no other office of the sacraments than of the word of God: which is to offer and set forth Christ unto us, and in him the treasures of heavenly grace: but they availe or profit nothing, but being received by faith: even as wine, or oyle, or any other liquor, though you powre it on largely, yet it will run beside and perish, unlesse the vessels mouth be open to receive it, and the vessell though it be wet round about on the out side, shall nevertheless remaine void and empty within. Beside this we must beware, lest those things which have been written by the old writers somwhat too gloriously to amplifie the dignity of sacraments, which lead us away into an error neere to this: namely that we should thinke that there is some secret power knit and fastned to the sacraments, that they may of themselves give us the graces of the holy Ghost, like as wine is given in a cup: whereas onely this office is appointed to them by God, to testifie and stablish to us the good will of God toward us, and doe profit no further unlesse the holy Ghost joyne himselfe to them, which may open our minds and hearts, and make us partakers of this testimony, wherin also doe cleerely appeare divers and severall graces of God. For the Sacraments, as we have above touched, are that thing to us of God, which to men are messengers of joyfull things, or earnests in stablishing of bargaines: which doe not of themselves give any grace, but doe tell and shew us, and (as they be earnests and tokens,) doe ratifie unto us those things that are given us by the liberality of God. The holy Ghost (whom the Sacraments doe not in common without difference bring to all men, but whom the Lord peculiarly giveth to them that be his) is he that bringeth the graces of God with him, which giveth to the Sacraments place in us, which maketh them to bring forth fruit. But although wee doe not denie that God himselfe with the most present power of his Spirit is present with his owne institution, lest the ministration which he hath ordained of the Sacraments should be fruitlesse and vaine: yet we affirme that the inward grace of the Spirit, as it is severed from the outward Ministery, so ought to be severally weighed and considered. God therefore truly performeth indeed whatsoever he promiseth and figureth in signes: neither doe the signes want their effect, that the author of them may bee proved true and faithfull. The question here is onely whether God worketh by his owne and by inward power (as they call it) or doe resigne his office to outward signes. But wee affirme, that whatsoever instruments he use, his originall working is nothing hindred thereby. When this is taught concerning the Sacraments, both their dignities is honourably set out, and their use is plainly shewed, and their profitableneſſe is abundantly reported, and the best meane in all these things is retained, that neither any thing be given to them which ought not, nor againe any thing be taken from them which is not convenient to be taken from them. In the meane time that fained devise is taken away, whereby the cause of justification and power of the holy Ghost is inclosed in elements as in vessels or waggons, and that principall force which hath beene omitted of other is expresly set out. Here also it is to be noted, that God inwardly worketh that which the Minister figureth and testifieth by outward doing: lest that be drawne to a mortall man, which God claimeth to himselfe alone. The same thing also doth Augustine wisely touch. How (saith hee) doth both Moses sanctifie, and God? not Moses for God: but Moses with visible Sacraments by his ministery, but God with invisible grace by his holy Spirit: where also is the whole fruit of visible Sacraments. For without this sanctification of invisible grace what doe those visible Sacraments profit?

Christ set forth as by the words, so by the Sacraments, neither available without faith, to whom they are available in them: they work not by secret included force, grace commeth with the Sacraments, not from the sacraments but from God.

Quæstio. vet. testam. lib. 3. c. 84.

18 The name of Sacrament, as we have hitherto entreated of the nature of it, doth generally containe all the signes that ever God gave to men, to certifie and assure them of the truth of his promises. Those hee sometime willed to remaine in naturall things; sometime hee delivered them in miracles. Of the first kinde these bee examples as when he gave to Adam and Eve the tree of life for an earnest of immortalitie, that they might assure themselves of it, so long as they did eate of the fruite thereof. And when hee did set the heavenly bowe for a monument to Noe and his posteritie, that he would no more from thence-forth destroy the earth with overflowing of water. These Adam and Noe had for sacraments. Not that the tree did give them immortalitie, which it could not give so it selfe: nor that the Bowe (which is but a striking backe of a sun-beame upon the clouds against it) was of force to hold in the waters: but because they had a marke graven in them by the word of God, that they should bee examples and seales of his testaments. And the tree was a tree before, and the bowe a bowe. When they were written upon with the word of God, then a new forme was put into them, that they should begin to be that which they were not before. That no man should thinke these things spoken without cause, the bowe it selfe is at this day also a witnesse of that covenant which God made with Noe: which bowe so oft as we behold, we reade this promise of God written in it, that the earth shall never be destroyed with overflowing of waters. Therefore if any fond Philosopher, to scorne the simplicitie of our faith, doe affirme that such varietie of colours doth naturally arise of reflected beames and a cloud set against them: let us grant it indeed, but let us laugh to scorne his senseless follie, which doth not acknowledge God the Lord and governour of nature: which at his owne will useth all the elements to the service of his owne glorie. If he had imprinted such tokens in the sunne, the starres, the earth, stones, and such like, they should all have beene sacraments to us. Why are not uncoined and coined silver both of one value, sith they are both one metall? even because the one hath nothing but nature: when it is striken with a common marke, it is made money, and receiveth a new valuation. And shall not God be able to marke his creatures with his word, that they may be made sacraments, which before were naked elements? Of the second kind these were examples, when hee shewed to Abraham a light in a smoking oven: when he watered the fleece with dewe, the earth remaining drie: againe he watered the earth, the fleece being untouched, to promise victorie to Gideon: when hee drew the shadow of the diall nine lines backward, to promise safetie to Ezechias. These things, when they were done to relieve and stablish the weakenesse of their faith, were then also sacraments.

Sacraments on Gods behalfe testimonies of grace, on ours notes and marks of profession. Lib 9. contra Faust. Manic. 11.

19 But our present purpose is, to discourse peculiarly of those sacraments, which the Lord willed to bee ordinarie in his Church, to nourish his worshippers and servants into one faith and the confession of one faith. For (to use the words of Augustine) men can be congealed together into no name of religion either true or false, unlesse they bee bound together with some fellowship of visible signes and sacraments. Sith therefore the most good Father foresaw this necessitie, he did from the beginning ordaine certaine exercises of godlinesse for his servants, which afterward Satan by turning them to wicked and superstitious worshippings, hath many wayes depraved and corrupted. Hereupon came those solemne professions of the Gentiles into their holie orders, and other bastard usages: which although they were full of errour and superstition, yet they also were therewith a proofe that men could not in profession of religion bee without such outward signes. But because they neither were grounded upon the word of God, nor were referred to that truth whereunto all signes ought to bee directed, they are unworthie to bee rehearsed where mention is made of the holie signes which are ordained of God, and have not swarved from their foundation, that is, that they should be helps of true godlinesse. They consist not of bare signes, as were the bowe and the tree, but upon ceremonies: or rather the signes that bee here given are ceremonies. But as it is above said, that they be on the Lords behalfe testimonies of grace and salvation: so they bee againe on our behalfe marks of profession, by which wee openly sweare to the name of God, for our parts binding our faith unto him. Therefore Chrysostome in one place fitly calleth them covenantings, whereby God bindeth himselfe in league with us, and wee be bound to pureneſſe and holinesse of life, because here is made a mutuall forme of covenanting betweene God and us. For as the Lord therein promiseth that hee will cancell and blot out whatsoever guiltinesse and penaltie wee have gathered by offending, and doth reconcile us to himselfe in his onely begotten sonne: so we againe on our behalfes doe by this profession binde our selves unto him to the following of godlinesse and innocency: so that a man may rightly say that such Sacraments are ceremonies, by which God will exercise his people first to the nourishing, stirring up, and strengthening of faith inwardly, then to the testifying of religion before men.

Sacraments before Christ and after, and the scope of both.

20 And even the Sacraments also were divers, after the divers order of time, according to the distribution whereby it pleaseth the Lord to shew himselfe after this or that manner to men. For to Abraham and his posteritie Circumcision was commanded whereunto afterward purifyings and Sacrifices, and other Ceremonies were added out of the law of Moses. These were the Sacraments of the Jewes untill the comming of Christ: at which comming those being abrogate, two Sacraments were ordained, which now the Christian Church useth, Baptisme, and the Supper of the Lord. I speake of those that were ordained for the use of the whole Church. For as for the laying on of hands, whereby the ministers of the Church are entred into their office, as I doe not unwillingly suffer it to be called a Sacrament, so I doe not reckon it among the ordinarie Sacraments. As for the rest which are commonly called Sacraments, what they are to be accounted, we shall see by and by. Howbeit the old Sacraments also had respect to the same marke, whereunto ours doe tend, that is, to direct and in a manner lead by the hand to Christ: or rather as Images to represent him, and shew him forth to be knowne. For whereas wee have already taught, that they are certaine seales wherewith the promises of God are sealed: and where it is most certaine, that there was never offered any promise of God to men but in Christ: that they may teach us of some promise of God, they must needs shew Christ. Whereunto pertaineth that heavenly paterne of the Tabernacle and of the worshipping in the law, which was given to Moses in the Mount. One onely difference there is, that those did shadow out Christ being promised, when he was yet looked for: these doe testifie him already given and delivered.

1 Cor. 1.30.

The intent of Circumcision, purifyings and sacrifices of the Law.

21 When these things shall all bee particularly and each one severally declared, they shall bee made much plainer. Circumcision was to the Jewes a signe, whereby they were put in minde, that whatsoever commeth of the seed of man, that is to say the whole nature of man is corrupt, and hath need of proyning. Moreover it was a teaching, and token of remembrance, whereby they should confirme themselves in the promise given to Abraham, concerning that blessed seed in whom all the Nations of the earth were to be blessed, from whom they had their owne blessing to bee looked for. Now that healthfull seed (as wee are taught of Paul) was Christ, in whom alone they hoped that they should recover that which they had lost in Adam. Wherefore Circumcision was to them the same thing which Paul saith that it was to Abraham, namely the seale of the righteousnesse of faith: that is to say, the seale whereby they should be more certainely assured, that their faith wherewith they looked for that seed, should be accounted to them of God for righteousnesse. But we shall upon a better occasion in another place goe through with the comparison of Circumcision and Baptisme. Baptisings and purifyings did set before their eyes their owne uncleannesse, filthinesse and pollution, wherewith they were defiled in their owne nature: but they promised another washing, whereby all their filthinesses should bee wiped and washed away. And this washing was Christ, with whose blood we being washed doe bring his cleannesse into the sight of God, that it may hide all our defilings. Their sacrifices did accuse them of their owne wickednesse, and therewithall did teach, that it was necessary that there should be some satisfaction which should be paid to the judgement of God. That therefore there should bee some one chiefe Bishop, a Mediator betweene God and men, which should satisfie God by shedding of blood, and by offering of a sacrifice which should suffice for the forgivenesse of sinnes. This chiefe Priest was Christ: hee himselfe shed his owne blood: he himselfe was the Sacrifice: for hee offered himselfe obedient to his Father unto death: by which obedience hee tooke away the disobedience of man, which had provoked the displeasure of God.

us, as hee was more neerely shewed to men, since hee hath beene truly delivered of his father such as he had beene promised. For Baptisme doth testifie unto us that wee are cleansed and washed, the Supper of thanksgiving testifieth that wee bee redeemed. In water, is figured washing: in bloud, satisfaction. These two things are found in Christ, which (as Iohn saith) came in water and bloud, that is to say, that hee might cleanse and redeeme. Of which thing the Spirit of God also is a witnesse. Yea there are three witnesses in one, Water, Bloud, and Spirit. In water and bloud we have a testimonie of cleansing and redeeming: but the Spirit the principall witnesse bringeth unto us assured credit of such witnessing. This high mysterie hath notably well beene shewed us in the Crosse of Christ, when water and bloud flowed out of his holy side: which side for that cause Augustine rightfully called the fountaine of our Sacraments: of which yet wee must intreat somewhat more at large. There is no doubt but that more plentifull grace also of the Spirit doth here shew forth it selfe if you compare time with time. For that pertaineth to the glory of the kingdome of Christ, as we gather out of many places, but specially out of the seventh Chapter of Iohn. In which sense wee must take that saying of Paul, that under the law were shadowes, but in Christ is the body. Neither is it his meaning to spoile of their effect the testimonies of grace, in which Gods will was in the old time to prove himselfe to the Fathers a true speaker, even as at this day hee doth to us in Baptisme and in the holy Supper. But onely his purpose was by way of comparison to magnifie that which was given us, lest any should thinke it marvellous, that the Ceremonies of the law were abolished by the comming of Christ.

Col. 2.17.

Too great a difference made by Schoolemen betweene the Sacraments of the law and ours.

23 But that same schoole doctrine (as I may also briefly touch this by the way) is utterly to be hissed out, whereby there is noted so great a difference betweene the Sacraments of the old and new law, as though those did nothing but shadow out the grace of God, and these doe presently give it. For the Apostle speaketh no lesse honorably of those than of these, when he teacheth that the Fathers did eat the same spirituall meat which wee eat, and expoundeth that same meat to be Christ. Who dare make that an emptie signe, which delivered to the Jewes a true communion of Christ? And the ground of the cause which the Apostle there handleth, doth plainely fight on our side. For, that no man trusting upon a cold knowledge of Christ, and emptie title of Christianitie, and outward tokens, should presume to despise the judgement of God: hee sheweth forth examples of Gods severitie, to bee seene in the Jewes: that wee should know that the same paines which they have suffered, hang over us, if we follow the same faults. Now that the comparison may bee fit, it behoved that hee should shew that there is no unequalnesse betweene us and them in those good things whereof hee did forbid us to boast falsely. Therefore first hee maketh us equall in the Sacraments, and leaveth to us not so much as any small peece of prerogative, that might encourage us to hope of escaping unpunished. Neither verily is it lawfull to give any more to our Baptisme, than he in another place giveth to Circumcision, when hee calleth it, The seale of the righteousnesse of faith. Whatsoever therefore is at this day given us in our Sacraments, the same thing the Iewes in the old time received in theirs, that is to say, Christ with his spirituall riches. What power our Sacraments have, the same they also felt in theirs: that is to say, that they were to them seales of Gods good will toward them, into the hope of eternall salvation. If they had beene apt expositors of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, they would not have so beene blinded. But when they reade there, that sinnes were not cleansed by the Ceremonies of the law, yea that the old shadowes had no availing force to righteousnesse: they neglecting the comparison which is there handled, while they tooke hold of this one thing, that the law of it selfe nothing profited the followers of it, thought simply that the figures were void of truth. But the Apostles meaning is to bring the ceremoniall law to nothing, untill it come to Christ, upon whom alone hangeth all the effectualnesse of it.

24 But they will object those things which are read in Paul concerning the Circumcision of the letter, that it is in no estimation with God, that it giveth nothing, that it is vaine. For such sayings seeme to presse it downe farre beneath Baptisme. Not so.

For

For the very ſame might rightfully bee ſaid of Baptiſme. Yea and alſo the ſame is ſaid, firſt of Paul himſelfe, where he ſheweth that God regardeth not the outward waſhing whereby we enter into profeſſion of religion, unleſſe the minde within be both clenſed and continue in cleanneſſe to the end: againe of Peter, when he teſtifieth that the truth of Baptiſme ſtandeth not in the outward waſhing, but in a good witneſſing of conſcience. But he ſeemeth alſo in another place utterly to diſpiſe the circumciſion made with hands, when hee compareth it with the circumciſion of Chriſt. I anſwer that even in this place nothing is abated of the dignitie of it. Paul there diſputeth againſt them, which required it as neceſſary when it was now abrogate. Therefore he warneth the faithfull, that leaving the old ſhadows they ſhould ſtand faſt in the truth. Theſe Maſters (ſaith he) inſtantly call upon you, that your bodies may bee circumciſed. But ye are ſpiritually circumciſed according to the ſoule and body. Yee have therefore the deliverance of the thing indeed, which is much better than the ſhadow. A man might take exception to the contrary, and ſay that the figure is not therfore to be deſpiſed becauſe they had the thing indeed? foraſmuch as the putting off of the old man, of which he there ſpeakes, was alſo among the Fathers, to whom yet outward circumciſion had not beene ſuperfluous: Hee preventeth this objection, when he by and by addeth, that the Coloſſians were buried with Chriſt by Baptiſme. Whereby hee ſignifieth that at this day baptiſme is the ſame to Chriſtians, which circumciſion was to the old people: and therfore that circumciſion cannot be enjoyned to Chriſtians without wrong done to Chriſt.

niſh the eſtimation of circumciſion, the ſame in like occaſion and ſenſe might as well be ſaid of Baptiſme.
1 Cor. 10.5.
1 Pet. 3.21.
Col. 2.11.

25 But that which followeth, and which I even now alleadged, is harder to aſſoile, that all the Jewiſh ceremonies were ſhadowes of things to come, and that in Chriſt is the body: but moſt hard of all is that which is intreated in many Chapters of the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes, that the bloud of beaſts, attained not to conſciences: that the law had a ſhadow of good things to come, not an image of things that the followers of it obtained, no perfection of the Ceremonies of Moſes and ſuch other. I goe backe to that which I have already touched, that Paul doth not therefore make the ceremonies ſhadowiſh, becauſe they had no ſound thing in them: but becauſe the fulfilling of them was after a certaine manner hanged in ſuſpence untill the delivering of Chriſt. Againe I ſay that this is to be underſtood not of the effectualneſſe, but rather of the manner of ſignifying. For till Chriſt was manifeſtly ſhewed in the fleſh, all the ſignes did ſhadow him out as abſent, howſoever hee did inwardly utter to the faithfull the preſence of his power and of himſelfe. But this we ought chiefely to marke, that in all thoſe places Paul doth not ſpeake ſimply, but by way of contention. Becauſe hee ſtrived with the falſe Apoſtles, which would have godlineſſe to conſiſt in the ceremonies onely without any reſpect of Chriſt: to confute them it ſufficeth onely to intreate, of what value ceremonies are by themſelves. This marke alſo the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes followed. Let us therefore remember that here is diſputed of ceremonies, not as they be taken in their owne and naturall ſignification, but as they be wreſted to a falſe and wrongfull expoſition: not of the lawfull uſe of them, but of the abuſe of ſuperſtition. What marvell is it therefore if ceremonies being ſevered from Chriſt, are unclothed of all force? For all ſignes whatſoever they be, are brought to nought, when the thing ſignified is taken away. So when Chriſt had to doe with them which thought that Manna was nothing elſe but meate for the belly, he applyeth his ſpeech to their groſſe opinion, & ſaith that he miniſtreth better meat, which may feed ſoules to hope of immortalitie. But if you require a plainer ſolution, the ſumme of all tendeth to this: Firſt, that all that furniture of ceremonies, which was in the law of Moſes, is a vaniſhing thing and of no value, unleſſe it be directed to Chriſt. Secondly, that they ſo had reſpect to Chriſt, that when he at length was manifeſtly ſhewed in the fleſh, they had their fulfilling. Finally, that it behoved that they ſhould be taken away by his comming, even as a ſhadow vaniſheth away in the cleare light of the Sunne. But becauſe I doe yet defer longer diſcourſe of that matter unto that place where I have purpoſed to compare baptiſme with circumciſion, therefore I doe now more ſparingly touch it.

The ſacraments of the law ſhadowes, not in reſpect of their working: but in regard of their manner of ſignifying that which is weight, ſpoken of as things of ſmall account not ſimply but when Chriſt is ſevered from them.

John 6.27.

writers concerning our signes, deceived those miserable Sophisters. As this of Augustine. That the Sacraments of the old law did onely promise the Saviour, but ours doe give salvation. When they marked not that these and such other formes of speaking were spoken: they also published their exceessive doctrines, but in a cleane contrary sense from the writing of the old fathers. For Augustine meant no other thing in that place, than as the same Augustine writeth in another place. That the Sacraments of the law of Moses did foretell of Christ, but ours doe tell of him present. And against Faustus. That those were promises of things to be fulfilled, these were tokens of things fulfilled: as if he should say, that those figured him when he was looked for, but ours doe as it were shew him present which hath beene already delivered. Moreover he speaketh of the manner of signifying, as also he sheweth in another place. The law (saith hee) and the Prophets had Sacraments, foretelling of a thing to come: but the Sacraments of our time do testifie that that is already come, which those did declare to be to come. But what hee thought of the thing and effectualnesse, he expoundeth in many places: as when hee saith, that the Sacraments of the Jewes were in signes, divers: but in the thing signified, equall with ours: divers in visible forme, but equall in spirituall power. Againe: in divers signes is all one faith: so in divers signes, as in divers words: because words change their sounds by times: and truly words are nothing but signes. The Fathers did drinke the same spirituall drink, for they drunke not the same bodily drink. See ye therfore, faith remaining one, the signes varied. To them the rocke was Christ: to us that is Christ, which is set upon the Altar. And they drinke for a great Sacrament, the water flowing out of the rocke: what we drinke, the faithfull know. If thou consider the visible forme they drunke another thing: if an understandable signification they drunke the same spirituall drinke. In another place, in the mystery the same is their meat and drinke which is ours: but the same in signification, not in forme: because the selfe same Christ was figured to them in the rocke, and shewed to us in the flesh. Howbeit in this behalfe also we grant that there is some difference. For both sacraments doe testifie that the fatherly good will of God and the graces of the holy Ghost are offered us in Christ: but our sacraments testifie it more cleerely and brightly. In both is a delivering of Christ: but in these more plenteous and fuller, namely as that difference of the old & new Testament beareth, of which we have intreated before. And this is it that the same Augustine meant (whom we more often alleadge as the best and faithfullest witnes of all the old writers) where he teacheth that when Christ was revealed, sacraments were ordained both in number fewer, in signification higher, in force more excellent. Of this thing also it is expedient that the readers briefly be warned, that whatsoever the Sophisters have triflingly taught concerning the worke wrought, is not onely false, but disagreeth with the nature of the Sacraments, which God hath ordained, that the faithfull being void and needy of all good things should bring nothing thither but beggery. Wherupon followeth that in receiving them, these men doe nothing wherby they may deserve praise: or that in doing (which in this their respect is meerely passive) no worke can be ascribed unto them.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of Baptisme.

The first use of Baptisme to be a token of our cleansing, and therefore not a marke of recognisance, and a signe of profession onely as some would have it.

BAptisme is a signe of the entring wherewith wee are received into fellowship of the Church: that being grafted into Christ, wee may be reckoned among the children of God. Now it was given us of God to this end, (which I have taught to bee common to all the mysteries) first, that it should serve to our Faith with him, and to our confession before men. We will orderly declare the manner of both purposes. Baptisme bringeth three things to our Faith, which also must be severally entreated of. This is the first which the Lord setteth out unto us, that it should be a token and proofe of our cleansing: or (to expresse my minde better) it is like to a certaine sealed Charter, whereby hee confirmeth unto us, that all our sinnes are so defaced, cancelled, and blotted out, that they may never come in his sight, nor be rehearsed, nor be imputed. For he willeth that all they that beleeve, should be baptised into forgivenesse of sinnes. Therefore they which thought that Baptisme is nothing else but a marke and token whereby whereby we profeſſe our religion before men, as ſouldiers beare the cognisance of their Captaine for a marke of their profeſſion, weigh not that which was the chiefe thing in Baptiſme. That is this, that wee ſhould receive it with this promiſe, that whoſoever beleeve and are baptiſed, ſhall be ſaved. Mar. 16. 16.

2 In this ſenſe is that to bee underſtood which Paul writeth, that the Church is ſanctified of Chriſt her ſpouſe, and cleanſed with waſhing of water in the word of life. And in another place, that wee are ſaved according to his mercie by the waſhing of regeneration and of the renuing of the holy Ghoſt. And that which Peter writeth that Baptiſme ſaveth us. For Pauls will was not to ſignifie, that our waſhing and ſalvation is perfectly made by water, or that water containeth in it ſelfe the power to cleanſe, regenerate and renue. Neither did Peter meane the cauſe of ſalvation, but onely the knowledge and certaintie of ſuch gifts to bee received in this Sacrament: which is evidently enough expreſſed in the words themſelves. For Paul knitteth together the word of life, and Baptiſme of water: as if he had ſaid, that by the Goſpell the meſſage of waſhing and ſanctifying is brought us, that by Baptiſme ſuch meſſage is ſealed. And Peter immediately adjoyneth, that that Baptiſme is not the putting away of the filthineſſe of the fleſh, but a good conſcience before God, which is of faith. Yea Baptiſme promiſeth us no other cleanſing, but by the ſprinkling of the bloud of Chriſt: which is figured by water, for the likeneſſe of cleanſing and waſhing. Who therefore can ſay that wee be cleanſed by this water, which certainely teſtifieth that the bloud of Chriſt is our true and onely waſhing? So that from no where elſe can bee fetched a ſurer reaſon to confute their blind error which referre all things to the power of the water, than from the ſignification of Baptiſme it ſelfe: which doth withdraw us as well from that viſible element which is ſet before our eyes, as from all other meanes, that it may binde our mindes to Chriſt alone. Our cleanſing not made by Baptiſme as by a cauſe but manifeſted by it as by a ſigne. Ephe. 5. 26. Tit. 3. 5. 1 Pet. 3 22.

3 Neither is it to be thought that Baptiſme is applyed onely to the time paſt, that for new fallings, into which wee fall backe after Baptiſme, wee muſt ſeeke new remedies of cleanſing, in I wot not what other Sacraments, as though the force of Baptiſme were worne out of uſe. By this errour it came to paſſe in old time, that ſome would not be baptiſed but in the uttermoſt perill of life, and at their laſt gaſpings, that ſo they might obtaine pardon of their whole life. Againſt which wayward ſubtle proviſion the old Biſhops ſo oft inveigh in their writings. But this we ought to thinke, that at what time ſoever wee be baptiſed, we are at once waſhed and cleanſed for all our life. Therefore ſo oft as wee fall we muſt goe backe to the remembrance of Baptiſme, and therewith we muſt arme our minde, that it may bee alway certaine and aſſured of the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes. For though when it is once miniſtred, it ſeemeth to be paſt, yet by latter ſinnes it is not aboliſhed. For the cleanneſſe of Chriſt is therein offered us that alway flouriſheth, is oppreſſed with no ſpots, but overwhelmeth and wipeth away all our filthineſſe: yet ought wee not to take thereof a libertie to ſinne in time to come (as verily wee bee not hereby armed to ſuch boldneſſe) but this doctrine is given onely to them, which when they have ſinned, doe groane wearied and oppreſſed under their ſinnes, that they may have wherewith they may raiſe up and comfort themſelves, leaſt they ſhould fall into confuſion and deſperation. So Paul ſaith, that Chriſt was made to us a Propitiator, unto the forgiveneſſe of faults going before. Wherein he denieth not that therein is obtained perpetuall and continuall forgiveneſſe of ſins even unto death: but he meaneth that it was given of the father, onely to poore ſinners, which wounded with the ſearing iron of conſcience, doe ſigh to the Phiſition. To theſe the mercie of God is offered. They which by eſcaping of puniſhment doe hunt for matter and libertie to ſinne, doe nothing but provoke to themſelves the wrath and judgement of God. Baptiſme a confirmation of the waſhing out of all ſin, and not onely of ſinnes paſt before we be baptiſed. Rom. 3. 25.

4 I know indeed that it is commonly thought otherwiſe: that by the benefit of repentance and of the keyes we doe after Baptiſme obtaine forgiveneſſe, which at our firſt regeneration is given us onely by Baptiſme. But they which deviſe this doe erre herein that they doe not remember that the power of the keyes, whereof they ſpeake, doth ſo hang upon Baptiſme that it ought in no wiſe to bee ſevered. The ſinner receiveth forgiveneſſe by the miniſterie of the Church, namely not without the preaching The force of Baptiſme as well as repentance extended throughout our whole life.

of the Gospell. But what manner of preaching is that? That wee be cleansed from sins by the bloud of Christ. But what signe and testimonie is there of that washing, but Baptisme? We see therefore how that absolution is referred to Baptisme. And this error hath bred us the faigned Sacrament of Penance: of which I have touched somewhat before, and the residue I will make an end of in place fit for it. But it is no marvell if men, which according to the grossenesse of their wit were immeasurably fast tied to outward things, have in this behalfe also bewrayed that fault, that not contented with the pure institution of God, they did thrust in new helps faigned of themselves. As though Baptisme it selfe were not a Sacrament of repentance. But if repentance bee commended to us for our whole life, the force also of Baptisme ought to be extended to the same bounds. Wherefore it is also no doubt but that all the godly throughout all their life long, so oft as they be vexed with knowledge in conscience of their owne sinnes, dare call backe themselves to the remembrance of Baptisme, that thereby they may confirme themselves in the affiance of that onely and continuall washing which we have in the bloud of Christ.

A second use of Baptisme to shew us our mortification and newnesse of life. Rom 6.3.

5 It bringeth also another fruit, because it sheweth us our mortification in Christ, and new life in him. For (as the Apostle saith) we are baptised into his death, being buried together with him into death, that we may walke in newnesse of life. By which words he doth not only exhort us to the following of him (as though he did say, that we are by Baptisme put in minde, that after a certaine example of the death of Christ, wee should die to our lusts: and after the example of his resurrection, wee should be raised up to righteousnesse,) but hee fetcheth the matter much deeper: that is to say, that by Baptisme Christ hath made us partakers of his death, that we may be graffed into it. And as the graffe receiveth substance and nourishment of the roote into which it is graffed: so they that receive Baptisme with such faith as they ought, doe truly feele the effectualnesse of the death of Christ in the mortifying of their flesh: and therewithall also they feele the effect of his resurrection in the quickning of the Spirit. Hereupon hee gathereth matter of exhortation: that if we be Christians, we ought to be dead to sinne, and to live to righteousnesse. This selfe same argument he useth in another place that we be circumcised, and have put off the old man, since that we be buried in Christ by Baptisme. Col.2.11. Tit.3.5. And in this sense, in the same place which we have before alleadged, he called it the washing of regeneration and of renuing. Therefore first free forgivenesse of sinnes and imputation of righteousnesse is promised us, and then the grace of the holy Ghost, which may reforme us into newnesse of life.

A third use of Baptisme to testifie our ingraffing into Christ, and partaking of his graces. Math.3.13. Gal.3.27. Act.8.16.& 19.5. Matt.28.19.

6 Last of all our faith receiveth also this profit of Baptisme, that it certainly testifieth unto us, that we are not onely graffed into the death and life of Christ, but that we are so united to Christ himselfe that wee are partakers of all his good things. For therefore hee hath dedicated and hallowed Baptisme in his owne bodie, that hee might have it common with us, as a most strong bond of the unitie and fellowship which hee vouchsafed to enter into with us: so that Paul proveth thereby that we be the children of God, because we have put on Christ in Baptisme. So we see that the fulfilling of Baptisme is in Christ, whom also for this reason we call the proper object of Baptisme. Therefore it is no marvell if it be reported that the Apostles baptised into his name, which yet were commanded to baptise into the name of the Father also and of the holy Ghost. For whatsoever gifts of God are set forth in Baptisme, are found in Christ alone. And yet it cannot be, but that hee which baptiseth into Christ, doth therewithall call upon the name of the Father and of the holy Ghost. For wee are therefore clensed with his bloud, because the mercifull father according to his incomparable kindnesse, willing to receive us into favour, hath set him a mediatour in the midst to procure to us favour with him. Matt.3.6. Luke 31.6. John 3.23. & 4.1. But regeneration we so onely obtaine, by his death and resurrection, if being sanctified by the spirit wee be endued with a new and spirituall nature. Wherefore both of our clensing and regeneration we obtaine and after a certaine manner distinctly perceive the cause in the Father, the matter in the Sonne, and the effect in the holy Ghost. So John first baptised, so afterward the Apostles, with the baptisme of repentance into the forgivenesse of sinnes: meaning by this word repentance, such regeneration: and by forgivenesse of sinnes, washing.

7 Whereby

7 Whereby alſo it is made moſt certaine, that the miniſterie of Iohn was altogether the ſame which was afterward committed to the Apoſtles. For the divers hands wherewith it is miniſtred, make not the baptiſme divers: but the ſame doctrine sheweth it to be the ſame baptiſme. Iohn and the Apoſtles agreed into one doctrine: both baptiſed into repentance, both into the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, both into the name of Chriſt, from whom was both repentance and forgiveneſſe of ſinnes. Iohn ſaid that hee was the Lambe of God, by whom the ſinnes of the world ſhould bee taken away: where hee made him the ſacrifice acceptable to the Father, the Propitiator of righteouſneſſe, the author of ſalvation. What could the Apoſtles adde to this confeſſion? Wherefore let it trouble no man, that the old writers labour to ſever the one from the other, whoſe voice wee ought not ſo much to eſteeme that it may ſhake the certaintie of the Scripture. For who will rather harken to Chryſoſtome denying that forgiveneſſe of ſinnes was comprehended in the baptiſme of Iohn, than to Luke contrariwiſe affirming that Iohn preached the baptiſme of repentance into the forgiveneſſe of ſinne? Neither is that ſubtlety of Auguſtine to bee received, that in the baptiſme of Iohn ſinnes were forgiven in hope, but in the baptiſme of Chriſt they are forgiven in deed. For whereas the Evangeliſt plainely teſtifieth, that Iohn in his baptiſme promiſed the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes: what need wee to abate this title of commendation, when no neceſſitie compelleth us unto it? But if any man ſeeke for a difference out of the Word of God, he ſhall finde none other but this, that Iohn baptiſed into him that was to come, the Apoſtles into him that had already preſented himſelfe.

The baptiſme of Iohn the ſame with that which the Apoſtles miniſtred howſoever the old writers Chryſoſtome, and Auguſtine ſever the one from the other.

8 As for this that more abundant graces of the Spirit were powred out ſince the Reſurrection of Chriſt, it maketh nothing to ſtabliſh a diverſitie of baptiſme. For the baptiſme which the Apoſtles miniſtred while hee was yet converſant in earth, was called his: yet it had no larger plentifulneſſe of the ſpirit, than the baptiſme of Iohn. Yea, even after his Aſcenſion, the Spirit was not given to the Samaritans above the common meaſure of the faithfull before the Aſcenſion, although they were baptiſed into the name of Jeſus, till Peter and Iohn were ſent unto them to lay their hands upon them. This onely thing, as I thinke, deceived the old writers, that they ſaid that the baptiſme of Iohn was but a preparation to the baptiſme of Chriſt, becauſe they reade, that they were baptiſed againe of Paul, which had once received the baptiſme of Iohn. But how much they were herein deceived, ſhall elſe where be plainely declared in place fit for it. What is it therefore that Iohn ſaid, that hee baptiſed indeed with water, but that Chriſt ſhould come which ſhould baptiſe with the holy Ghoſt, and with fire? This may in few words be aſſoyled. For hee meant not to put difference betweene the one baptiſme and the other, but hee compared his owne perſon with the perſon of Chriſt, ſaying, that himſelfe was a miniſter of water, but that Chriſt was the giver of the holy Ghoſt, and ſhould declare his power by viſible miracle the ſame day that hee ſhould ſend the holy Ghoſt to the Apoſtles under fierie tongues. What could the Apoſtles boaſt of more than this? What more could they alſo that baptiſe at this day? For they bee onely miniſters of the outward ſigne, and Chriſt is the authour of the inward grace: as the ſame old writers themſelves doe every where teach, and ſpecially Auguſtine, whoſe principall ſtay againſt the Donatiſts is this, that what a one ſoever he be that baptiſeth, yet onely Chriſt is ruler of it.

The baptiſing not diverſe because the graces of the ſpirit were divers which followed the miniſterie of Iohn, and of Chriſts Apoſtles, yea even of the Apoſtles before and after Chriſts Aſcenſion.

Act. 2.8.

9 Theſe things which wee have ſpoken both of mortification and of waſhing, are ſhadowed out in the people of Iſrael, whom for the ſame cauſe the Apoſtle ſaith to have beene baptiſed in the cloud and in the ſea. Mortifying was figured, when the Lord delivering them out of the hand of Pharao and from cruell bondage, made for them a way through the red ſea, and drowned Pharao himſelfe, and the Ægyptians their enemies, that followed them hard at their backs, and were even in their necks to overtake them. For after the ſame manner alſo he promiſeth to us in baptiſme, and by a ſigne given sheweth us, that we are by his power brought forth and delivered out of the thraldome of Ægypt, that is to ſay, out of the bondage of ſinne: that our Pharao is drowned, that is to ſay the devil, although even ſo alſo he ceaſeth not to exerciſe & wearie us. But as that Ægyptian was not throwne downe into the bottome of the ſea, but being overthrowne on the ſhore, did yet with terrible ſight make the Iſraelites afraid, but could not hurt them:

them: so this our enemie yet indeed threatneth, sheweth his weapons, is felt, but cannot overcome. In the cloud was a signe of cleansing. For as then the Lord covered them with a cloud cast over them, and gave them refreshing cold, least they should faint and pine away with too cruell burning of the Sunne: so in Baptisme we acknowledge our selves covered and defended with the bloud of Christ, least the severitie of God, which is indeed an intollerable flame, should lye upon us. But although this mysterie was then darke and knowne to few: yet because there is none other way to obtaine salvation, but in those two graces, God would not take away the signe of them both from the old Fathers, whom he had adopted to be heires.

Num. 9. 14.

Faithfull men by Baptisme not rid of originall sinne, but certified first that condemnation whereunto the corruption of their nature hath made them subject, is done away.

10 Now it is cleare, how false that is which some have lately taught, and wherein some yet continue, that by Baptisme we be loosed and delivered from originall sinne, and from the corruption which was from Adam spread abroad into his whole posteritie, and that wee be restored into the same righteousnesse and pureneſſe of nature, which Adam should have obtained, if hee had stood fast in the same uprightnesse wherein hee was first created. For such kinde of teachers never understood what was originall sinne, nor what was originall righteousnesse, nor what was the grace of Baptisme. But wee have already proved, that originall sinne is the perversnesse and corruption of our nature, which first maketh us guiltie of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth works in us, which the Scripture calleth the works of the flesh. Therefore these two points are severally to bee marked, namely that we being in all parts of our natnre defiled and corrupted are already for such corruption onely, holden worthily condemned and convicted before God, to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousneſſe, innocencie and cleanneſſe. Yea, and very Infants themselves bring their owne damnation with them from their mothers wombe. Who, although they have not yet brought forth the fruits of their iniquitie, yet have the seed thereof inclosed within them. Yea, their whole nature is a certaine seed of sinne, therefore it cannot but bee hatefull and abominable to God. The Faithfull are certified by Baptisme that this damnation is taken away, and driven from them: forasmuch (as we have already said) the Lord doth by this signe promise us that full and perfect forgiveneſſe is granted both of the fault which should have beene imputed to us, and of the paine which wee should have suffered for the fault: they take hold also of righteousnesse, but such as the people of God may obtaine in this life, that is to say by imputation onely; because the Lord of his owne mercy taketh them for righteous and innocent.

Cal. 5. 19.

Secondly that the works of the flesh shall not beare rule and have dominion over them.

11 The other point is, that this perversneſſe never ceaseth in us, but continually bringeth forth new fruits, namely those works of the flesh which wee have before described: none otherwise than a burning furnace continually bloweth out flame and sparkles, or as a spring infinitely casteth out water. For lust never utterly dyeth and is quenched in men, untill being by death delivered out of the body of death, they have utterly put off themselves. Baptisme indeed promiseth us that our Pharao is drowned, and the mortification of sinne: yet but so that it is no more, or may no more trouble us, but onely that it may not overcome us. For so long as we live enclosed within this prison of our bodie, the remnants of sinne shall dwell in us: but if wee hold fast by Faith the promise given us of God in Baptisme, they shall not beare rule nor raigne. But let no man deceive himselfe: Let no man flatter himselfe in his owne evill, when hee heareth that sinne alway dwelleth in us. These things are not spoken to this end, that they should carelesly sleepe upon their sinnes, which are otherwise too much inclined to sinne: but only, that they should not faint and be discouraged, which are tickled and pricked of their flesh. Let them rather thinke that they are yet in the way, and let them beleeve that they have much profited, when they feele that there is daily somewhat minished of their lust, till they have attained thither whether they travaile, namely to the last death of their flesh, which shall bee ended in the dying of this mortall life. In the meane time let them not cease both to strive valiantly, and to encourage them to goe forward and to stirre them up to full victorie. For this also ought more to whet on their endevours, that they see that after that they have long travailed, they have yet no small businesse remayning. This wee ought to hold; we are baptised into the mortifying of our flesh, which is begun by Baptisme in us, which wee dayly follow: but it shall bee made perfect when wee shall remove out of this life to the Lord.

Baptisme according to S. Paul the earnest of our regeneration, the weaknesse of our nature hereunto, and the greatnesse of our comfort notwithstanding this weakenesse.

12 Here wee say no other thing, than the Apostle Paul in the seventh Chapter to the Romanes most clearely setteth out. For after that hee had disputed of free righteousnesse, because some wicked men did thereof gather, that we might live after our owne lust, because we should not be acceptable to God by the deservings of works: he addeth, that all they that are clothed with the righteousnesse of Christ, are therewith regenerate in Spirit, and that of this regeneration wee have an earnest in baptisme. Hereupon hee exhorteth the faithfull, that they suffer not sinne to have dominion in their members. Now because hee knew that there is alway some weakenesse in the faithfull: that they should not therefore be discouraged, he adjoyneth a comfort, that they are not under the law. Because againe it might seeme, that Christians might grow insolent, because they are not under the yoke of the law, he entreateth what manner of abrogating that is, and therewithall what is the use of the law: which question he had now the second time defined. The summe is, that wee be delivered from the rigor of the law, that we should cleave to Christ: but that the office of the law is, that we being convinced of our perverseness, should confesse our owne weakeneſſe and miserie. Now forasmuch as that perverseneſſe of nature doth not so easily appeare in a prophane man, which followeth his owne lust without feare of God: he setteth an example in a man regenerate, namely in himselfe. He saith therefore that he hath a continuall wrastling with the remnants of his flesh, and that hee is holden bound with miserable bondage, that he cannot consecrate himselfe wholy to the obedience of the law of God. Therefore hee is compelled with groning to crie out. Unhappy am I. Who shall deliver me out of this body subject to death? If the children of God bee holden captive in prison so long as they live, they must needs be much carefully grieved with thinking upon their owne perill, unlesse this feare be met withall. Therefore he adjoyneth to this use a comfort, that there is no more damnation to them that are in Christ Jesu. Where he teacheth, that they whom the Lord hath once received into favour, engraffed into the communion of his Christ, he hath by baptisme admitted into the fellowship of his Church, while they continue in the faith of Christ, although they bee besieged of sinne, yea and carrie sinne about within them, yet are acquited from guiltinesse and condemnation. If this be the simple and naturall exposition of Paul, there is no cause why we should seeme to teach any new unwonted thing.

Rom. 7. 24.

Rom. 8.

Baptisme the badge of our profession.

13 But Baptisme so serveth our confession before men. For it is a marke, whereby we openly professe that wee should be accounted among the people of God: whereby we testifie that wee agree with all Christians into the worshipping of one God and into one religion: finally, whereby wee openly affirme our Faith: that not onely our harts should breath out the praise of God, but also our tongues, and all the members of our body should sound it out with such utterances as they be able. For so, as we ought, all our things are imployed to the service of the glorie of God, whereof nothing ought to bee void, and other may by our example bee stirred up to the same endevours. Hereunto Paul had respect, when he asked the Corinthians whether they had not beene baptised into the name of Christ: meaning verily, that even in this that they were baptised into his name, they avowed themselves unto him, swore to his name, and bound their Faith to him before men, that they could no more confesse any other, but Christ alone, unlesse they would forsake the confession which they had made in Baptisme.

1 Cor. 1. 2.

The Author of Baptisme is also the worker of grace spirituall therein figured not inclosed.

14 Now sith it is declared what our Lord had regard unto in the institution of Baptisme: it is plaine to judge what is the way for us to use and receive it. For so far as it is given to the raising, nourishing and confirming of our Faith, it is to be taken as from the hand of the Author himselfe: we ought to hold it certaine and fully perswaded, that it is hee which speaketh to us by the signe, that it is hee which cleanseth us, washeth us, and putteth away the remembrance of our sinnes, that it is he which maketh us partakers of his death, which taketh away from Satan his kingdome, which feebleth the forces of our lust, yea which groweth into one with us, that being cloathed with him wee may bee reckoned the children of God: that these things, I say, he hee doth inwardly so truly and certainly performe to our Soule, as we certainly see our bodie outwardly to be washed, dipped, and cloathed. For this either relation, or similitude, is the most sure rule of Sacraments: that in bodily things wee should behold spirituall things, as if they were presently set before our eyes, forasmuch as it hath pleased the Lord to represent them by such figures: not for that such graces are bound and enclosed in the Sacrament, that they should bee given us by the force thereof: but onely because the Lord doth by this token testifie his will unto us, that is, that hee will give us all these things. Neither doth hee onely feed our eyes with a naked sight, but he bringeth us to the thing present, and together fulfilleth that which it figureth.

Cornelius and Paul by Baptisme yet indued with grace, but assured that they were entred through faith, without which, Baptisme doth but testifie our unthankfulnesse.
Act. 10. 48.
Act 9. 17.

15 Hereof let Cornelius the Captaine be an example, which was baptised, having before receeived forgivenesse of sinnes, and visible graces of the holy Ghost: seeking not by Baptisme a larger forgivenesse, but a more certaine exercising of faith, yea an increase of confidence by a pledge. Peradventure some man will object: why therefore did Ananias say to Paul, that hee should wash away his sinnes by Baptisme, if sinnes be not washed away by the power of Baptisme it selfe? I answer: Wee are said to receive, to obtaine, to get that which so farre as concerneth the feeling of our faith, is given us of the Lord, whether he doe then first testifie it, or being testified doth more and certainlier confirme it. This therefore onely was the meaning of Ananias: that thou maist bee assured Paul, that thy sinnes are forgiven thee, bee baptised. For the Lord doth in Baptisme promise forgivenesse of sinnes: receive this, and bee out of care. Howbeit I meane not to diminish the force of Baptisme, but that the thing and the truth is present with the signe, so farre as God worketh by outward meanes. But of this Sacrament, as of all other, wee obtaine nothing but so much as we receive by faith. If we want faith, it shall be for a witnesse of our unthankfulnesse, whereby we may be declared guiltie before God, because we have not beleeved the promise there given. But so farre as it is a signe of our confession, wee ought by it to testifie that our affiance is in the mercie of God, and our cleanesse is in the forgivenesse of sins, which is gotten us by Jesus Christ: and that by it wee enter into the Church of Christ, that wee may with one consent of faith and charitie live in one mind with all the faithfull. This last point did Paul meane, when he saith, that we are all baptised into one Spirit, that we may be one bodie.

1 Cor. 12. 13.

Nothing added unto or taken from Baptisme by their worthinesse or unworthinesse which are ministers of it: and therefore rebaptization not to be received.

16 Now if this bee true which wee determine, that a Sacrament is not to be wayed according to his hand of whom it is ministred, but as of the very hand of God, from whom without doubt it proceeded: heroupon wee may gather that nothing is added to it nor taken from it by the worthinesse of him by whose hand it is delivered. And even as among men, if a letter be sent, so that the hand and the seale be well knowne, it maketh no matter who or what manner of man bee the carrier: so it ought to suffice to know the hand and seale of the Lord in his Sacraments, by what carrier soever they be brought. Hereby the error of the Donatists is very well confuted, which measured the force and value of the Sacrament by the worthinesse of the Minister. Such at this day are our Catabaptists, which denie that we be rightly baptised, because we were baptised by wicked men and Idolaters in the Popish kingdome: therefore they furiously call upon us to be baptised againe. Against whose follies wee shall be armed with a reason strong enough, if we thinke that wee were professed by Baptisme not into the name of any man, but into the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, and that therefore it is not the Baptisme of man, but of God, of whomsoever it bee ministred. Although they were never so much ignorant or despisers of God and all godlinesse, which baptised us, yet they did not baptise us into the fellowship of their owne ignorance or sacrilege, but into the faith of Jesus Christ: because they called not upon their owne name, but the name of God, nor baptised us into any other name. Now if it were the baptisme of God, it hath verily inclosed in it a promise of the forgivenesse of sinnes, the mortifying of the flesh, the spirituall quickning, and the partaking of Christ. So it nothing hindered the Jewes, to have beene circumcised of uncleane Priests and Apostates: neither was the signe therefore voide, that it needed to bee done of new: but it was sufficient to returne to the naturall beginning. Wherethey object this

Matt. 28. 19.

Baptisme

Baptiſme ought to be celebrate in the aſſemblies of the godly, that proveth not, that that which is faulty in part, ſhould deſtroy the whole force thereof. For when wee teach what ought to be done that Baptiſme may be pure, and void of all deſiling, we doe not aboliſh the ordinance of God, although idolaters corrupt it. Eor when in old time Circumciſion was corrupted with many ſuperſtitions, yet it ceaſed not to be taken for a ſigne of grace: neither did Ioſias and Ezechias, when they gathered out of all Iſrael them that had departed from God, call them to a ſecond Circumciſion.

Baptiſme not made void by their remaining a long time in blindneſſe that are baptiſed.

17 Now whereas they aske us, what faith of ours hath yet followed Baptiſme in certaine yeeres paſt, that they thereby might prove that the Baptiſme is void, when it is not ſanctified unto us, but by the word ofpromiſe received by faith: to this queſtion we anſwer that we indeed being blinde and unbeleeving, did in a long time not hold faſt the promiſe given us in Baptiſme: yet the promiſe it ſelfe, for as much as it was of God, continued alway ſtaied, ſtedfaſt, and true. Although all men be liers and faithbreakers, yet God ceaſeth not to be true: although all men be loſt, yet Chriſt remaineth ſalvation. We confeſſe therefore that Baptiſme, for that time profited us nothing at all: for as much as in it the promiſe offered us, without which baptiſme is nothing, lay nothing regarded. Now ſith by the grace of God, we have begun to waxe wiſer, we accuſe our owne blindneſſe and hardneſſe of heart, which have ſo long been unthankefull to his ſo great goodneſſe. But we beleeve that the promiſe it ſelfe is not vaniſhed away: but rather thus we conſider. God by baptiſme promiſeth the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, and ſith he hath promiſed it, will undoubtedly performe it to all that beleeve it. That promiſe was offered us in baptiſme: by faith therefore let us embrace it. It hath indeed long been buried from us becauſe of infidelity: now therefore let us receive it by faith. Wherefore where the Lord calleth the Iewiſh people to repentance, he giveth them no commandement of a ſecond circumciſion, which being (as we have ſaid) circumciſed with a wicked and ungodly hand, lived a certaine time entangled with the ſame wickedneſſe. But he earneſtly calleth upon the onely turning of the heart. Becauſe, howſoever the covenant was broken of them, yet the ſigne of the covenant, by the ordinance of the Lord, remaineth alwayes ſtedfaſt and inviolable. Therefore with the onely condition of repentance they were reſtored into the covenant which the Lord had once made with them in circumciſion: which yet being received by the hand of the Leaguebreaker prieſt, ſo much as in them lay, they had defiled againe, and the effect whereof they had quenched.

Rom. 3. 3.

They whom Iohn had Baptiſed not rebaptiſed by Paul. Act. 19. 3.

Act. 1. 5.

it is ſaid, that the Apoſtles remembred the words of the Lord, concerning the Baptiſme of fire and of the ſpirit. And Peter ſaith that the ſame came to his remembrance, when he ſaw thoſe graces powred out upon Cornelius, and his houſhold and kindred. Neither is that contrary which is after adjoyned: When hee had laid his hands on them, the Holy Ghoſt came downe upon them. For Luke doth not tell of two divers things: but followeth the manner of telling commonly uſed among the Hebrewes, which doe firſt propound the ſumme of the matter, and then doe ſet it out more at large. Which every man may perceive by the very framing together of the words. For hee ſaith, When they had heard theſe things, they were Baptiſed in the name of Jeſus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the holy Ghoſt came downe upon them. In this latter ſentence is deſcribed, what manner of Baptiſme that was. If ignorance doe ſo corrupt a former baptiſme, that it muſt be amended by with ſecond baptiſme: the Apoſtles ſhould have beene rebaptiſed firſt of all, which in whole three yeares after their baptiſme had ſcarcely taſted any ſmall parcell of purer doctrine. And now among us what rivers might ſuffice to renew ſo many waſhings, as there be ignorances by the mercie of the Lord dayly amended in us?

Act. 11. 16. Acceſſary inventions of men added unto Chriſts inſtitution of Baptiſme.

19 The force, dignity, profit, and end of the myſtery if I bee not deceived, ought by this time to be plaine enough. So much as concerneth the outward ſigne, I would to God the naturall inſtitution of Chriſt had prevailed ſo much as was meet, to reſtraine the boldneſſe of men. For, as though it were a contemptible thing to be baptiſed with water according to the precept of Chriſt, there is invented bleſſing, or rather inchanting, to defile the true hallowing of the water. Afterward was added a Taper with Chriſme: but the blowing ſeemeth to open the gate to baptiſme. But although I am not ignorant, how ancient is the beginning of this added packe: yet it is lawfull both for mee and all the godly to refuſe whatſoever things men have preſumed to adde to the ordinance of Chriſt. When Satan ſaw that by the fooliſh light credit of the world at the very beginnings of the Goſpell his deceits were eaſily received, hee brake foorth into groſſer mockeries. Hereupon ſpittle, and like trifles, were openly brought in with unbridled liberty to the repoch of Baptiſme. By which experiences let us learne that nothing is either holier, or better, or ſafer, than to bee content with the authority of Chriſt alone. How much better therefore was it, leaving ſtagelike pompes, which dazell the eyes of the ſimple, and dull their mindes, ſo oft as any was to be baptiſed, that he ſhould bee preſented to the aſſembly of the faithfull, and be offered to God, the whole Church looking on as a witneſſe: and praying over him: that the confeſſion of faith ſhould be rehearſed, wherewith he that is to be catechiſed ſhould bee inſtructed: that the promiſes ſhould be declared which are contained in Baptiſme: that the inſtructed ſhould be baptiſed in the name of the Father, and the Sonne, and the holy Ghoſt: at length that he be ſent away with praiers and thankſgiving. So is nothing omitted that might make to the matter, and that the onely Ceremony which proceeded from God the authour thereof, ſhould moſt clearely ſhine, being not overwhelmed with any forreine filthineſſe. But whether he be wholly dipped which is baptiſed, and that thrice or once, or whether he bee but ſprinkled with water onely powred upon him, it maketh very little matter: but that ought to be at liberty to Churches according to the diverſity of Countries. Howbeit the very word of Baptiſing ſignifieth to dip, and it is certaine that the manner of dipping was uſed of the old Church.

Baptiſme not to be adminiſtred by private men.

20 This alſo pertaineth to the purpoſe, to know that is done amiſſe if private men take upon themſelves the adminiſtration of Baptiſme. For as well the diſtribution of this as of the Supper is a part of the Eccleſiaſticall miniſtery. For Chriſt did not command women, nor yet every ſort of men, that they ſhould baptiſe: but whom he had ordained his Apoſtles, to them he gave this commandement. And when hee commanded his Diſciples to doe that in the miniſtration of the Supper which they had ſeene him doe, when he executed the office of a right diſtributer: hee would without doubt, that they ſhould therein follow his example. As for this that in many ages paſt, yea and in a manner at the very beginning of the Church, it hath beene receyed in uſe, that that lay men might baptise in perill of death, if the minister were not present in time. I see not with how strong a reason it may bee defended. The very old fathers themselves, which either held or suffered this manner, were not sure whether it were well done. For Augustine seemeth to have this doubt, when he saith: Although a lay man compelled by necessitie doe give baptisme, I cannot tell whether a man may godlily say that it ought to bee iterate. For if it bee done when no necessitie compelleth, it is the usurping of another mans office: but if necessitie enforceth, it is either none or a veniall sinne. Moreover of women it was decreed without any exception in the Councell at Carthage, that they should not presume to baptize at all. But there is danger, least if hee which is sicke should die without baptisme, hee should be deprived of the grace of regeneration. Not so, God pronounceth that he adopteth our infants to be his owne, before they be borne, when he promiseth that hee will be a God to us and to our seed after us. In this word is contained their salvation. Neither shall any man dare to be so reprochfull against God, to denie that his promise is of it selfe sufficient to worke the effect thereof. How much harme that doctrine being evill expounded, that baptisme is of necessitie to salvation, hath brought in, few doe marke: and therefore they take lesse heed to themselves. For where this opinion is growne in force, that all are lost to whom it hath not happened to bee washed with water, our state is worse than the state of the old people, as though the grace of God were now more narrowly straitened than it was under the law. For Christ shall be thought to be come, not to fulfill the promises, but to abolish them: forasmuch as the promise which then was of it selfe effectuall enough to give health before the eight day, now should not be of force without help of the signe.

Lib contra epi. parm. 2. Cap. 13.

21 But how the custome was before that Augustine was borne, first is gathered of Tertullian, that it is not permitted to a woman to speake in the Church, nor to teach, nor to baptise, nor to offer, that she should not claime to her selfe the execution of any mans office, much lesse of the Priests. Of the same thing Epiphanius is a substantiall witnesse, where hee reprocheth Marcion, that he gave women libertie to baptise. Neither am I ignorant of their answer which thinke otherwise, that is, that common use much differeth from extraordinarie remedie, when extreme necessitie inforceth: but when hee pronouncing that it is a mockerie to give women libertie to baptise, excepteth nothing, it sufficiently appeareth that hee condemneth this corruption, so that it is by no colour excusable. Also in the third booke, where teaching that it was not permitted even to the holy mother of Christ, he addeth no restraint.

Women not authorised to baptise.

22 The example of Sephora is unseasonably alleadged. For whereas the Angell of God was appeased, after that she taking a stone, circumcised her sonne, thereupon it was wrongfully gathered that her doing was allowed of God. Otherwise it ought to bee said, that the worshipping which the nations that were brought out of Assyria raised up, pleased God. But by other strong reasons it is proved, that that which a foolish woman did, is wrongfully drawne to an example of imitation. If I should say that it is a certaine singular case, which ought not to be made an example, and specially that sith it is no where read that in old time there was given to the Priests a speciall commandement to circumcise, the order of Circumcision and Baptisme is unlike: this should be strong enough to confute them. For the words of Christ are plaine: Goe yee, teach all nations, and baptise. When hee ordained the selfe same men publishers of the Gospell, and ministers of Baptisme: and none (as the Apostle witnesseth) doth take honour upon himselfe in the Church, but hee that is called as Aaron: whosoever without lawfull calling baptiseth, hee rusheth into another mans office. Even in the smallest things, as in meat and drinke, whatsoever wee enterprise with a doubtfull conscience, Paul openly cryeth out to bee sinne. Therefore in womens baptising is much more grievously sinne, where it is evident that they brake the rule appointed by Christ, forasmuch as wee know that it is unlawfull to plucke in sunder those things that God conjoyneth. But all this I passe over. Onely I would have the readers to note, that Sepporaes purpose was nothing lesse, than to doe any service to God. Seeing her sonne to bee in danger, she grudged, and murmured, and not without stomacking threw the foreskin upon the ground, she so taunted her husband, that she was also angry with God. Finally it is plaine that all this came of a furiousnesse of minde, because she murmured against God and her husband, for that shee was compelled to shed the bloud of her sonne. Moreover if she had in all other things behaved herselfe well, yet herein is an unexcusable rash presumption that shee circumcised her sonne, her husband being present, not any private man, but Moses the principall prophet of God, than whom there never rose any greater in Israel: which was no more lawfull for her to doe, than at this day it is for women in the sight of the Bishop. But this controversie shall by and by be easily taken away by this principle, that infants are not debarred from the kingdome of heaven whom it happeneth to depart out of this present life before that it be granted them to be dipped in water. But it is already proved that no small wrong is done to the covenant of God, if we doe not rest in it, as though it were weake of it selfe: whereas the effect thereof hangeth neither upon Baptisme, nor upon any additions. There is afterward added to it a Sacrament like a seale, not that it bringeth effectualnesse to the promise of God as a thing weake of it selfe, but onely confirmeth it to us. Whereupon followeth, that the children of the faithfull are not therefore Baptized, that they may then first bee made the children of God, which before were strangers from the Church, but rather that they be therefore received by a solemne signe into the Church, because by the benefit of the promise they did already belong to the body of Christ. Therefore if in omitting the signe their bee neither slothfulnesse, nor contempt, nor negligence, wee are free from all danger. It is therefore much more holy, to give this reverence to the ordinance of God, that wee seeke Sacraments from no where else, than where the Lord hath left them. When wee may not have them of the Church, the grace of God is not so bound to them but that we may obtaine them by faith out of the word of the Lord.

Rom. 14. 23.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

That the Baptisme of Infants doth very well agree with the institution of Christ and the nature of the signe.

The Baptising of infants not devised and received onely by the rashnes of men without warrant from God himselfe.

BVt forasmuch as in this age, certaine phranticke Spirits have raised up sore troubles in the Church for the Baptisme of infants, and doe not yet cease to turmoile: I cannot choose but I must joyne here an addition to restraine their furiousnesse. If peradventure it shall seeme to some man to be very much too long, let him (I beseech him) weigh with himselfe, that we ought so much to esteeme the pureneſse of doctrine in a most great matter, together with the peace of the Church, that nothing ought to bee lothsomly received, which may availe to procure them both. Beside that, I so study to frame this discourse, that it shall be of no small importance to the clearer declaration of the mystery of Baptisme. They assaile the Baptisme of infants with an argument indeed favourable in shew, saying that it is grounded upon no institution of Christ, but that it was brought in onely by the boldnesse of men, and perverse curiousnesse, and then afterward with fond easinesse rashly received in use. For a Sacrament, unlesse it rest upon a certaine foundation of the word of God, hangeth but by a thred. But what if, when the matter is well considered, it shall appeare, that the Lords holy ordinance is falsely and unjustly charged with such a slander? Let us therefore search out the first beginning of it. And if it shall appeare, that it was devised by the onely rashnesse of men, then bidding it farewell, let us measure the true observation of baptisme by the onely will of God. But if it shall be proved that it is not destitute of his certaine authority, we must beware, least in pinching the holy ordinances of God, we be also slanderous against the author himselfe.

The right consideration of Baptisme grounded upon the promise and spirituall mystery thereof, not upon the outward ceremony alone.

2 First it is a doctrine well enough knowne, and confessed among all the godly, that the right consideration of the signes, consisteth not onely in the outward ceremonies: but principally hangeth upon the promise, and upon the spirituall mysteries, for figuring whereof the Lord ordaineth the ceremonies themselves. Therefore he that will perfectly learne of what valew baptisme is, to what end it tendeth, finally what it is: let him not stay his thought upon the element and bodily sight: but rather let him raise it up to the promises of God, which are therein offered us, and to the inward secrets which are

are therein presented unto us. Hee that knoweth these things hath attained the sound truth of Baptisme, and the whole substance thereof as I may so call it: and thereby also hee shall bee taught, what is the reason, and what is the use of the outward sprinkling. Againe, hee that contemptuously passing over these shall have his minde wholly fastened and bound to the visible ceremonie, shall understand neither the force nor property of Baptisme: nor yet so much as this, what the water meaneth, or what use it hath. Which sentence is proved with so many and so cleare testimonies of Scripture, that wee need not at this present to tarry long about it. Therefore it remaineth now that we seeke out of the promises given in Baptisme, what is the force and nature of it. The Scripture sheweth, that the clensing of sinnes, which we obtaine of the bloud of Christ, is here first shewed: then the mortifying of the flesh, which standeth upon the partaking of his death, by which the faithfull are regenerate into newnesse of life, yea, and into the fellowship of Christ. To this summe may be referred whatsoever is taught in the Scriptures concerning baptisme: saving that beside this it is a signe to testifie religion before men.

The use of circumcision under the law.

3 But forasmuch as before the institution of baptisme, the people of God had circumcision in stead thereof: let us see what these two signes differ the one from the other, and with what likenesse they agree together. Whereupon may appeare what is the relation of the one to the other. Where the Lord gave circumcision to Abraham to be kept, he telleth him before, that hee would be God to him and to his seed: adding, that with him is the flowing store and sufficiance of all things, that Abraham should account that his hand should be to him a spring of all good things. In which words the promise of eternall life is contained, as Christ expoundeth it, bringing an argument from hence to prove the immortality of the faithfull, and the resurrection. For God (saith he) is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Wherefore Paul also shewing to the Ephesians from what destruction the Lord had delivered them, gathereth by this that they had not beene admitted into the covenant of circumcision, that they were without Christ, without God, without hope, strangers from the testaments of the promise: all which things the covenant it selfe contained. But the first accesse to God, the first entry to immortall life, is the forgivenesse of sinnes. Whereupon is gathered, that this forgivenesse answereth to the promise of Baptisme concerning our clensing. Afterward the Lord taketh covenant of Abraham that he should walke before him in pureness and innocency of heart which belongeth to mortifying or regeneration. And that no man should doubt, that circumcision is a signe of mortifying, Moses in another place doth more plainly declare it, when hee exhorteth the people of Israel, to circumcise the uncircumcised skin of the heart, because they were severally chosen to bee the people of God out of all the Nations of the Earth. As God, where hee adopteth the posterity of Abraham to his people, commandeth them to bee circumcised: so Moses pronounceth that the hearts ought to bee circumcised, declaring verily what is the truth of this circumcision. Then that no man should endevour toward it by his owne strength, hee teacheth that they need the grace of God. All these things are so often repeated of the Prophets, that I need not to heape into this place many testimonies which doe each where offer themselves. We have proved therfore, that in circumcision a spirituall promise was uttered to the fathers, such as in baptisme is given: for asmuch as it figured to them the forgivenesse of sinnes, and the mortifying of the flesh. Moreover as we have taught that Christ is the foundation of baptisme, in whom both these things remaine: so it is evident that he is also of circumcision. For he is promised to Abraham, and in him the blessing of all Nations. To the sealing of which grace, the signe of circumcision is added.

Deut.30,6.

The argument and difference betweene circumcision and Baptisme.

4. Now we may easily see, what there is like in these two signes, or what there is differing. The promises, whereupon wee have declared that the power of the signes consisteth is all one in both, namely of the fatherly favour of God, of the forgivenesse of sinnes, of life everlasting. Then, the thing figured also is all one and the same, namely regeneration. The foundation whereupon the fulfilling of these things standeth, is all one in both. Wherefore there is no difference in the inward mystery, whereby the whole force and property of the Sacraments is to bee weighed. The unlike-unlikelineſſe that remaineth, lieth in the outward ceremonie, which is the ſmalleſt portion: whereas the chiefeſt part hangeth upon the promiſe and the thing ſignified. Therefore wee may determine, that whatſoever agreeth with circumciſion, doth alſo belong to baptiſme, except the difference of the viſible Ceremonie. To this relation and compariſon, the Apoſtles rule leadeth us by the hand, whereby wee are commanded to examine all expoſition of Scripture by the proportion of faith. And truly the truth doth in this behalfe almoſt offer it ſelfe to bee ſeen. For as circumciſion, becauſe it was a certaine token to the Jewes, whereby they were certified that they were choſen to be the people and houſehold of God, and they againe on their behalfes profeſſed that they yeelded themſelves to God, was their firſt entry into the Church: ſo now alſo we by baptiſme enter into profeſſion of God, that we may bee reckoned among his people, and mutually ſweare to his name. Whereby it appeareth out of controverſie, that baptiſme is come into the place of circumciſion, that it may have the ſame office with us.

Rom. 12. 3.

Infants being partakers of the ſpirituall grace may not be denied the outward ſigne of baptiſme more than Jewiſh children circumciſion.

5 Now if we liſt to ſearch out, whether Baptiſme bee lawfully communicate to infants: ſhall we not ſay that hee doth too much play the foole, yea dote, which will reſt onely upon the element of water, and the outward obſervation, but cannot abide to bend his mind to the ſpirituall myſtery? Whereof if there be any conſideration had, it ſhall without doubt certainely appeare that Baptiſme is rightfully given to infants, as the thing that is due unto them. For the Lord in old time did not vouchſafe to admit them to circumciſion, but that he made them partakers of all thoſe things which were then ſignified by circumciſion. Otherwiſe he ſhould with meere deceits have mocked his people, if he had fed them with deceitfull ſignes, which is horrible even to bee heard of. For hee pronounceth expreſſely, that the circumciſion of a little infant ſhould be in ſtead of a ſeale to ſeale the promiſe of the covenant. But if the covenant remaine unbroken and ſtedfaſt, it doth at this day no leſſe belong to the children of Chriſtians than under the old Teſtament it pertained to the infants of the Jewes. But if they be partakers of the thing ſignified, why ſhall they be debarred from the ſigne? If they have the truth, why ſhall they be put backe from the figure? Although the outward ſigne cleave faſt together with the Word in the Sacrament, ſo that they cannot bee plucked in ſunder: yet if they bee ſeverally conſidered, whether of them I pray you ſhall wee eſteeme of more valew? Truly ſith we ſee that the figure ſerveth the word, wee muſt ſay that it is under it, and muſt ſet it in the inferiour place, Sith therefore the word of baptiſme is extended to infants; why ſhall the ſigne, that is to ſay, the addition hanging to the Word, be debarred from them? This one reaſon, if there were no moe, were aboundantly enough to confute all them that will ſpeake to the contrarie. That which is objected, that there was a day certainely ſet for circumciſion, is altogether but a ſhift. We grant that wee be not now bound to certaine dayes, like the Jewes: but when the Lord howſoever he certainely appointeth no day, yet declareth that hee is pleaſed that infants ſhould with a ſolemne formall uſage be received into his covenant: what ſeeke we more?

The children of Chriſtian parents being holy ſeed as Abrahams were, as neceſſarily the one bound to be baptized as the other to bee circumciſed.

6 Howbeit the Scripture openeth unto us yet a certainer knowledge of the truth. For it is moſt evident, that the covenant which the Lord once made with Abraham, is at this day no leſſe in force to Chriſtians, than it was in old time to the Jewiſh people; yea and that this word hath no leſſe reſpect to Chriſtians, than it then had reſpect to the Jewes. Vnleſſe perhaps we thinke, that Chriſt hath by his comming diminiſhed, or cut ſhort the grace of his Father. Which ſaying is not without abhominable blaſphemie; Wherefore as even the children of the Jewes were called a holy ſeed, becauſe being made heires of the ſame covenant they were made differing from the children of the ungodly: for the ſame reaſon even yet alſo the children of Chriſtians are accounted holy, yea although they bee the iſſue but of one parent faithfull: and (as the Apoſtle witneſſeth) they differ from the uncleane ſeed of Idolaters. Now when the Lord immediately after the covenant made with Abraham, commanded the ſame to be ſealed in infants with an outward Sacrament: what cauſe will Chriſtians alleage, why they ſhould not at this day teſtifie and ſeale the ſame in their children? Neither let any man obiect againſt me, that the Lord commanded his covenant to bee confirmed with no other signe than of circumcision, which is long agoe taken away. For we have in readinesse to answer, that for the time of the old Testament hee ordained circumcision to confirme his covenant: but circumcision being taken away, yet alway remaineth the same manner of confirming which we have common with the Jewes. Wherfore we must alway diligently consider what is common to both, and what they have severall from us. The covenant is common, the cause of confirming it is common. Onely the manner of confirming is diverse, because circumcision, was that to them, in place whereof baptisme hath succeeded among us. Otherwise if the testimony whereby the Jewes were assured of the salvation of their seed, be taken away from us, it should bee brought to passe by the comming of Christ, that the grace of God should bee darker and lesse approved by testimonies to us, than it was before to the Jewes. If that cannot bee said without extreame slander of Christ, by whom the infinite goodnesse of the Father hath more clearely and liberally than ever heretofore beene poured forth upon the earth: and declared to men: wee must needs grant, that it is at the least, not more pinchingly to be suppressed, nor to be set forth with lesse testimonie, than it was under the dark shadowes of the Law.

Infants embraced, prayed for, learned the heires of the kingdom of heaven by our Saviour Christ, and therefore not to be excluded from baptisme. Mat. 9. 13.

7 Wherefore the Lord Iesus minding to shew a token whereby the world might understand that he was come rather to enlarge than to limit the mercie of God, gently embraced children offered unto him, rebuking the disciples which went about to forbid them to come to him: forasmuch as they did leade those, to whom the kingdome of heaven belongeth, away from him by whom alone the entrie is open into heaven. But (will some man say) what like thing hath baptisme with this embracing of Christ? For neither is it reported that he baptized them, but that hee received them, embraced them, and wished them well. Therefore if we list to follow his example, let us helpe infants with prayer, but not baptise them. But let us weigh the doings of Christ somewhat more heedfully, than such kind of men doe. For neither is this to be lightly passed over, that Christ commandeth infants to be brought unto him, adding a reason why, because of such is the kingdome of heaven. And afterward hee witnesseth his will with deede, when embracing them he commendeth them to his Father with his prayer and blessing. If it be meet that infants bee brought to Christ, why is it not also meete that they be received to baptisme, the signe of our communion and fellowship with Christ? If the kingdome of heaven be theirs, why shall the signe be denied them, whereby there is as it were an entry opened into the Church, that being admitted into it they may bee adnumbred among the heires of the heavenly kingdome? How unjust shall we be, if we drive away them whom Christ calleth unto him? if we spoile them, whom hee garnisheth with his gifts? if wee shut out them whom hee willingly receiveth? But if wee will examine how much that which Christ there did differeth from baptisme, yet of how much greater price shall we have baptisme, (whereby wee testifie that infants are contained in the covenant of God) than receiving, embracing, laying on of hands, and prayer, whereby Christ himselfe being present: declareth that they both are his, and are sanctified of him? By the other cavillations, whereby they labour to mocke out this place, they doe nothing but bewray their owne ignorance. For they gather an argument of this which Christ saith, Let little ones come to mee, that they were in age good big ones which were already able to goe. But they are called of the Evangelists, Brephe and paidia, by which words the Greekes doe signifie babes yet hanging on the breastes. Therefore this word (to come) is simply set for (to have accesse.) Loe what snares they are compelled to make, which are growne hard against the truth. Now where they say, that the kingdome of heaven is not given to them, but to such as be like them, because it is said to be of such, not of them: that is no sounder than the rest. For if that bee granted, what manner of reason shall the reason of Christ bee, whereby hee meaneth to shew, that infants in age are not strangers from him? When hee commandeth that infants bee suffered to have accesse unto him, nothing is plainer than that very infancie indeed is there spoken of. And that this should not seeme an absurditie, hee by and by addeth: of such is the kingdome of heaven. But if it must needs be that infants be comprehended herein it must be plaine that by this word (such) are meant very infants themselves, and such as be like them.

Though it be not expreſly mentioned in Scripture what infants were baptiſed by the Apoſtles: yet when they are reported to have baptiſed families we have no reaſon to thinke that the children in ſuch families were not baptiſed: no writer ſo old that maketh not the baptiſme of Infants as ancient as the Apoſtles times. Act. 16. 15. & 33.

8. Now there is no man that ſeeth not, that Baptiſme of Infants was not framed by man, which is upholden by ſo great approving of Scripture. Neither doe they colourably enough play the fooles, which object that it is no where found, that any one Infant was baptiſed by the hands of the Apoſtles. For although it bee not expreſly by name rehearſed of the Evangeliſts: yet becauſe againe they are not excluded, ſo oft as mention happeneth to bee made of the baptiſing of any houſhold: who, unleſſe hee bee mad, can reaſon thereupon that they were not baptiſed? If ſuch arguments were of any force, women ſhould bee forbidden to partake of the Lords Supper, whom wee read not to have beene received unto it in the time of the Apoſtles. But here wee bee content with the rule of Faith. For when we conſider, what the inſtitution of the Supper requireth, thereby alſo wee may eaſily judge to whom the uſe thereof ought to bee communicated. Which wee obſerve alſo in Baptiſme. For when wee marke, to what end it was ordained, wee evidently eſpie, that it belongeth no leſſe to Infants, than to elder folkes. Therefore they cannot bee deprived of it, but that the will of the Authour muſt bee manifeſtly defrauded. But whereas, they ſpread abroad among the ſimple people, that there paſſed a long row of yeares after the reſurrection of Chriſt, in which the Baptiſme of Infants was unknowne: therein they moſt fowly doe lye. For there is no writer ſo old, that doth not certainly referre the beginning thereof to the time of the Apoſtles,

The fruit that commeth by baptiſme both to children preſented, and to ſuch alſo as preſent them thereunto.

9. Now remaineth that we briefely ſhew, what fruit commeth of this obſervation, both to the Faithfull which preſent their children to the Church to bee baptiſed, and alſo to the Infants themſelves that be baptiſed with the holy water: that no man ſhould deſpiſe it as unprofitable or idle. But if it come in any mans minde, upon this pretence to mocke at Baptiſme of Infants, hee ſcorneth the commandement of Circumciſion given by the Lord. For what will they bring forth to impugne the Baptiſme of Infants, which may not alſo be throwne backe againſt circumciſion? So the Lord taketh vengeance of their arrogance, which doe by and by condemne that which they comprehend not with the ſenſe of their owne fleſh. But God furniſheth us with other armors, whereby their fooliſhneſſe may be beaten flat. For neither this his holy inſtitution, by which we feele our faith to be holpen with ſingular comfort, deſerveth to bee called ſuperfluous. For Gods ſigne communicated to a childe doth as it were by an imprinted ſeale confirme the promiſe given to the godly Parent, and declareth that it is ratified that the Lord will be God, not onely to him but alſo to his ſeed, and will continually ſhew his good will and grace, not to him onely, but alſo to his poſteritie even to the thouſand generation. Where when the great kindneſſe of God uttereth it ſelfe, firſt it yeeldeth moſt large matter to advance his glory, and overſpreadeth godly hearts with ſingular gladneſſe, becauſe they are therewithall more earneſtly moved to love againe ſo godly a Father, whom they ſee to have care of their poſterity for their ſakes. Neither doe I regard, if any man take exception, and ſay that the promiſe ought to ſuffice to confirme the ſalvation of our children: foraſmuch as it hath pleaſed God otherwiſe, who as he knoweth our weakeneſſe, willed in this behalfe ſo much to beare tenderly with it. Therefore let them that embrace the promiſe of Gods mercie to bee extended to their children, thinke that it is their duty to offer them to the Church to bee ſigned with the ſigne of mercie, and thereby to encourage themſelves to a more aſſured confidence, becauſe they doe with preſent eye behold the covenant of the Lord graven in the bodies of their children. Againe, the children receive ſome commodity of their Baptiſme that being engraffed into the body of the Church, they bee ſomewhat the more commended to the other members. Then when they are grown to riper age, they be thereby not ſlenderly ſtirred up to earneſt endevour to worſhip God, of whom they have beene received into his children by a ſolemne ſigne of adoption, before that they could by age acknowledge him for their Father. Finally that ſame condemnation ought greatly to make us afraid, that God will take vengeance of it, if any man deſpiſe to marke his ſonne with the ſigne of the covenant, becauſe by ſuch contempt the grace offered is refuſed, and as it were foreſworne.

Gen. 17. 14.

The difference which the enemies of baptiſ-

10 Now let us examine the arguments, whereby certaine furious beaſts doe not ceaſe to aſſaile this holy inſtitution of God. Firſt becauſe they ſee that they bee exceedingly dingly neere driven and hard strained with the likenesse of Baptisme and Circumcision, they labour to plucke in sunder these two signes with great difference, that the one should not seeme to have any thing common with the other. For they say that both divers things are signified, and that the covenant is altogether divers, and that the naming of the children is not all one. But while they goe about to prove that first point, they alleadge that Circumcision was a figure of mortification and not of Baptisme. Which verily wee doe most willingly grant them. For it maketh very well for our side. Neither doe we use any other proofe of our sentence, than that Baptisme and Circumcision are signes of mortification. Hereupon wee determine that Baptisme is set in the place of Circumcision, that it should represent unto us the same thing which in old time it signified to the Iewes. In affirming the difference of the covenant, with how barbarous boldnesse doe they turmoile and corrupt the Scripture, and that not in one place alone, but so as they leave nothing safe or whole? For they depaint unto us the Iewes so to bee carnall that they be liker beasts than men: with whom forsooth the covenant made proceedeth not beyond the temporall life, to whom the promises given doe rest in present and bodily good things. If this doctrine take place, what remaineth but that the nation of the Iewes were for a time filled with the benefits of God, none otherwise than as they fat a heard of swine in a stie, that at length they should perish with eternall damnation. For so soone as we alleadge Circumcision and the promises annexed unto it, they answer that Circumcision was a litterall signe, and the promises thereof were carnall.

tisme ministred unto children to put betweene the thing signified by Baptisme and circumcision overthroweth them, their difference betweene the one and the other covenant most false.

11 Truly if Circumcision was a literall signe, there is no otherwise to bee thought of Baptisme. For the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Colossians maketh the one no more spirituall than the other. For hee saith that we are circumcised in Christ, with a Circumcision not made with hand, putting away the body of sinne that dwelled in our flesh: which he calleth the Circumcision of Christ. Afterward for declaration of that saying, he adjoyneth, that wee bee buried with Christ by Baptisme. What meaneth hee by these words, but that the fulfilling and truth of Baptisme, is also the truth and fulfilling of Circumcision, because they figure both one thing? For he travalleth to shew that Baptisme is the same to Christians, which circumcision had beene before to the Iewes. But forasmuch as we have now evidently declared, that the promises of both the signes, and the misteries that are presented in them, doe agree together, wee will for this present tarry no longer upon them. Onely I will put the faithfull in minde, that though I hold my peace, they should weigh with themselves whether it bee taken for an earthly and litterall signe, under which nothing is contained but spirituall and heavenly. But that they should not sell their smokes to the simple, we will by the way confute one objection wherewith they colour this most shamelesse lie. It is most certaine that the principall promises, wherein was contained the covenant which in the old Testament God stablished with the Israelites, were spirituall and tended to eternall life: and then againe, that they were received of the Father, spiritually, as it was meete, that they might thereof receive affiance of the life to come, whereunto they longed with the whole affection of their heart. But in the meane time we denie not, but that he witnessed his good will toward them with earthly and carnall benefits: by which also we say that the same promise of spirituall things was confirmed. As when he promised everlasting blessednesse to his servant Abraham, that hee might set before his eies a manifest token of his favour, hee addeth another promise concerning the possession of the land of Chanaan. After this manner we ought to understand all the earthly promises that are given to the Iewish nation, that the spirituall promise, as the head, whereunto they are directed, should alway have the chiefe place. But sith I have more largely entreated of these things in the difference of the new and old Testament, therefore now I doe the more sleighly knit it up.

Promises spirituall and heavenly, not earthly and carnall only made to the Fathers in the old Testament.
Colos. 2. 11.

Gen. 15. 1. & 18.

12 In the naming of the children they finde this diversity, that in the old Testament they were called the children of Abraham, which issued of his seede: but that now they are called by that name, which follow of his faith: And that therfore that carnall infancy, which was by circumcision graffed into the fellowship of the covenant, figured the infants of the New Testament, which are regenerate by the word of God to immortall life. In which words wee behold indeed a small sparkle of truth: but herein these light spirits grievously offend, that when they catch hold of that which first commeth to their hand, when they should goe further and compare many things together, they stand stiffely upon one word. Whereby it cannot otherwise bee but that they must sometime bee deceived which rest upon the sound knowledge of nothing. Wee grant indeed that the carnall seed of Abraham did for a time hold the place of the spirituall seed which is by faith graffed into him. For wee be called his children howsoever there is no naturall kinred betweene him and us. But if they meane, as they plainely shew that they doe, that there was never spirituall blessing promised to the carnall seed of Abraham, herein they are much deceived. Wherefore we must levell to a better marke, whereunto wee are directed by the most certaine guiding of the Scripture. The Lord therefore promised to Abraham, that hee should have a seed, wherein all nations of the earth shall bee blessed: and therewithall assureth him, that he would be a God to him and his seed. Whosoever doe by Faith receive Christ the Authour of blessing, are heires of this promise, and therefore are called the children of Abraham.

The dignitie of Abrahams children, circumcised and uncircumcised equall.
Matt.8.11.
Exod.19.5.

13 But although since the resurrection of Christ the bounds of the kingdome of God have begun to be farre and wide enlarged into all nations without difference, that according to the saying of Christ, faithfull ones should be gathered from every part to sit downe in the heavenly glorie with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: yet he had many ages before extended that same so great mercie to the Jewes. And because passing over all other, hee had chosen out that onely nation, in which he would restraine his grace for a time, called them his peculiar possession, and his purchased people. For testifying of such liberalitie, Circumcision was given, by the signe whereof the Jewes might bee taught that God is to them the author of salvation: by which knowledge their minds were raised into hope of eternall life. For what shall he want, whom God hath once received into his charge? Wherefore the Apostle meaning to prove that the Gentiles were the children of Abraham as well as the Jewes, speaketh in this manner: Abraham (saith hee) was justified by faith in uncircumcision. Afterward hee received the signe of circumcision, the seale of righteousnesse of faith, that he should bee the Father of all the faithfull, both of uncircumcision and of circumcision, not of them that glorie of onely circumcision, but of them that follow the faith which our Father Abraham had in uncircumcision. Doe not wee see that both sorts are made equall in dignitie? For during the time appointed by the decree of God, he was the Father of circumcision. When, the wall being plucked downe (as the Apostle writeth in another place) by which the Jewes were severed from the Gentiles, the entry was made open to them also into the kingdome of God, he was made their Father, and that without the signe of circumcision, because they have baptisme in stead of circumcision. But where hee expressely by name denieth, that Abraham is Father to them which are of circumcision onely, that same was spoken to abate the pride of certaine, which omitting the care of godlinesse, did boast themselves of onely ceremonies. After which manner at this day also their vanitie may be confuted which seeke in baptisme nothing but water.

Rom.4.10.

The carnall and spirituall seed of Abraham heretofore with the estimation due to them both.

14 But another place of the Apostle out of the ninth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romanes shall bee alleadged to the contrary, where he teacheth that they which are of the flesh, are not the children of Abraham: but they onely are counted his seed, which are the children of promise. For hee seemeth to signifie, that the carnall kinred of Abraham is nothing, which yet we doe set in some degree. But it is more diligently to be marked, what matter the Apostle there intreateth of. For, meaning to shew to the Jewes how much the goodnesse of God was not bound to the seed of Abraham, yea how it nothing availeth of it selfe, hee bringeth forth Ismael and Esau for example to prove it: whom being refused, as if they were strangers, although they were according to the flesh the naturall off-spring of Abraham, the blessing rested in Isaac and Jacob. Whereupon is gathered that which he afterward affirmeth, that salvation hangeth of the mercie of God, which hee extendeth to whom it pleaseth him: and that there is no cause why the Jewes should stand in their owne conceit, or boast upon the name of the covenant, unleſſe they keepe the law of the covenant, that is to ſay, doe obey the word. Againe when hee hath throwne them downe from vaine confidence of their kindred, yet becauſe on the other ſide hee ſaw, that the covenant which was once made of God with the poſterity of Abraham, could in no wiſe bee made voide, in the eleventh Chapter, he argueth that the carnall kindred is not to be ſpoiled of his due dignitie: by the beneficiall meane whereof he teacheth that the Iewes are the firſt and naturall heires of the Goſpell, but in reſpect that by their unthankefulneſſe, they were forſaken as unworthy: yet ſo that the heavenly bleſſing is not utterly remooved from their nation. For which reaſon, how much ſoever they were ſtubborne and covenant breakers, nevertheleſſe hee calleth them holy (ſo much honour hee giveth to the holy generation, with whom God had vouchſafed to make his holy covenant) but calleth us if we be compared with them, as it were after borne, yea for the untimely borne children of Abraham, and that by adoption, not by nature: as if a twig broken off from his naturall tree ſhould bee graffed in a ſtrange ſtocke. Therefore that they ſhould not be defrauded of their prerogative: it behooved that the Goſpell ſhould bee firſt preached to them: for they be in the houſhold of God as it were the firſt begotten children. Wherefore this honour was to be given them, until they refuſed it being offered them, and by their owne unthankfulneſſe brought to paſſe that it was carried away to the Gentiles. Neither yet, with how great obſtinacie ſoever they continue to make warre againſt the Goſpell, ought they to be deſpiſed of us: if we conſider that for the promiſes ſake, the bleſſing of God doth yet ſtill remaine among them: as verily the Apoſtle teſtifieth that it ſhall never utterly depart from thence: becauſe the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. Rom. 11.29.

15 Behold of what force is the promiſe given to the poſterity of Abraham, and with what balance it is to be weighed. Wherefore although in diſcerning the heires of the kingdome from baſtards and ſtrangers, we nothing doubt that the onely election of God ruleth with free right of government: yet we alſo therewithall perceive, that it pleaſed him peculiarly to embrace the ſeed of Abraham with his mercie, and that the ſame mercie might be the more ſurely witneſſed, to ſeale it with Circumciſion. Now altogether like ſtate is there of the Chriſtian Church. For as Paul there reaſoneth that the Iewes are ſanctified of their parents: ſo in another place hee teacheth, that the children of Chriſtians receive the ſame ſanctification of their parents: Wherupon is gathered, that they are worthily ſevered from the reſt, which on the other ſide are condemned of uncleanneſſe. Now who can doubt, but that it is moſt falſe which they doe thereupon conclude, that ſay that the infants which in old time were circumciſed, did onely ſignre ſpirituall infancie, which ariſeth of the regeneration of the word of God. For Paul doth not ſo ſubtily play the Philoſopher, where hee writeth that Chriſt is the miniſter of Circumciſion, to fulfill the promiſes which had beene made to the Fathers, as if he had ſaid thus: Foraſmuch as the covenant made with Abraham hath reſpect to his ſeed, Chriſt, to performe and diſcharge the promiſe once made by his Father, came to ſalvation to the nation of the Iewes. See you not how alſo after the reſurrection of Chriſt, he judgeth that the promiſe of the covenant is to bee fulfilled not onely by way of Allegorie, but as the very words do ſound to the carnall ſeed of Abraham. To the ſame intent ſerveth that which Peter in the ſecond Chapter to the Actes, declareth to the Iewes, that the benefit of the Goſpell is due to them and their ſeed by right of the covenant, and in the Chapter next following he calleth them the children of the Teſtament, that is to ſay heires. From which alſo not much diſcordeth the other place of the Apoſtle above alleadged, where hee accounteth and ſetteth circumciſion imprinted in infants, for a teſtimonie of that communion which they have with Chriſt. But if we hearken to their trifles, what ſhall be wrought by that promiſe, whereby the Lord in the ſecond article of his law undertaketh to his ſervants, that he will bee favourable to their ſeed even to the thouſand generation? Shall we here flee to Allegories? But that were too trifling a ſhift. Or ſhall wee ſay that this is aboliſhed? But ſo the law ſhould bee deſtroyed, which Chriſt came rather to ſtabliſh, ſo farre as it turneth us to good unto life. Let it therefore bee out of controverſie, that God is ſo good and liberall to his, that for their ſakes, hee will ſave alſo their children, whom they ſhall beget, to be adnumbred among his people.

Abſurd differences between baptiſme and circumciſion to exclude children from the one, though from the other they were not excluded.

Children want of underſtanding no reaſon to keep them from being baptiſed who is the ſeale of that ſanctitie whereof they are capable.

17 They thinke alſo that they bring forth a moſt ſtrong reaſon, why children are to be debarred from baptiſme, when they alleadge that that they are not yet for age able to underſtand the myſtery there ſignified. That is ſpirituall regeneration, which cannot be in the firſt infancy. Therefore they gather, that they are tobe taken for none other than the children of Adam: till they bee growne to age meet for a ſecond birth. But truth of God each where ſpeaketh againſt all theſe things. For if they be to be left among the children of Adam, then they are left in death: foraſmuch as in Adam we can doe nothing but die. But contrariwiſe Chriſt commandeth them to be brought unto him. Why ſo? becauſe he is life: Therefore that hee may give life to them, he maketh them partakers of himſelfe: when in the meane time theſe fellowes driving them far away doe adjudge them to death. For if they ſay for a ſhift that infants doe not therefore periſh if they be accounted the children of Adam, their error is abundantly confuted by witneſſe of the Scripture. For whereas it pronounceth that all do die in Adam, it followeth that there remaineth no hope of life but in Chriſt. Therefore that wee may be made heires of life, we muſt communicate with him. Againe when it is written in another place, that by nature we are ſubject to the wrath of God: and conceived in ſinne, whereunto damnation perpetually cleaveth: we muſt depart out of our owne nature, before that the entrie bee open to us into the kingdome of God. And what can be more plainely ſpoken, than that fleſh and blood cannot poſſeſſe the kingdome of God? Therefore let all be done away whatſoever is ours (which ſhall not be done without regeneration) then we ſhall ſee this poſſeſſion of the kingdome. Finally if Chriſt ſay truely, when he reporteth that he is life, it is neceſſarie that we be graffed nto him, that we may be delivered out of the bondage of death. But (say they) how are infants regenerate, which are not endued with knowlege neither of good nor of evil? But we answer, that the work of God is not yet no worke at all, although it be not subject to our capacity. Moreover it is nothing doubtfull, that the infants which are to be saved (as verily of that age some are saved) are before regenerate of the Lord. For if they bring wth them from their mothers womb the corruption naturally planted in them: they must be purged thereof, before that they be admitted into the kingdome of God, whereinto nothing entereth that is defiled or spotted. If they be born sinners, as both David & Paul affirme: either they remaine out of favour & hatefull to God, or they must needs be justified. And what seek we more, when the Judge himselfe openly affirmeth that the entry into heavenly life is open to none but to them that be born again? And to put such carpers to silence, he shewed an example in Iohn the Baptist, (whom he sanctified in his mothers womb), what he was able to doe in the rest. Neither doe they any thing prevaile by the shift wherewith they here mocke, that that was but once done: whereupon it doth not by and by follow that the Lord is wont commonly to do so with infants. For neither do we reason after that manner: only our purpose is to shew, that the power of God is by them unjustly & enviously limited within those narrow bounds within which it suffereth not it selfe to be bound. Their other by-shift is even of as great waight. They allege that by the usual manner of the scripture, this word (from the womb) is asmuch in effect, as if it were said, from childhood. But we may cleerly see, that the angel when he declared the same to Zachary, meant another thing: that is, that it which was not yet born, should be filled with the holy Ghost. Let us not therfore attẽpt to apoint a law to God, but that he may sanctify whõ it pleaseth him as he sanctified this child, forasmuch as his power is nothing minished.

Luke 1. 15.

18 And truly Christ was therefore sanctified from his first infancie, that he might sanctifie in himself his elect out of every age without difference. For as, to do away the fault of disobedience which had beene committed in our flesh, he hath put on the same flesh upon himselfe, that he might in it for us & in our steed performe perfect obedience: so he was conceived of the holy Ghost, that having the holines therof fully powred into him in the flesh which he had taken upon him, he might powre forth the same into us. If we have in Christ a most perfect paterne of all the graces which God continually sheweth to his children, verily in this behalfe also he shall be a proofe unto us, that the age of infancy is not so far unfit for sanctification. But howsoever it be, yet this we hold out of controversie that none of the elect is called out of this present life, which is not first made holy & regenerate by the spirit of God. Wheras they object to the contrarie, that in the scriptures the spirit acknowlegeth no other regeneration but of incorruptible seed, that is, of the word of God: they do wrongfully expound that saying of Peter, wherin he cõprehendeth only the faithfull which had beene taught by preaching of the Gospell. To such indeed we grant that the word of the Lord is the only seed of spirituall regeneration: but we deny that it ought therupon to be gathered, that infants cannot be regenerate by the power of God, which is to him as easie and ready as to us it is incomprehensible and wonderful. Moreover it should not be safe enough for us to take this away from the Lord, that he may not be able to shew himselfe to be knowne to them by whatsoever way he will.

Christ in his infancie sanctified to shew that Christians infants are capable of sanctitie.

1 Pet. 1. 23.

19 But faith, say they, is by hearing, wherof they have not yet gotten the use, neither can they be able to know God, whom Moses teacheth to be destitute of the knowledge both of good & evil. But they consider not that the Apostle, when he maketh hearing the beginning of faith, describeth only the ordinarie distribution of the Lord and disposition which he useth to keep in calling them that be his: but appointeth not to him a perpetuall rule, that he may not use any other way. Which way verily he hath used in the calling of many, to whom he hath given the true knowlege of himself, by an inward maner by the enlightning of the spirit, without any preaching used for mean therof. But whereas they think it shall be a great absurditie, if any knowledge of God be given to infants, from whom Moses taketh away the understanding of good and evill: I beseech them to answer me what danger is there if they be said to receive some part of that grace, wherof a little after they shall enjoy the full plentifulnesse. For if the fulnesse of life standeth in the perfect knowlege of God, when many of them, whom in their very first infancie death by and by taketh away, do passe into eternall life, truly they are received to behold the most present face of God. Whom therefore the Lord will enlighten with the full brightnesse of his light, why may he not presently also, if it so please him, send out to shine upon them some small sparkle thereof: specially if he do not first uncloath them of ignorance, before that he taketh them out of the prison of the flesh? Not that I meane rashly to affirme that they be endued with the same Faith which we feele in our selves, or that they have altogether like knowledge of faith: (which I had rather leave in suspence) but somewhat to restraine their fooliſh arrogance, which according as their mouth is puffed up with fulnesse, doe boldly deny or affirme they care not what.

No absurditie that infants have some sparke of that heavenly light here wherof in heaven the full brightnesse doth shine unto them though they die in their infancie. Deut. 1. 39.

Infants not excluded from baptisme more than from circumcision for want of faith and repentance.

20 But that they may yet stand more strongly in this point, they adde that baptisme is a Sacrament of repentance and of Faith, wherfore sith neither of these can befall in tender infancie, we ought to beware lest if they be admitted to the communion of baptisme, the signification of it be made void and vaine. But these darts are throwne rather against God than against us. For it is most evident by many testimonies of Scripture, that circumcision also was a sign of repentance. Moreover it is called of Paul the seale of the righteousnesse of Faith. Let therefore a reason be required of God himselfe why he commanded it to be marked in the bodies of infants. For sith baptisme and circumcision are both in one case, they can give nothing to the one but that they must also therwithall grant the same to the other. If they looke back to their wonted starting hole, that then by the age of infancie were figured spirituall infants, the way is already stopped up against them. We say therfore, sith God hath communicated to infants circumcision a Sacrament of repentance and faith, it seemeth no absurditie if they be made partakers of baptism: unlesse they list openly to rage against the ordinance of God. But both in all the doings of God, & in this selfe same doing also shineth wisdome and righteousnes enough, to beat down the backbitings of the wicked. For though infants, at the same instant that they were circumcised, did not comprehend in understanding what that sign meant: yet they were truly circumcised into the mortification of their corrupt & defiled nature, in which mortification they should afterward exercise themselves when they were growen to riper age. Finally it is very easie to assoile this objection, with saying that they be baptised into repentance & faith to come: which although they be not formed in them yet by secret working of the spirit the seed of both lieth hidden in them. With this answer at once is overthrowen whatsoever they wrest against us which they have fetched out of the signification of baptism. Of which sort is that title wherwith it is commended of Paul, where he calleth it the washing of regeneration & of renewing. Wherupon they gather that it is to be given to none but to such a one as is able to conceive those things. But we on the contrary side may answer, that neither was circumcision which betokened regeneration, to be given to any other than to them that were regenerate. And so also we condemn the ordinance of God. Wherfore (as we have already touched in divers places) whatsoever arguments do tend to the shaking of circumcision, they have no force in the assailing of baptism. Neither do they escape, if they say that we ought to take that for determined and certaine, which standeth upon the authoritie of God, although there appeare no reason of it: which reverence is not due to the baptisme of infants, nor to such other things which be not commended unto us by the expresse word of God: sith they are still fast holden with this double argument. For the commandement of God concerning infants to be circumcised, was either lawfull and subject to no cavillations, or worthy to be found fault withall. If there were no inconvenience nor absurditie in the commandement of circumcision, neither can there any absurditie be noted in observing the baptisme of infants.

Rom. 14. 11.

Tit. 3. 5.

No necessity that the understanding should goe before the receiving of the holy mysterie of baptisme.

21 As for the sport of absurdity which in this place they goe about to lay upon it, we thus wipe it away. Whom the Lord hath vouchsafed to elect, if having received the sign of regeneration, they depart out of this present life before that they be come to riper age he reneweth them wᵗʰ the power of his spirit incomprehensible to us, in such maner as he alone foreseeth to be expedient. If they chance to grow up to age, whereby they may be taught the truth of baptism, they shall hereby be the more inkindled to the endevor of renuing, the token wherof they shal learn to have bin given them from their first infancie, that they should exercise themselves in it throughout the whole course of their life. To the same intent ought that to be applied which Paul teacheth in two places, that by baptism we are buried together with Christ. For he doth not mean therby, that he which is to be baptised must be already first buried together with Christ: but simply declareth what doctrin is contained under baptism, yea & that to them that be already baptised: so that very

mad men would not affirm by this place that it goeth before baptisme. After this manner Moses and the Prophets did put the people in mind what circumcision meant, wherwith yet they had bin marked while they were infants. Of the same effect also is that which he writeth to the Galathians, that they when they were baptised, did put on Christ. To what end? Verily that they should from thenceforth live to Christ, because they had not lived before. And although in the older sort the receiving of the signe ought to follow the understanding of the mysterie: yet it shall be by and by declared that infants ought to be otherwise esteemed and accounted of. And no otherwise ought we to judge of the place of Peter, in which they think that they have a strong hold: when hee saith that it is not a washing to wipe away the filthinesses of the body, but the witnesse of a good conscience before God, by the resurrection of Christ. They indeed do gather thereby, that nothing is left to the baptisme of infants, but that it should be a vain smoke, namely from which this truth is far distant. But they often offend in this error, that they will have the thing in order of time to goe alway before the signe. For the truth of circumcision also consisted of the same witnesse of good conscience. If it ought of necessitie to have gone before, infants should never have bin circumcised by the commandement of God. But he shewing that the witnesse of a good conscience was contained under the truth of circumcision, and yet therewithall also commanding infants to be circumcised, doth in that point sufficiently declare that circumcision is applyed to the time to come. Wherefore there is no more present effectualnesse to be required in baptisme of infants, than that it should confirme and stablish the covenant made by the Lord with them. The rest of the signification of that Sacrement shall afterward follow at such time as God himselfe foreseeth.

Gal. 3. 27.

1 Pet. 3. 21.

22 Now I think there is no man, that doth not cleerly see that all such reasons of theirs are meer misconstruings of Scriptur. As for the rest that be of a neer kind to these, we will lightly run thorow them by the way. They object that baptisme is given unto the forgivenes of sins: which when it is granted, will largely make for defence of our sentence. For sith we be borne sinners, we doe even from our mothers womb need forgivenes and pardon. Now seeing the Lord doth not cut off, but rather assure to that age the hope of mercy: why should we take from them the signe which is much inferior than the thing it selfe? Wherefore that which they goe about to throw against us, we thus throw backe against themselves: infants have remission of sins given them, therefore they ought not to have the sign taken from them. They alleage also this out of the Epistle to the Ephesians: that the Church is clensed of the Lord, with the washing of water in the word of life. Than which there could be nothing alleaged more fit to overthrow this error: for thereupon groweth an easie proof of our side. If the Lord will have that washing, wherwith he clenseth his Church, to be testified by baptisme: it seemeth not rightfull that it should want the testimony of it in infants, which are rightfully accounted part of the Church, forasmuch as they be called heires of the heavenly kingdom. For Paul speaketh of the whole Church, where he saith that it was clensed with the baptism of water. Likwise of this that in another place he saith, that we be by baptisme grafted into the body of Christ, we gather that infants, whom he reckoneth among his members, ought to be baptised, lest they be plucked away from his body. Behold with what violence as with so many engins they assault the fortresses of our faith.

Baptisme of infants proved by allegations brought to disprove it, as that it is ministred to the forgiveneſſe of sinnes, that the Church is therewith clensed of the Lord in the word of life, that thereby we are engrafted into the body of Christ.
Eph. 5. 26.

1 Cor. 12. 27.

23 Then they come down to the practise & custom of the time of the Apostles, wherin none is found to have bin admitted to baptism, but he which hath before professed faith & repentance. For where Peter was asked of them that were minded to repent, what was needful to be done, he counselled them first to repent, & then to be baptised into the forgivnes of sins. Likwise Philip, when the Evnuch required to be baptised, answered that he might be baptised if he believed with all his hart. Hereby they think that they may win, that it is not lawful that baptism be grãted to any, but where faith & repẽtance go before. Truly if we yeeld to this reason, the first of these two places where is no mention made of faith, wil prove that repentance alone sufficeth: and the other place, wherin repentance is not required wil prov that faith only is enough. I think they wil answer that the on place is holpen wth the other, & therfore must be joyned together, I say also likwise, that other places must be laid togither which make somwhat to the undoing of this knot: forasmuch as there be many sentences in scripture, the understanding wherof hangeth upon the circumstance

The Apostles in not baptising any come unto yeeres of discretion, without repentance and profession made of their faith, meant not hereby to teach that none should be baptised but only such as were of yeeres to doe this.
Act. 2. 37.

ſtance of the place. As this preſently is an example. For they to whom Peter and Philip ſpake theſe things were of age ſufficient to have practice of repentance and to conceive faith. We earneſtly deny that ſuch ought to be baptiſed, untill after perceiving of their converſion and faith, at leaſt ſo far as it may be ſearched out by the judgement of men. But that infants ought to be accounted in another number, it is more than evident enough. For in old time if any man did joine himſelf into communion of religion with Iſrael, it behoved that he ſhould firſt he taught the covenant of the Lord, and inſtructed in the Law, before that he were marked with circumciſion, becauſe in birth he was a ſtranger from the people of Iſrael, with whom the covenant had beene made with circumciſion ſtabliſhed.

Act. 8. 37.

As faith in Abraham went before circumciſion, but in his ſeede circumciſion before faith, ſo it is with baptiſme in chriſtian men and children.

Gen. 15 1.
Gen. 17. 16.

24 As alſo the Lord, when he adopteth Abraham to himſelfe, doth not begin at circumciſion, hiding in the mean time what he meaneth by that ſign: but firſt he declareth what covenant he intendeth to make with him, & then after faith given to the promiſe, he maketh him partaker of the Sacrament. Why doth in Abraham the ſacrament follow faith, and in Iſaac his ſon it goeth before all underſtanding? Becauſe it is meet that he, which being in full grown age is received into fellowſhip of the covenant, from which he had bin hitherto a ſtranger, ſhould firſt learn the conditions thereof: but an infant begotten of him needed not ſo, which by right of inheritance according to the form of the promiſe is even from his mothers womb contained in the covenant. Or (that the mater may be more clearly and briefly ſhewed) if the children of the faithfull, without the help of underſtanding, are partakers of the covenant, there is no cauſe why they ſhould be debarred from the ſign for this that they cannot ſwear to the form of the covenant. This verily is the reaſon, why in ſome places God affirmeth that the infants which are iſſued of the Iſraelites, are begotten and borne to him. For without doubt he eſteemeth as his children the children of them to whoſe ſeed he promiſeth that he will be a Father. But he which is unfaithfull iſſued of ungodly parents, til he be by faith united to God, is judged a ſtranger from the communion of the covenant. Therefore it is no marvell if he be not partaker of the ſigne, the ſignification wherof ſhould be deceitfull and void in him. To this effect Paul alſo writeth that the Gentiles ſo long as they were drowned in their idolatry, were out of the Teſtament. With this ſhort ſum, (as I think) the whole matter may be cleerly opened: that they which in grown age, embrace the faith of Chriſt, foraſmuch as they were hitherto ſtrangers from the covenant, are not to be marked with baptiſme, but wheras faith and repentãce come between, which only can open them the entry into the fellowſhip of the covenant: but the infants that are iſſued of Chriſtians, as they are received of God into the inheritance of the covenant, ſo ſoone as they be borne; ſo ought to be received to baptiſm. Hereunto muſt that be applyed which the Evangeliſt ſpeaketh of, that they were baptiſed of John which confeſſed their ſins. Which example at this day alſo we think meet to be kept. For if a Turke offer himſelfe to baptiſme, he ſhould not be raſhly baptiſed of us, namely not till after confeſſion, whereby he may ſatisfie the Church.

Gen. 16 2. and 23 37.

Ephe. 2. 12.

Mat. 3 6.

The words of Chriſt concerning birth of water and the ſpirit nothing leſſe than a proofe that effectuall regeneration muſt preſently always concur with baptiſme.

Iohn 3. 5.

25 Moreover they bring forth the words of Chriſt, which are rehearſed in the third Chapter of Iohn, whereby they think that a preſent regeneration is required in baptiſm. Unleſſe a man be born againe of water and the ſpirit, he cannot enter into the kingdome of God. Lo (ſay they) how baptiſm is by the Lords own mouth called regeneration. Then therefore whom it is more than enough known to be unable to receive regeneration, by what colour do we admit to baptiſme which cannot be without regeneration? Firſt they are deceived in this that they thinke that in this place mention is made of baptiſme, becauſe they heare the name of water. For after that Chriſt had declared to Nicodemus the corruption of nature, and taught him, that men muſt be borne of new, becauſe Nicodemus dreamed of a bodily new birth, he there ſhewed the manner how God doth regenerate us, namely by water and the ſpirit: as though he ſhould ſay by the ſpirit which in cleanſing and watering faithfull ſoules doth the office of water. Therefore I take water and the ſpirit ſimply for the ſpirit, which is water. Neither is this a new forme of ſpeech, for it altogether agreeth with the ſame which is in the third Chapter of Matthew: He that followeth me, it is he that baptiſeth in the holy Ghoſt and fire. Therfore as to baptiſe in the holy Ghoſt and fire, is to give the holy Ghoſt, which hath the office and nature of fire: ſo to be born again of water and the ſpirit, is nothing elſe but to receive that power of the holy ſpirit which doth the ſame thing in the ſoule that water doth in the body.

Mat. 3. 11.

dy. I know that other do otherwiſe expound it: but I am out of doubt that this is the naturall meaning: becauſe the purpoſe of Chriſt is none other, but to teach that all they muſt put off their own nature which aſpire to the heavenly kingdom. Howbeit if we liſt to cavil unſavorily as they do, it were eaſie for us (when we have granted as they would have it) to infer upon them that baptiſme is before faith and repentance: foraſmuch as in the words of Chriſt it goeth before the ſpirit. It is certaine that this is underſtood of ſpirituall gifts: which if it come after baptiſme, I have obtained what I require. But leaving cavillations, we muſt hold faſt the plaine expoſition, which I have brought, that no man till he have bin renued with living water, that is, with the ſpirit, can enter into the kingdome of God.

26 Now hereby alſo it is evident that their fained invention is to be hiſſed out, which adjudge all the unbaptiſed to eternall death. Therefore let us according to their requeſt imagine baptiſme to be miniſtred to none but to them that be growne in age: What will they ſay, ſhall become of a child, which is rightly and well inſtructed with the introductions of godlines, if when the day of baptiſing is at hand, he happen to be taken away with ſudden death beſide all mens hope? The Lords promiſe is cleere, that whoſoever hath beleeved in the ſonne, ſhall not ſee death, nor ſhall come into judgement, but is already paſſed from death into life: and it is no where found that he ever damned him that was not yet baptiſed. Which I would not have ſo taken of me, as though I meant that baptiſme might freely be deſpiſed (by which deſpiſing I affirme that the Lords covenant is defiled: ſo much leſſe can I abide to excuſe it:) only it is enough for me to prove, that it is not ſo neceſſarie, that he ſhould be immediatly thought to be loſt, from whom power is taken away to obtaine it. But if we agree to their fained device, we ſhall damne all them without exception, whom any chance withholdeth from baptiſme, with how great faith ſoever (by which Chriſt himſelfe is poſſeſſed) otherwiſe they are endued. Moreover they make all infants guilty of eternall death, to whom they denie baptiſme, which by their own confeſſion is neceſſary to ſalvation. Now let them looke how trimly they agree with the words of Chriſt, by which the kingdome of heaven is adjudged to that age. But, to grant them every thing ſo much as pertaineth to the underſtanding of this place, yet they ſhall gather nothing thereof unleſſe they overthrow the former doctrine which we have ſtabliſhed concerning the regeneration of infants.

All unbaptiſed not to be adjudged to eternall death.

Mat. 19. 14.

27 But they glory that they have the ſtrongeſt hold of all in the very inſtitution of baptiſme, which they fetch out of the laſt Chapter of Matthew: where Chriſt ſending forth his Apoſtles to all nations, giveth them the firſt commandement to teach them, and the ſecond to baptiſe them. Then alſo out of the laſt of Mark they adjoyne this, He that beleeveth and is baptiſed, ſhall be ſaved. What ſeek we further (ſay they) when the Lords own words doe openly ſound, that we muſt firſt teach ere we baptiſe, and do aſſign to baptiſme the ſecond ſtate after faith? Of which order the Lord alſo ſhewed an example in himſelfe, which would be baptiſed not till the thirtieth yeere. But here, O good God, how many wayes doe they both entangle themſelves, and bewray their owne ignorance? For herein they now more than childiſhly erre, that they fetch the firſt inſtitution of Baptiſme from thence, which Chriſt had from the beginning of his preaching given in charge to his Apoſtles to miniſter. Therefore there is no cauſe why they ſhould affirme that the law and rule of Baptiſme is to be fetched out of theſe places, as though they contained the firſt inſtitution thereof. But to beare with them for this fault yet how ſtrong is this manner of reaſoning? Truly if I liſted to dally with them, there is not a little lurking hole, but a moſt wide field offereth it ſelfe open for us to eſcape them. For when they ſtick ſo faſt to the order of words, that they gather that becauſe it was ſaid, Goe preach and baptiſe. Againe, he that beleeveth and is baptiſed, therefore they muſt preach before that they baptiſe, and beleeve before that they require baptiſme: why may not we again anſwer them with ſaying that we muſt baptiſe before that we muſt teach the keeping of thoſe things that Chriſt hath commanded, namely ſith it is ſaid, baptiſe ye, teaching them to keep whatſoever things I have commanded you? which ſame things we have noted in that ſaying of Chriſt which hath been even now alleaged concerning the regeneration of water and the ſpirit. For if it be ſo underſtood as they would have it, verily in that place baptiſme muſt be before ſpirituall regeneration, becauſe it is named in the firſt place, For Chriſt doth teach that we muſt be regenerate, not of the ſpirit and water, but of water and the ſpirit.

The baptiſme of infants not diſproved by the commandement which Chriſt gave to teach and baptiſe, nor by the promiſe of ſalvation which he maketh to every one that beleeveth and is baptiſed. Mat. 28. 19. Mark. 16. 16. Mat. 3. 13. Luk. 3. 23.

Mark. 16. 15.

The Gospel by Christs apointment to be preached to men of capacitie and they to beleeve before they be baptised but not Infants therefore to bee unbaptised till they come unto yeeres of habilitie to beare and beleeve.

28 Now this invincible reason wherupon they beare themselves so bold, seemeth to be somwhat shaken: but because truth hath defence enough in simplicity, I will not escape away with such light arguments. Therefore let them take with them a full answer. Christ in this place giveth the chiefe commandement concerning the preaching of the Gospell, wherunto he adjoyneth the ministery of baptisme as an addition hanging upon it. Againe he speaketh more otherwise of baptisme, but so farre as the ministration of it is under the office of teaching. For Christ sendeth the Apostles to publish the Gospell to all the nations of the world, that they should from each where with the doctrin of salvation gather together into his kingdome men that before were lost. But whom, or what manner of men? It is certaine that there is no mention but of them that are able to receive teaching. Afterward he addeth that such, when they are instructed, ought to be baptised, adjoyning a promise, that they that beleeve and are baptised shall be saved. Is there in all that saying so much as one syllable of infants? What forme therefore of reasoning shall this be wherewith they assaile us: they which are of growne age, must first be instructed, that they may beleeve, ere they be baptised: therefore it is unlawfull to make baptisme common to infants? Although they would burst themselves, they shall prove nothing else by this place but that the Gospell must be preached to them that are of capacitie able to heare it, before that they be baptised, forasmuch as he there speaketh of such onely. Let them hereof if they can make a stop to debarre infants from baptisme.

Children no more excluded from baptisme by commandement given that no men should be baptised before they beleeve, than from meat by the Apostles injunction that none should eat that laboureth not. 2 Thes. 3. 10.

29 But that even blind men also may with groping find out their diceits, I will point them out with a very cleere similitude. If any man cavill that infants ought to have meat taken from them, upon this pretence that the Apostle suffereth none to eat but them that labour, shall he not be worthy that all men should spit at him? Why so? Because he without difference draweth that to all men, which was spoken of one kinde and one certaine age of men. No whit handsomer is their handling in this present cause. For that which every man seeth to belong to one age alone, they draw to infants, that this age also may be subject to the rule which was made for none but them that were more grown in yeers. As for the example of Christ it nothing upholdeth their side, He was not baptised before that he was thirty yeers old. That is indeed true: but there is a reason thereof ready to be shewed: because he then purposed by his preaching to lay a sound foundation of baptisme, or rather to stablish the foundation which had beene before laid of Iohn. Therefore when he minded with his doctrine to institute baptisme, to procure the greater authoritie to his institution, he sanctified with his owne body, and that in such times of time as was most convenient, namely when he began his preaching. Finally, they shall gather nothing else hereof, but that baptise tooke his originall and beginning at the preaching of the Gospell. If they list to appoint the thirtieth yeere, why doe they not keep it, but do receive every one to baptisme as he hath in their judgement sufficiently profited? yea and Servetus one of their masters when he stiffely required this time, yet began at the 21. yeere of his age to boast himself to be a Prophet, As though he were to be suffred that taketh on himselfe the place of a teacher in the Church, before that he be a member of the Church.

Luk. 3. 23.

The Scripture sheweth reason why the Lords supper should not be given unto Infants, but why Baptisme none.

30 At the last they object, that there is no greater cause why Baptisme should be given to Infants, than the Lords supper, which yet is not granted them. As though the scripture did not every way expresse a large difference. The same was indeed usually done in the old Church, as it appeareth by Cyprian and Augustine: but that manner is worthily grown out of use. For if we consider the nature and property of baptisme, it is truly an entry into the Church, and as it were a forme of admission, whereby we are adnumbred into the people of God, a sign of our spiritual regeneration by which we are born again into the children of God: whereas on the other side the supper is given to them that be more growne in age, which having passed tender infancy, are now able to beare strong meat. Which difference is very evidently shewed in the scripture. For there the Lord so much as pertaineth to baptisme, maketh no choice of ages. But he doth not likewise give the supper to all to take part of it, but only to them which are fit to discerne the body and blood of the Lord, to examine their owne conscience, to declare the Lords death, to waigh the power thereof. Would we have any thing plainer, than that which the Apostle teacheth when he exhorteth that every man should prove and examine himselfe, and then eat of this bread and drink of this cup? Therefore examination must goe before, which should in vaine be looked for of infants. Againe, he that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himselfe, not discerning the Lords body. If none can partake worthily but they that can well discerne the holinesse of the Lords body, why should we give to our tender children, poison in stead of lively food? What is that commandement of the Lord, ye shall doe it in remembrance of me? what is that other which the Apostle deriveth from the same. So oft as yee shall eat of this bread, ye shall declare the Lords death till he come? What remembrance (I beseech you) shall we require at our infants of the thing which they never attained with understanding, what preaching of the crosse of Christ, the force and benefit whereof they doe not yet comprehend in mind? None of these things is prescribed in Baptisme. Therefore betweene these two signes is great difference: which we note also in like signes in the old testament; Circumcision, which is knowne to answer to our Baptisme, was appointed for infants. But the Passeover into whose place the Supper hath now succeeded, did not receive all manner of guests without difference. But was rightly eaten of them onely that might by age enquire of the signification of it. If these men had remaining one crum of sound braine, would they be blind at a thing so cleere and offering it selfe to sight. 1 Cor. 11. 28.

13 Although it grieveth me to load the Readers with a heap of trifles: yet it shall bee worth the travaile briefly to wipe away such gay reasons as Servetus not the least of the Anabaptists, yea the great glory of that company, thought himselfe to bring when he prepared himselfe to conflict. He alleageth that Christs signes as they be perfect, so doe require them that be perfect or able to conceive perfection. But the solution is easie: that the perfection of Baptisme, which extendeth even to death, is wrongfully restrained to one point of time. I say yet further that perfection is foolishly required in man at the first day, whereunto Baptism allureth us all our life long, by continuall degrees. He objecteth that Christs signes were ordained for remembrance, that every may should remember that he was buried together with Christ. I answer that that which he hath fained of his own head, needeth no confutation: yea that which he draweth to Baptisme, Pauls words shew to be proper to the holy supper, that every man should examine himselfe: but of Baptisme there is no where any such thing. Whereupon we gather that they be rightly Baptised which for their smalnesse of age, are not yet able to receive examination. Wheras he thirdly alleageth, that all they abide in death which beleeve not the Son of God, and that the wrath of God abideth upon them: and therfore that infants which cannot beleeve lie in their damnation: I answer that Christ there speaketh not of the generall guiltinesse whetwith all the posterity of Adam are enwrapped, but only threatneth the despisers of the Gospel, which do proudly & stubbornly refuse the grace offered them. But this nothing pertaineth to infants. Also I set a contrary reason against them: that whomsoever Christ blesseth, he is discharged from the curse of Adam and the wrath of God: Sith therefore it is knowen that infants are blessed of him, it followeth that they are discharged from death. Then he falsly citeth that which is no where read, that whosoever is borne of the spirit, heareth the voice of the spirit. Which although we grant to be written, yet shall prove nothing else but that the faithfullare framed to obedience, according as the spirit worketh in them. But that which is spoken of a certaine number, it is faulty to draw indifferently to all. Fourthly, he objecteth: because that goeth before which is naturall we must tarry ripe time for Baptisme which is spirituall. But although I grant that all the posterity of Adam begotten of the flesh doe from the very womb bare their owne damnation, yet I deny that that withstandeth but that God may presently bring remedie. For neither shall Servetus prove that there were many yeares appointed by God that the spiritualnesse of life may begin As Paul testifieth, although they which are borne of the faithfull are by nature damned: yet by supernaturall grace they are saved. Then he bringeth forth an allegory that David going up into the tower of Sion, did lead neither blind men nor lame men with him but strong souldiers. But what if I set a parable against it, wherin God calleth to the heavenly banket blind men and lame men: how will Servetus unwind himselfe out of this knot? I aske also whether lame and maimed men have not first bin souldiers with David. But is is superfluous to tarry longer upon this reason, which the readers shall find by the holy History to be made of meere falshood. There followeth another allegory, that the Apostles were fishers of men, not of little children. But I aske, what that saying of Christ meaneth meaneth that into the net of the Goſpell are gathered all kinds of fiſhes. But becauſe I like not to play with allegories, I anſwer that when the office of teaching was enjoyned to the Apoſtles, yet they were not forbidden from baptiſing of infants. Howbeit I would yet know, when the Evangeliſt nameth them Anthropous, men, (in which word is comprehended all mankind without exception) why they ſhould denie infants to be men. Seventhly he alleageth, that ſith ſpirituall things agree with ſpirituall, infants which are not ſpirituall, are alſo not meet for baptiſme. But firſt it is plainly evident how wrongfully they wreſt the place of Paul. There is entreated of doctrine: when the Corinthians did too much ſtand in their own conceit for vaine ſharpeneſſe of wit, Paul rebuketh their ſluggiſhnes, for that they were yet to be inſtructed in the firſt introduction of heavenly wiſdom. Who can thereof gather that baptiſme is to be denied to infants, whom being begotten of the fleſh, God doth by free adoption make holy to himſelfe? Whereas he ſaith, that they muſt bee fed with ſpirituall meat, if they be new men, the ſolution is eaſie that by baptiſme they are admitted into the flocke of Chriſt, and that the ſigne of adoption ſufficeth them, till being growen to age they be able to beare ſtrong meat: that therefore the time of examination which God expreſly requireth in the holy Supper, muſt be tarried for. Afterward he objecteth that Chriſt calleth all his to the holy Supper. But it is certaine enough that he admitteth none, but them that be already prepared to celebrate the remembrance of his death. Whereupon followeth that infants whom he vouchſafed to embrace, doe ſtay in a ſeverall and proper degree by themſelves till they grow to age, and yet are not ſtrangers.

8 Whereas he ſaith, that it is monſtrous that a man after that he is borne, ſhould not eat: I anſwer that ſoules are otherwiſe fed than by the outward eating of the Supper: and that therfore Chriſt is nevertheleſſe meat to infants, although they abſtaine from the ſigne. But of baptiſme the caſe is otherwiſe, by which onely the gate into the Church is opened to them. Againe he objecteth that a good ſteward diſtributeth meat to the houſhold in due time. Which although I willingly grant: yet by what right will he appoint unto us the certaine time of baptiſme, that he may prove that it is not given to infants out of time.

9 Mat. 24. 46.

10 Moreover he bringeth in that commandement of Chriſt to the Apoſtles, that they ſhould make haſte into the harveſt, while the fields wax white. Verily Chriſt meaneth this onely, that the Apoſtles ſeeing the fruit of their labour preſent, ſhould the more cheerefully prepare themſelves to teach. Who ſhall therefore gather that the onely time of harveſt is the ripe time for baptiſme? His eleventh reaſon is, that in the firſt Church Chriſtians and diſciples were all one: but we ſee now that he fondly reaſoneth from the part to the whole

John 4 35.

11 Act. 11. 26. Diſciples are called men of full age, which had beene already throughly taught, and had profeſſed Chriſt: as it behooved that the Jewes under the law ſhould be the diſciples of Moſes: yet no man ſhall thereof rightly gather, that infants were ſtrangers, whom the Lord hath teſtified to be of his owne houſhold. Beſides theſe he alleageth, that all Chriſtians are brethren, in which number infants are not unto us, ſo long as we debarre them from the Supper. But I returne to that principle, that none are heires of the kingdome of heaven, but they that are the members of Chriſt: then, that the embracing of Chriſt was a true token of the adoption, whereby infants are joyned in common with ful growne men, and that the abſtaining for a time from the Supper withſtandeth not but that they pertain to the body of the Church. Neither did the thiefe that was converted on the croſſe, ceaſe to be brother to the godly, although he never came to the Supper.

13 Afterward he addeth that none is made our brother but by the Spirit of adoption, which is given only by the hearing of faith. I anſwer, that he ſtill falleth back into the ſame deceitfull argument, becauſe he overthwartly draweth that to infants which was ſpoken onely of growne men. Paul teacheth there that this is Gods ordinary manner of calling to bring his elect to the faith, when he ſtirreth up to them faithfull teachers, by whoſe miniſterie and travell hee reacheth his hand to them. Who dare therby appoint a law to him, but that he may by ſóe other ſecret way graffe infants into Chriſt? Where he objecteth that Cornelius was baptiſed after he had received the holy Ghoſt: how wrongfully he doth out of one example gather a generall rule, appeareth by the Evnuch and the Samaritanes, in whom the Lord kept a contrary order, that baptiſme went before the gifts of the holy Ghoſt. The fifteenth reaſon is more than fooliſh. He ſaith that we are by regeneration made gods: and that they be gods to whom the word of God is ſpoken, which accordeth not to children that be infants. Whereas he faineth a Godhead to the faithfull, that is one of his dotages, which it partaineth not to this preſent place to examine. But to wreſt the place of the Pſalme to ſo contrary a ſenſe, is a point of deſperate ſhameleſneſſe. Chriſt ſaith, that Kings and Magiſtrates are caled of the Prophet Gods, becauſe they beare an office appointed them of God. But that which concerning the ſpeciall commandement of governance is directed to certaine men, this handſome expoſitor draweth to the doctrine of the Goſpell, that he may baniſh infants out of the Church. Againe he objecteth, that infants cannot be accounted new men, becauſe they are not begotten by the word. But I doe now againe repeat that which I have often ſaid, that to regenerate us, doctrine is the uncorruptible ſeed, if we be fit to receive it: but when by reaſon of age there is not yet in us aptneſſe to learne, God keepeth his degrees of regenerating. Afterward he commeth back to his allegories, that in the law a ſheep and a goat were not offered in ſacrifice ſo ſoon as they came out of the womb. If I liſted to draw figures to this purpoſe, I could readily object againſt them, that all firſt begotten things were conſecrate to God ſo ſoon as they have opened the womb: then that a lamb muſt be killed at a yeeres age. Whereupon followeth that manly ſtrength is not to be tarried for, but rather that the new & yet tender iſſues are choſen of God for ſacrifices. Furthermore he affirmeth that none can come to Chriſt but they that have bin prepared of Iohn. As though Johns office were not enduring but for a time. But to omit truly that ſame preparation was not in the children whom Chriſt imbraced and bleſſed. Wherefore let him go with his falſe principle. At length he calleth for patrons Triſmegiſtus and the Sibylles, to prove that holy waſhings pertaine not but to them that are of growen age. Lo how honourably he thinketh of the baptiſme of Chriſt, which he reduceth to the cerimonies of the Gentiles, that it may be no otherwiſe miniſtred than pleaſeth Triſmegiſtus. But we more eſteeme the authority of God, whom it hath pleaſed to make infants holy to himſelfe, and to admit them with the holy ſigne, the force whereof they did not yet by age underſtand. Neither doe we count it lawfull to borrow out of the cleanſings of the Gentiles any thing, that may change in our Baptiſm the everlaſting and inviolable law of God, which he hath ſtabliſhed concerning circumſion. Laſt of all, he maketh this argument: that if it be lawfull to baptiſe infants without underſtanding, that Baptiſme may enterlude like and inſport be miniſtred of boyes when they play. But of this matter let him quarell with God by whoſe commandement circumciſion was common to infants before that they have attained underſtanding. Was it therefore a playing matter, or ſubject to the follies of children, that they might overthrow the holy ordinance of God? But it is no marvell that theſe reprobate ſpirits, as though they were vexed wᵗʰ a phrenſie, do thruſt in all the groſſeſt abſurdities for defence of their errors, becauſe God doth with ſuch giddineſſe juſtly take vengance of their pride and ſtubbornneſſe. Verily I truſt I have made plaine with how feeble ſuccours Servetus hath holpen his ſilly breathren the Anabaptiſts.

16 17 Exod. 13.2. Exod. 12.5. 18 19 20

32 Now I think it wil be doubtful to no ſober man, how raſhly they trouble the church of Chriſt that move brawles and contentions for the Baptiſme of infants. But it is profitable to conſider, what ſatan goeth about with this ſo great ſubtility: even to take away from us the ſingular fruit of affiance and ſpirituall joy which is to be gathered hereof to diminiſh as much alſo the glory of the goodneſſe of God. For how ſweet is it to godly minds, to be certified not only by word, but alſo by ſight to be ſeene with eyes, that they obtaine ſo much favor with the heavenly Father, that he hath alſo care of their poſterity For here it is to be ſeene, how he taketh upon him the perſon of a moſt provident father of houſhold toward us, which even after our death doth not lay away his carefulneſſe of us, but provideth and ſeeth for our children. Ought we not heere after the example of David with all our heart to leap up unto thankſgiving, that by ſuch ſhew of his goodneſſe, his name may be ſanctified? This, verily Satan intendeth, in aſſaling with ſo great armies the Baptiſme of infants: namely, that this teſtifying of the grace of God being taken away, the promiſe which by it is preſent before our eyes, may at length by little and little vaniſh away. Whereupon ſhould grow not onely a wicked unthankfulnes toward the mercie of God, but alſo a certaine ſlothfulneſſe in inſtructing our children to godlineſſe. For by this ſpur we are not a little pricked forward to bring them up in earneſt fear of God and in the keeping of his law, when we conſider that even immediatly from their their birth, he taketh and acknowledgeth them for his children. Wherfore unles we list enviously to darken the bountifulneſſe of God, let us offer to him our children, to whom he giveth a place among them that be of his family and houſhold, that is to ſay, the members of the Church.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of the holy Supper of Chriſt: and what it availeth us:

The Sacrament of the ſupper of Chriſt inſtituted to teſtifie that our ſoules are not onely once made alive, but continually kept and nouriſhed by Chriſt as by food.

AFter that God hath once received us into his family, and not only to take us as his ſervants but as his children: that he may fulfill the office of a moſt good Father, and carefull for his iſſue, he taketh alſo upon him to nouriſh us throughout the whole courſe of our life. And not contented therewith, it pleaſed him by a pledge given, to aſſure us of this continuall liberality. To this end therefore he hath given his Church another Sacrament by the hand of his only begotten Sonne, namely a ſpirituall banket, wherein Chriſt teſtifieth himſelf to be the quickning bread, wherwith our ſoules are fed to true and bleſſed immortality. But foraſmuch as the knowledge of ſo great a miſtery is very neceſſary, and according to the greatneſſe thereof, requireth a diligent declaration: and Satan, that he might bereave the Church of this ineſtimable treaſure, hath long ago ſpread miſts, and ſince that time darkeneſſe, to obſcure the light of it, and then hath ſtirred ſtrifes and battels that might eſtrange the mindes of the ſimple from taſting of this holy food, and hath alſo in our time attempted the ſame craft: therefore when I ſhall have briefly knit up the ſum for the capacitie of the unlearned, I will undoe thoſe knots, wherewith Satan hath endevoured to ſnare the world. Firſt, bread and wine are ſignes, which repreſent unto us the inviſible food, which we receive of the fleſh and blood of Chriſt. For as in Baptiſme God againe begetting us doth graft us into the fellowſhip of his Church, and by adoption doth make us his owne: ſo we have ſaid that he performeth the office of a provident father of houſhold, in this that he continually miniſtreth us meat, that he ſuſtaineth and preſerveth us in that life whereunto he hath by his word begotten us. Now the onely meat of our ſoule is Chriſt, and therefore the heavenly father calleth us to him, that being refreſhed with common partaking of him, we may from time to time garher lively force, untill we attaine to heavenly immortality. But foraſmuch as this miſtery of the ſecret uniting of Chriſt with the godly is by nature impoſſible to be comprehended, he giveth the figure and image thereof in viſible ſignes moſt fit for our ſmall capacitie: yea, as it were by earneſt and tokens given, he maketh it ſo aſſured unto us as if it were ſeen with our eies, becauſe this ſo familiar a ſimilitude entreth even to the groſſeſt minds that ſoules are ſo fed with Chriſt, as bread and wine doe ſuſtaine the bodily life. Now therfeore we have it declared, to what end this myſticall bleſſing tendeth, namely to aſſure us, that the body of the Lord was ſo once offered for us, that we now eat it, and in eating it do feele in us the effectuall working of that only ſacrafice, that his blood was ſo once ſhed for us, that it is unto us continuall drink. And ſo ſound the words of the promiſe there adjoyned Take, this is my body, which is delivered for you. The body therefore which was once offered up for our ſalvation, we are commanded to take and eat: that when we ſee our ſelves to be made partakers of this, we may certainely determine that the power of his death which bringeth life ſhall be effectuall in us. Whereupon alſo he calleth the cup, the covenant in his bloud. For after a certaine manner it reneweth, or rather continueth the covenant which he hath once ſtabliſhed with his bloud, ſo much as pertaineth to the confirming of our faith, ſo oft as he reacheth unto us that holy bloud to be taſted of.

Mat. 26.26. Mat. 14.17. Luke. 22.19. 1 Cor. 11.24.

The exchange which Chriſt hath made by taking that upon him which was ours, and communicating that which is his to us, confirmed by this ſacrament.

2 A great fruit verily of affiance and ſweetneſſe may godly ſoules gather of this ſacrament, becauſe they have a witneſſe, that we are growen together into one body with Chriſt, ſo that whatſoever is his we may cal ours. Herupon followeth that we may boldly promiſe unto our ſelves, that everlaſting life is ours, whereof he is heire: and that the kingdom of heaven, wherinto he is now entred, can no more fall away from us than from him: againe that we cannot now be condemned by our ſins, from the guiltineſſe whereof he hath acquited us, when he willed them to be imputed to himſelf as if they were his owne. This is the marvellous exchange, which of his immeaſurable bountifulnes he hath made with us: that he being made with us the ſonne of man, hath made us with him the ſons of God: that by his comming downe into earth, he hath made us a way to go up into into heaven: that putting upon him our mortality, he hath given us his immortality: that taking on him our weakneſſe, he hath ſtrengthened us with his power: that taking our povertie to himſelfe, he hath conveyed his riches to us: that taking to him the waight of our unrighteouſneſſe, wherewith we were oppreſſed, he hath clothed us with his righteouſneſſe.

3 Of all theſe things we have ſo full a witneſſing in this Sacrament, that we muſt certainly determine, that Chriſt is truly given us, as if Chriſt himſelf were ſet preſent before our eyes, and handled with our hands. For this word can neither lie to us, nor mock us: Take, eat, drinke: This is my body, which is delivered for you: this is the bloud, which is ſhed into the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes. Whereas he commandeth to take, he ſignifieth that it is ours. Whereas he commandeth to eat, he ſignifieth that that is made one ſubſtance with us: Wheras he ſaith of the body that it is delivered for us: of the blood, that it is ſhed for us: therein he teacheth that both are not ſo much his as ours: becauſe he took and laid away both, not for his commodity, but to our ſalvation, And truly it is to be diligently marked, that the chiefe, and in a manner whole pith of the ſacrament ſtandeth in theſe words. Which is delivered for you, which is ſhed for you. For otherwiſe it ſhould not much profit us, that the body and bloud of our Lord are now diſtributed, unleſſe they had beene once given forth for our redemption and ſalvation. Therefore they are repreſented under bread and wine, that we ſhould learne that they are not only ours, but alſo ordained for the nouriſhment of ſpirituall life. This is it that we before ſaid, that from the corporall things which are ſhewed forth in the Sacraments, we are by a certain proportionall relation guided to ſpirituall things. So when bread is given us for a ſign of the bodie of Chriſt, we ought by and by to conceive this ſimilitude: As bread nouriſheth, ſuſtaineth, & maintaineth the life of our body: ſo the body of Chriſt is the only meat to quicken and give life to our ſoule. When we ſee wine ſet forth for a ſign of his blood: we muſt call to mind what uſes wine bringeth to the body, that we may conſider that the ſame are brought to us ſpiritually by the bloud of Chriſt: thoſe uſes be to cheriſh, to refreſh to ſtrengthen, to make merry. For if we ſufficiently weigh, what the delivering of this holy body what the ſhedding of this holy bloud hath profiteth us: we ſhall plainly perceive that theſe things which are ſpoken of bread & wine, according to ſuch proportional relation doe very well accord with them toward us when they are communicated unto us.

Chriſt truly given and made ours in this ſacrament the whole pith whereof in a manner ſtandeth herein, that for us the body and bloud of Chriſt were offered which we receive repreſented under bread and wine to teach that they are to the ſoule the ſame which theſe viſible creatures to the bodie.

4 Therfore the chiefe parts of the Sacrament are not ſimply and without higher conſideration to reach to us the body of Chriſt: but rather that ſame promiſe, whereby he teſtifieth, that his fleſh is verily meat, and his bloud is drink, with which we are fed unto eternall life: whereby he affirmeth himſelfe to be the bread of life, of which who ſo eateth he ſhall live for ever: to ſeale (I ſay) and confirme that promiſe: and for bringing the ſame to paſſe, to ſend us to the croſſe of Chriſt, where that promiſe hath been truly performed and in all points fulfilled. For we doe not well and healthfully eat Chriſt but crucified when we doe with lively feeling conceive the effectualneſſe of his death. For whereas he calleth himſelfe the bread of life, he did not borrow that name of the Sacrament, as ſome doe wrongfully expound it: but becauſe he was given us ſuch of the Father, and performed himſelfe ſuch, when being made partaker of our human mortality he made us partners of his divine immortalitie: when offering himſelfe for ſacrifice, hee tooke our accurſednеſſe upon himſelfe, that he might fill us with bleſſing: when with his death hee devoured and ſwallowed death: when in his reſurrection he raiſed up this our corruptible fleſh which he had put on, to glory and uncorruption.

The higheſt conſideration in this ſacrament is of the promiſe whereby Chriſt hath teſtified his fleſh to be meat and his bloud to be drink indeed.

5 It remaineth that by applyance all the ſame may come to us. That is done, both by the Goſpell, and more cleerely by the holie Supper, where both he offereth himſelfe to us with all his good things, and we receive him by faith. Wherefore the Sacrament maketh not that Chriſt firſt beginneth to be the bread of life: but when it bringeth into remembrance that he was made the bread of life: which we continually eat, and when it giveth unto us the taſte and ſavour of that bread, then it maketh us to feele the ſtrength of that bread. For it promiſeth us, that whatſoever Chriſt did or ſuffered the ſame was done to give life to us. Then, that this giving of life is everlaſting, by which we may without end be nouriſhed, ſuſtained, and preſerved in life. For as Chriſt ſhould not have been to us the bread of life, unleſſe he had bin born and had died for

This Sacrament maketh not Chriſt to be the bread of life, but teſtifieth unto us that he is ſo to ſuch as receive him in the due eſtimation of theſe myſteries whereby he is received, to receive him to.

for us, unlesse he had risen again for us: so now he should not be the same unles the effectualnes and fruit of his birth, death and resurrection, were an everlasting and immortal thing. All which Christ hath very well expressed in these words. The bread which I will give, is my flesh, which I wil give for the life of the world. By wch words without doubt he signifieth, that his body should therefore be to us for bread, to the spirituall life of the soule, because it should be given forth to death for our salvation: & that it is delivered to us to eat of it, when by faith he maketh us partakers of it. Once therfore he gave it, that he might be made bread, when he gave forth himselfe to be crucified for the redemption of the world: daily he giveth it, when by the word of the Gospell he offereth it unto us to be received, so far as it was crucified: where he sealeth that deliverance with the holy misterry of the Supper: where he inwardly fulfilleth that wch he outwardly betokeneth. Now herein we must beware of two faults, that neither doing too much in abasing the signs, we seem to pluck them from their misteries to which they are in a manner knit fast: nor that being immesurable in advancing the same, we seem in the meane time somewhat to darken the mysteries themselves. That Christ is the bread of life, wherewith the faithful are nourished into eternall salvation, there is no man but he granteth, unles he be altogether without religion. But this point is not likewise agreed upon among all men, what is the manner of partaking of him. For there be that in one word define, that to eat the flesh of Christ and to drink his blood, Is nothing else but to beleeve in Christ himselfe. But I think that Christ meant some certainer and higher thing, in that notable sermon where he commendeth to us the eating of his flesh, namly, that we are quickned by the true partaking of him: wch also he therefore expressed by the words of eating and drinking, lest any man should think, that the life which we receive of him is conceived by bare knowledg only For as not the sight, but the eating of bread sufficeth the body for nourishmẽt: so it behoveth that the soule be truly and throughly made partaker of Christ, that by the power of him it may be quickned into a spirtuall life. But in the meane time we confesse that there is no other eating, but of faith: as there can no other be immagined. But this is the differẽc between my words and theirs, that with them to eat is only to beleeve: but I say that the flesh of Christ is eaten with beleeving, because by faith he is made ours, and I say that eating is the fruit and effect of faith. Or, if you will have it plainer, wch them eating is faith and I think it rather to follow of faith. In words verily the difference is but small: but in the thing it selfe, not small. For though the Apostle teacheth that Christ dwelleth in our harts by faith: yet no man will expound this dwelling to be faith: but al men do perceive that there is expressed a singular effect of faith, for that by it the faithfull do obtaine to have Christ dwelling in them. After this manner the Lord meant, in calling himselfe the bread of life, not only to teach that in the faith of his death and resurrection, salvation is reposed for us: but also that by true partaking of himselfe it is brought to passe, that his life passeth into us and becommeth ours: like as bread, when it is taken for food, ministreth livelinesse to the body.

to eat his flesh and to drinke his blood, an effect of beleefe, and a thing to be distinguished from faith.

6 Neither did Augustine, whom they bring in for their patrone in any other meaning write, that we eat by beleeving, than to shew that this eating is of faith, not of the mouth. Which I also deny not: but yet therewithall I adde, that we do by faith embrace Christ, not appearing a far of, but making himselfe one with us that he may be our head, and we his members. Yet doe not I utterly disallow that manner of speaking: but only I deny it to be a full declaration, if they mean to defin what it is to eat the flesh of Christ. Otherwise I see that Augustine hath oft used this forme of speech: as when he saith in the third book of Christian doctrine, unlesse ye eat the flesh of the Sonne of man: this is a figure teaching that we must communicate with the passion of the Lord, and must sweetly and profitably lay up in remembrance that for us his flesh was crucified and wounded. Againe when he saith that the three thousand men which were converted at Peters sermon, did drink the bloud of Christ by beleeving, which they had shed by cruell dealing. But in many other places he honourably setteth out that benefit of faith, that by it our soules are no lesse refreshed with the communicating of the flesh of Christ, than our bodies are with the bread which they eat. And the same is it which in a certaine place Chrysostome writeth, that Christ doth not onely by faith, but also indeed make us his body. For he meaneth not that we doe from any other where than from faith, obtaine such a benefit: but this only he he meaneth to exclude that none when he heareth faith to be named, ſhould conceive a naked imagination. As for them that will have the Supper to be onely a marke of outward profeſſion, I doe now paſſe them over: becauſe I thinke that I have ſufficiently confuted their errour, when I entreated of Sacraments generally. Onely this thing let the Readers marke, that when the cup is called the covenant in the bloud, there is a promiſe expreſſed that may be of force to confirme faith. Whereupon followeth, that unleſſe we have reſpect to God; and embrace that which he offreth, we doe not rightly uſe the holy Supper. Luke 22.20.

7 Moreover they alſo doe not ſatisfie me, which acknowledging that we have ſome communion with Chriſt, when they meane to expreſſe it, do make us partakers only of the ſpirit, without making any mention of fleſh and bloud. As though all thoſe things were ſpoken of nothing, that his fleſh is verily meat, that his bloud is verily drinke: that none hath life, but he that eateth that fleſh, & drinketh that bloud: and ſuch other ſayings that belong to the ſame end. Wherfore if it be certain that the full communicating of Chriſt proceedeth beyond their deſcription, as it is too narrowly ſtrained: I will now goe about to knit up in few words, how large it is, and how farre it extendeth it ſelfe, before that I ſpeake of the contrary fault of exceſſe. For I ſhall have a longer diſputation with the exceſſive teachers, which, when according to their owne groſſenes they frame a manner of eating & drinking full of abſurditie, do alſo transfigure Chriſt ſtripped out of this fleſh into a fantaſie: if yet a man may with any words comprehend ſo great a myſterie, which I ſee that I can not ſufficiently comprehend with mind: and therefore I do willingly confeſſe it, that no man ſhould meaſure the highneſſe thereof by the ſmall proportion of my childiſhnes. But rather I exhort the readers, that they doe not reſtraine the ſenſe of their minds within theſe two narrow bounds: but endevour to riſe up much higher, than they can by my guiding. For I my ſelfe, ſo oft as I ſpeake of this thing when I have travelled to ſay all, thinke that I have yet ſaid but little in reſpect of the worthines therof. And although the mind can doe more in thinking than the tongue in expreſſing: yet with greatneſſe of the thing, the mind alſo is ſurmounted and overwhelmed. Finally therefore nothing remaineth, but that I muſt breake forth into admiration of that myſterie, which neither the mind can ſuffice to thinke of, nor the tongue to declare. Yet after ſuch a manner as I can, I will ſet forth the ſumme of my ſentence: which as I nothing doubt to be true, ſo I truſt that it will not be diſallowed of godly hearts.

They ſtraine the Communion of Chriſt too narrowly who make it nothing but the participation of his ſpirit onely.

8 Firſt of all, we are taught out of the Scripture, that Chriſt was from the beginning that life bringing word of the Father, the fountaine and originall of life, from whence all things ever received their having of life. Wherfore Iohn ſometime calleth him the word of life, and ſomtime writeth that life was in him: meaning that he even then flowing into all creatures, powred into them the power of breathing and living. Yet the ſame Iohn addeth afterward, that the life was then & not till then openly ſhewed, when the Sonne of God taking upon him our fleſh, gave himſelfe to be ſeen with eyes & felt with hands. For though he did before alſo ſpread abroad his power iuto the creatures: yet becauſe man, being by ſinne eſtranged from God, having loſt the communion of life, ſaw on every ſide death hanging over him: that he might recover hope of Immortalitie, it behoved that hee ſhould be received into the communion of that word. For how ſmall a confidence ſhalt thou conceive thereof, if thou heare that the word of God indeed, from which thou art moſt farre removed, containeth in it ſelfe the fulneſſe of life, but in thy ſelfe and round about thee nothing offreth it ſelfe and is preſent before thine eyes but death? But ſince that fountain of life began to dwell in our fleſh, now it lyeth not a far off hidden from us, but preſently delivereth it ſelfe to be partaken of us. Yea and it maketh the very fleſh, wherein it reſteth, to be of power to bring life to us, that by partaking thereof we may be fedde to immortalitie. I am (ſaith he) the bread of life, that am come downe from heaven. And the bread which I will give is my fleſh, which I will give for the life of the world. In which words he teacheth not onely that he is life, in reſpect that he is the eternall word of God which came downe to us from heaven, but that in comming downe hee powred the ſame power into the fleſh which he did put on, that from thence the communicating of life might flow forth unto us. Hereupon alſo theſe things now follow, that his fleſh is verily meat, and his bloud is verily drinke, Chriſt from the beginning the fountaine of life, by taking our fleſh maketh it of power, being fedde on, to be ſuſtenance that ſoſtreth them to immortalitie.

John 6.48. & 58.

with which sustenances the faithfull are fostered unto eternall life. Herein therfore consisteth singular comfort to the godly, that now they finde life in their owne flesh. For so they doe not onely with easie passage attaine unto it, but have it of it selfe laid abroad for them and offering it selfe unto them. Onely let them hold open the bosome of their heart that they may embrace it being present, and they shall obtaine it.

The flesh of Christ being (though not of it selfe) an unwasted fountaine from whence life floweth, he that will live must of necessitie be partaker thereof, and have fellowship with it.

9 But although the flesh of Christ have not so great power of it selfe, that it can give life to us, which both in the owne first estate of it was subject to mortalitie, and now being endued with immortalitie, liveth not by it selfe: yet it is rightfully called life-bringing, which is filled with fulnesse of life to powre it into us. In which meaning I do with Cyril expound that saying of Christ: as the Father hath life in himselfe, so he hath also given to the Sonne to have life in himselfe. For there he properly speaketh of his gifts, not which he from the beginning possessed with the Father, but with which he was garnished in the same flesh in which he appeared. Therefore he sheweth that in his manhood also dwelleth the fulnesse of life, that whosoever partaketh of his flesh and bloud, may therewithall also enjoy the partaking of life. Of what sort that is, we may declare by a familiar example. For as out of a fountaine water is somtime drunke, sometime is drawne, sometime by furrowes is conveighed to the watering of grounds, which yet of it selfe doth not overflow into so many uses, but from the very spring it selfe which with everlasting flowing yeeldeth and ministreth unto it from time to time new abundance: so the flesh of Christ is like a rich and unwasted fountaine which powreth into us the life, springing from the Godhead into it selfe. Now who seeth not that the communion of the flesh and bloud of Christ is necessarie to all that aspire to heavenly life? Hereunto tendeth that saying of the Apostle, that the Church is the bodie of Christ and the fulfilling of it: and that hee is the head out of which the whole body coupled and knit together by joints maketh increase of the body: that our bodies are the members of Christ. All which things we understand to be impossible to be brought to passe, but that he must wholly cleave to us in spirit and body. But that most neere fellowship whereby wee are coupled with his flesh, he hath yet set out with a more glorious title, when he said that we are members of his bodie, and are of his bones and of his flesh. At the last, to declare it to be a matter greater than all words, he concludeth his saying with an exclamation. This is (saith he) a great secret. Therfore it should be a point of extreme madnesse to acknowledge no communion of the faithfull when the flesh and bloud of the Lord, which the Apostle declareth to be so great, that he had rather wonder at it than expresse it.

John 5.19.

Ephe. 5.30.

The bodie and bloud of Christ truly given us, and yet bare & naked figures thereof in the Sacrament.

10 Let the summe be, that our soules are so fed with the flesh and bloud of Christ, as bread and wine doe maintaine and sustaine the bodily life. For otherwise the proportionall relation of the signe should not agree, unlesse souls did finde their food in Christ. Which cannot be done, unlesse Christ doe truly grow into one with us, and refresh us with the eating of his flesh and drinking of his bloud. But although it seeme incredible, that in so great distance of places the flesh of Christ reacheth to us that it may bee meat to us: let us remember how much the secret power of the Spirit surmounteth above all our senses, and how foolish it is to goe about to measure his unmeasurableness by our measure. That therefore which our minde comprehendeth not, let our faith conceive, that the Spirit truly knitteth in one those things that are severed in places. Now that same holy communicating of his bodie and bloud, whereby Christ powreth his life into us, even as if he had pearced it into our bones and marrowes, he in the Supper also testifieth and sealeth: and that not with setting before us a vaine or void signe. but bringing forth there the effectuall working of his Spirit whereby hee fulfilleth that which he promiseth. And verily he there offereth and delivereth the thing signified to all them that sit at that spirituall banquet: although it be received with fruite of the faithfull onely, which receive so great bountifulnesse with true faith and thankfulnesse of minde. After which manner the Apostle said, that the bread which wee breake is the communion of the bodie of Christ: and that the cup which we hallow with the word and prayers to that purpose, is the communion of his bloud. Neither is there any cause why any man should object, that it is a figurative speech, by which the name of the thing signified is given to the signe. I grant verily that the breaking of the bread is a ſigne, not the thing it ſelfe. But this being admitted, yet we ſhall rightly gather of the deliverance of the ſigne, that the thing it ſelfe is delivered. For unleſſe a man will cal God a deceiver, he can never be ſo bold to ſay that he ſetteth before us an empty ſigne. Therfore if by the breaking of bread the Lord doth truly repreſent the partaking of his body, it ought to be out of doubt that hee truly performeth and delivereth it And this rule, is alway to be holden of the Godly, that ſo oft as they ſee the ſignes ordained of the Lord, they certainly thinke and perſwade themſelves that the truth of the thing ſignified is there preſent. For to what purpoſe ſhould the Lord deliver to thee into thy hand the ſigne of his body, but to aſſure thee of the true partaking of it? If it be true, that a viſible ſigne is given us, to ſeale the gift of an inviſible thing: when we receive the ſigne of the body, let us no leſſe certainly beleeve that the body it ſelfe alſo is given us.

is

Chriſt himſelfe by faith, even his body and blood truly participated, in the Sacrament.

11 I ſay therfore (which both hath been alway received in the Church, and all they teach at this day that thinke right) that the holy myſtery of the Supper conſiſteth of two things: that is to ſay of the bodily ſignes, which being ſet before our eyes do repreſent unto us inviſible things: according to the capacity of our weaknes: and of ſpirituall truth, which is by thoſe ſignes both figured & delivered. Of what ſort that is, when I meane to ſhew it familiarly, I uſe to ſet three things: the ſignification, the matter which hangeth of the ſignification, the vertue or effect which followeth of both. The ſignification conſiſteth in the promiſes, which are after a certaine manner wrapped together with the ſigne. The matter of ſubſtance I call Chriſt with his death and reſurrection. By effect I underſtand the redemption, righteouſnes, ſanctification & eternall life, & whatſoever other benefits Chriſt bringeth us. Now although all theſe things have reſpect to Faith: yet I leave no place to this cavillation: as though when I ſay that Chriſt is received by Faith, I would have him conceaved with underſtanding only and imagination. For the promiſes offer him, not that we ſhould ſticke faſt in the ſight alone and in bare knowledge: but that we ſhould enjoy the true communicating of him. And truly I ſee not how any man may have confidence that he hath redemption & righteouſnes in the croſſe of Chriſt, & life in his death, but principally ſtanding upon the true communion of Chriſt himſelfe. For thoſe good things ſhould not come to us unleſſe Chriſt firſt made himſelfe ours. I ſay therefore, that in the myſtery of the Supper, by the ſignes of bread and wine Chriſt is truly delivered to us, yea and his body and bloud, in which he hath fulfilled all obedience for purchaſing of righteouſnes to us: namely that firſt wee ſhould grow together into one body with him: and then being made partakers of his ſubſtance, we may alſo feele his power in the communicating of all his good things.

A local preſence of the body of Chriſt not needfull unto this, that we may enjoy the partaking of it which the ſpirit of Chriſt perfourmeth without ſuch groſſenes.

12 Now I come downe to the exceſſive mixtures, which ſuperſtition hath brought in. For herein Satan hath played with marvellous ſubtiltie, that withdrawing the minds of men from heaven, he might fill them with perverſe error, as though Chriſt were faſtned to the element of bread. And firſt we muſt not dreame ſuch a preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament, as the crafteſmen of the Court of Rome have faigned: as though the body of Chriſt were made preſent with preſence of place, to bee handled with hands, to be brooſed with teeth, and ſwallowed with mouth. For this forme of recantation Pope Nicholas endited to Berengarius, to be a witneſſe of his repentance: namely with words ſo far monſtrous, that the Author of the Gloſſe cryeth out that there is danger, if the readers doe not wiſely take heed to themſelves, leſt they ſucke out of them an hereſie worſe than was that of Berengarius. In the ſecond diſtinction, in the Chapter beginning thus, Ego Berengarius. But Peter Lombarde, although he travell much in excuſing the abſurditie, yet more inclineth to the contrary ſentence. For as we nothing doubt that it hath limits according to the perpetuall nature of the body of men, and is holden in heaven, into which it was once received, untill he returne to judgement: ſo to draw it backe under theſe corruptible elements or to imagine it preſent every where, we account it to be utterly unlawful. Neither verily is it ſo needfull to this that we may enjoy the partaking of it: for as much as the Lord giveth us this benefit by his Spirit that wee bee made one with him in body, ſpirit, and ſoule. The bond therefore of this conjoyning is the ſpirit of Chriſt, by the knitting wherof we be coupled together, and as it were a certaine conduit, by which whatſoever Chriſt himſelfe both is and hath, is conveyed to us. For if we behold the ſunne ſhining forth with his beames upon the earth after a certain manner to caſt forth his ſubſtance unto it to engender, nouriſh, and quicken the fruits therof: why ſhould the extending of beames of the ſpirit of Chriſt be inferior to conveigh the communion of his fleſh and bloud into us? Wherfore the Scripture, when it ſpeaketh of our partaking with Chriſt, referreth the whole force therof to the ſpirit. Yet inſteed of many one place ſhall be ſufficient. For Paul in the eight chapter to the Romans, ſaith that Chriſt dwelleth in us none otherwiſe than by his ſpirit: wherby yet he taketh not away that communion of his fleſh and bloud of which wee now ſpeake, but teacheth that the Spirit alone worketh that we poſſeſſe whole Chriſt and have him dwelling in us.

The manner of preſence which the Schoolemen have deviſed in this Sacrament.

13 The Schoolmen thought more ſhame faſtly which were with holden with horror of ſo barbarous ungodlineſſe. Yet they alſo themſelves doe nothing but mocke with ſubtiller deceits. They grant that Chriſt is not contained there by way of circumſcription, not after a bodily manner: but afterward they invent a way, which neither themſelves doe underſtand, nor they can declare to other: yet it is ſuch as falleth to this point that Chriſt muſt be ſought in the forme of bread as they call it. For what is it? When they ſay that the ſubſtance of bread is turned into Chriſt, doe they not faſten him to the whiteneſſe which they there leave? But (ſay they) he is ſo contained in the Sacrament, that he abideth in heaven: and wee determine no other preſence but of habitude. But whatſoever words they bring in, to cloake it with a deceitfull colour, this is the end of all that that is by conſecration made Chriſt, which before was bread: that from thencefoorth Chriſt lyeth hid under that colour of bread. Which alſo they are not aſhamed in plaine words to expreſſe. For theſe be the words of Lombarde: that the body of Chriſt, which in it ſelfe is viſible, when the conſecration is ended, lyeth hidden and is covered under the forme of bread. So the forme of that bread is nothing elſe but a viſor, that taketh away the ſight of the fleſh from the eyes. Neither need we many conjectures to finde what ſnares they minded to lay with theſe words, ſith the thing it ſelfe plainly ſpeaketh it. For it is to be ſeene with how great ſuperſtition in certaine ages paſt, not only the common ſort of men, but alſo the very chiefe of them have beene holden, and at this day be holden in Popiſh Churches. For having little care of true faith (by which alone we both come into the fellowſhip of Chriſt, and doe cleave together with him) ſo that they have a carnall preſence of him, which they have framed beſide the word, they thinke that they have him preſent enough. Therefore in a ſumme, we ſee that this hath beene gotten by this witty ſubtilty that bread was taken of God.

Lib. 4. diſt.

14 From hence proceeded that ſame faigned tranſubſtantiation, for which at this day they fight more earneſtly than for all the other articles of their faith. For the firſt builders of that locall preſence could not unwind themſelves from this doubt, how the body of Chriſt ſhould bee mingled with the ſubſtance of bread, but that by and by many abſurdities did thruſt themſelves in place. Therefore they were driven of neceſſitie to flee to this invention, that there is made a turning of bread into the body: not that the body is properly made of the bread, but becauſe Chriſt that he might hide himſelfe under the forme, bringeth the ſubſtance to nothing. But it is marvellous, that they fell to ſo great ignorance, yea ſenſeleſſe dulneſſe, that not onely that Scripture but alſo the conſent of the old Church fighting againſt it, they brought abroad that monſter. I grant indeed that ſome of the old writers ſometime uſed the name of turning: not for that they would deſtroy the ſubſtance in the outward ſignes, but that they might teach that the bread dedicate to the myſtery differeth far from common bread and is now other. But each where they all plainely declare, that the holy Supper conſiſteth of two parts, an earthly part, and a heavenly: and the earthly part they doe without controverſie expound to bee bread and wine. Truly whatſoever they bable, it is plaine that in confirming of this doctrine they want the defence of antiquitie, which they oftentimes preſume to ſet againſt the evident word of God. For it is not ſo long agoe ſince it was invented, it was verily unknowne not onely to thoſe better ages, in which the purer doctrine of religion yet flouriſhed, but alſo even when that ſame pureneſſe was much defiled. There is none of the old writers that doth not in expreſſe words confeſſe that the holy ſignes in the Supper are bread and wine. Although, as wee have ſaid, they ſometime ſet it out with divers titles, to advance the dignitie of the Myſterie. For whereas they ſay that in the conſe-

Tranſubſtantiation deſtitute of antiquity to defend it.

cration is made of a ſecret turning, that now it is another thing than bread and wine: I have even now given warning that they doe not thereby meane that the things themſelves, are brought to nought, but that they are now to bee otherwiſe eſteemed than common meats, which are appointed onely to feed the belly: for as much as in them is delivered to us the ſpirituall meat and drinke of the ſoule. This we alſo denie not. If (ſay theſe men) there be a turning, it muſt needs be that there is of one thing made another thing. If they meane that there is ſome thing made which before was not, I agree with them. If they will draw it to that their owne imagination, let them anſwer me what change they thinke to be made in baptiſme. For herein the Fathers alſo doe determine a marvellous turning, when they ſay that of a corruptible element is made a ſpirituall waſhing of the ſoule, yet none of them denyeth that water remaineth. But (ſay they) there is no ſuch thing in baptiſme, as is that in the Supper. This is my body. As though the queſtion were of thoſe words, which have a meaning plaine enough: and not rather of that word of turning, which ought to ſignifie no more in the Supper than in baptiſme. Therefore farewell they with theſe ſnares of ſyllables, whereby they doe nothing elſe but bewray their owne hungrineſſe. For otherwiſe the ſignification would not agree together unleſſe the truth which is there figured, had a lively image in outward ſigne. Chriſts will was by the outward ſigne to teſtifie that his fleſh is meat. If hee did ſet before us only an empty imaginative forme of bread not true bread, where were the correlation or ſimilitude which ſhould lead us from the viſible thing to the inviſible? For, that all things may agree together, the ſignification ſhall extend no further, but that we be fed with the forme of the fleſh of Chriſt. As, if in baptiſme the forme of water ſhould deceive our eyes, it ſhould not bee to us a certaine pledge of our waſhing: yea by that deceitfull ſhew there ſhould bee given us an occaſion of wavering. Therefore the nature of the Sacrament is overthrowne, unleſſe in the manner of ſignifying the earthly ſigne anſwer to the heavenly thing. And therefore wee looſe the truth of this myſterie, unleſſe true bread repreſent to us the true body of Chriſt. I repeate it againe: Sith the Supper is nothing elſe, than a viſible teſtifying of that promiſe which is in the ſixt Chapter of John, namely that Chriſt is the bread of life, which came downe from heaven: there muſt be viſible bread uſed for a meane whereby that ſame ſpirituall bread may be figured: unleſſe wee will that wee looſe all the fruit which in this behalfe God tenderly granteth to ſuſtaine our weakneſſe. Now by what reaſon ſhould Paul gather, that all wee are one body and one bread, which doe together partake of one bread, if there remained onely an imaginative forme and not rather a naturall truth of bread? 1 Cor. 10. 17.

15 But they could never have beene ſo fowly beguiled with the deceits of Satan, but becauſe they were already bewitched with this errour, that the body of Chriſt incloſed under bread was by the bodily mouth ſent downe into the belly. The cauſe of ſo brutiſh imagination was, that conſecration ſignified as much among them as a magicall enchantment. But this principle was drawne to them, that bread is a Sacrament to none but to men, to whom the word is directed: like as the water of baptiſme is not changed in it ſelfe, but ſo ſoone as the promiſe is adjoyned, it beginneth to be that to us which it before was not. This ſhall better appeare by example of a like Sacrament. The water ſpringing out of the rocke in the deſert was to the fathers a token and ſigne of the ſame thing, which the wine doth figure to us in the Supper. For Paul teacheth that they drunke the ſame ſpirituall drinke. But it was a common watering for the beaſts and cattell of the people. Whereupon it is eaſily gathered, that in earthly elements, when they are applyed to a ſpirituall uſe, there is made no other turning but in reſpect of men, inſomuch as they are to them ſeales of the promiſes. Moreover ſith Gods purpoſe is (as I often repeat) as it were by handſome chariots to lift us up to himſelfe, they doe by their waywardneſſe wickedly diſappoint the ſame, which doe indeed call us to Chriſt, but lurking inviſibly under bread. For it is not poſſible that the mind of men, uncombring it ſelfe from the immeaſurablenes of places, ſhould attaine to Chriſt even above the heavens. That which nature denied them, they attempted to amend with a more hurtfull remedie: that abiding in earth, wee ſhould neede no heavenly neereneſſe of Chriſt. Loe, this is the neceſſitie, that compelled them to transfigure the body of Chriſt. In Bernards time, although a harder manner of ſpeaking was growne in uſe, yet tranſubſtantiation was not then knowne. And in all ages before that, this ſimilitude did flie about in everie mans mouth, that there is with bread and wine a ſpirituall thing joyned in this myſtery. Of the words they anſwer as they thinke, wittily: but bringing in nothing fit for this preſent cauſe. The rodde of Moſes (ſay they) being turned into a ſerpent, although it did get the name of a ſerpent, yet keepeth ſtill the old name, and is called a rodde. So in their opinion it is as probable, that although the bread paſſe into a new ſubſtance, it may bee abuſively and yet not unaptly called that which it appeareth to the eyes. But what likelihood or neerneſſe find they betweene a cleere miracle, and their fained illuſion, of which no eye in earth is witneſſe? The magicians had mocked with deceits, ſo that the Ægyptians were perſwaded, that they excelled in divine power to charge creatures above the order of nature. Moſes came forth, and driving away all their deceits, ſhewed that the invincible power of God was on his ſide, becauſe his owne rod conſumed all the reſt. But for as much as that was a turning diſcernable with eyes, therefore as wee have ſaid, it pertaineth nothing to this preſent cauſe: and a little time after, the rodde viſibly returned into his owne forme. Beſide that it is not knowne, whether that ſudden turning was of ſubſtance or no. Alſo the alluding to the roddes of the magycians is to be conſidered, which the Prophet therefore would not call ſerpents, leſt he ſhould ſeeme to ſignifie a turning where none was: becauſe thoſe deceivers had done nothing but caſt a miſt before the eyes of the beholders. What likeneſſe herewith have theſe formes of ſpeech. The bread which we breake, So oft as yee ſhall eat this bread. They communicated in breaking of bread, and ſuch other? It is certaine that their eyes were only deceived with the enchantment of the magicians. As concerning Moſes, the matter is more doubtfull, by whoſe hand it was no more hard for God to make of a rod a ſerpent, and againe of a ſerpent to make a rod, than to cloth Angels with fleſhly bodies, and by and by after to uncloth them. If the nature of this myſtery were the ſame or like, there were ſome colour for their ſolution. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that it is not truly nor fitly promiſed us that in the Supper the fleſh of Chriſt is truly to us for meat, unleſſe the true ſubſtance of the outward ſigne agree with it. And (as one errour groweth of another) the place of Jeremie is ſo fooliſhly wreſted to prove tranſubſtantiation, that it irketh me to rehearſe it. The Prophet complaineth that wood is put in his bread: meaning that by the cruelty of his enemies, his bread was infected with bitterneſſe. As David with a like figure bewaileth that his meat was corrupted with gall, and his drinke with vineger. Theſe men will have it that the body of Chriſt was by way of allegorie faſtned to the croſſe. But ſome of the old Fathers thought ſo. As though wee ought not rather to pardon their ignorance, and to bury their ſhame, than to adde ſhameleſneſſe to compell them yet ſtill to fight like enemies with the naturall meaning of the Prophet.

16 Other, which ſee that the proportionall relation of the ſigne and the thing ſignified, cannot bee overthrowne, but that the truth of the myſtery muſt fall, doe confeſſe that the bread of the Supper is verily a ſubſtance of an earthly and corruptible element, and ſuffereth no change in it ſelfe, but hath under it ſelfe the body of Chriſt incloſed. If they did ſo declare their meaning, that when the bread is delivered in the myſtery, there is adjoyned the delivering of the body, becauſe the truth is unſeverable from the ſigne: I would not much ſtrive with them. But becauſe they placing the body in the bread, doe faine to it a being every where contrary to the nature thereof, and in adding under the bread, they will have it lye there hidden: it is neceſſary a little while to draw ſuch ſubtleties out of their dennes. For my mind is not as of ſet purpoſe to goe through with all this point: but only that I may lay the foundations of the diſputation which ſhall by and by follow in place fit for it. They will therefore have the body of Chriſt to be inviſible and immeaſurable, that it may be hid under the bread: becauſe they thinke they doe not otherwiſe communicate with him than if hee deſcend into the bread: but they comprehend not the manner of deſcending, whereby hee lifteth teth us upward to himselfe. They lay upon it all the colours that they can: but when they have said all, it sufficiently appeareth, that they stay upon the locall presence of Christ. Whence commeth that? even because they can abide to conceive no other partaking of the flesh and bloud, but which consisteth either of joyning and touching of place, or of some grosse enclosing.

The flesh of Christ by some, grossly extended as wide as heaven and earth, by others, subtlety imagined to be because glorious therefore free from the naturall properties of things corporall. Act 1.3.9. and 7.55. and 9.3.

17 And, that they may obstinately defend the errour once rashly conceived, some of them sticke not to say, that the flesh of Christ had never any other measurings, but so farre and wide as heaven and earth is broad. Whereas hee was borne a child out of the wombe, whereas he grew, whereas hee was spread abroad on the crosse, whereas hee was inclosed in the sepulchre, the same was done by a certaine dispensation, that he might be borne and die, and performe the other duties of man. Whereas after his resurrection hee was seene in his wonted forme of body, whereas he was taken up to heaven, whereas last of all also after his ascension hee was seene of Stephen and Paul: it was done by the same dispensation, that it might appeare to the sight of men that hee was made a king in heaven. What is this else, but to raise up Marcion out of hell. For no man can doubt that the body of Christ was a fantasie or a phantasticall thing, if hee was of such state. Some slip away somewhat more subtlely, with saying that this body which is given in the Sacrament is glorious and immortall: and that therefore it is no absurditie, if it be contained in many places, if in no place, if with no forme, under the Sacrament. But I aske what manner of body Christ gave to the disciples, the day before that hee suffered? doe not the words sound that hee gave the same mortall body, which was within a little after to bee delivered? Hee had already before (say they) shewed his glory to bee seene to three of the disciples. That is true indeed, but his will was by that brightnesse to give them a taste of immortality for an hower. In the meane time they shall not there find a double body, but that one body which Christ did beare, garnished with new glory. But when hee distributed his body at his first Supper, the time was now at hand, when hee being stricken of God, and humbled should lye without glorie as a leaprous man: so farre is it off that hee then would shew forth the glory of his resurrection. And how great a window is here opened to Marcion, if the body of Christ was seene in one place mortall and base, and in another place was holden immortall and glorious? Howbeit if their opinion take place, the same hapneth daily: because they are compelled to confesse that the body of Christ being visible in it selfe, lyeth hid invisibly under the signe of bread. And yet they that vomit out such monstrousnes are so not ashamed of their own shame, that they doe unprovoked, hainously raile at us, because we doe not subscribe to them.

Matt. 17.2.

Esai. 53.4.

The body and bloud of Christ though not fastned unto, yet spiritually delivered in the bread and wine of the holy Eucharist.

18 Now if they list to fasten the body and bloud of the Lord to bread and wine: the one shall of necessity be plucked in sunder from the other. For as the bread is delivered severally from the cup, so the body united to the bread must needs bee devided from the bloud inclosed in the cup. For when they affirme that the body is in the bread and the bloud in the cup: and the bread and wine are by spaces of place distant the one from the other: they can by no shift escape, but that the body must be severed from the bloud. But whereas they are wont to alleadge, that by accompanying (as they faine) in the body is the bloud, and likewise in the bloud is the body, that verily is too trifling: for as much as the signes in which they are enclosed, are so severed. But if we be lifted up with our eyes and minds to heaven, that we seeke Christ there in the glory of his kingdome: as the signes doe allure us to him whole, so under the signe of bread, wee shall be fed with his body, under the signe of wine wee shall severally drinke his bloud, that at length wee may enjoy him whole. For although he hath taken away his flesh from us, and in his body is ascended up into heaven, yet hee sitteth at the right hand of the Father, that is to say he raigneth in the power, and majesty, and glory of the Father. This kingdome is neither bounded with any spaces of place, nor compassed about with any measurings, but that Christ may shew forth his might whersoever it pleaseth him both in heaven and in earth: but that he may shew himselfe present with power and strength: but that he may alway be at hand with them that be his, breathing his life into them, may live in them, strengthen them, quicken them, preserve them safe even as if he were present in body: finally, but that he may feed them with his own body the the communion whereof hee doth by the power of his ſpirit powre into them. After this manner the body and bloud of Chriſt is delivered to us in the Sacrament.

The true manner of Chriſts preſence, and the ſubſtantiall communicating of his body and bloud in the Lords Supper, made hatefull to the world by the unjuſt judgements of men.

19 But we muſt appoint ſuch a preſence of Chriſt in the Supper, as may neither faſten him to the element of bread, nor ſhut him up in the bread, nor by any meane compaſſe him in, (for it is plaine that all theſe things abate his heavenly glory) finally ſuch as may neither take from him his owne meaſure, nor diverſly draw him in many places at once, nor faine to him ſuch an unmeaſurable greatnes as is ſpread abroad throughout heaven and earth, for theſe things are plainly againſt the truth of the nature of manhood. Let us (I ſay) never ſuffer theſe two exceptions to bee taken away from us. The one, that nothing bee abated from the glory of Chriſt, which is done, when hee is brought under the corruptible elements of this world, or is bound to any earthly creatures. The other, that nothing be by faining, applyed to his body, that agreeth not with the nature of man: which is done, when it is either ſaid to be infinite, or is ſet in many places at once. But theſe abſurdities being taken away, I willingly receive whatſoever may availe to expreſſe the true and ſubſtantiall communicating of the body and bloud of the Lord, which communicating is delivered to the faithfull under the holy ſignes of the Supper: and ſo that they may bee thought not to receive it by imagination only or underſtanding of mind, but to enjoy it indeed to the foode of eternall life. Why this ſentence is ſo hatefull to the world, and all defence taken away from it by the unjuſt judgements of many, there is no cauſe at all, but for that the divell hath with horrible bewitching madded their minds. Truly that which we teach, doth in all points very well agree with the Scriptures: it containeth neither any abſurdity, nor darkneſſe, nor doubtfulneſſe: it is not againſt true godlineſſe and ſound edification: finally, it hath nothing in it, that may offend, ſaving that in certaine ages paſt, when that ignorance and barbarouſneſſe of Sophiſters raigned in the Church, ſo cleere light and open truth hath been unworthily oppreſſed. Yet becauſe Satan at this day alſo travaileth by troubleſome ſpirits to ſpot it with all the ſlanders and reproches that he can, and bendeth himſelfe to no other thing with greater endevour: it is profitable the more diligently to defend and reſcue it.

The words of Chriſts inſtitution, in word held, indeed perverted and forſaken by the authors as well of tranſubſtantiation as conſubſtantiation.
Matt. 26 26.
Mark. 14. 22.
Luk. 22. 17.
1 Cor. 11. 24.

20 Now before that we goe any further, we muſt entreat of the ſelfe inſtitution of Chriſt: ſpecially becauſe this is the moſt glorious objection that our adverſaries have, that we depart from the words of Chriſt. Therefore, that we may be diſcharged of the falſe cauſe of malice wherewith they burden us, our fitteſt beginning ſhall bee at the expoſition of the words. Three Evangeliſts and Paul rehearſe, that Chriſt tooke bread: when hee had given thanks he brake it, gave it to his diſciples and ſaid, Take, eat, this is my body which is delivered, or broken for you. Of the cup Matthew and Marke ſay thus: This cup is the bloud of the new Teſtament, which ſhall be ſhed for many unto forgiveneſſe of ſinnes. But Paul and Luke ſay thus: This cup is the new Teſtament in my bloud. The patrones of tranſubſtantiation will have by the pronoune (this) the forme of bread to be ſignified, becauſe the conſecration is made in the whole content of the ſentence, and there is no ſubſtance that can be ſhewed. But if they be holden with religious care of the words, becauſe Chriſt teſtified, that that which he reached into the diſciples hands, was his body: truly this their deviſe, that that which was bread is now the body, is moſt far from the proper meaning of them. That which Chriſt tooke into his hands and gave the Apoſtles, hee affirmeth to be his body: but hee tooke bread: who therefore cannot underſtand that bread is yet ſhewed? and therefore there is no greater abſurditie, than to remove that to the forme, which is ſpoken of the bread. Other, when they expound this world (is) for (to be tranſubſtantiate,) doe flee to a more enforced and violently wreſted gloſſe. Therefore there is no cauſe why they ſhould pretend that they bee moved with reverence of words. For this was unheard of among all nations and languages, that the word (is) ſhould be taken in this ſenſe, namely for to be turned into another thing. As for them that leave bread in the Supper, and affirme that there is the body of Chriſt, they much differ among themſelves. They which ſpeake more modeſtly, although they preciſely exact the letter. This is my body, yet afterward ſwarve from their preciſeneſſe, and ſay that it is as much in effect as that the body of Chriſt is with bread, in bread, and under bread. Of the matter it ſelfe which they affirme, wee have already touched ſomewhat, and wee ſhall by and by have occaſion yet to ſpeake more. Now I diſpute only of the words, by which they ſay they are reſtrained that they cannot admit bread to be called the body, becauſe it is a ſigne of the body. But if they ſhun all figures, why doe they leape away from the plaine ſhewing of Chriſt, to their owne manners of ſpeaking farre differing from it? For there is great difference betweene this that bread is the body, and this that the body is with bread. But becauſe they ſaw it to be impoſſible, that this ſimple propoſition might ſtand, that bread is the body: they have attempted to ſcape away by thoſe formes of ſpeech, as it were by crooked turnings. Some more bold ſticke not to affirme that even in proper ſpeaking, bread is the body, and by this meane they truly prove themſelves to be literall men. If it be objected, that therefore the bread is Chriſt, and is God: this verily they will denie, becauſe it is not expreſſed in the words of Chriſt. But they ſhall nothing prevaile by denying it: for as much as all doe agree that whole Chriſt is offered us in the Supper. But it is an intolierable blaſphemy, that it be without figure ſpoken of a fraile and corruptible element, that it is Chriſt. Now I aske of them, whether theſe two propoſitions be both of one effect, Chriſt is the ſonne of God, and bread is the body of Chriſt. If they grant that they are diverſe, (which wee will enforce them to grant whether they will or no) then let them anſwer whence commeth the difference. I thinke they will bring none other but that the bread is after the ſacramentall manner called the body. Whereupon followeth, that Chriſts words are not ſubject to the common rule, nor ought to be tried by Grammar. Alſo I aske of the preciſe and ſtiffe requirers of the letter, where Luke and Paul doe call the cup the Teſtament in the bloud, whether they doe not expreſſe the ſame thing which they did in the firſt part, where they call bread the body. Truly the ſame religion was in the one part of the myſtery that was in the other: and becauſe ſhorteneſſe is darke, longer ſpeech doth better open the meaning. So oft therefore as they ſhall affirme by one word, that the bread is the body: I will out of moe words bring a fit expoſition, that it is the Teſtament in the body. For why? Shall we need to ſeeke a more faithfull or ſurer expoſitor than Paul and Luke? Neither yet doe I tend hereunto, to diminiſh any thing of that communicating of the body of Chriſt which I have confeſſed: onely my purpoſe is to confute that fooliſh waiwardneſſe, whereby they doe ſo hatefully braule about words. I underſtand, by the authority of Paul and Luke, that the bread is the body of Chriſt, becauſe it is the covenant in the body. If they fight againſt this, they have warre not with me, but with the ſpirit of God. Howſoever they cry out that they be touched with reverence of the words of Chriſt, whereby they doe not figuratively underſtand thoſe things that are plainely ſpoken: yet this is not a pretence rightfull enough, why they ſhould ſo refuſe all the reaſons which we object to the contrarie. In the meane time, as I have already given warning, it is convenient to learne, what manner of thing this is, The teſtament in the body and bloud of Chriſt: becauſe the covenant ſtabliſhed with the ſacrifice of death, ſhould otherwiſe not profit us, unleſſe there were adjoyned that ſecret communicating whereby wee growe into one with Chriſt.

Luk. 22. 20. 1 Cor. 11. 25.

21 It remaineth therefore that for the affinitie which the things ſignified have with their ſignes, we confeſſe that the ſelfe name of the thing was given to the ſigne: figuratively indeed, but not without a moſt fit proportionall agreement. I leave allegories and parables, leaſt any man ſhould quarrell that I ſeeke ſtarting holes, and wander out of the preſent purpoſe. I ſay that this is a ſpeech by figure of tranſnomination, which is commonly uſed in the Scripture, when myſteries are intreated of. For neither can you otherwiſe underſtand that which is ſaid: that circumciſion is a covenant: that the lambe is the paſſeover: that the Sacrifices of the law are expiations: finally that the rocke, out of which water flowed in the deſert, was Chriſt, unleſſe you take it to be ſpoken by way of transferring of names. Neither are names transferred onely from the higher name to the lower? but contrariwiſe the name of the viſible ſigne is alſo given to the thing ſignified: as when it is ſaid that God appeared to Moſes in the buſh: when the Arke of the covenant is called God, and the face of God: and the dove is called the holy Ghoſt. For though the ſigne differ in ſubſtance from the thing ſignified:

Figurative ſpeech uſuall, and unto ſignes the names of things ſignified given, when Sacramentall myſteries are intreated of: which thing S. Auguſtine plainely teacheth.

Exod. 3. 2. Pſal. 84. 8. and 42. 3. Matt. 3. 16.

fied: because this is spirituall and heavenly, and that is corporall and visible: yet because it doth not onely figure the thing which it is holily appointed to represent, as a naked and emptie token, but doth also truly deliver it indeed: why may not the name of the thing rightly accord with it? If signes devised by men, which are rather images of things absent, than marks of things present, which selfe absent things, they doe oftentimes deceitfully shadow, are yet sometime garnished with the titles of the things: then those things that are ordained of God, doe by much greater reason borrow the name of those things, of which they alway both beare a sure and not deceitfull signification, and have the truth adjoyned with them. There is therefore so great likenesse and neerenesse of the one to the other, that it is easie to draw their names to and fro. Therefore let our adversaries cease to heape unsavourie scoffings against us, in calling us Tropists, because wee expound the sacramentall manner of speaking after the common use of the Scripture. For whereas the Sacraments agree together in many things: in this transferring of names, they have all a certaine communitie together.

1 Cor. 10. 4. As therefore the Apostle teacheth, that the stone out of which spirituall drinke did spring to the Israelites, was Christ, because it was a visible signe, under which that spirituall drinke was truly indeed (but not discernably to the eye) perceived: so bread is at this day called the bodie of Christ, for as much as it is a signe whereby the Lord offereth to us the true eating of his body. Neither did Augustine otherwise thinke or speake least any man should despise this as a new invention. If (saith he) the sacraments had not a certaine likenesse of those things whereof they are sacraments, they should not be sacraments at all. And of this likenesse oftentimes they take the names of the things themselves. As therefore after a certaine manner the Sacrament of the body of Christ, is the body of Christ: the Sacrament of the bloud of Christ, is the bloud of Christ: so the Sacrament of faith is faith. There bee in him many like places, which it were superfluous to heape together, sith that one sufficeth: saving that the readers must be warned that the holie man teacheth the same thing in the Epistle to Exodium.

Epist 23. ad Bonifac. But it is a trifling shift to say, that where Augustine teacheth, that when transferring is often and commonly used in mysteries, hee maketh no mention of the Supper: because if this shift were received, we might not reason from the generaltie to the specialtie, neither were this a good argument: Every feeling creature hath power of moving, therefore an oxe and an horse have power of moving. Howbeit long disputation hereof is in another place ended by the words of the same holie man, where he saith, that Christ sticked not to call it his body, when hee gave the signe of his body. Against Adimantus the Manichean, in the twelft chapter. And in another place, upon the third Psalme. Marvellous (saith he) is the patience of Christ, that hee received Iudas to the banket, wherein hee committed and delivered to his Disciples the figure of his body and bloud.

The force of the substantive verbe in the words of consecration.

22 But if some precise man, being blind at all the rest, doe stand onely upon this word (this is) as though it severed this mysterie from all other, the solution is easie. They say that the vehemence of the substantive verbe (is) is so great that it admitteth no figure. Which if wee grant to them: even in the words of Paul is read the substantive verbe, where hee calleth bread the communicating of the body of Christ. But the communicating is another thing than the body it selfe. Yea commonly where Sacraments are intreated of, wee finde the same word used. As: this shall be to you a covenant with me. This Lambe shall be to you a passeover. To rehearse no moe: when Paul saith that the rocke was Christ, why doe they take the substantive verbe in that place to bee of lesse vehemence than in the speech of Christ? Let them also answere, where John saith, the holy Ghost was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified, of what force the substantive verbe is in that place. For if they abide fastened to their rule, the eternall essence of the holy Ghost shall be destroyed, as though it tooke beginning at the Ascension of Christ. Finally let them answere, what meaneth that saying of Paul, that Baptisme is the washing of regeneration and renewing, which it is evident to be unprofitable to many. But nothing is stronger to confute them, than that saying of Paul, that the Church is Christ. For bringing a similitude of the body of man, he addeth, So is Christ: in which place hee understandeth the onely begotten

ſonne of God, not in himſelfe, but in his members. Hereby I thinke I have obtained that to ſound witted and uncorrupted men the ſlanders of our enemies, are lothſome, when they ſpread abroade, that we withdraw credit from the words of Chriſt: which we doe no leſſe obediently embrace than they, and doe weigh them with more godly reverence. Yea their negligent careleſneſſe ſheweth that they doe not greatly care what Chriſt meant, ſo that it give them a buckler to defend their obſtinacie: like as our earneſt ſearching ought to bee a witneſſe how much wee eſteeme the authoritie of Chriſt. They odiouſly ſpread abroade, that naturall ſenſe of man withholdeth us from beleeving that which Chriſt hath uttered with his owne holie mouth: but how maliciouſly they burden us with this ſlander, I have a great part alreadie made plaine, and hereafter it ſhall more cleerely appeare. Therefore nothing withholdeth us from beleeving Chriſt when hee ſpeaketh, nor from obeying ſo ſoone as he doth but with becke will this or that. Onely this is the queſtion, whether it be unlawfull to inquire of the naturall meaning.

23 Theſe good maſters, that they may ſeeme well lettered, doe forbid men to depart be it never ſo little from the letter. But I on the other ſide, when the Scripture nameth God a warlike man, becauſe I ſee that without figurative tranſlation it is too rough a manner of ſpeaking, doe not doubt that it is a compariſon taken from men. And truly upon none other pretence in the old time the Anthropomorphites troubled the true teaching fathers, but that catching faſt hold of theſe ſayings. The eyes of God doe ſee, His went up to his eares, His hand ſtretched out. The earth his footeſtoole, they cryed out that God had his body taken from him, which the Scripture aſſigneth unto him. If this law bee received, outragious barbarouſneſſe ſhall overwhelme the whole light of faith. For what monſters of abſurdities may not phrantike men picke out, if it be granted them to alleadge every ſmall title to ſtabliſh their opinions? That which they object, that it is not likely, that when Chriſt prepared for his Apoſtles a ſingular comfort in adverſities, hee did then ſpeake in a riddle or darkely, maketh of our ſide. For if it had not come in the minds of the Apoſtles that bread was figuratively called the body, becauſe it was the ſigne of the body, they had without doubt been troubled with ſo monſtrous a thing. Almoſt at the ſame moment John reporteth that they did ſticke in perplexitie at every of the leaſt difficulties. They which ſtrive among themſelves, how Chriſt will goe to the father: and do move queſtion, how he will goe out of the world: they which underſtand nothing of thoſe things that are ſpoken concerning the heavenly father, till they ſee him: how would they have beene ſo eaſie to beleeve that which all reaſon refuſeth, that Chriſt ſitteth at the boord in their ſight, and is incloſed inviſible under bread? Whereas therefore they in eating the bread without doubting, teſtified their conſent, hereby appeareth that they tooke Chriſts words in the ſame ſenſe that wee doe, becauſe they remembred that which ought not to ſeeme ſtrange in myſteries, that the name of the thing ſignified is tranſferred to the ſigne. Therefore it was to the diſciples, as it is to us, a certaine and cleere comfort, entangled with no riddle. Neither is there any other cauſe why ſome ſhould depart from our expoſition, but becauſe the inchantment of the divell hath blinded them, namely that they ſhould faigne darknes to themſelves, where the expoſition of an apt figure offereth it ſelfe. Moreover if wee preciſely ſtand upon the words, Chriſt ſhould wrongfully have ſpoken in one place ſeverally another thing concerning the bread than he ſpeaketh of the cup. He calleth the bread his bodie, he calleth the wine his bloud: either it ſhall bee a confuſed vaine repetition, or it ſhall bee ſuch a partition as ſhall divide the body from the bloud. Yea it ſhall as truly be ſaid of the cup, This is my body, as of the bread it ſelfe, and it may likewiſe interchangeably be ſaid, that the bread is the bloud. If they anſwer that we muſt conſider to what end or uſe the ſignes were ordained: I grant it indeed: but in the meane time they ſhall not unwinde themſelves, but that their erroure muſt draw this abſurditie with it, that the bread is the bloud, and the wine is the body. Now I wot not what this meaneth, when they grant the bread and the body to bee divers things, yet to affirme that the one is ſpoken of the other properly and without any figure, as, if a man ſhould ſay that a garment is indeed a thing differing from a man, and yet that is properly called a man. In the meane meane while as though their victorie consisted in obstinacie and railing, they say that Christ is accused of lying, if an exposition be sought of the words. Now it shall be easie for us to shew to the Readers how unjust wrong these catchers of syllables doe to us, when they fill the simple with this opinion, that we withdraw credit from the words of Christ, which wee have proved to be furiously perverted and confounded by them, but to be faithfully and rightly expounded by us.

The words and ſyllables of Chriſts ſpeech not ſo preciſely to be ſtood upon, that all expoſition be rejected which being ſound and ſober bringeth light, but no diſcredit unto the ſpeaker.

The unmeasurable power of God not at all diminished by them, who refuse the doctrine of consubstantiation.

24 But the slander of this lie cannot be utterly purged, till another crime be wipped away. For they spread abroad, that we be so addicted to naturall reason, that wee give no more to the power of God, than the order of nature suffereth and common sense teacheth. From so malicious slanders I appeale to the very doctrine it selfe which I have declared: which doth clearely enough shew, that I doe not measure this mystery by the proportion of mans reason, nor doe make it subject to the lawes of nature. I beseech you, have we learned out of naturall Phylosophie, that Christ doth so from heaven feede our Soules and bodies with his flesh, as our bodies are nourished with bread and wine? Whence commeth this power to flesh, that it may give life? All men will say that it is not done naturally. It will no more please mans reason, that the flesh of Christ reacheth to us, that it may be food unto us. Finally whosoever hath tasted of our doctrine, shall be ravished into admiration of the secret power of God. But these good men that be so zealous of it, forge to themselves a miracle, which being taken away, God himselfe vanisheth with his power. I desire to have the Readers once againe warned, that they diligently weigh what our doctrine bringeth, whether it hang upon common sense, or with the wings of Faith, surmounting the world, climbeth up beyond it into the heavens. We say that Christ as well with the outward signe as with his spirit, descendeth to us, that hee may truly quicken our soules with the substance of his flesh and of his bloud. In these few words he that perceiveth not to bee contained many miracles, is more than senseless: foraſmuch as there is nothing more beside nature, than that Soules should borrow spirituall and heavenly life, of the flesh which tooke her beginning of the earth, and which was subject to death. Nothing is more incredible, than that things distant and a sunder by the whole space of heaven and earth, should in so great distance of places not onely be conjoyned, but also united, that Soules may receive food of the flesh of Christ. Therefore let wayward men cease to procure hatred to us, by a filthy slaunder, as though wee did enviously restraine any thing of the immeasurable power of God. For they doe either too foolishly erre, or too maliciously lye. For it is not here in question what God could, but what he would. We affirme that to be done which pleased him. But it pleased him, that Christ should be made like to his brethren in all things, except sinne. What manner of thing is our flesh? Is it not such as consisteth of the certaine measure of it, as is contained in place, as is touched, as is seene? And why (say they) may not God make, that one selfe same flesh may occupie many and divers places, may bee contained in one place, may bee without measure and forme? Thou mad man, why requirest thou of the power of God to make flesh at one selfe time to bee and not to be flesh? Like as if thou shouldest instantly require him to make at one selfe time the light to bee both light and darkenesse. But he willeth light to be light, darknesse to bee darknesse, flesh to be flesh. He shall indeed when it pleaseth him, turne darknesse into light, and light into darknesse, but when thou requirest that light and darknesse may not differ, what dost thou else but pervert the order of the wisedome of God? Therefore flesh must bee flesh, and Spirit Spirit, every thing in such law and condition as God hath created it. But such is the condition of flesh, that it must be in one yea and that a certaine place, and consist of her measure and of her forme. With this condition Christ tooke flesh upon him, to which (as Augustine witnesseth) hee hath given indeed uncorruption and glory, but he hath not taken from it nature and truth.

Heb. 4. 15.

Ep. ad Dard.

They that make Christ to lurke invisible under bread, are neither thereunto led by the words,

25 They answer, that they have the word, wherby the will of God is made plaine: namely if it be granted them to banish out of the Church the gift of exposition, which may bring light to the word, I grant that they have the word: but such as in old time the Anthropomorphites had, when they made God having a body: such as Marcion and the Manichees had, when they faigned the body of Christ to bee either heavenly heavenly or phantasticall. For they alleadged for testimonies, The first Adam was of the earth earthly; the second Adam is of heaven, heavenly: Againe, Christ abased himselfe, taking upon him the forme of a servant, and was found in likenesse as a man. But the grosse eaters thinke that there is no power of God, unlesse with the monster forged in their braines, the whole order of nature be overthrowne: which is rather to limit God, when we covet with our faigned inventions to prove what hee can doe. For out of what word have they taken that the body of Christ is visible in heaven, but lurketh invisible in earth under innumerable little peeces of bread? They will say that necessity requireth this that the body of Christ should bee given in the Supper. Verily because it pleased them to gather a fleshly eating out of the words of Christ: they being carried away by their owne fore judgement, were driven of necessity to coine this subtlety, which the whole Scripture cryeth out against. But that any thing is by us diminished of the power of God, is so false that by our doctrine the praise of it is very honorably set out. But forasmuch as they alway accuse us, that wee defraud God of his honor, when wee refuse that which according to common sense is hard to be beleeved, although it have beene promised by the mouth of Christ: I make againe the same answer that I made even now, that in the mysteries of Faith we doe not aske counsell of common sense, but with quiet willingnesse to learne, and with the spirit of meeknesse, which James commendeth, we receive the doctrine come from heaven. But in that when they perniciously erre, I denie not that we follow a profitable moderation. They hearing the words of Christ, This is my bodie, imagine a miracle most far from his minde. But when out of this faigned invention arise fowle absurdities, because they have already with headlong hast put snares upon themselves, they plunge themselves into the bottomelesse depth of the almightinesse of God, that by this meane they may quench the light of truth. Hereupon commeth that proud precisenesse: We will not know how Christ lyeth hid under the bread, holding our selves contented with this saying of his, This is my bodie. But we, as we doe in the whole Scripture, doe with no lesse obedience than care, studie to obtaine a sound understanding of this place: neither doe we with prepostorous heate rashly and without choice catch hold of that which first thrusteth it selfe into our mindes: but using diligent musing upon it, we embrace the meaning which the spirit of God ministreth: and standing thereupon wee doe from aloft despise whatsoever earthly wisedome is set against it. Yea we hold our mindes captive that they may not be bold so much as with one little word to carpe against it: and doe humble them, that they may not dare to rise up against it. Hereupon sprung up the exposition of the words of Christ, which to be by the continuall usage of the Scripture common to all Sacraments, all they that have beene thought but meanely exercised therein, doe know. Neither doe we, after the example of the holy Virgin, thinke it lawfull for us, in a hard matter to enquire how it may be done.

26 But because nothing shall more availe to confirme the Faith of the Godly, than when they have learned that the doctrine which wee have taught is taken out of the word of God, and standeth upon the authoritie thereof: I will make this also evident with as great briefenesse as I can. The bodie of Christ, since the time that it rose againe, not Aristotle but the holy Ghost teacheth to bee limited, and that it is comprehended in heaven untill the last day. Neither am I ignorant that they boldly mocke out those places that are alleadged for this purpose. So oft as Christ saith that hee will depart, leaving the world, they answere that that departing is nothing else but a changing of mortall estate. But after this manner, Christ should not set the Holy Ghost in this place to supply (as they call it) the want of his absence: forasmuch as hee doth not succeede into this place, nor Christ himselfe doth descend againe out of the heavenly glorie to take upon him the state of mortall life. Truly the comming of the holy Ghost, and the ascending of Christ are things set as contrarie: therefore it cannot be that Christ should according to the flesh dwell with us after the same manner that hee sendeth his Spirit. Moreover hee in plaine words expresseth, that he will not be alway with his Disciples in the world. This saying also they thinke that they doe gaily wipe away, as though Christ said that hee will not alway bee poore and miserable or subject to the necessities of this fraile life. But the circumstance of Christ proved by Scripture not to be on earth according to the presence of the flesh, but only by majestie, providence & grace. John 14. 2. & 28.

the place cryeth plainely to the contrarie, becauſe there is not entreated of povertie and neede, or of the miſerable eſtate of earthly life, but of worſhip and honour. The anointing pleaſed not the Diſciples, becauſe they thought it to bee a ſuperfluous and unprofitable coſt, and neere unto riotous exceſſe, therefore they had rather that the price thereof which they thought to bee ill waſted, had been beſtowed upon the poore. Chriſt anſwered that hee ſhall not alwaie bee preſent that he may bee worſhipped with ſuch honour. And none otherwiſe did Auguſtine expound it, whoſe words bee theſe which are nothing doubtfull. When Chriſt ſaid, Yee ſhall not alway have mee, hee ſpake of the preſence of his bodie. For according to his majeſtie, according to his providence, according to his unſpeakable and inviſible grace, this was fulfilled which he ſaid, behold, I am with you even to the ending of the world. But according to the fleſh which the Word tooke unto him, according to this that hee was borne of the Virgin, according to this that hee was taken of the Jewes, that hee was faſtned to the tree, that he was taken downe from the Croſſe, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, that he was laid in the grave, that hee was manifeſtly ſhewed in the reſurrection, this was fulfilled, Yee ſhall not alway have mee with you. Why ſo? Becauſe hee was converſant according to the preſence of his bodie forty dayes with his diſciples, and while they accompanied him in ſeeing, not in following, he aſcended. Hee is not here: for hee ſitteth there at the right hand of the Father. And yet hee is here: becauſe hee is not gone away in preſence of Majeſtie. Otherwiſe according to the preſence of Majeſtie wee have Chriſt alway: and according to the preſence of the fleſh it is rightly ſaid, But me ye ſhall not alway have. For according to the preſence of the fleſh, the Church had him a few dayes: now ſhee holdeth him by Faith, but ſeeth him not with eyes. Where (that I may note this alſo briefly) hee maketh them preſent to us three wayes, by majeſtie, providence, and unſpeakeable grace, under which I comprehend this marvellous communion of his body and bloud: if ſo that wee underſtand it to bee done by the power of the holy Ghoſt, not by that faigned encloſing of his bodie under the element. For our Lord hath teſtified, that hee hath fleſh and bones which may be felt and ſeene. And to goe away and Aſcend doe not ſignifie to make a ſhew of one aſcending and going away, but to doe indeed that which the words ſound. Shall we then (will ſome man ſay) aſſigne to Chriſt ſome certaine coaſt of heaven? But I anſwere with Auguſtine that this is a moſt curious and ſuperfluous queſtion, if ſo that yet we beleeve that he is in heaven.

27 But what doth the name of aſcending ſo oft repeated? doth it not ſignifie a remooving from one place to another? They denie it: becauſe after their opinion by height is onely ſignified Majeſtie of Empire. But what meaneth the very manner of aſcending? was he not in ſight of his Diſciples looking on, lifted up on high? Doe not the Evangeliſts plainely declare that he was taken up into the heavens? Theſe witty Sophiſters doe anſwere that with a cloud ſet betweene him and them hee was conveighed out of their ſight, that the faithfull might learne that from thence foorth he ſhould not be viſibly in the world. As though, to make credit of his inviſible preſence, he ought not rather to vaniſh away in a moment, or as though the cloud ought not rather to compaſſe him before that he ſtirred his foote. But when he is carried upon high into the aire, and with a cloud caſt underneath him, teacheth that hee is no more to be ſought in the earth: we ſafely gather, that now he hath his dwelling place in the heavens: as Paul alſo affirmeth, and from thence he biddeth us to looke for him. After this manner the Angels warned the Diſciples, that they in vaine gazed up into heaven: becauſe Jeſus which is taken up into heaven, ſhall ſo come as they have ſeene him goe up. Heere alſo the adverſaries of ſound doctrine ſtart away with a pleaſant ſhift as they thinke, ſaying that hee ſhall then come viſible, which never went out of the earth but that hee abideth inviſible with them that bee his. As though the Angels did there ſignifie a double preſence, and doe not ſimply make the Diſciples witneſſes of his going up ſeeing it with their eyes, that no doubting might remaine: even as if they had ſaid: hee in your ſight beholding it, being taken up into heaven, hath claimed to himſelfe the heavenly Empire: it remaineth that yee patiently abide in expectation, till he come againe the Judge of the world: becauſe he is now entred into heaven, heaven, not that he may alone poſſeſſe it, but that he may gather together with him you and all the godly.

28 But foraſmuch as the defenders of this baſtard doctrine are not aſhamed to garniſh it with the conſenting voices of the old writers, and ſpecially Auguſtine: I will in few words declare how perverſly they goe about it. For whereas their teſtimonies have beene gathered together of learned and godly men, I will not doe a thing already done: let him that will, ſeeke them out of their works. I will not heap together, neither out of Auguſtine himſelfe, all that might make to the purpoſe: but will bee content to ſhew by a few that hee is without controverſie whole on our ſide. As for this that our adverſaries, to writh him from us, doe alleadge that it is commonly read in his bookes, that the fleſh and blood of Chriſt is diſtributed in the Supper, namely the ſacrifice once offered in the croſſe: it is but trifling: ſith he alſo calleth it either thankſgiving, or the Sacrament of the body. But in what ſenſe hee uſeth the words of fleſh and bloud, we need not to ſeeke with long compaſſing about: for aſmuch as he declareth himſelfe, ſaying that Sacraments take their names of the likeneſſe of the things which they ſignifie: and that therefore after a certaine manner the Sacrament of the bodie is the bodie. Wherewith accordeth another place which is well enough knowne, The Lord ſticked not to ſay, This is my bodie, when he gave the ſigne of it. Againe they object, that Auguſtine writeth expreſly, that the body of Chriſt falleth to the ground, and entreth into the mouth: even in the ſame ſenſe, that he affirmeth it to be conſumed, becauſe he joyneth them both together. Neither doth that make to the contrarie, which he ſaith, that when the myſterie is ended, the bread is conſumed: becauſe he had a little before ſaid: ſith theſe things are knowne to men, foraſmuch as they are done by men, they may have honour as things: but as marvellous things, they may not. And to no other end tendeth that which our adverſaries doe too unaduiſedly draw, to themſelves: that Chriſt did (after a certaine manner) beare himſelfe in his owne hands, when he reacheth the myſticall bread to the Diſciples. For by enterlacing this adverbe of likeneſſe (after a certaine manner) he ſufficiently declareth, that he was not truly or really incloſed under the bread. And no marvell: ſith in another place hee plainely affirmeth that bodies, if ſpaces of places bee taken from them, ſhall bee no where: and becauſe they ſhall bee no where, they ſhall not bee at all. It is an hungry cavillation, to ſay that in that place is not entreated of the Supper, in which God uttereth ſpeciall power: becauſe the queſtion was moved concerning the fleſh of Chriſt, and the holy man of ſet purpoſe anſwering, ſaith: Chriſt gave immortallity to his fleſh, but tooke not nature from it. After this forme it is not to be thought that he is each where ſpread abroad: for wee muſt beware that wee doe not ſo affirme the Godhead of the man, that we take away the truth of the bodie. And it followeth not, that that which is in God muſt bee each where as GOD is. There is a reaſon by and by added: for one perſon is God and man, and both are one Chriſt: each where, by this that hee is God: in heaven, by this that hee is man. What a negligence had it beene, not to except the myſtery of the Supper being a thing ſo earneſt and waighty, if there had beene in it any thing againſt the doctrine which hee entreated of. And yet if a man doe heedfully reade that which followeth within a little after, he ſhall find that under that generall doctrine, the Supper is alſo comprehended, that Chriſt the onely begotten Sonne of God and the ſame the Sonne of man is each where whole preſent as God: that he is in the Temple of God (that is in the Church) God as it were there dwelling, and in ſome certaine place of heaven by reaſon of the meaſure of his true bodie. Wee ſee how, to the uniting of Chriſt with the Church, he doth not draw his bodie out of Heaven: which ſurely he would have done, if the body of Chriſt were not truely meat to us unleſſe it were encloſed under bread. In another place defining how the faithfull doe now poſſeſſe Chriſt. Thou haſt him (ſaith hee) by the ſigne of the Croſſe, by the Sacrament of Baptiſme by the meate and drinke of the Altar. How rightly hee reckoneth a ſuperſtitious uſage among the ſignes of the preſence of Chriſt, I doe not now diſpute: but hee that compareth the preſence of the fleſh to the ſigne of the Croſſe, ſufficiently ſheweth that he faineth not a two bodied Chriſt, that the ſame hee, may lurke hidden under the bread, which ſitteth viſible in heaven. If this need plainer declaration, it is by and by after added in the ſame place, that according to the preſence of majeſty, we alway have Chriſt: that according to the preſence of the fleſh, it is rightly ſaid, Mee yee ſhall not alway have. They anſwer, that this is alſo added, that according to an unſpeakable and inviſible grace, it is fulfilled which is ſaid of him, I am with you, even unto the ending of the world. But that is nothing for their advantage: becauſe this is at length reſtrained to his majeſty, which is ever in compariſon ſet againſt the body, and his fleſh by expreſſe name is made different from his grace and power. As in another place the ſame compariſon of contraries is read in him, that Chriſt by bodily preſence left the Diſciples, that by ſpirituall preſence he may be ſtill with them: where it is plaine that the ſubſtance of the fleſh is diſtinguiſhed from the power of the ſpirit, which conjoyneth us with Chriſt, though we be otherwiſe farre ſevered by diſtance of places. The ſame manner of ſpeaking he oftentimes uſeth, as when he ſaith: He is to come againe to the quick and the dead with bodily preſence, according to the rule of Faith and ſound doctrine. For with ſpirituall preſence he was alſo to come to them and to abide with the whole Church in the world untill the ending of the world. Therfore this ſpeech is directed to the beleevers whom he had already begun to ſave with bodily preſence, and whom he was to leave with bodily abſence: that he might with his Father ſave them with ſpirituall preſence. To take bodily for viſible is but trifling: ſith he ſetteth alſo the body in compariſon againſt the divine power: and adding (to ſave with the Father) he clearely expreſſeth that he doth powre abroad his grace from heaven to us by his Spirit.

The body of Chriſt by glory not made inviſible, which fancie concerning Chriſt hath no manner of ground in Scripture.

29 And ſith they put ſo much confidence in this lurking hole of inviſible preſence, goe too let us ſee how well they hide themſelves in it. Firſt they ſhall not bring foorth one ſyllable out of the Scriptures, whereby they may prove that Chriſt is inviſible: but that they take that for confeſſed which no man that hath his ſound wit will grant them, that the body of Chriſt cannot otherwiſe bee given in the Supper but being covered with the viſour of bread. And this is the very point about which they ſtrive with us, ſo farre is it off from having the place of a principle. And when they ſo babble, they are compelled to make a double body of Chriſt: becauſe after their opinion it is in it ſelfe viſible in heaven, but inviſible in the Supper after a ſpeciall manner of diſpenſation. But how trimly this agreeth, it is eaſie to judge both by other places of Scripture, and by the witneſſe of Peter. Peter ſaith that Chriſt muſt bee holden or contained in heaven, till he come againe. Theſe men teach that hee is every where, but without forme. They take exception and ſay that it is unjuſt dealing, to make the nature of a glorified body ſubject to the lawes of common nature. But this anſwer draweth with it that doting error of Servetus, (which is worthily to be abhorred of all the godly) that the body was ſwallowed up of the Godhead. I doe not ſay that they thinke ſo. But if this bee reckoned among the qualities of a glorified bodie, to fill all things after an inviſible manner, it is evident, that the bodily ſubſtance is deſtroyed, and that there is left no difference of the Godhead and the nature of man. Againe If the body of Chriſt bee of ſo many faſhions and divers, that it is ſeene in one place, and is inviſible in another: where is the very nature of a bodie which conſiſteth of his meaſured proportions? and where is unity? Much more rightly doth Tertullian ſay, which affirmeth that the body of Chriſt was a true and naturall body, becauſe in the miſterie of the Supper the figure of it is ſet before us for a pleadge and aſſurance of the ſpirituall life. And verily Chriſt ſaid of his glorified body, ſee and feele, for a ſpirit hath not fleſh and bones. Loe by Chriſts owne mouth the truth of the fleſh is prooved, becauſe it can bee felt and ſeene: Take away theſe things, then it ſhall ceaſe to bee fleſh. They ſtill flee to their denne of diſpenſation which they have framed to themſelves. But it is our part ſo to embrace that which Chriſt abſolutely pronounceth, that that which he meaneth to affirme may bee of force with us without exception. He prooveth himſelfe to bee no Ghoſt, becauſe he is viſible in his fleſh. Let that bee taken away which he claimeth as proper to the nature of his bodie: muſt they not then be faine to coine a new definition of a bodie? Now whither ſoever they turne themſelves about, their faigned diſpenſation hath no place in that place of Paul where hee ſaith, that wee looke for a Saviour from heaven which ſhall faſhion our baſe body like to his glorious body. For we may not hope for a like faſhioning in thoſe qualities which they faigne to Chriſt, that every one ſhould have an inviſible and unmeaſurable body. Neither ſhall there bee found any man ſo dull-witted whom they may make to beleeve ſo great an abſurditie. Let them not therefore aſcribe this gift to Chriſts glorified body, to bee at once in many places, and to bee contained in no ſpace. Finally let them either openly denie the reſurrection of the fleſh, or let them graunt that Chriſt being clothed with heavenly glory, did not put off his fleſh, who ſhall make us in our fleſh fellowes and parteners of the ſame glorie, when wee ſhall have the reſurrection common with him. For what doth the Scripture teach more plainely, than that as Chriſt did put on our true fleſh when he was borne of the Virgin, and ſuffered in our true fleſh when he ſatisfied for us: ſo hee received againe alſo the ſame true fleſh in riſing againe, and carried it up to heaven? For this is to us the hope of our reſurrection and aſcending into heaven, that Chriſt is riſen againe and aſcended: and (as Tertullian ſaith) hee carryed the earneſt of our reſurrection into the heavens with him. Now how weake and fraile ſhould that hope bee, unleſſe this our ſelfe fleſh had beene raiſed up with Chriſt, and entred into the kingdome of heaven? But this is the proper truth of a body, to be contained in ſpace, to conſiſt of his meaſured proportions, to have his forme. Therefore away with this fooliſh device, which doth faſten both the minds of men and Chriſt to the bread. For to what purpoſe ſerveth the ſecret preſence under bread, but that they which covet to have Chriſt joyned with them, may reſt in that ſigne? But the Lord himſelfe willed us to withdraw not onely our eyes but all our ſenſes from the earth, forbidding himſelfe to bee touched of the women untill hee had gone up to his Father. When hee ſeeth Marie with godly zeale of reverence to make haſte to kiſſe his feet, there is no cauſe why hee ſhould diſallow and forbid this touching till hee have beene taken up into heaven, but becauſe hee will be ſought no where elſe. Whereas they object, that hee was afterward ſeene of Stephen, the ſolution is eaſie. For neither was it therefore neceſſarie that Chriſt ſhould change place, which could give to the eyes of his ſervant ſuch ſharpneſſe of ſight as might pearce through the heavens. The ſame alſo is to bee ſaid of Paul. Whereas they object that Chriſt came out of the Sepulchre being ſhut: and entred in among the diſciples, the doores being ſhut: that maketh never a whit more for maintenance of their errour. For as the water like a faſt pavement made a way to Chriſt walking upon the lake: ſo it is no marvell, if at his comming the hardneſſe of the ſtone yeelded it ſelfe. Howbeit it is more proveable, that by his commandement the ſtone was removed, and by and by after paſſage given him returned into his place. And to enter the doores being ſhut, is not as much in effect as to pearce through the whole ſubſtance, but by divine power to open an entrie for himſelfe, that hee ſuddenly ſtood among the Diſciples, verily after a marvellous manner, when the doores were faſt locked. That which they alleage out of Luke, that Chriſt ſuddenly vaniſhed away from the eyes of the diſciples with whom hee went to Emaus, profiteth them nothing, and maketh for us. For, that hee might take away the ſight of himſelfe from them, he was not made inviſible, but onely went out of ſight. As when hee went in journey together with them (as the ſame Luke witneſſeth) hee did not put on a new face, that hee might not bee knowne, but held their eyes. But theſe fellowes doe not onely transforme Chriſt, that he may be converſant in earth, but in divers places they make him divers and unlike himſelfe. Finally, in ſo trifling they doe not by one word indeed, but by a circumſtance, make of the fleſh of Chriſt a ſpirit: and not contented therewith, they put upon it altogether contrarie qualities. Whereupon of neceſſitie followeth that it is double.

30 Now although wee graunt them that which they prate of the inviſible preſence, the unmeaſurableneſſe ſhall not bee yet proved, without which they ſhall in vaine attempt to encloſe Chriſt under bread. Unleſſe the bodie of Chriſt may bee everie where at once, without any compaſſe of place, it ſhall not be likely that he lyeth hidden under bread in the Supper. By which neceſſitie they brought in the monſtrous being being every where. But it is shewed by strong and plaine witnesses of Scripture, that it was limited about by the measure of the body of a man: and then that by his ascending he hath made it plaine that he is not in all places, but that when he passeth into one place, he leaveth the other that he was in before. Neither is the promise which they alleadge, to be drawne to the bodie, I am with you even to the ending of the world. First the continuall conjoyning cannot stand, unlesse Christ dwell in us corporally without the use of the Supper. Therefore there is no just cause why they should so sharply brawle about the words of Christ, that they may in the Supper enclose Christ under bread. Againe the text it selfe proveth, that Christ speaketh nothing lesse than of his flesh, but promiseth to his Disciples invincible help, whereby hee may defend and sustaine them against all the assaults of Satan and the world. For when he enjoyned them a hard charge: least they should doubt to take it in hand, or should fearefully execute it, he strengtheneth them with affiance of his presence: as if he had said, that his succour shall not faile them, which shall be impossible to be overcome. Unlesse they listed to confound all things, ought they not to have made distinction of the manner of presence. And verily some had rather with great shame to utter their ignorance, than to yeeld never so little of their errour. I speake not of the Papists: whose doctrine is more tolerable, or at the least more shamefast. But contentiousnesse so carrieth some away, that they say that by reason of the natures united in Christ, wheresoever the Godhead of Christ is, there is also his flesh, which cannot bee severed from his Godhead. As though that same uniting have compounded of those two natures I wot not what meane thing which was neither God nor man. So indeed did Eutiches, and after him Servetus. But it is plainely gathered out of the Scripture, that the onely one person of Christ doth so consist of two natures, that either of them hath still her owne propertie remaining safe. And that Eutiches was rightfully condemned, they will be ashamed to denie: it is marvell that they marke not the cause of his condemning, that taking away the difference betweene the natures, enforcing the unitie of person, he made of God man, and of man God. What madnesse therefore is it, rather to mingle heaven and earth together, than not to draw the body of Christ out of the heavenly sanctuarie? For whereas they bring for themselves these testimonies, None is gone up to heaven but hee that is come downe the sonne of man which is in heaven. Againe, The sonne which is in the bosome of the Father, he shall declare them: it is a point of like senseleſse dulnesse, to despise the communicating of properties which was in old time not without cause invented of the holy Fathers. Truly, when the Lord of glorie is said to be crucified, Paul doth not meane that he suffered any thing in his Godhead: but because the same Christ which being an abject and despised in the flesh did suffer, was both God and Lord of glorie. After this manner also the Sonne of man was in heaven: because the selfe-same Christ, which according to the flesh did dwell in the Sonne of man in earth, was God in heaven. In which sort he is said to have descended from the said place according to his Godhead: not that the Godhead did forsake heaven to hide it selfe in the prison of the body: but because, although it filled all things, yet in the very manhood of Christ it dwelled corporally, that is to say naturally and after a certaine unspeakable manner. It is a common distinction in schooles, which I am not ashamed to rehearse: that although whole Christ be every where, yet not the whole that is in him is every where. And I would to God the schoolemen themselves had well weighed the pith of this saying: for so should the unsavorie invention of the fleshly presence of Christ have beene met withall. Therefore our mediator, sith he is whole every where, is alway at hand with his, & in the Supper after a speciall manner giveth himselfe present: but yet so, that whole he is present, not the whole that he is: because, as it is said, in his flesh he is contained in heaven till he appeare to judgement.

31 But they are far deceived, which conceive no presence of the flesh of Christ in the Supper, unlesse it be made present in bread. For so they leave nothing to the secret working of the Spirit, which uniteth Christ himselfe unto us. They thinke not Christ present, unlesse hee come downe to us. As though if hee did lift us up to him, we should not as well enjoy his presence. Therefore the question is onely of the manner: because they place Christ in the bread, but we thinke it not lawfull for us to plucke him out of Heaven.

alleadges thereof, which being denied take the away the presence of Christ in or under the bread, was both condemned in the heresie of Eutiches, and hath in Scripture no colour of proofe.

Christ present in the Supper though he descend not to present his body invisible in bread.

Heaven. Let the readers judge whether is the righter. Onely let this cavillation be driven away, that Christ is taken away from his Supper, unlesse he be hidden under the cover of bread. For sith this mysterie is heavenly, it is no need to draw Christ into the earth, that he may be joyned to us.

32 Now if any man doe aske me of the manner, I will not be ashamed to confesse, that it is a higher secret than that it can be either comprehended with my wit, or uttered with my words: and, to speake it more plainely, I rather feele it, than I can understand it. Therefore I doe herein without controversie embrace the truth of God, in which I may safely rest. Hee pronounceth that his flesh is the meat of my soule, and his bloud is the drinke. With such foode I offer my soule to him to be fed. In his holy Supper he commandeth me under the signes of bread and wine to take, eat, and drinke his bodie and bloud. I nothing doubt that both hee doth truly deliver them, and I doe receive them. Onely I refuse the absurdities, which appeare to be either unworthie of the heavenly majestie of Christ, or disagreeing from the truth of his nature of manhood: for as much as they must also fight with the word of God; which also teacheth that Christ was so taken up into the glory of the heavenly kingdome that it lifteth him up above all estate of the world, and no lesse diligently setteth forth in his nature of man, those things that are properly belonging to his true manhood. Neither ought this to seeme incredible, or not consonant to reason, because as the whole kingdome of Christ is spirituall, so whatsoever he doth with his Church, ought not to be reduced to the reason of this world. Or, that I may use the words of Augustine, this mysterie, as other are, is done by men, but from God: in earth, but from heaven. Such (I say) is the presence of the body, as the nature of the Sacrament requireth: which wee say here to excell with so great force, and great effectualnesse, that it not onely bringeth to our minds undoubted trust of eternall life, but also assureth us of the immortalitie of our flesh. For it is now quickned of his immortall flesh, and after a certaine manner communicateth of his immortalitie. They which are carried above this with their excessive speeches, doe nothing but with such entanglements darken the simple and plaine truth. If any be not yet satisfied, I would have him here a while to consider with me, that we now speake of a Sacrament, all the parts whereof ought to be referred to faith. But we doe no lesse daintily and plentifully feede faith with this partaking of the body which we have declared, than they that plucke Christ himselfe out of heaven. In the meane time I plainely confesse, that I refuse that mixture of the flesh of Christ with our soule, or the powring out of it such as they teach: because it sufficeth us, that Christ doth out of the substance of his flesh breath life into our soules, yea doth powre into us his owne life, although the very flesh of Christ doth not enter into us. Moreover it is no doubt that the proportion of faith, whereby Paul willeth us to examine all exposition of Scripture, doth in this behalfe very well agree with me. As for them that speake against so evident a truth, let them looke after what rule of faith they fashion themselves. He that doth not confesse that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God. These men, although they cloke it, or marke it not, doe spoile him of his flesh.

33 Of communicating is to be likewise thought, which they acknowledge none, unlesse they devoure the flesh of Christ under bread. But there is no small wrong done to the holy Ghost, unlesse wee beleeve that it is brought to passe by his incomprehensible power, that wee communicate with the flesh and bloud of Christ. Yea if the force of the mysterie, such as it is taught of us, and as it was knowne to the old Church from fower hundred yeeres agoe, were weighed according to the worthinesse of it, there was enough and more whereupon we might be satisfied: the gate had beene shut against many foule errours, out of which have beene kindled many horrible dissensions wherewith both in old time and in our age the Church hath beene miserably vexed, while curious men doe enforce an excessive manner of presence, which the Scripture never sheweth. And they turmoile about a thing fondly and rashly conceived, as if the enclosing of Christ under bread were (as the proverbe is) the prowe and poupe of godlinesse. It principally behoved to know, how the body of Christ, as it was once delivered for us, is made ours: how we are made partakers of his bloud that was shed: because this is to possesse whole Christ crucified, that we may enjoy all his good good things. Now these things, in which was so great importance, being omitted, yea neglected, and in a manner buried, this onely crabbed question pleaseth them, how the body of Christ lyeth hid under bread or under the forme of bread. They falsly spread abroad that whatsoever wee teach concerning spirituall eating, is contrarie to the true and reall eating, as they call it: because we have respect to nothing but to the manner, which among them is carnall, while they enclose Christ in bread: but to us it is spirituall, because the secret power of the spirit is the bond of our conjoyning with Christ. No truer is that other objection, that we touch onely the fruit or effect which the faithfull take of the eating of the flesh of Christ. For wee have said before, that Christ himselfe is the substance of the Supper: and that thereupon followeth the effect, that by the sacrifice of his death we are clensed from sinnes, by his bloud wee are washed, by his resurrection wee are raised up into hope of the heavenly life. But the

Our communicating of Christ in the Sacrament spirituall not carnall, such as receiveth Christ himselfe not the effects of his grace onely, otherwise sacramentall then Lombard and after him others have dreamed, who thinke his flesh eaten without taste, without faith.

Lib. 4. Dist. 8. foolish imagination, whereof Lombard was the authour, hath perverted their minds, while they thinke that the eating of the flesh of Christ is the Sacrament. For this saith he: The Sacrament and not the thing are the formes of bread and wine: the Sacrament and the thing, are the flesh and bloud of Christ: the thing and not the Sacrament, is the mysticall flesh. Againe within a little after. The thing signified and contained, is the proper flesh of Christ: the thing signified and not contained, is his mysticall body. Whereas hee maketh difference betweene the flesh of Christ, and the effectuall power of nourishing, wherewith it is endued, I agree: but whereas he faigneth it to be a Sacrament, yea and contained under bread, it is an errour not to be suffered. Hereupon hath growne the false exposition of sacramentall eating, because they have thought that wicked men also and evill doers doe eat the flesh of Christ, how much soever they be strangers from him. But the flesh of Christ, it selfe in the mysterie of the Supper is no lesse a spirituall thing, than eternall salvation. Whereupon we gather, that whosoever are void of the spirit of Christ, can no more eat the flesh of Christ, than they can drinke wine wherewith is joyned no taste. Truly Christ is too hainously torne in sunder, when that dead body, and which hath no lively strength, is given forth in common to unbeleevers: and his expresse words are directly against John 6. 56. it. Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my bloud, abideth in me, and I in him. They answer that in that place is not intreated of the sacramentall eating: which I grant, so that they will not now and then stumble against the same stone, saying that the flesh it selfe is eaten without fruit. But I would know of them, how long they hold it when they have eaten it. Here, in my judgement, they shall have no way to get out. But they object, that nothing can bee withdrawne or faile of the promises of God by the unthankefulnesse of men. I grant indeed, and I say that the force of the mysterie remaineth whole, howsoever wicked men doe, as much as in them lyeth, endevour to make it void. Yet it is one thing to bee offered, and another thing to bee received. Christ reacheth this spirituall meat, and offereth this spirituall drinke to all men, some doe greedily eat of it, some doe lothingly refuse it: shall these men refusing make the meat and the drinke to lose their nature? They will say that their opinion is holpen by this similitude, namely, that the flesh of Christ, thought it be unsavorie, is nevertheless his flesh. But I denie that it can be eaten without the taste of faith: or (if wee list rather to speake as Augustine doth) I say that men beare away no more of this Sacrament, than they gather with the vessell of faith. So nothing is abated from the Sacrament, yea the truth and effectualnesse thereof remaineth unminished, although the wicked depart emptie from the outward partaking of it. If they againe object that this word, this is my bodie, is diminished, if the wicked receive corruptible bread and nothing else, wee have a solution readie, that God will not bee acknowne true in the receiving it selfe, but in the stedfastnesse of his owne goodnesse, when hee is readie to give, yea liberally offereth to the unworthie that which they refuse. And this is the fulnesse of the Sacrament, which the whole world cannot breake, that the flesh and bloud of Christ is no lesse given to the unworthie, than to the chosen faithfull ones of God: but therewithall it is true, that as water lighting upon a hard stone, falleth away, because there is no entrie open into the stone: so the wicked doe with their hardnesse drive backe the grace of God that it cannot pierce into them. Moreover, that Christ should be received without faith, is no more agreeing with reason, than seed to bud in the fire. Whereas they aske, how Christ is come to damnation to some, unlesse they receive him unworthily, it is a very cold question: forasmuch as we no where read, that men doe procure death to themselves by unworthy receiving Christ, but rather by refusing him. Neither doth Christs parable helpe them, where he saith that seed groweth up among thornes, and afterward being choaked is marred: because he there entreateth, of what value the faith is which endureth but for a time, which they doe not thinke to be necessary to the eating of Christs flesh and drinking of his bloud, that in this behalfe doe make Iudas equally fellow with Peter. But rather by the same parable their error is confuted, where Christ saith that some seed falleth in the high-way, othersome upon stones, and neither of them taketh roote. Whereupon followeth that to the unbeleevers their owne hardnesse is a let that Christ attaineth not to them. Whosoever desireth to have our salvation holpen by this mystery, shall find nothing fitter, than that the faithfull being led to the very fountaine, should draw life out of the Sonne of God. But the dignitie of it is honourably enough set out, when we keep in mind that it is a helpe whereby wee bee grafted into the body of Christ, or being graffed doe more and more grow together, till he doe fully make himselfe one with us in the heavenly life. They object that Paul ought not to have made them guilty of the body and blood of Christ. unlesse they were partakers of them. But I answer that they are not therefore condemned because they have eaten them, but onely because they have prophaned the mystery, in treading vnder feet the pledge of the holy conjoyning with God, which they ought reverently to receive.

Mat. 13 7.

1 Cor. 11. 29.

34 Now because Augustine among the old writers chiefly hath affirmed that article of doctrine, that nothing is abated from the Sacraments, nor the grace which they figure is made voide by the infidelity or naughtinesse of men: it shall be profitable to prove cleerly by his owne words, how unfitly and perversly they doe draw that to this present cause, which cast the body of Christ to dogs to eat. The Sacramentall eating, after their opinion, is whereby the wicked receive the body and bloud of Christ without the power of the Spirit, or any effect of grace. Augustine contrariwise weying wisely those words. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my bloud, shall not die for ever, saith: Namely the power of the sacrament, not onely the visible sacrament: and verily within, not without: he that eateth it with hart, not he that presseth it with tooth. Whereupon at length he concludeth that the sacrament of this thing, that is to say, of the unity of the body and bloud of Christ, is set before men in the supper of the Lord, to some unto life, to some unto destruction,: but the thing it selfe whereof it is a sacrament to all men unto life, to none unto destruction, whosoever be partakers of it. That none should here cavill, that the thing is called not the body, but the grace of the spirit which may be severed from the body, the contrary comparisons betweene these two words of addition Visible and Invisible driveth away all those mists: for under the first of them cannot be comprehended the body of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the unbeleevers doe communicate only of the visible signe. And that all doubting may be better taken away, after that he had said that this bread requireth the hunger of the inward man, he addeth: Moses and Aaron and Phinees, and many other that did eat, Manna, pleased God. Why so? because the spirituall meat they spiritually understood, spiritually hungred, spiritually tasted, that they might be spiritually filled. For we also at this day have received spiritually meat: but the Sacrament is one thing, and the power of the Sacrament is another. A little after: and by this he that abideth not in Christ, and in whom Christ abideth not, without doubt neither eateth spiritually his flesh, nor drinketh his blood, though carnally and visibly he presseth with teeth the signe of the body and bloud. We heare againe that the visible signe is set in comparison as a contrarie to spirituall eating. Whereby that error is confuted, that the body of Christ invisible is in deed eaten sacramentally, though not spiritually. We heare also that nothing is granted to prophane and uncleane men beside the visible receiving of the signe. Hereupon commeth his famous saying, that the other disciples did eat the bread the Lord: but Iudas did eat the bread of the Lord: wherein he plainly excludeth the unbeleevers from from the partaking of the body and blood. Neither tendeth it to any other end which he ſaith in another place: What marvelleſt thou, if to Iudas was given the bread of Chriſt, by which he might be made bound to the devill: when thou ſeeſt on the contrarie ſide that to Paul was given the angell of the devill, by whom he might be made perfect in Chriſt? he ſaith verily in another place, that the bread of the Supper was the body of Chriſt to them to whom Paul ſaid, He that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgement to himſelfe: and that they have not therefore nothing, becauſe they have received naughtily. But in what ſenſe, he declareth more fully in another place, For taking in hand purpoſely to define how the wicked and evill doers, which profeſſe the Chriſtian faith with mouth but with deedes doe denie it, doe eat the body of Chriſt, (and that againſt the opinion of ſome which thought that they did not eate in ſacrament onely but in very deed.) But neither (ſaith he) ought it to be ſaid that they eate the body of Chriſt, becauſe they are not to bee reckoned among the members of Chriſt. For (to ſpeake nothing of the reſt) they cannot together be the members of Chriſt, and the members of a harlot. Finally where himſelfe ſaith, He that eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my bloud, abideth in me, and I in him, he ſheweth that it is not ſacramentally but in very deed to eat the body of Chriſt. For this is to abide in Chriſt, that Chriſt may abide in him. For he ſo ſaid this as though hee had ſaid, he that abideth not in me, and in whom I abide not, let him not ſay or thinke that hee doth eat my body or drinke my bloud. Let the readers weigh the things ſet as contraries in the compariſon to eat, ſacramentally, and in very deed: and there ſhall remaine no doubt. He confirmeth the ſame, no leſſe plainly in theſe words: Prepare not your jawes, but your heart. Hereupon is this Supper commended. Loe we beleeve in Chriſt, when we receive by faith: in receiving we know what to think. We receive a little and are fatted in heart. Therefore not that which is ſeene, but that which is beleeved, doth feed. Here alſo that which the wicked receive, he reſtraineth to the viſible ſigne: and teacheth that Chriſt is none otherwiſe received than by faith. So alſo in another place, pronouncing expreſly that the good and the evill doe communicate together in the ſignes he excludeth the evill from the true eating of the fleſh of Chriſt. For if they received the thing it ſelfe, he would not utterly have left that unſpoken which was more fit for his matter. Alſo in another place, entreating of the eating and the fruit thereof, he concludeth thus: then ſhall the body and blood of Chriſt bee life to every man, if that which in the ſacrament is viſibly received, be in the truth it ſelfe ſpiritually eaten, ſpiritually drunke. Therefore who ſo make unbeleevers partakers of the fleſh and bloud of Chriſt, that they may agree with Auguſtine, let them ſhew us the viſible bodie of Chriſt foraſmuch as by his judgement, the whole truth is ſpirituall. And it is certainely gathered out of his words, that the ſacramentall eating, when unbeleefe cloſeth up the entry to truth, is as much in effect as viſible or outward eating. If the body of Chriſt might be eaten truely and yet not ſpiritually, what ſhould that meane which he ſaith in another place? Yee ſhall not eate this body which yee ſee, and drinke the bloud which they ſhall ſhed that ſhall crucifie me. I have commanded a certaine ſacrament unto you being ſpiritually underſtood it ſhall quicken you. Verily hee would not deny but that the ſame body which Chriſt offered for ſacrifice, is delivered in the Supper: but he did ſet out the manner of eating: namely that being received into heavenly glory, by the ſecret power of the ſpirit, it breatheth life into us. I grant indeed that there is oftentimes found in him this manner of ſpeaking, that the body of Chriſt is eaten of the unbeleevers: but he expoundeth himſelfe, adding, In Sacrament. And in another place he deſcribeth ſpirituall eating, in which our bitings conſume not grace. And leaſt mine adverſaries ſhould ſay, that I fight with them with a heape of places, I would know of them how they can unwinde themſelves from one ſaying of his, where he ſaith that Sacraments doe worke in the onely elect that which they figure. Truely they dare not deny but that the bread in the ſupper figureth the body of Chriſt. Whereupon followeth that the reprobate are debarred from the partaking of it. That Cyrill alſo thought none otherwiſe, theſe words doe declare, as if a man upon molten wax doe powre other wax, he wholly tempereth the one wax with the other: ſo it is neceſſary if any man receive the fleſh and bloud of the Lord that he be joyned with him that Chriſt may be found in in him and he in Christ. By these words, I thinke it is evident, that they are bereaved of the true and reall eating, that doe but sacramentally eat the bodie of Christ, which cannot be severed from his power : and that therefore faileth not the faith of the promises of God, which ceaseth not to raine from heaven, although the stones and rockes conceive not the liquor of the raine.

35 This knowledge shall also easily draw us away from the carnall worshipping, which some have with perverse rashnesse erected in the sacrament : because they made account with themselves in this manner : If it be the body, then both the soule and the Godhead are together with the body, which now cannot be severed : therefore Christ is there to bee worshipped. First if their accompaning which they pretend bee denied them, what will they doe ? For how much soever they cry out upon an absurdity, if the body bee severed from the soule and the Godhead : yet what sound witted and sober man can perswade himselfe that the body of Christ is Christ : They thinke themselves indeede gaily to prove it with their logicall arguments. But sith Christ speaketh distinctly of his body and bloud, btit describeth not the manner of presence: how will they of a doubtfull thing gather certainely that which they would ? What then ? If their consciences chance to be exercised with any more grievous feeling, shall not they by and by with their logicall arguments bee dissolved and melt ? namely when they shall see themselves destitute of the certaine word of God, upon which alone our soules doe stand fast, when they are called to account, and without which they faint at every first moment: when they shall call to minde that the doctrine and examples of the Apostles are against them, and that themselves alone are to themselves the authors of it. To such motions shall be added other not small prickinhs. What ? Shall it be a matter of no importance, to worship God in this forme, where nothing was prescribed unto us ? When it concerned the true worship of God, ought they with so great lightnesse to have attempted that of which there is no where read any one word ? But if they had, with such humbleneſſe as they ought, holden all their thoughts under the word of God, they would truely have harkened to that which he said, Take, eat, drinke, and would have obeyed this commandement, wherein he biddeth the Sacrament to be received, not to be worshipped. But they which, as it is commanded of God, doe receive it without worshipping, are assured that they doe not swarve from Gods commandement : than which assuredneſſe there is nothing better when wee take any worke in hand. They have the example of the Apostles, whom wee reade not to have fallen downe flat and worshipped it, but even as they were sitting to have received it and eaten it. They have the use of the Apostolike Church, wherein Luke reporteth that the faithfull did communicate not in worshipping but in the breaking of bread. They have the Apostles doctrine, wherewith Paul instructed the Church of the Corinthians, professing that hee had received of the Lord that which he delivered.

Adoration of Christ in the Sacrament unwarranted.

Act. 2. 4.

1 Cor. 11.

36 And these things verily tend to this end, that the godly reader should weigh how perillous it is in so high matters to wander from the simple word of God to the dreames of our owne braine. But those things that are above said, ought to deliver us from all doubt in this behalfe. For that godly soules may therein rightly take hold of Christ they must needs be lifted up to heaven. If this be the office of a Sacrament, to helpe the minde of man which otherwise is weake, that it may rise upward to reach the height of spirituall misteries : then they which are holden downe in the outward signe doe stray from the right way of seeking Christ. What then ? Shall we deny that it is a superstitious worshipping, when men doe throw themselves downe before bread to worship Christ therein ? Doubtlesse the Nicene Synode meant to meet with this mischiefe, when it forbade us to be humbly intentive to the signes set before us. And for none other cause was it in old time ordained, that before the consecration the people should with a loud voice be put in mind to have their hearts lifted upward. The Scripture it selfe also, beside that it diligently declareth unto us the ascension of Christ, whereby hee conveyed away the presence of his body from our sight and conversation: to shake away from us all carnall thinking of him, so oft as it maketh mention of him, commandeth us to be in mindes raised upward, and to seeke him in heaven sitting at the right hand of the father. According to this rule he was rather to be spiritually worshipped

ped in heavenly glory, than this so perillous a kind of worshipping to be devised, full of carnall and grosse opinion of God. Wherefore they that have invented the worshipping of the Sacrament, have not only dreamed it of themselves beside the Scripture, in which no mention of it can bee shewed (which yet should not have beene overpassed if it had beene acceptable to God:) But also all the Scripture crying out against it, they have framed to themselves a God after the will of their owne lust, leaving the living God. For what is Idolatry, if this be not, to worship the gifts instead of the giver himselfe? Wherein they have doubly offended: For both the honor taken from God was conveighed to a creature: and hee himselfe also dishonored in the defiling and prophaning of his benefit, when of his holy Sacrament is made a cursed idole. But let us contrariwise least wee fall into the same pit, throughly settle our eares, eyes, hearts, mindes, and tongues in the holy doctrine of God. For that is the schoole of the holy Ghost, the best Schoole-master, in which such profit is attained, that nothing neede more to be gotten from any where else, but we willingly ought to be ignorant of whatsoever is not taught in it.

Christ in the Sacrament offered and given by promise unto them not which behold and adore, but which eat and give thanks: this Sacrament being instituted for the participation of Christ by faith and the profession of our gratefull remembrance as two speciall uses.

37 But now (as superstition, when it hath once passed the right bounds, maketh no end of sinning) they tell a great way further. For they have devised Ceremonies altogether strange from the institution of the Supper, to this end only that they might give divine honours to the signe. Wee yeeld (say they) this worship to Christ. First, if this were done in the Supper, I would say that that worshipping onely is lawfull, which resteth not in the signe, but is directed to Christ sitting in heaven. But now by what pretense doe they boast that they worship Christ in that bread: when they have no promise thereof? They consecrate an host, as they call it, which they may carry about in pompe, which they may shew forth in a common gazing to bee looked upon, worshipped, and called upon. I aske by what power they thinke it to bee rightly consecrate. Verily they will bring foorth those words, This is my body. But I will object to the contrary, that it was therewithall said, Take and eat. Neither will I doe that of nothing. For when a promise is knit to a commandement, I say that the promise is so contained under the commandement, that being severed it is made no promise at all. This shall be made plainer by a like example. God gave a commandement, when hee said, Call upon me: Hee added a promise, I will heare thee. If any man calling upon Peter and Paul, doe glory upon this promise, will not all men crye out that he doth wrongfully? And what other thing I pray, doe they which leaving the commandement concerning eating, doe catch hold of a maimed promise, this is my body, to abuse it to strange Ceremonies from the institution of Christ? Let us therefore remember that this promise is given to them which keepe the commandement joyned with it: but that they be destitute of all the word, which remove the Sacrament to any other way. We have heretofore entreated how the mystery of the holy Supper serveth our Faith before God. But for as much as the Lord doth here not onely bring into our remembrance so great largenes of his bounty, as we have before shewed, but doth as it were from hand to hand bring it foorth, and stirreth us to acknowledge it: he doth therewithall warne us that wee bee not unthankefull to so plentifull liberalitie: but rather that wee would publish it with such praises as it is meet, and advance it with thanksgiving. Therefore when hee delivered the institution of the Sacrament it selfe to the Apostles, hee taught them, that they should doe it in remembrance of him. Which Paul expoundeth, to declare the Lords death. That is, publikely and altogether with one mouth openly to confesse, that all our affiance of life and salvation is reposed in the death of the Lord: that wee may glorifie him with our confession, and may by our example exhort others to give glory to him. Here againe it appeareth wherennto the marke of this Sacrament is directed, namely to exercise us in the remembrance of the death of Christ. For, this that wee are commanded to declare the Lords death till he come to judge, is nothing else but that wee should publish that with confession of mouth, which our faith hath acknowledged in the Sacrament, that is, that the death of Christ is our life. This is the second use of the Sacrament, which pertaineth to outward confession.

Luk. 22.19.
1 Cor. 11.26.

38 Thirdly, the Lord also willed it to be to us instead of an exhortation, than which which none other can more vehemently encourage and enflame us both to pureneſſe and holineſſe of life, and alſo to charity, peace and agreement. For the Lord doth therein ſo communicate his body to us, that hee is made throughly one with us, and we with him. Now ſith hee hath but one body, whereof hee maketh us all partakers, it is neceſſary that all wee alſo bee by ſuch partaking made one body. Which unity the bread which is delivered in the Sacaament, repreſenteth : which as it is made of many graines in ſuch ſort mingled together that one cannot bee diſcerned from another : after the ſame manner wee alſo ought to bee conjoyned and knit together with ſo great agreement of minds, that no diſagreement or diviſion come betweene us. This I had rather to be expreſſed with Pauls words. The cup of bleſſing (ſaith he) which we bleſſe is the communicating of the bloud of Chriſt : and the bread of bleſſing which wee breake, is the partaking of the body of Chriſt, therefore wee all are one body that partake of one bread. Wee ſhall have very well profited in the Sacrament, if this thought ſo ſhall be imprinted and ingraven in our minds, that none of the brethren can bee hurt, deſpiſed, refuſed, abuſed, or any wiſe bee offended of us, but that therewithall we doe in ſo doing hurt, deſpiſe, and abuſe Chriſt with our injurious dealings : that we cannot diſagree with our brethren but that we muſt therewithall diſagree with Chriſt : that Chriſt cannot bee loved of us, but that hee muſt be loved in our brethren : that what care we have of our own body, ſuch alſo we ought to have of our brethren which are members of our body : as no part of our body is touched with any feeling of grieſe, which is not ſpread abroad into all the other parts, ſo wee muſt not ſuffer our brother to bee grieved with any evill whereof we ſhould not alſo be touched with compaſſion. Therefore Auguſtine not without cauſe ſo oft calleth this Sacrament that bond of charity. For what ſharper ſpur could be put to us, to ſtir up mutuall charitie among us, than when Chriſt giving himſelfe to us, doth not only allure us with his owne example, that we ſhould mutually dedicate and deliver our ſelves one to another: but in ſo much as hee maketh himſelfe common to all, hee maketh all us alſo one in himſelfe?

A third uſe of the Sacrament in ſtirring up unto unity and love.

1 Cor. 10. 16.

39 But hereby is that very well confirmed which I have ſaid in another place, that the true miniſtration of the Sacrament ſtandeth not without the word. For whatſoever profit commeth to us of the Supper, requireth the word : whether we be to be confirmed in faith, or to be exerciſed in confeſſion, or to be ſtirred up to duty, prayer is needfull. Therefore nothing can be more diſorderly done in the Supper, than if it be turned to a dumbe action : it hath been done under the tyrannie of the Pope. For they would have the whole force of conſecration to hang upon the intent of the Prieſt, as though this nothing pertained to the people, to whom it moſt of all behooved that the myſtery ſhould be declared. But thereupon hath growne this error, that they marked not that thoſe promiſes wherewith the conſecration is made, are directed not to the elements themſelves, but to them that receive them. Bnt Chriſt ſpeaketh not to the bread, that it may be made his body, but commandeth his Diſciples to eat, and promiſeth to them the communicating of his body and bloud. And none other order doth Paul teach than that together with the bread and the cup, the promiſes ſhould be offered to the faithfull. Thus it is truly. Wee ought not to imagine any magicall inchantment, that it bee ſufficient to have mumbled up the words, as though the elements did heare them : but let us underſtand that thoſe words are a lively preaching, which may edifie the hearers, which may inwardly pearce into their minds, which may be imprinted and ſetled in their hearts, which may ſhew forth effectualneſſe in the fulfilling of that which it promiſeth : by theſe reaſons it cleerly appeareth that the laying up of the Sacrament, which many doe earneſtly require, that it may be extraordinarily diſtributed to the ſicke, is unprofitable : For either they ſhall receive it without rehearſing of the inſtitution of Chriſt, or the miniſter ſhall together with the ſigne joyne the true declaration of the myſtery. In ſilence is abuſe and fault. If the promiſes be rehearſed, and the myſtery declared, that they which ſhall receive it may receive it with fruit, there is no cauſe why we ſhould doubt that this is the true conſecration. To what end then will that other conſecration come, the force whereof commeth not ſo far as to the ſicke men? But they that doe ſo, have the example of the old Church. I grant: but in so great a matter, and in which we erre not without great danger, nothing is safer than to follow the truth it selfe.

The danger of unworthily receiving this Sacrament.

40 Now as wee see that this holy bread of the Supper of the Lord is spirituall meat, no lesse sweet and delicate than healthfull to the godly worshippers of God, by the taste whereof they feele that Christ is their life, whom it raiseth up to thanksgiving, to whom it is an exhortation to mutuall charity among themselves: so on the other side it is turned into a most noisome poison to all them whose faith it doth not nourish and confirme, and whom it doth not stir up to confession of praise and to charity. For as bodily meat, when it findeth a stomacke possessed with evill humors, being it selfe also thereby made evill and corrupted doth rather hurt than nourish: so this spirituall meat, if it light upon a soule defiled with malice and naughtinesse, throweth it downe headlong with greater fall: verily not by the fault of the meat it selfe, but becawse to defiled and unbeleeving men nothing is cleane, though otherwise it bee never so much sanctified by the blessing of the Lord. For (as Paul saith) they that eat and drinke unworthily are guilty of the body and bloud of the Lord, and doe eat and drinke judgement to themselves, not discerning the body of the Lord. For such kinde of men as without any sparkle of Faith, without any zeale of charitie, doe thrust themselves forth like swine to take the Supper of the Lord, doe not discerne the body of the Lord. For in so much as they doe not beleeve that that body is their life, they doe as much as in them lyeth dishonour it, spoiling it of all the dignity thereof, and finally in so receiving it they prophane and defile it. But in so much as being estranged and disagreeing from their brethren, they dare mingle the holy signe of the body of Christ with their disagreements, it is no thanke to them that the body of Christ is not rent in sunder, and limbe meale torne in pieces. And so not unworthily they are guilty of the body and bloud of the Lord, which they doe with ungodlinesse full of sacriledge so fowly defile. Therefore by this unworthy eating, they take to themselves damnation. For whereas they have no faith reposed in Christ, yet receiving the Sacrament they professe that there is salvation for them no where elsse than in him, and doe forsweare all other affiance. Wherefore they themselves are accusers to themselves, they themselves pronounce witnesse against themselves, and they themselves seale their owne damnation. Againe when they beeing with hatred and evill will divided and drawn in sunder from their brethren, that is from the members of Christ have no part in Christ: yet they doe testifie that this is the onely salvation to communicate with Christ, and to bee made one with him. For this cause Paul commandeth, that a man prove himselfe, before that hee eat of this bread or drinke of this cup. Whereby (as I expound it) he meant that every man should descend into himselfe, and weigh with himselfe, whether he doe with inward affiance of heart rest upon the salvation which Christ hath purchased: whether hee acknowledge it with confession of mouth: then whether hee doe with desirous endevour of innocencie and holinesse aspire to the following of Christ: whether after his example hee be ready to give himselfe to his brethren, and to communicate himselfe to them with whom hee hath Christ common to him: whether, as hee himselfe is accompted of Christ, he doe likewise on his behalfe take all his brethren for members of his owne body: whether he covet to cherish, defend and helpe them as his owne members. Not for that these duties both of faith and charitie can now be perfect in us: but becawse we ought to endevour this, and with all our desires to long toward it, that we may daily more and more encrease our faith begun.

Tit. 1. 15.
2 Cor. 11. 29.

1 Cor. 11. 21.

Consciences tormented by that worthinesse of receiving which is taught in the church of Rome.

41 Commonly when they goe about to prepare men to such worthinesse of eating, they have in cruell wise tormented and vexed poore consciences: and yet they brought never a whit of all those things that might serve to the purpose. They said that those did eat worthily which were in state of grace. To bee in state of grace they expounded to bee pure and clensed from all sinne. By which doctrine all the men that ever have at any time beene, or now bee in earth, were debarred from the use of this Sacrament. For if we goe about this, to fetch our worthinesse from our selves, wee are utterly undone: only despaire and damnable ruine abideth for us. Though we endevour with our whole strengths, we shall nothing more prevaile, but that then at last wee shall be most unworthy, when we have most of all travelled about seeking of worthinesse. To salve this sore, they have devised a way to attaine worthinesse: that, as much as in us lyeth, making examination, and requiring of our selves accompt of all our doings, wee should with contrition, confession, and satisfaction cleanse our unworthinesse, which way of cleansing, what manner of thing it is, we have already shewed there where was more convenient place to speake of it. So much as serveth for our present purpose, I say that these be two hungry and vanishing comforts, too dismayed and discouraged consciences, and such as are stricken with horror of their sinne. For if the Lord by speciall forbidding admitteth none to the partaking of the Supper but the righteous and innocent: there needeth no small heed that may make a man assured of his owne righteousnesse which he heareth to be required of God. But whereby is this assurednesse confirmed unto us, that they are discharged afore God, which have done so much as in them lay? But although it were so, yet when shall it be that a man may be bold to assure himselfe that he hath done as much as in him lay? So when there is made no certaine assurance of our worthinesse, the entry shall alway remaine shut by that horrible forbidding, whereby is pronounced that they eat and drinke judgement to themselves, which eat and drinke unworthily.

The medicinable vertue of this Sacrament unto men weakened with the consciences of their owne unworthinesse.

42 Now it is easie to judge what manner of doctrine this is which raigneth in the Papacy, and from what Authour it hath proceeded, which with the outragious rigor therof, bereaveth and spoyleth, miserable sinners and such as bee tormented with feare and sorrow, of the comfort of this Sacrament in which yet all the sweet delicates of the Gospell were set before them. Surely the devill cou'd by no readier way destroy men, than by so making them senseless, that they could not perceive the taste and savor of such food, wherewith it was the will of the most good heavenly Father to feed them. Least therefore wee run into such headlong downe-fall, let us remember that this holy banket is medicine to the sicke, comfort to sinners, liberall gift to the poore: which bring no profit to the healthy, righteous, and rich, if any such could be found. For whereas in it Christ is given us for meat: wee understand that without him we pine, starve, and faint, like as famine destroyeth the lively strength of the body: Againe, whereas hee is given us for life: wee understand that without him wee are in our selves utterly dead. Wherefore this is the worthinesse both the onely and best that wee can bring to God, if wee offer to him our owne vilenesse and (as I may so call it) unworthinesse, that of his mercy hee may make us worthy of him: if wee despaire in our selves, that wee may bee comforted in him: if wee humble our selves, that wee may bee raised up of him: if wee accuse our selves, that wee may be justified of him: moreover if wee aspire to that unitie which he commendeth to us in his Supper: and as hee maketh us all one in himselfe, so if we wish to us all altogether one soule, one heart, one tongue. If we have these things throughly well weighed and considered, such thoughts although they shake us yet shall never overthrow us. As how should we being needy and naked of all good things, we defiled with filthinesse of sinnes, we halfe dead, eat the body of the Lord worthily? We will rather thinke that wee being poore come to the liberall giver, we sicke to the Phisition, we sinners to the authour of righteousnesse, finally, wee dead men to him that giveth life: that that worthinesse which is commanded of God, consisteth chiefely of Faith, which reposeth all things in Christ and nothing in us: and next of charitie, and the selfe same charitie which it is enough to offer unperfect to God, that hee may increase it to better, forasmuch as it cannot be given perfect. Some other agreeing with us in this, that the worthinesse it selfe consisteth in Faith and Charity: yet in the measure of worthinesse have gone farre out of the way, requiring a perfection of Faith, whereunto nothing may be added, and a charity equall with that which Christ hath shewed toward us. But hereby they doe none otherwise than those other before, drive all men away from comming to this holy Supper. For if their sentence should take place, no man should receive but unworthily, for as much as all without exception should be holden guilty and convict of their unperfectnesse. And truly it were a point of too much amazed dulnesse, I will not say foolishnesse, to require such perfection in the Sacrament, as may make the Sacrament voide and superfluous: which was not ordained for the perfect, but for the weake and feeble to a wtake, to ſtir up, to pricke forward and exerciſe the affection of Faith and Charity, and to correct the default of either of them.

The liberty granted unto men and their wanton folly ſhewed in ceremonies annexed to the adminiſtration of this Sacrament.

43 But ſo much as concerneth the outward forme of doing, whether faithfull receive it in their hand or no, whether they divide it, or every one eat that which is given him: whether they put againe the cup in the hand of the Deacon, or deliver it to the next: whether the bread be leavened, or unleavened: whether the wine be red or white: it maketh no matter. Theſe things be indifferent and left in the liberty of the Church. Howbeit it is certaine, that the uſage of the old Church was, that evey one ſhould take it into his hand. And Chriſt ſaid, Divide it among you. The Hiſtories report that it was leavened and common bread before the time of Alexander Biſhop of Rome, which firſt delighted in unleavened bread: But for what reaſon I ſee not, unleſſe it were with a new ſight to draw the eyes of the common people to wondering at it, rather than to inſtruct their minds with good religion. I adjure all them that are touched with any thought but light zeale of godlineſſe, to tell whether they doe not evidently ſee, both how much more brightly the glory of God ſhineth herein, and how much more aboundant ſweetneſſe of ſpirituall comfort commeth to the faithfull, than in theſe cold and player-like trifles, which bring none other uſe but to deceive the ſenſe of the amazed people. This they call the holding of the people in religion, when being made fooliſh and ſenſeleſſe with ſuperſtition it is drawne whether they liſt. If any man will defend ſuch inventions by antiquity, I my ſelfe alſo am not ignorant how ancient is the uſe of chriſme, and blowing in Baptiſme: How nigh to the age of the Apoſtles the Supper of the Lord was infected with ruſtineſſe: but this verily is the waywardneſſe of mans boldneſſe, which cannot with hold it ſelfe but that it muſt alway play and be wanton in the myſteries of God. But let us remember that God doth ſo highly eſteeme the obedience of his word, that hee willeth us in it to judge both his Angels and the whole world. Now, bidding fare well to ſo great a heape of ceremonies: it might thus have been moſt comelily miniſtred, if it were oft and at leſt every weeke ſet before the church but that firſt they ſhould begin with publike prayers: then a ſermon ſhould bee made; then the miniſter having bread and wine ſet upon the boord, ſhould rehearſe the inſtitution of the Supper: and then ſhould declare the promiſes that are in it left unto us? and therewithall ſhould excommunicate all them that by the Lords forbidding are debarred from it, afterward they ſhould pray that with what liberality the Lord hath given us this holy foode, hee would inſtruct and frame us alſo with the ſame faith, and thankfulneſſe of minde to receive it, and that foraſmuch as we are not of our ſelves, he would of his mercy make us worthy of ſuch a banket: that then either Pſalmes ſhould be ſung, or ſomewhat read, and the faithfull ſhould in ſeemely order communicate of the holy banket, the Miniſters breaking the bread and giving it to the people: that when the Supper is ended, exhortation ſhould be made to pure faith and confeſſion of faith, to charity, and to manners meete for Chriſtians: laſt of all that giving of thanks ſhould be rehearſed, and praiſes be ſong to God: which being ended the congregation ſhould be let goe in peace.

The oft receiving of this Sacrament.

44 Theſe things that wee have hitherto ſpoken of this Sacrament, doe largely ſhew, that it was not therefore ordayned, that it ſhould be received yeerely once, and that ſlightly for manners ſake (as now commonly the cuſtome is) but that it ſhould bee in often uſe to all Chriſtians that with often remembrance they ſhould repeate the paſſion of Chriſt: by which remembrance they might ſuſtaine and ſtrengthen their faith, and exhort themſelves to ſing confeſſion of praiſe to God, and to publiſh his goodneſſe: finally by which they might nouriſh mutuall charity, and teſtifie it among themſelves, whereof they ſaw the knot in the unitie of the body of Chriſt. For ſo oft as wee communicate of the ſigne of the body of the Lord, wee doe as by a token given and received, interchangeably binde our ſelves one to another unto all duties of love, that none of us doe any thing whereby hee may offend his brother, nor leave any thing undone whereby hee may helpe him, when need requireth and ability ſufficeth. That ſuch was the uſe of the Apoſtolike Church, Luke rehearſeth in the Acts, when hee ſaith that the faithfull were continuing in the doctrine of the Apoſtles, in communicating, in breaking of bread, and in prayers. So was it altogether meete

Act. 2. 42.

to be done, that there should bee no assemblie of the Church without the word, prayers, partaking of the Supper and almes. That this order was also institute among the Corinthians wee may also sufficiently gather of Paul, and it is certaine that in many ages afterward it was in use. For thereupon came those old Canons, which they father upon Anacletus and Calixtus, that when the consecration is done, all should communicate, that will not bee without the doores of the Church. And it is read in those old Canons, which they call the Canons of the Apostles: that they which continue not unto the end, and doe not receive the holie Communion, must be corrected as men that move unquietnesse to the Church. Also in the Councell at Antioch, it was decreed that they which enter into the Church, and heare the Scriptures, and doe abstaine from the Communion, should bee removed from the Church, till they have amended this fault. Which although in the first Councell at Toletum it was either somewhat qualified, or at least set forth in milder words, yet is there also decreed, that they, which when they have heard the Sermon, are found never to communicate, should be warned: if after warning they abstaine, they should be debarred from it.

45 Verily by these ordinances the holie men meant to retaine and maintaine the often use of the Communion, which often use they had received from the Apostles themselves, which they saw to bee most wholsome for the faithfull, and by little and little by the negligence of the common people to grow out of use, Augustine testifieth of his owne time: The Sacrament (saith he) of this thing, of the unitie of the Lords body, is somewhere daily, somewhere by certaine distances of the daies, prepared unto the Lords table, and is there received at the table, to some unto life, to other some unto destruction. And in the first Epistle to Januarius: some doe daily communicate of the body and bloud of the Lord: some receive it at certaine daies: in some places there is no day let passe wherein it is not offered: in some other places onely upon the Saturday and the Sunday, and in some other places never but on the Sunday. But forasmuch as the common people was (as wee have said) somewhat slack, the holie men did call earnestly upon them with sharp rebukings, least they should seeme to winke at such slothfulnesse. Such an example is in Chrysostome upon the Epistle to the Ephesians. It is not said unto him that dishonoured the banket: wherefore didst thou sit downe? but wherefore diddest thou come in? Whosoever is not partaker of the mysteries, hee is wicked and shameless for that hee standeth here present. I beseech you if any be called to a banket, washeth his hands, sitteth downe, seemeth to prepare himselfe to eat, and then doth taste of nothing: shall hee not shame both the banket, and the maker of the banket? So thou standing among them that with prayer doe prepare themselves to receive the holie meat, hast even in this that thou hast not gone away, confessed that thou are one of the number of them, at the last thou doest not partake: had it not been better that thou hadst not beene present? Thou wilt say, I am unworthy. Therefore neither wast thou worthy of the communion of prayer, which is a preparing to the receiving of the holy mysterie.

The first beginnings of slacknes to communicate.

In 6 cap. Johan. tract. 26.

In cap. 1. Hom. 16. 11.

46 And truly this custome, which commandeth to communicate yeerely once, is a most certaine invention of the divell, by whose ministerie soever it was brought in. They say that Zepherinus was authour of that decree, which it is not likely to have beene such as wee now have it. For hee by his ordinance did peradventure not after the worst manner provide for the Church, as the times then were. For it is no doubt but that then the holy Supper was set before the faithfull so oft as they came together in assemblie, neither is it any doubt but that a good part of them did communicate. But when it scarcely at any time happened that all did communicate together, and whereas it was necessarie that they which were mingled with prophane men and idolaters, should by some outward signe testifie their faith: the holy man for order and policies sake, appointed that day, wherein the whole people of Christians should by partaking of the Lords Supper utter a confession of their faith. The ordinance of Zepherinus being otherwise good hath beene evill wrested of them that came after, when a certaine law was made of one communicating yeerely: whereby it is come to passe, that almost all men when they have once communicate, as though they had gaily discharged themselves for all the rest of the yeere, sleepe soundly on both eares.

The custome of yeerely once receiving, perverse.

It ought to have beene farre otherwise done. Every weeke at the leſt, the Lords table ſhould bee ſet before the aſſemblie of the Chriſtians : the promiſes ſhould be declared, which might feed us ſpiritually at it : none ſhould indeed be compelled by neceſſitie, but all ſhould bee exhorted and pricked forward : the ſluggiſhneſſe alſo of the ſlothfull ſhould be rebuked. All ſhould by heapes, as hungrie men, come together to ſuch dainties. Not without rightfull cauſe therefore at the beginning I complained, that by the craft of the divell this cuſtome was thruſt in, which when it appointeth one certaine day of the yeere, maketh men ſlothfull for all the reſt of the yeere. We ſee indeed that this perverſe abuſe was crept in even in the time of Chryſoſtome: but wee may alſo therewithall ſee how much it diſpleaſed him. For hee complaineth with grievous words in the ſame place which I even now alleadged, that there is ſo great inequalitie of this matter, that often in ſome times of the yeere they came not even when they were cleane, but at Eaſter they came even when they were uncleane. Then he cryeth out : O cuſtome, O preſumption. Then in vaine is the daily offring uſed : in vaine we ſtand at the Altar : there is none that partaketh together with us. So farre is it off that he allowed it by his authoritie adjoyned to it.

An ordinance to take away halfe this Sacrament from the people.

47 Out of the ſame ſhop proceeded alſo another ordinance, which hath ſtolen away or violently taken away the halfe of the Supper from the better number of the people of God, namely the ſigne of the bloud, which being denyed to lay and profane men (for with ſuch titles forſooth they ſet out Gods inheritance) became a peculiar poſſeſſion to ſhaven and annointed men. It is the commandement of the eternall God, that all ſhould drinke : which commandement man dare diſcontinue and repell with a new and contrary law, commanding that not all ſhould drinke. And that theſe lawmakers ſhould not ſeeme to fight without reaſon againſt their God, they pretend perils that might happen if this holie cup were commonly given to all : as though thoſe dangers had not beene foreſeene and marked of the eternall wiſedome of God. And then ſubtlely forſooth they reaſon, that the one is enough for both. For if (ſay they) it be the body, it is whole Chriſt, which cannot now be ſevered from his body. Therefore by accompanying the bodie containeth the bloud. Loe how our wit agreeth with God, when it hath never ſo little begun with looſe raines to be wanton and wilde. The Lord ſhewing bread ſaith that it is his body : when he ſheweth the cup, hee calleth it his bloud. The boldneſſe of mans reaſon cryeth out contrariwiſe, that the bread is the bloud, and the wine is the body : as though the Lord had for no cauſe ſevered his body from his bloud both in words and in ſignes : or as though it had ever been heard ſpoken that the body or bloud of Chriſt is called God and Man. Verily if hee had meant to ſignifie whole himſelfe, hee might have ſaid it is I : as he is wont to ſpeake in the Scriptures, and not, this is my body, this is my bloud. But hee willing to help our weakeneſſe, did ſet the cup ſeverally from the bread, to teach that he ſufficeth no leſſe for drinke than for meat. Now let one part be taken away, then we ſhall finde but the one halfe of the nouriſhments in him. Therefore, although it be true which they pretend, that the bloud is in the bread by way of accompanying, and againe, the body in the cup, yet they defraud godly ſoules of the confirmation of Faith which Chriſt delivereth us as neceſſary. Therefore bidding their ſubtleties farewell, we muſt hold faſt the profit which is by the ordinance of Chriſt in the two earneſts.

Cavillous allegations for defenſe of the halfe communion.

48 I know indeed that the miniſters of Satan doe here cavill, as it is an ordinarie thing with them to make mockery of the Scriptures. Firſt they alleadge that of one bare doing ought not to bee gathered a rule whereby the Church ſhould be bound to perpetuall obſerving. But they lye when they ſay that it was but a bare doing : for Chriſt did not onely deliver the cup, but alſo did inſtitute that his Apoſtles ſhould in time to come doe the ſame. For they are the words of a commander, Drinke ye all of this cup. And Paul ſo rehearſeth that it was a deede, that he alſo commendeth it for a certaine rule. Another ſtarting hole is, that the Apoſtles alone were received of Chriſt to the partaking of this Supper whom hee had already choſen and taken into the order of the ſacrificing Prieſts. But I would have them anſwere me to five queſtions, from which they ſhall not bee able to eſcape, but that they ſhall be eaſily convinced with their lyes. Firſt, by what oracle have they this ſolution revealed, being ſo ſtrange from the word of God? The Scripture reckoneth twelve that sate with Jesus: but it doth not so obscure the dignitie of Christ that it calleth them sacrificing Priests, of which name we will speake hereafter in place fit for it. Though he gave it then to the twelve, yet hee commanded that they should doe the same, namely, that they should so distribute it among them. Secondly, why in that better age, from the Apostles almost a thousand yeeres, were all without exception made partakers of both the signes? was the old Church ignorant what guests Christ had received to the Supper? It were a point of most desperate shamelessnesse, here to sticke and dally in graunting it to be true. There remaine the Ecclesiasticall histories, there remaine the bookes of the old writers, which minister evident testimonies of this matter. The flesh (saith Tertullian) is fed with the body and bloud of Christ, that the soule may be fatted with feeding upon God. How (said Ambrose to Theodosius) wilt thou receive with such hands the holie body of the Lord? With what boldnesse wilt thou with thy mouth partake of the cup of the precious bloud? And Hierome saith. The Priests which make the Thanksgiving, and doe distribute the bloud of the Lord to the people. Chrysostome, Not as in the old law the Priest did eat part, and the people part: but one body is set before all, and one cup. Those things that pertaine to the Thanksgiving are all common betweene the Priest and the people. The selfe same thing doth Augustine testifie in many places.

Lib de resurrect. carnis. Theod lib. 3. ca. 8. Eucharistia. Hier. in 2. Mal. Chrys. in 2. Cor. Cap. 8. Eucharistia.

49 But why dispute I about a thing most knowne? Let all the Greeke and Latine writers bee read over: such testimonies shall each where offer themselves. Neither was this custome growne out of use, while there remained one drop of pureneſse in the Church. Gregory, whom you may rightly say to have beene the last Bishop of Rome, teacheth, that it was kept in his time. What is the bloud of the Lambe, yee have now learned, not by hearing, but by drinking. His bloud is poured into the mouthes of the faithfull. Yea it yet endured foure hundred yeeres after his death, when all things were growne out of kinde. For neither was that taken onely for an usage, but also for an inviolable law. For then was in force the reverence of Gods institution, & they doubted not that it was sacriledge, to sever those things which the Lord had conjoyned. For thus saith Gelasius. We have found, that some receiving onely the portion of the holy body, doe abstaine from the cup. Let them without doubt, because they seeme to be bound with I wot not what superstition, either receive the Sacraments whole, or be debarred from them whole. For the dividing of this mysterie is not committed without great sacriledge. Those reasons of Cyprian were heard, which truly ought to move a Christian minde. How (saith he) doe we teach or provoke them to shed their bloud in the confessing of Christ, if we denie his bloud to them that shall fight? Or how doe wee make them fit for the cup of Martyrdome: if we doe not first in the Church by the right of communion admit them to drinke the cup of the Lord? Whereas the Canonists doe restraine that decree of Gelasius to the Priests, that is so childish a cavill that it neede not to be confuted.

The custome of ministring the cup to the people not abrogated as long as there continued any drop of pureneſse in the Church.

De consecr. dist. 2. cap. comper.

Ser. 5. de lap.

50 Thirdly, why did hee simply say of the bread, that they should eat: but of the cup, that they should all drinke? even as if hee had meant of set purpose to meete with the craft of Satan. Fourthly, if (as they would have it) the Lord vouchsafed to admit to his Supper onely sacrificing Priests, what man ever durst call to the partaking of it, strangers whom the Lord had excluded? yea and to bee partaking of that gift, the power whereof was not in their hands, without any commandement of him which onely could give it. Yea upon confidence of what warrant doe they use at this day to distribute to the common people the signe of the body of Christ, if they have neither commandement nor example of the Lord? Fiftly, did Paul lye, when he said to the Corinthians, that he had received of the Lord that which hee had delivered to them? For afterward hee declareth the thing that hee delivered, that all without difference should communicate of both the signes. If Paul received of the Lord, that all should bee admitted without difference: let them looke of whom they have received which doe drive away almost all the people of God: because they cannot now pretend God to bee the Authour of it, with whom there is not yea and nay. And yet still for cloking of such abhominations they dare pretend the name of the Church, and with such ſuch pretence defend it. As though either theſe Antichriſts were the Church, which ſo eaſily tread under foote, ſcatter abroad, and deſtroy the doctrine and inſtitution of Chriſt: or the Apoſtolike Church were not the Church, in which the whole force of religion flouriſhed.

Three other reasons why the people should communicate in both kindes.

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of the Popiſh Maſſe, by which ſacriledge the Supper of Chriſt hath not onely beene prophaned, but alſo brought to nought.

The ſacrifice of the Maſſe being held to be a ſacrifice propitiatorie, is nothing but a meere prophanation of the Supper of the Lord.

WIth theſe and like inventions Satan hath travelled, as by overſpreading of darkeneſſe to obſcure and defile the holy Supper of Chriſt, that at leaſt the pureneſſe of it ſhould not be kept ſtill in the Church. But the head of horrible abhomination was when hee advanced a ſigne, by which it might not onely be darkened and perverted, but being utterly blotted and aboliſhed ſhould vaniſh and fall out of the remembrance of men: namely when he blinded almoſt the whole world with a moſt peſtilent errour that they ſhould beleeve that the Maſſe is a ſacrifice and oblation to obtaine the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes. How at the beginning the ſounder ſort of the ſchoolemen tooke this doctrine, I nothing regard: farewell they with their crabbed ſubtleties: which howſoever they may be defended with cavilling, yet are therefore to bee refuſed of all good men, becauſe they doe nothing elſe but ſpread much darkeneſſe over the brightneſſe of the Supper. Therefore bidding them farewell, let the readers underſtand that I here match in fight with that opinion, wherewith the Romiſh Antichriſt and his Prophets have infected the whole world, namely that the Maſſe is a worke whereby the ſacrificing Prieſt which offereth up Chriſt, and the other that doe partake at the ſame oblation, doe deſerve the favour of God: or that it is a cleanſing ſacrifice, whereby they reconcile God to themſelves. Neither hath this beene received onely in common opinion of the people, but the very doing it ſelfe is ſo framed, that it is a kind of pacifying wherewith ſatisfaction is made to God for the purging of the quick and dead. The words alſo which they uſe, doe expreſſe the ſame: and no other thing may we gather of the daily uſe of it. I know how deepe rootes this peſtilence hath taken, under how great ſeeming of goodnes it lurketh, how it beareth in ſhew the name of Chriſt, how in the one name of Maſſe many beleeve that they comprehend the whole ſumme of faith. But when it ſhall be by the word of God moſt cleerely proved, that this Maſſe, how much ſoever it muſt be coloured and glorious, yet ſhamefully diſhonoreth Chriſt, burieth and oppreſſeth his croſſe, putteth his death in forgetfulneſſe, taketh away the fruit that commeth thereof unto us, doth weaken and deſtroy the Sacrament wherein was left the memorie of his death: ſhall there then bee any ſo deepe rootes, which this moſt ſtrong axe, I meane the word of God, ſhall not cut downe and overthrow? Is there any face ſo beautifull, that this light cannot bewray the evill which lurketh under it?

Chriſt diſhonored by the ſacrifice of the Maſſe.

Heb. 5. 5. & 7. 17. & 9. 11. & 21.

Pſal. 110. 14.

Geneſ. 14. 18.

2 Let us therefore ſhew that which hath beene ſet in the firſt place, that in it is intolerable blaſphemie and diſhonour done to Chriſt. For he was conſecrate of his Father a Prieſt and biſhop, not for a time as we read that they were ordained in the old teſtament, whoſe life being mortall their Prieſthood alſo could not bee immortall: for which cauſe alſo there needed ſucceſſours that ſhould from time to time bee put in the place of them that died. But in place of Chriſt, which is immortall, there needeth no vicar to be ſet after him. Therefore he was ordained of the Father a Prieſt for ever, according to the order of Melchiſedech, that he ſhould execute an everlaſting Prieſthood. This myſtery had beene long before figured in Melchiſedech, whom when the Scripture had once brought in for the Prieſt of the living God, it never afterward made mention of him, as though he had had no end of his life. After this point of likeneſſe, Chriſt was called a Prieſt according to his order. Now they that doe daily ſacrifice, muſt needs appoint Prieſts to make the oblations whom they muſt appoint as it were ſucceſſours and vicars in ſtead of Chriſt. By which putting in ſtead of him, they doe not onely ſpoile Chriſt of his honour, and plucke from him the prerogative of eternall Prieſthood, but alſo travell to thruſt him downe from the right hand of his Father, on which hee cannot ſit immortall, but that hee muſt therewithall remaine the eternall Prieſt.

Neither

Neither let them say for themselves that their pettie sacrificers are not put in place of Christ as if he were dead, but onely are helpers of his eternall Priesthood, which ceaseth not therefore to continue. For they are more strongly holden fast with the words of the Apostle, than that they may so escape: namely, that there were many other Priests made, because they were by death letted to continue. Therefore there is but one that is not letted by death, and he needeth no companions. Yet, such is their frowardnesse, they arme themselves with the example of Melchisedech to defend their wickednesse. For, because it is said that hee offered bread and wine, they gather that he was a foreshewing of their Masse: as though the likenesse betweene him and Christ were in the offering of bread and wine. Which is so emptie and trifling that it needeth no confutation. Melchisedech gave bread and wine to Abraham and his companions, to refresh them being wearie after their journey and battle. What is this to a sacrifice? Moses praiseth the gentlenesse of the holy King: these fellowes unseasonably coyne a mysterie whereof no mention is made. Yet they deceitfully paint their errour with another colour, because it followeth by and by after. And he was the priest of the highest God. I answer, that they wrongfully draw to the bread and wine that which the Apostle referreth to the blessing. Therefore when hee was the Priest of God hee blessed Abraham. Whereupon the same Apostle (than whom wee need to seeke no better expositor) gathereth his excellencie, because the lesser is blessed of the greater. But if the oblation of Melchisedech were a figure of the sacrifice of the Masse, would the Apostle, I pray you, which searcheth out all eveu the least things, have forgotten so earnest and weighty a thing? Now (howsoever they trifle) they shall in vaine goe about to overthrow the reason which the Apostle himselfe bringeth, that the right and honour of sacrificing Priesthood ceaseth among mortall men, because Christ which is immortall, is the onely and perpetuall sacrificing Priest.

Heb. 7. 13.

Heb. 7. 7.

3 Another vertue of the Masse was, that it oppresseth and burieth the crosse and passion of Christ. This verily is most certaine, that the Crosse of Christ is overthrowen so soone as the Altar is set up. For if hee offered himselfe for a sacrifice upon the Crosse, that hee might sanctifie us for ever, and purchase to us eternall redemption: undoubtedly the force and effectualnes of that sacrifice continueth without any end. Otherwise wee should thinke nothing more honourably of Christ, than of oxen and calves which were sacrificed under the law: the offerings whereof are proved uneffectuall and weake by this that they were oft renued. Wherefore either we must confesse, that the sacrifice of Christ, which hee fulfilled upon the Crosse, wanted the force of eternall cleansing, or that Christ hath made an end of all with one sacrifice once for ever. This is it that the Apostle saith, that this chiefe Bishop Christ once appeared by offering up of himselfe before the ending of the world, to the driving away of sinne. Againe, that we are sanctified by the will of God, by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once. Againe, That Christ with one oblation for ever hath made perfect them that are sanctified: whereunto hee adjoyneth a notable sentence, that forgivenesse of sins being once purchased, there remaineth no more any oblation. This also Christ signified by his last saying and uttered among his last gaspings, when hee said, it is ended. Wee are woont to note the last sayings of men when they are dying, for oracles. Christ dying testifieth that by his owne sacrifice is perfited and fulfilled whatsoever was for our salvation. Shall it be lawfull for us daily to patch innumerable sacrifices to such a sacrifice, (the perfection whereof hee hath so shiningly set forth) as though it were unperfect? When the holy word of God not only affirmeth, but also cryeth out, and protesteth, that this sacrifice was once fully done that the force thereof remaineth everlasting: who so require another sacrifice, doe they not accuse this of imperfection and weakenesse? But as for the Masse, which hath beene delivered in such sort that there may every day bee made a hundred thousand sacrifices, to what end tendeth it, but that the passion of Christ whereby hee offered him an onely sacrificed oblation to the Father, should lye buried and drowned? Who, unlesse he be blind, cannot see that it was the boldnesse of Satan, which wrastled against so open and cleare truth? Neither am I ignorant with what deceits that Father of lying useth to colour this his fraude, saying that there are not sundry nor divers sacrifices, but that one selfe same sacrifice

The crosse of Christ thereby buried and oppressed.

crifice is repeated. But ſuch ſmokes are eaſily blowne away. For in the whole diſcourſe the Apoſtle travelleth to prove: not onely that there are no other ſacrifices, but that that one ſacrifice was once offered up, and ſhall no more bee repe ated. The ſubtiller men doe yet ſlip out at a narrower hole, ſaying, that it is not a repeating but an applying. But this Sophiſticall argument alſo is no leſſe eaſily confuted. For neither did Chriſt once offer up himſelfe with this condition: that his ſacrifice ſhould bee daily confirmed with new oblations: but that by the preaching of the Goſpell, and miniſtring of the holy Supper, the fruit thereof ſhould bee communicated unto us. So Paul ſaith that Chriſt our Paſſeover was offered up, and biddeth us to eate of him. This (I ſay) is the meane whereby the Sacrifice of the Croſſe is rightly applyed to us, when it is communicated to us to take the uſe of it, and we with true faith receive it.

1 Cor. 5. 7.

The weake ſupporters of the Maſſe.

4 But it is worth the labour to heare, with what other foundation beſide theſe they uphold the ſacrifice of the Maſſe. For they draw to this purpoſe the Propheſie of Malachie, whereby the Lord promiſeth that the time ſhall come when throughout the whole world there ſhall bee offered to his name incenſe and a cleane ſacrifice. As though it were a new or unwonted thing among the Prophets, when they ſpeake of the calling of the Gentiles to expreſſe by the outward ceremonie of the law the ſpirituall worſhipping of God, to which they exhort them, that they might the more familiarly declare to the men of their age, that the Gentiles ſhould bee called into the true fellowſhip of religion. Like as alſo they are wont altogether to deſcribe by figures of their law, the truth that was delivered by the Goſpell. So they ſet for turning to the Lord, aſcending into Jeruſalem: for the worſhipping of God, the offering of all kindes of gifts: for larger knowledge of him which was to be given to the faithfull in the kingdome of Chriſt, dreames and viſions. That therefore which they alleadge, is like unto another Prophecie of Eſay, where the Prophet foretelleth of three Altars to be ſet up in Aſſyria, Ægypt, and Iurie. For firſt I aske, whether they doe not grant that the fulfilling of this Prophecie is in the kingdome of Chriſt. Secondly, where bee theſe Altars, or when were they ever ſet up. Thirdly whether they thinke that to every ſeverall kingdome is appointed a ſeverall Temple, ſuch as was that at Jeruſalem. Theſe things if they weigh, I thinke they will confeſſe, that the Prophet under figures agreeable with his time, prophecieth of the ſpirituall worſhip of God to be ſpread abroad into the whole world. Which we give to them for a ſolution. But of this thing ſith there doe every where examples commonly offer themſelves, I will not buſie my ſelfe in longer rehearſall of them. Howbeit herein alſo they are miſerably deceived, that they acknowledge no ſacrifice but of the Maſſe, whereas indeed the faithfull doe now ſacrifice to the Lord, and doe offer a cleane offering, of which ſhall bee ſpoken by and by.

By the ſacrifice of the Maſſe, the memorie of the death of Chriſt blotted out.

5 Now I come downe to the third office of the Maſſe, where I muſt declare how it blotteth out the true and onely death of Chriſt, and ſhaketh it out of the remembrance of men. For as among men the ſtrength of a Teſtament hangeth upon the death of the Teſtatour: ſo alſo our Lord hath with his death confirmed the Teſtament whereby hee hath given us forgiveneſſe of ſinnes and eternall righteouſneſſe. They that dare varie or make new any thing in this Teſtament, doe denie his death, and hold it as it were of no force. But what is the Maſſe, but a new and altogether divers Teſtament? For why? Doth not every ſeverall Maſſe promiſe new forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, new purchaſing of righteouſneſſe: ſo that now there bee ſo many Teſtaments, as there be Maſſes? Let Chriſt therefore come againe, and with another death confirme this Teſtament, or rather with infinite deaths confirme innumerable Teſtaments of Maſſes. Have not I therefore ſaid true at the beginning, that the onely and true death of Chriſt is blotted out by Maſſes? Yea what ſhall wee ſay of this that the Maſſe directly tendeth to this end, that if it be poſſible, Chriſt ſhould be ſlaine againe? For where is a Teſtament (ſaith the Apoſtle) there of neceſſitie muſt bee the death of the Teſtatour. The Maſſe ſheweth it ſelfe to be a new Teſtament of Chriſt: therefore it requireth his death. Moreover the hoſte which is offered, muſt neceſſarily bee ſlaine and ſacrificed. If Chriſt in every ſeverall Maſſe bee ſacrificed, then hee muſt at every moment bee in a thouſand places cruelly ſlaine. This is not mine but the Apoſtles ſtles argument. If he had needed to offer himſelfe oft, hee muſt oft have died ſince the beginning of the world. I know that they have an anſwer in readineſſe, whereby alſo they charge us with ſlander. For they ſay that that is objected againſt them which they never thought, nor yet can. And wee know, that the death and life of Chriſt is not in their hand. We looke not whether they goe about to kill him: onely our purpoſe is to ſhew, what manner of abſurditie followeth of their ungodly and wicked doctrine. Which ſelfe thing I prove by the Apoſtles owne mouth. Though they cry out to the contrarie a hundred times, that this ſacrifice is unbloudie: I will denie that it hangeth upon the will of men, that ſacrifices ſhould change their nature, for by this meane the holy and inviolable ordinance of God ſhould faile. Whereupon followeth that this is a ſure principle of the Apoſtle, that there is required ſhedding of bloud, that waſhing may not be wanting.

Heb. 9. 16.

6 Now is the fourth office of the Maſſe to be entreated of, namely to take away from us the fruit that came to us of the death of Chriſt, while it maketh us not to acknowledge it and thinke upon it. For who can call to minde that hee is redeemed by the death of Chriſt, when hee ſeeth a new redemption in the Maſſe? Who can truſt that ſinnes are forgiven him: when he ſeeth a new forgiveneſſe? Neither ſhall he eſcape that ſhall ſay, that wee doe for no other cauſe obtaine forgiveneſſe of ſinnes in the Maſſe, but becauſe it is already purchaſed by the death of Chriſt. For he bringeth nothing elſe than as if he ſhould boaſt, that Chriſt hath redemed us with this condition, that wee ſhould redeeme our ſelves. For ſuch doctrine hath beene ſpread by the miniſters of Satan, and ſuch at this day they maintaine with cryings out with ſword and fire, that we when in the Maſſe we offer up Chriſt to his Father, by this worke of offering doe obtaine forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, and are made partakers of the paſſion of Chriſt. What now remaineth to the paſſion of Chriſt, but to bee an example of redemption, whereby wee may learne to be our owne redeemer? Chriſt himſelfe, when in the Supper hee ſealeth the confidence of pardon, doth not bid his Diſciples to ſticke in that doing, but ſendeth them away to the ſacrifice of his death: ſignifying that the Supper is a monument or memoriall (as the common ſpeech is) whereby they may learne that the ſatisfactorie cleanſing ſacrifice, by which the Father was to be appeaſed, muſt have beene offered but once. For neither is it enough to know that Chriſt is the onely ſacrifice, unleſſe the onely ſacrificing be joyned with it, that our faith may be faſtned to his croſſe.

The death of Chriſt made unfruitfull by the ſacrifice of the Maſſe.

7 Now I come to the concluſion, namely that the holy Supper, in which the Lord had left the remembrance of his paſſion graven and expreſſed, is by the ſetting up of the Maſſe, taken away, defaced, and deſtroyed. For the Supper it ſelfe is the gift of God, which was to bee received with thankſgiving. The ſacrifice of the Maſſe is faigned to pay a price to God, which he may receive for ſatisfaction. How much difference there is betweene to give and to receive, ſo much doth the ſacrifice differ from the Sacrament of the Supper. And this truly is the moſt wretched unthankfulneſſe of man, that where the largeneſſe of Gods bountie ought to have beene acknowledged, and thanks to be given, therein he maketh God his debtor. The Sacrament promiſed, that by the death of Chriſt wee are not onely once reſtored into life, but are continually quickned, becauſe then all the parts of our ſalvation were fulfilled. The ſacrifice of the Maſſe ſingeth a farre other ſong, that Chriſt muſt bee daily ſacrificed, that hee may ſomewhat profit us. The Supper ſhould have beene diſtributed in the common aſſemblie of the Church, that it might informe us of the communion whereby wee all cleave together in Chriſt Jeſus. The ſacrifice of the Maſſe diſſolveth and plucketh in ſunder this communitie. For after that the errour grew in force, that there muſt be ſacrificers that ſhould ſacrifice for the people, the Supper of the Lord as though it were poſted over to them, ceaſed to bee communicated to the congregation of the faithfull, according to the commandement of the Lord. An entrie was made open to private Maſſes, which might rather reſemble a certaine excommunication, than that ſame communitie ordained of the Lord, when that pettie ſacrificer willing ſeverally by himſelfe to devoure his ſacrifice, doth ſever himſelfe from the whole people of the faithfull. I call private Maſſe (leaſt any man be deceived) whereſoever there is no

The Sacrament of that holy Supper thereby defaced and deſtroyed.

no partaking of the Lords Supper among the faithfull, although otherwise a great multitude of men be present.

Private Masses wicked abuses.

8 And whence the very name of Masse first sprung, I could never certainly judge: saving that it seemeth to me likely that it was taken of the offerings that were given. Whereupon the old writers use it commonly in the plurall number. But to leave striving about the name, I say that private Masses are directly against the ordinance of Christ, and therefore they are a wicked prophaning of the holy Supper. For what hath the Lord commanded us? not to take, and divide it among us? What manner of observing of the commandement doth Paul teach? not the breaking of bread, which is the communion of the bodie and bloud? Therefore when one taketh it without distributing, what likenesse is there? But that same one man doth it in the name of the whole Church. By what commandement? Is not this openly to mocke God, when one man privatly taketh to himselfe that which ought not to have beene done but among many? But because the words of Christ and Paul are plaine enough, we may briefly conclude, that whersoever is not breaking of bread to the communion of the faithfull, there is not the Supper of the Lord, but a false and wrongfull counterfaiting of the Supper. But a false counterfaiting is a corrupting. Now the corrupting of so great a mysterie is not without wickednesse. Therefore in private Masses is a wicked abuse. And (as one fault in religion from time to time breedeth another) after that that manner of offering without communion was once crept in, by little and little they began in every corner of Churches to make innumerable Masses, and diversly to draw the people hither and thither, which should have come together into one assemblie, that they might reknowledge the mysterie of their owne unitie. Now let them goe and denie it to be idolatrie, that in their Masses they shew forth bread to be worshipped in stead of Christ. For in vaine they boast of those promises of the presence of Christ, which howsoever they be understood, verily were not given to this purpose, that wicked and prophane men so oft as they will, and to whatsoever abuse they list, may make the bodie of Christ: but that the faithfull, when with religious observation they doe in celebrating of the Supper follow the commandement of Christ, may enjoy the true partaking of him.

1 Cor. 10. 16.

No commandement in Scripture to warrant Massing sacrificers.

1 Sam. 15. 22.

9 Beside that, this perversnesse was unknowne to the purer Church. For howsoever the more shamelesse sort among our adversaries doe here goe about to disguise the matter with false colours, yet it is most sure that all antiquitie is against them, as wee have afore proved in other things, and it may more certainely be judged by the continuall reading of old writers. But ere I make an end of speaking of it, I aske our Massing doctors, sith they know that obedience is more esteemed of God than oblations, and that hee more requireth that his voice bee harkened to, than that sacrifices bee offered: how they beleeve that this manner of sacrificing is acceptable to God, whereof they have no certaine commandement, and which they see not to be allowed by any one syllable of the Scripture. Moreover when they heare the Apostle say, that no man taketh to himselfe the name and honour of sacrificing priesthood, but hee that is called as Aaron was: yea and that Christ himselfe did not thrust in himselfe, but obeyed the calling of his Father: either they must bring forth God the Authour and ordainer of their sacrificing Priesthood, or they must confesse that the honour is not of God, into which they have with wicked rashnesse broken in uncalled. But they cannot shew one title of a letter that maintaineth their sacrificing Priesthood. Why therefore shall not their sacrifices vanish away which cannot be offered without a Priest?

Such sacrifice never allowed by old writers as the Church of Rome hath devised in the Masse.

10 If any man doe thrust in short sentences of the old writers gathered here and there, and doe by their authoritie travaile to prove that the sacrifice which is done in the Supper is farre otherwise to be understood than wee doe expound it: let him bee briefly answered thus: if the question bee of allowing the forged devise of sacrifice, such as the Papists have faigned in the Masse, the old writers doe never speake in defence of such sacriledge. They doe indeed use the word Sacrifice: but there withall they expound, that they meane nothing else but the remembrance of that true and onely sacrifice, which Christ our onely sacrificing Priest (as they each where report of him) made on the Crosse. The Hebrewes (saith Augustine) in the sacrifices of beasts which they offered to God, did celebrate a prophecie of the sacrifice to come, which Christ offered: the Christians doe with the holy oblation and partaking of the body of Christ celebrate a remembrance of the sacrifice already made. Here verily he teacheth altogether the same thing, which is written in moe words in the booke of Faith to Peter the Deacon, whosoever be the author of it. The words be these, Beleeve most stedfastly and doubt not at all, that the onely begotten himselfe, being made flesh for us, offered himselfe for us a sacrifice and oblation to God into a savour of sweetnesse: to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost in the time of the old Testament beasts were sacrificed: and to whom now with the Father and the Holy Ghost (with whom he hath one Godhead) the holie Church throughout the whole world ceaseth not to offer the sacrifice of bread and wine. For in those fleshly sacrifices was a figuring of the flesh of Christ which hee should offer for our sinnes, and of his blood which hee should shed to the forgivenesse of sinnes. But in this sacrifice is thanksgiving and rehearsall of the flesh of Christ which he offered for us, and of his blood which the same he hath shed for us. Whereupon Augustine himselfe in many places expoundeth it to be nothing else but a sacrifice of praise. Finally you shall commonly find in him that the Supper of the Lord is for no other reason called a sacrifice, but because it is the remembrance, image, and witnesse of that singular, true and onely sacrifice wherewith Christ hath cleansed us. Also there is a notable place in his fourth booke of the Trinitie the xxiiij. Chapter, where after that he hath discoursed of the onely sacrifice, he thus concludeth: because in a sacrifice foure things are considered, to whom it is offered, and of whom, what is offered, and for whom. The same he himselfe the one and true Mediatour reconciling us to God by the sacrifice of peace, remaineth one with him to whom hee offered: maketh them one in him for whom hee offered: is one himselfe which offered, and the thing which he offered. To the same effect also speaketh Chrysostome. But they so challenge the honour of sacrificing priesthood to Christ, that Augustine testifieth to be the voice of Antichrist if any man make a Bishop intercessor betweene God and men.

Lib. 1. cont. Parm. cap. 8

11 Yet do we not deny but that the offering up of Christ is there so shewed in us, that the spectacle of the Crosse is in a manner set before our eyes: as the Apostle saith that Christ was crucified in the eyes of the Galatians, when the preaching of the Crosse was set before them. But forasmuch as I see that those old fathers also wrested this remembrance another way than was agreeable with the institution of the Lord, (because their supper contained I wot not what repeated or at least renewed forme of sacrificing) the safest way for godly hearts shall bee to rest in the pure and simple ordinance of God: whose also the supper is therefore called, because in it his authoritie alone ought to be in force. Truly sith I finde that they have kept a godly and true sence of this whole mysterie, and I doe not perceive that they meant to abate any thing were it never so little from the onely sacrifice of the Lord, I cannot condemne them of ungodlinesse: yet I thinke that they cannot be excused, but that they have offended somewhat in the manner of the celebration. For they counterfeited the Iewish manner of sacrificing more neerely than either Christ had ordained, or the nature of the Gospell did beare. Therefore that same overthwart appliance to heavenly things is the onely thing wherein a man may worthily blame them, for that being not contented with the simple and naturall institution of Christ, they swarved to the shadowes of the law.

Christ after a sort offered because his offering as it were painted out by this mysterie, in celebration whereof the Fathers not simplie to be allowed, though not to be condemned of ungodlinesse neither Gal. 3. 1.

12 If a man doe diligently weigh, that this difference is put by the word of the Lord betweene the sacrifices of Moses, and our Thanksgiving, that whereas those did represent to the Jewish people, the same effectualnesse of the death of Christ, which is at this day delivered to us in the Supper, yet the manner of representing was divers. For in those, the Leviticall priests were commanded to figure that which Christ should performe: there was brought a sacrifice which should be in the stead of Christ himselfe: there was an altar whereupon it should bee offered: Finally all things were so done, that there was set before their eies an image of the sacrifice which was to bee offered to God for a satisfactorie cleansing. But since the time that the sacrifice is ended the Lord hath appointed to us another order: namely, that it should conveigh to the faithfull people the fruit of the sacrifice offered to him by the sonne. Therefore he hee hath given us a table whereat we should eat, not an altar wherupon sacrifice should bee offered: hee hath not consecrated priests to sacrifice, but Ministers to distribute the holy banquet. How much more high and holy the mystery is, so much more religiously and with greater reverence it is meet to be handled. Therefore there is no way safer than putting away all boldnesse of mans understanding, to sticke fast in that alone which the Scripture teacheth. And truly if wee consider that it is the Supper of the Lord and not of men, there is no cause why we would suffer our selves to be removed one haire's breadth from it by any authority of men or presciption of yeeres. 1 Cor. 11. 20. Therefore when the Apostle minded to cleanse it from all faults which had alreadie crept into the Church of the Corinthians, he useth the readiest way thereunto, that is, he calleth it backe to the only institution of it, from whence he sheweth that a perpetuall rule ought to be fetched.

The name of sacrifice, two kinds thereof in the law, in the Gospell, two other thereunto answerable.

13 Now lest any wrangler, should stirre us up strife by reason of the names of sacrifice and sacrificing priest, I will also declare, but yet briefely what in the whole discourse I have meant by a sacrifice, and what by a sacrificing priest. Whoso stretch the word sacrifice to all holy Ceremonies and doings of Religion, I see not by what reason they do it. We do know that by the continuall use of the Scripture a sacrifice is called that which the Greeks call sometime Thusia, sometime Prosphora, sometime Telete. Which being generally taken comprehendeth whatsoever is in any wise offered to God. Wherefore we must make distinction: but yet so that this distinction may have a supernall appliance of similitude from the sacrifices of the law of Moses: under the shadowes whereof the Lord willed to represent to his people the whole truth of sacrifices. Of those although there were divers formes, yet they may all be referred to two sorts. For either there was oblation made for sinne after a certaine manner of satisfaction, whereby guiltinesse was redeemed before God: or it was a signe of the worshipping of God, and a testifying of religion: sometime in stead of supplication, to crave the favour of God: sometime in stead of thanksgiving, to testifie thankefulnesse of minde for benefits received: sometime only for an exercise of godlinesse, to renew the stablishing of the covenant, to which latter sort pertained burnt offerings, drinke offerings, oblations, first fruits, and peace offerings. Wherefore let us also divide ours into two kinds; and for teachings sake let us call the one the sacrifice of worship and of godly devotion, because it consisteth in the honouring and worshipping of God, which the faithfull both owe and yeeld unto him: or, if you will, the sacrifice of Thanksgiving: for as much as it is given to God of none but of them that being laden with immeasurable benefits, do render to him themselves with all their doings. The other may be called propitiatory or of expiation. The sacrifice of expiation is that which tendeth to appease the wrath of God, to satisfie his judgement, and so to wash and wipe away sinnes: whereby the sinner cleansed from the filthy spots of them, and restored into purity of righteousnesse, may returne into favour with God himselfe. So in the law those were called sacrifices that were offered for the purging of sinnes: not for that they were sufficient to recover the favour of God, or to put away iniquity: but for that they shadowed out such a true sacrifice which at length was fully done by Christ alone: and by him alone, because it could be done by none other: and once, because the effectualnesse and force of that one sacrifice which Christ hath fully done, is eternall, as he himselfe hath testified with his owne mouth, when he said that it was ended and fulfilled: that is to say, that whatsoever was necessary to the reconciling of the fathers favour, to the obtaining of the forgivenesse of sinnes, to righteousnesse and to salvation, all the same was performed and fulfilled with that his onely oblation, and there so nothing wanted thereof, that there was afterward no place left to any other sacrifice.

Exod. 29. 3.

Iohn 19. 30.

In the sacrifice of the Masse Christ blasphemed and sola, the sacrifi er himselfe not authorised.

14 Wherefore I determine, that it is a most wicked reproch, and blasphemie not to be suffered, as well against Christ as against the sacrifice which hee hath fully done by his death upon the crosse for us, if any man by renewing an oblation thinke to purchase the pardon of sinnes, to appease God, and to obtaine righteousnesse. But what is else done by Massing, but that by deserving of new oblation we may be made partakers of the paſſion of Chriſt. And that there might bee no meaſure of madding, they thought it but a ſmall thing to ſay that there is made indifferently a common ſacrifice for the whole Church, unleſſe they further ſaid that it is in their choice to apply it peculiarly to this man or that man to whom they would, or rather to every one whoſoever he were that would buy for himſelfe ſuch ware with ready money. Now becauſe they could not reach to the price that Iudas had, yet that they might in ſome marke reſemble their authour, they kept the likeneſſe of number. Iudas ſold him for thirty ſilver pence: theſe fellowes ſell him after the French account, for thirty braſen pence: but Iudas ſold him once, theſe fellowes ſell him as oft as they can finde a buyer. In this ſence alſo we deny that they be ſacrificing prieſts, that is to ſay, they that with ſuch an oblation are meanes to God for the people, they that appeaſing God, may purchaſe the ſatisfactory purging of ſinnes. For Chriſt is the onely Biſhop and ſacrificing prieſt of the new Teſtament, into whom all prieſthoods are removed, and in whom they be ſhut up and ended. And if the Scripture had made no mention of the eternall prieſthood of Chriſt: yet foraſmuch as God, ſince that hee hath taken away thoſe old prieſthoods, hath ordained none, the Apoſtles argument remaineth invincible, that no man taketh honour to himſelfe, but he that is called of God. By what affiance therefore dare theſe robbers of God, that boaſt themſelves for the butchers of Chriſt, call themſelves the ſacrificing Prieſts of the living God?

The common price of a Maſſe in France is three karolus, which make twenty deniers about the value of a ſterling groat. Heb. 5. 4.

15 Plato hath an excellent place in his ſecond booke of common weale. Where when he entreateth of the old manners of expiation, and laugheth to ſcorne the fooliſh confidence of evill men and wicked doers, which thought that their wicked doings were by theſe as by coverings hidden that the gods could not ſee them, and did, as if they had gotten warrant of the gods by covenant, more careleſly follow their owne luſts: hee ſeemeth throughly to touch the manner of ſatisfactory purging of the Maſſe, ſuch as is at this day in the world. To beguile and undermine another man, all men know to be unlawfull. To grieve widowes with wrongfull dealings, to rob the fatherleſſe, to trouble the poore, by evill craftie meanes to catch other mens goods to themſelves, with forſwearings and deceits to enter forceably into any mans poſſeſſions, to oppreſſe any man with violence and tyrannous feare, all men confeſſe to be wicked. How therefore dare ſo many commonly do all theſe things, as though they ſhould freely be bold to doe them? Truly, if we rightly weigh it, no other cauſe doth ſo much encourage them, but becauſe they have confidence, that by the ſacrifice of a Maſſe, as by payment of full price for recompence, they ſhall ſatisfie God, or at the leaſt that this is an eaſie way to compound with him. Then Plato proceedeth further to ſcorne their groſſe blockiſhneſſe, which thinke that by ſuch ſatisfactorie cleanſings thoſe paines are redeemed that otherwiſe they ſhould ſuffer in hell. And whereto ſerve at this day the yearely obites, and the greater part of Maſſes, but that they which throughout all their life have beene moſt cruell tyrants, or moſt ravenous robbers, or given forth to all miſchievous doings, ſhould as though they were redeemed by this price, eſcape the fire of purgatory?

The very practice of the Church of Rome in their maſſe and the groſſenesse thereof condemned even by Plato himſelfe.

16 Under the other kinde of ſacrifice, which we have called the ſacrifice of thankſgiving, are contained all the dutifull workes of charity, which when wee extend to our brethren, wee honour the Lord himſelfe in his members: then, all our prayers, praiſings, giving of thankes, and whatſoever we doe to the worſhipping of God. All which things finally doe hang upon the greater ſacrifice, whereby we are in ſoule and body hallowed to be a holy Temple to the Lord. For neither is it enough, if our outward doings be applied to the obeying of him: but firſt our ſelves, and then all that is ours ought to be conſecrate and dedicate to him: that whatſoever is in us, may ſerve his glory, and may ſavour of zealous endevour to advance it. This kind of ſacrifice tendeth nothing at all to appeaſe the wrath of God, nothing at all to obtaine forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, nothing at all to deſerve righteouſneſſe: but is occupied onely in magnifying and extollingn of God. For it cannot be pleaſant and acceptable to God, but at their hands, whom by forgiveneſſe of ſinnes already received hee hath by other meanes reconciled to himſelfe, and therefore acquited them from guiltineſſe. But it is ſo neceſſary for the Church, that it cannot bee away from it. Therefore it ſhall bee everlasting, so long as the people of God shall continue, as wee have before already shewed out of the Prophet: for in that meaning I will take this prophecie. For from the rising of the Sunne to the going downe thereof, great is my name among the Gentiles, and in every place incense shall be offered to my name, and a cleane offering: because my name is terrible among the Gentiles, saith the Lord: so farre is it off, that we would put it away. So Paul biddeth us to offer our bodies a sacrifice living, holy, acceptable to God, a reasonable worship. Where he spake very pithily, when he added that this is our reasonable worshipping: for he meant the spirituall manner of worshipping of God, which hee did secretly set in comparison against the carnall sacrifices of the law of Moses. So liberall doing of good and communicating, are called sacrifices by which God is pleased. So the liberality of the Philippians, whereby they had relieved the povertie of Paul, is called a sacrifice of sweet smelling. So all the good works of the faithfull are called spirituall sacrifices.

The ſacrifice of praiſe and thankſgiving.

Prayer and other good duties termed sacrifices by the Prophets and Christians in respect thereof Priests.
Psal.141.2. Osee 14.3. Psal.51.21. Hebr.13.15. 1 Pet.2.9.

17 And why do I seeke out many examples? For commonly this manner of speaking is often found in the Scriptures. Yea and while the people of God was yet holden under the outward schooling of the law, yet the prophets did sufficiently expresse, that under those carnall sacrifices was the truth, which the Christian Church hath common with the nation of the Iewes. After which manner David prayed, that his prayer might as incense ascend into the sight of God. And Osee called giving of thanks, the calves of lips, which in another place David calleth the sacrifices of praise. Whom the Apostle himselfe following, calleth them also the sacrifices of praise, and expoundeth them the fruits of lips confessing to his name. This kind of sacrifice the Supper of the Lord cannot want: wherein when we declare his death and render thanksgiving, wee doe nothing but offer the sacrifice of praise. Of this office of sacrificing, all wee Christians are called a kingly priesthood: because by Christ wee offer to God that sacrifice of praise of which the Apostle speaketh, the fruit of lips that confesse to his name. For neither do we with our gifts appeare in the sight of God without an intercessour. Christ is he, which being the Mediator comming betweene, we offer us and ours to the Father. He is our Bishop, which being entred into the sanctuary of heaven, hath opend the entrie to us. He is the altar, upon which wee lay our gifts, that in him we may be bold all that we are bold. It is hee (I say) that hath made us a kingdome and Priests to the Father.

Masse a grand deceiver of the world.
Revel.1.6.

18 What remaineth, but that the blinde may see, the deafe may heare, children themselves may understand this abomination of the Masse? which being offered in a golden cup, hath made drunke the kings and people of the earth from the highest to the lowest, hath so stricken them with drowsinesse and giddinesse, that being become more senceleſſe than bruit beasts, they have set the whole ship of their safetie onely in this deadly devouring gulfe. Truly Satan never did bend himselfe with a stronger engine then this to assaile and vanquish the kingdome of Christ. This is the Helene, for whom the enemies of the truth fight at this day with so great rage, so great furiousnesse, so great crueltie: and a Helene indeed, with whom they so defile themselves with spirituall whoredome, which is the most cursed of all. I doe not here so much as once touch with my little finger those grosse abuses wherewith they might colour the unholy pureneſſe of their holy Masse: how filthie marketings they use, how unhonest gaines they make with their massings, with how great ravening they fill their covetousnesse. Onely I doe point unto, and that with few and plain words, what manner of thing is even the very holiest holinesse of the Masse, for which it hath deserved in certaine ages past to be so honourable and to be had in so great reverence. For to haue these so great mysteries set out according to their worthinesse, requireth a greater worke: and I am unwilling to mingle herewith those filthie uncleannesses that commonly shew themselves before the eyes and faces of all men, that all men may understand, that the Masse taken in her most picked pureneſſe, and wherewith it may be set out to the best shew, without her appendances, from the roote to the top swarmeth full of all kind of wickednesse, blasphemie, idolatrie, and sacriledge.

* No Sacrament in the Church but onely Baptisme, and the Lords Supper.

19 * The readers now have in a manner almost all those things gathered into an abridgement, which wee have though t behoovefull to be knowne concerning these two Sacraments: the uſe of which hath beene delivered to the Chriſtian Church from the beginning of the new Teſtament, to continue to the very end of the world: namely, that Baptiſme ſhould be as it were a certaine entry into it, and an admiſſion into faith: and the Supper ſhould be as it were a continuall food, wherewith Chriſt ſpiritually feedeth the family of his faithfull. Wherefore as there is but one God, one faith, one Chriſt, one Church, his body: ſo there is but one Baptiſme, and is not oft miniſtred againe. But the Supper is from time to time diſtributed, that they which have beene once received into the Church, may underſtand that they be continually fed with Chriſt. Beſide theſe two as there is no other ſacrament ordained of God, ſo neither ought the Church of the faithfull to acknowledge any other. For that, it is not a thing that lieth in the choiſe of man to raiſe and ſet up new ſacraments, he ſhall eaſily underſtand that remembreth that which hath been here before plainely enough declared, that is, that ſacraments are appointed of God to this end, that they ſhould inſtruct us of ſome promiſes of his, and teſtifie to us his good will toward us: and he alſo that calleth to minde, that none hath been Gods counſeller, that might promiſe us any certainty of his will, or aſſure us, and bring us out of care, what affection he beareth toward us, what hee will give, or what he will deny us. For therewith is alſo determined, that no man can ſet forth a ſigne to be a teſtimony of any will or promiſe of his: it is hee himſelfe alone, that can by a ſigne give teſtifie to us of himſelfe. I will ſpeake it more briefely, and peradventure more groſly, but more plainely, A Sacrament can never be without promiſe of ſalvation. All men gathered on a heape together can of themſelves promiſe nothing of our ſalvation. Therefore neither can they of themſelves ſet forth or ſet up a Sacrament.

Eſa.40.13. Rom.11.34.

20 Therefore let the Chriſtian Church bee contented with theſe two, and let her not onely not admit or acknowledge any third for the preſent time, but alſo not deſire or looke for any to the end of the world. For whereas certaine diverſe Sacraments, beſide thoſe their ordinarie ones, were given to the Jewes according to the divers courſe of times, as Manna, Water ſpringing out of the rocke, the Braſen Serpent and ſuch other: they were by this change put in minde that they ſhould not ſtay upon ſuch figures whoſe ſtate was not very ſtedfaſt: but that they ſhould looke for ſome better thing from God, which ſhould continue without any decayling and without any end. But we are in a farre other caſe, to whom Chriſt is openly ſhewed: in whom all the treaſure of knowledge and wiſdome are hidden with ſo great abundance and plenty, that either to hope for or looke for any new encreaſe to theſe treaſures, is verily to move God to wrath, and provoke him againſt us. We muſt hunger for, ſeeke looke upon, learne, and throughly learne Chriſt alone, untill that great day ſhall appeare, wherein the Lord ſhall openly ſhew to the full the glory of his kingdome, and himſelfe ſuch as hee is, to be beholden of us. And for this reaſon this our age is in the Scripture ſignified by the laſt houres, the laſt dayes, the laſt times, that no man ſhould deceive himſelfe with vaine looking for any new doctrine of revelation. For many times and in many ſorts hee ſpake before the Prophets, in theſe laſt dayes the heavenly Father hath ſpoken in his beloved Sonne, which onely can manifeſtly ſhew the Father: and indeed hee hath manifeſtly ſhewed him to the full, ſo much as behoveth us, while we now behold him by a glaſſe. As therefore this is now taken away from men, that they cannot make new Sacraments in the Church of God: ſo it were to be wiſhed, that as little as were poſſible of mans invention might be mingled with thoſe Sacraments that are of God. For like as when water is powred in, the wine departeth and is allayed: and as with leaven ſcattered among it, the whole lumpe of dough waxeth ſower: ſo the pureneſſe of the myſteries of God is nothing elſe but defiled when man addeth any thing of his owne. And yet we ſee how farre the Sacraments are ſwarved out of kinde from their naturall pureneſſe, as they be handled at this day. There is eachwhere too much of pompes ceremonies and geſturings: but of the word of God in the meane time there is neither any conſideration or mention, without which even the Sacraments themſelves are not Sacraments. Yea and the very ceremonies that are ordained of God, in ſo great a rout cannot once lift up their head, but lie as it were oppreſſed. How little is that ſeene in Baptiſme, which onely ought there to have shined and beene looked upon, as we have in another place rightfully complained, even Baptisme it selfe? As for the Supper, it is utterly buried, since that it hath beene turned into the Masse, saving that it is seene once every yeere but in a mangled and halfe torne fashion.

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER.

Of the five falsely named Sacraments: where is declared, that the other five which have beene hitherto commonly taken for Sacraments, are no Sacraments: and then is shewed what manner of things they be.

A Sacrament defined to be a visible signe of invisible grace, and this applied in the schoole of Rome to five other, besides those two before handled.

OUr former discourse concerning Sacraments might have obtained this with the sober and willing to learne, that they should not over curiously proceed any further, nor should without the word of God embrace any other Sacraments beside those two which they knew to be ordained of the Lord. But forasmuch as that opinion of the seven Sacraments, being commonly used in all mens talke, having wandred through all scooles and preachings, hath by very ancienty gathered roots, and is yet still setled in the minds of men: I thought that I should doe a thing worth the travell, if I should severally and more neerely search those other five that are commonly adnumbred among the true and naturall Sacraments of the Lord, and wiping away all deceitfull colour, should set them forth to bee seene of the simple such as they bee, and how falsely they have been hitherto taken for Sacraments. First, I here protest to all the godly, that I doe not take in hand this contention about the name for any desiring of striving, but that I am by weighty causes led to fight against the abuse of it. I am not ignorant that Christians are Lords, as of words, so of all things also, and therfore may at their will apply words to things, so that a godly sence be kept, although there be some unproperneſſe in the speaking. All this I grant: although it were better that the words should be made subject to things, than things to the words. But in the name of Sacrament there is another consideration. For they which make seven Sacraments, doe therewithall give to them all this definition, that they be visible formes of invisible grace: they make them altogether vessels of the holy Ghost: instruments of giving of righteousneſſe, causes of the obtaining of grace. Yea and the master of the sentences himselfe denieth that the Sacraments of the Law of Moses are properly called by this name, because they did not deliver indeed the thing that they figured. Is it, I beseech you, to bee suffered, that those signes which the Lord hath hallowed with his owne mouth, which he hath garnished with excellent promises, should not bee accounted for Sacraments: and in the meane time this honour should be conveighed away to those usages which men either have devised of themselves, or at least doe observe without expresse commandement of God? Therefore either let them change the definition, or let them abstaine from the wrongfull using of this word, which doth afterward engender false opinions and full of absurdity. Extreame anointing (say they) is a figure and cause of invisible grace, because it is a Sacrament: If wee ought in no wise to grant that which they gather upon it, then truly wee must resist them in the name it selfe, lest thereby wee admit that it may give occasion to such an errour. Againe when they would prove it to bee a Sacrament, they adde this cause, for that it consisteth of the outward signe and the word. If wee finde neither commandement nor promise of it, what can wee doe else but cry out against them?

In no mans power but in Gods alone to institute Sacraments.

2 Now appeareth that wee brawle not about the word, but doe move a controversie not superfluous concerning the thing it selfe. Therfore this we must strongly hold fast that wee have with invincible reason before confirmed, that the power to institute a Sacrament is in the hand of none but of God only. For a Sacrament ought with a certaine promise to raise up and comfort the consciences of the faithfull: which could never receive this certainty from man. A Sacrament ought to bee to us a witnessing of the good will of God toward us, whereof none of all men or Angels can be witnesse, forasmuch as none hath been of Gods councell. Therefore it is hee alone which doth with right authoritie testifie of himselfe to us by his Word. A Sacrament is a seale, wherewith the testament or promise of God is sealed. But it could not be sealed with bodily things and elements of this world, unlesse they be by the power of God framed and appointed thereunto. Therefore man cannot ordaine a Sacrament, because this is not in the power of man, to make that so great mysteries of God should lie hidden under so base things. The word of God must goe before, which may make a Sacrament to be a Sacrament, as Augustine very well teacheth. Moreover it is profitable that there be kept some difference between the Sacrament and other ceremonies, unlesse we will fall into many absurdities. The Apostles prayed kneeling: therefore men shall not kneele without a Sacrament. It is said that the disciples prayed toward the East: therefore the looking into the East shall be a Sacrament. Paul willeth men in every place to lift up pure hands, and it is rehearsed that holy men often times prayed with their hands lifted up, then let the lifting up of hands also bee made a Sacrament. Finally, let all the gestures of the holy ones turne into Sacraments. Howbeit I would not also much passe upon these things, if so that they were not joyned with those other greater discommodities.

is

Hom. in Joan. 80.

Acts 19.40. & 10 3.6. 1 Tim. 2.8.

3 If they will presse us with the authority of the old Church, I say that they pretend a false colour. For this number of seven is no where found among the Ecclesiasticall writers: neither is it certaine at what time it first crept in. I grant indeed that sometime they bee very free in using the name of a Sacrament: but what meane they thereby? even all ceremonies and outward rites, and all exercises of godlinesse. But when they speake of those signes that ought to be witnesses of the grace of God towards vs, they are contented with these two, Baptisme, and the Supper. Lest any man should thinke that I falsely boast of this, I will here rehearse a few testimonies of Augustine. To Ianuarius he saith, First I would have thee to hold fast that which is the chiefe point of this disputation, that our Lord Christ (as hee himselfe saith in the Gospell) hath made us subject to a light yoke and a light burden. Wherefore hee hath bound together the fellowship of the new people with Sacraments very few in number, very easie in observing, very excellent in signification. As are Baptisme hallowed in the name of the Trinity, and the communicating of the body and blood of the Lord, and whatsoever else is set forth in the Canonicall Scriptures. Againe, in his booke of Christian doctrine. Since the Lords resurrection, the Lord himselfe and the doctrine of the Apostles hath delivered certaine few signes in stead of many, and those most easie to be done, most reverend in understanding, most pure in observing: as is Baptisme and the celebrating of the body and blood of the Lord. Why doth he here make no mention of the holy number, that is, of the cumber of seven? It is likely that he would have passed it ouer, if it had beene at that time ordained in the Church, specially sith he is otherwise in observing of numbers more curious than need were? Yea, when he nameth Baptisme and the Supper, and speaketh nothing of the rest: doth he not sufficiently signifie, that these two mysteries doe excell in singular dignity, and that the other ceremonies doe rest beneath in a lower degree? Wherefore I say that these Sacramentary Doctors are destitute not onely of the word of the Lord, but also of the consent of the old Church, how much soever they glory of this pretence. But now let us come downe to the speciall things themselves.

Although the word Sacrament be in the Fathers largely applied, yet S. Augustine speaking of those principall mysteries which Christ hath left unto his Church, doth mention onely Baptisme and the celebrating of the body and blood of Christ. Epist. 118. Lib. 3. cap 9.

Of Confirmation.

4 This was the manner in old time, that the children of Christians, when they were growne to age of discretion should be brought before the Bishop: that they would fulfill that duty which was required of those that being growne in yeares did offer themselves to Baptisme. For these sate among those that were to be catechised, till being fully instructed in the mysteries of the faith, they could make a confession of their faith before the Bishop and the people. Therefore they that were baptised being infants, because they had not then made confession of their faith before the Church, were about the end of their child-hood, or in the beginning of their yeeres of discretion presented againe by their parents, and were examined of the Bishop according to the forme of the Catechisme, which they had then certaine and common. And that this doing, which otherwise ought worthily to be grave and holy, might have the more reverence verence and dignitie, there was added also the Ceremonies of laying on of hands. So that same child, his faith being allowed, was let goe with solemne blessing. The old writers doe oft make mention of this manner. Leo the Pope writeth: If any returne from Hereticks, let him not be baptised againe (but which he wanted among the Hereticks) let the vertue of the spirit bee given him by the Bishops laying on of his hands. Here our adversaries will crie out that it is rightfully called a Sacrament, in which the holy Ghost is given, but Leo himselfe doth in an other place declare what hee meaneth by those words: Whoso (saith he) is baptised among hereticks, let him not be rebaptised, but with calling upon the holy Ghost, let him be confirmed with the laying on of hands: because he received onely the forme of Baptisme without sanctifying. Hierome also maketh mention of it, writing against the Luciferians. But although I doe not denie that Hierome some what erreth therein, for that he saith that it is an observation of the Apostles: yet he is most farre from these mens follies, and the very same also he qualifieth, when he addeth, that this blessing is given to the Bishops onely, rather in honour of their priesthood, than by the necessitie of law. Therefore such laying on of hands, which is done simply in stead of blessing, I praise and would that it were at this day restored to the pure use thereof.

The cause and matter of ancient confirmation, with the opinions of Leo and Hierome concerning it.

Epi. 39.

For confirmation as at this day they use it in the Church of Rome, there is in the word of God no warrant.

5 But the latter age having in a manner blotted out the thing it selfe, hath set I wot not what feigned confirmation for a Sacrament of God. They have faigned that the vertue of confirmation is, to give the holy Ghost to the encrease of Grace, which in baptisme was given to innocencie: to strengthen them to battaile, which in baptisme were new begotten to life. This Confirmation is celebrate with annoynting, and with this forme of words, I signe thee with the signe of the holie crosse, and confirme thee with the chresme of salvation,, in the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holie Ghost. All this is gaily and trimly done. But where is th the word of God, that may promise here the presence of the holy Ghost? They cannot bring forth one tittle. Whereby then will they certifie us, that their chresme is the vessell of the holy Ghost? We see oyle, that it is a thicke and fat liquor and nothing else. Let the word (saith Augustine) be added to the element, and there shall bee made a Sacrament. Let them (I say) bring forth this word, if they will have us in the oyle to look upon any thing but the oyle. If they did acknowlege themselves ministers of the Sacraments, as they ought, we needed to strive no longer. This is the first law of a minister, that he doe nothing without commandement. Go to, let them bring forth any commandement of this point of ministerie, and I will not speake one word more. If they have no commandement, they cannot excuse their boldnesse full of sacriledge. After this manner the Lord askes the Pharisees, whether the baptisme of John were from heaven or from men: if they had answered from men, then hee had made them confesse that it was trifling and vaine: if from heaven, then were they compelled to acknowledge the doctrine of John. Therefore lest they should too much slander John, they durst not confesse that it was from men. If therefore Confirmation bee from men, it is proved to bee vaine and trifling: if they will perswade us that it is from heaven, let them prove it.

Matt. 12. 25.

Imposition of hands used by the Apostles, no president for popish confirmation.

Acts 8. 21.

6 They doe indeed defend themselves with the examples of the Apostle, whom they thinke to have done nothing rashly. This is well indeed: neither would wee blame them, if they shewed themselves followers of the Apostles. But what did the Apostles? Luke reporteth in the Acts that the Apostles which were at Hierusalem, when they heard that Samaria had received the Word of God, sent thither Peter and John: they prayed for the Samaritanes, that they might receive the holy Ghost, which was not yet come into any of them, but they were baptised onely in the name of Jesus: when they had prayed, they laid their hands upon them: by which laying on, the Samaritanes received the holy Ghost. And of this laying on of hands he divers times maketh mention. I heare what the Apostles did: that is, they faithfully executed their ministerie. The Lord willed that those visible and wonderfull graces of the holie Ghost, which he then powred out upon his people, should be ministred and distributed of his Apostles by the laying on of hands. But under this laying on of hands: I thinke there was not contained any higher mysterie, but I expound it, that they adjoyned adioyned such a ceremony, that by the very outward doing they might signifie, that they commended and as it were offered to God him upon whom they laid their hands. If this ministery which the Apostles then executed, were yet still remaining in the Church, the laying on of hands also ought to bee kept. But since the same grace hath ceased to bee given, whereto serveth the laying on of hands? Truly the holy Ghost is yet present with the people of God, without whom being guider and directer, the Church of God cannot stand. For we have the eternall promise and which shall ever stand in force, by which Christ calleth to himselfe them that thirst, that they may drinke living waters. But those miracles of powers, and manifest workings, which were distributed by the laying on of hands have ceased, neither behooved it that they should be but for a time. For it behooved that the preaching of the Gospell while it was new, should bee gloriously set forth and magnified, with unheard of, and unwonted miracles. From which when the Lord ceased, he did not by and by forsake his Church, but taught that the royaltie of his kingdome and the dignitie of his word was excellently enough disclosed. In what point therefore will these stage-players say that they follow the Apostles? They should have done it with laying on of hands, that the evident power of the holy Ghost might by and by shew forth it selfe. This they bring not to passe: why therefore doe they boast that the laying on of hands maketh for them, which wee reade indeed that the Apostles used, but altogether to another end?

John 7.37.

7 This hath like reason as if a man should teach that the breathing wherewith the Lord breathed upon his Disciples, is a Sacrament whereby the holy Ghost is given. But whereas the Lord did this once, hee did not also will that we should doe the same. After the same manner also the Apostles laid on their hands, during the time that it pleased the Lord that the visible graces of the holy Ghost should bee distributed at their prayers: not that they which come after, should onely player-like and without the thing indeed counterfeit an emptie and cold signe, as these Apes doe. But if they prove that in laying on of hands they follow the Apostles (wherein they have no like thing with the Apostles, saving I wot not what overthwart wrongfull counterfeiting) yet whence commeth their oyle which they call the oyle of salvation? Who taught them to seeke salvation in oyle? Who taught them to give to it the power of strengthening? Did Paul, which draweth us far away from the elements of the world, which condemneth nothing more than the sticking to such petty observation? But this I boldly pronounce not of my selfe, but from the Lord. Who so call oyle the oyle of salvation, they forsweare the salvation which is in Christ, they deny Christ, they have no part in the kingdome of God. For oyle is for the belly, and the belly for oyle, the Lord shall destroy both. For all these weake elements, which decay with very use, belong nothing to the kingdome of God, which is spirituall, and shall never decay. What then? will some men say: doe you measure with the same measure, the water wherewith we be baptised, and the bread and wine under which the Supper of the Lord is given? I answer, that in Sacraments given of God, two things are to bee looked unto: the substance of the bodily thing which is set before us, and the forme that is by the word of God printed in it, wherein lieth the whole strength. In respect therefore that the bread, wine, and water that are in the Sacraments offered to our sight, doe keepe their owne substance, this saying of Paul alway hath place, Meat for the belly, and the belly for meates: God shall destroy them both. For they passe and vanish away with the fashion of this world. But in respect that they be sanctified by the word of God, that they may be Sacraments, they doe not hold us in the flesh, but doe truly and spiritually teach us.

8 But let us yet more neerely looke into it, how many monsters this fat liquor fostereth and feedeth. These anointers say, that the holy Ghost is given in baptisme, to innocencie: in confirmation, to encrease of grace: that in Baptisme, we are new begotten into life: in confirmation, we are prepared to battell. And they are so past shame, that they deny that Baptisme can well be done without confirmation. O wickednesse! Are wee not therefore in Baptisme buried together with Christ, being made partakers of his death, that we may be also partners of his resurrection? But this fellowship

lowship with the death and life of Christ, Paul expoundeth to bee the mortifying of Rom. 6. 4. our flesh, and quickning of our spirit: for that our old man is crucified, that wee may walke in newnesse of life. What is to be armed to battell if this be not? If they counted it a matter of nothing to tread under feet the word of God: why did they not yet at least reverence the Church, to whom they will in every point seeme so obedient? But what can bee brought forth more strong against their doctrine, than that decree of the Millevitane Councell? Who so saith, that Baptisme is given onely for forgivenesse of sinnes, and not for a helpe of grace to come, accursed be he. But whereas Luke, in the place which we have alleadged, Acts 8. 16. saith that they were baptised in the name of Jesus Christ, which had not received the holy Ghost: he doth not simply deny that they were endued with any gift of the holy Ghost, which beleeved in Christ with heart, and confessed him with mouth: but meaneth of that receiving of the holy Ghost, whereby the open powers and visible graces were received. So Is it said that the Acts 2. 4. Apostles received the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, whereas it had been long before said unto them of Christ, It is not you that speake, but the Spirit of my Father which speaketh in you. Behold all ye that are of God, the malicious and poysonous deceit of Sathan. That thing which was truly given in Baptisme, he lyingly saith to be given in his confirmation, that he may by stealth leade you unaware from Baptisme. Who now can doubt that this is doctrine of Sathan, which cutting away from Baptisme the promises properly belonging to Baptisme, doth conveigh away and remove them, to another thing? It is found (I say) upon what manner of foundation this godly anointing standeth. The word of God is, that all they which are baptised in Christ,
Gal. 3. 27. De consc. dist. 5. cap. Sp. have put on Christ with his gifts. The word of the Anointers is, that they received in Baptisme no promise, by which they may bee armed in battailes. That is the voice of truth, therefore this must be the voice of lying. Therefore I can more truly define this confirmation than they have hitherto defined it: namely, that it is a notable slander of Baptisme, which darkeneth, yea abolisheth the use thereof: that it is a false promise of the Devill, which draweth us away from the word of God. Or if you will, it is oyle defiled with the lying of the Devill, which as it were by overspreading of darkenesse deceiveth the eyes of the simple.

Christianity imagined imperfect without confirmation and but halfe Christianity

Verba cap. 1. de consc. dist. 5. con. aurel. bap. ut leiuni.

9 They adde furthermore, that all the faithfull ought after Baptisme to receive the holy Ghost by laying on of hands, that they may bee found full Christians: because he shall never be a Christian, that is not chresmed with the Bishops Confirmation. These be their owne sayings word for word. But I had thought that whatsoever things pertained to Christianity, were all set forth in writing and comprehended in Scriptures. Now, as I perceive, the true forme of Religion is to be sought and learned from elsewhere than out of the Scriptures. Therefore the whole wisdome of God, the heavenly truth, the whole doctrine of Christ, doth but begin Christians, and oyle maketh them perfect. By this sentence are damned all the Apostles, and so many Martyrs, whom it is most certaine to have never beene chresmed: forasmuch as the oyle was not yet made, which being powred upon them, they might fulfill all the parts of Christianitie, or rather might be made Christians which yet were none. But though I hold my peace, they do largely confute themselves. For how many of the number of their owne people doe they anoint after Baptisme? why therefore doe they suffer such halfe Christians in their flocke, whose imperfection might easily bee holpen? Why doe they with so careleſse negligence suffer them to omit that which was not lawfull to be omitted without grievous offence? Why doe they no more severely call upon the keeping of a thing so necessary, and without which salvation cannot bee obtained, unlesse peradventure some bee prevented by death? Verily when they so freely suffer to be despised, they secretly confesse that it is not of so great value as they boast it.

 Confirmation preferred before Baptisme in worthinesse, because that administred by a Bishop.*

* 10 Last of all they determine that this holy anointing is to bee had in greater reverence than Baptisme: because this anointing is peculiarly ministred by the hands of the chiefe Bishops, but Baptisme is commonly distributed by every Priest. What may a man here say, but that they are utterly mad, which so flatter their owne inventions, that in comparison of them they carelesly despise the holy ordinances of God?

O mouth that robbeſt God, dareſt thou ſet a fat liquor onely defiled with the ſtinke of thine owne breath, and enchanted with murmuring ſound of wordes, againſt the Sacrament of Chriſt, and to compare it with water hallowed with the word of God? But thy wickednesſe accounted this but a ſmall matter; unleſſe thou didſt alſo preferr it above the ſame. Theſe be the anſwers of the holy ſea, theſe be the oracles of the Apoſtolike treſtle. But ſome of them, even in their owne opinion, began ſomewhat to qualifie this unbridled madneſſe. It is (ſay they) to be worſhipped with greater reverence: peradventure not for the greater vertue and profit that it giveth: but becauſe it is given of the worthier men, and is made in the worthier part of the body, that is, in the forehead: or becauſe it bringeth a greater increaſe of vertues, although Baptiſme avalle more to forgiveneſſe. But in the firſt reaſon do they not bewray themſelves to be Donatiſts, which meaſure the force of the Sacrament by the worthineſſe of the miniſter. But I will admit, that Confirmation be called the worthier by reaſon of the worthineſſe of the Biſhops hand. But if a man aske of them, from whence ſo great prerogative hath been given to Biſhops, what reaſon will they bring beſides their owne luſt? The Apoſtles alone uſed that power, which alone diſtributed the holy Ghoſt. Are the Biſhops alone Apoſtles? Yea are they Apoſtles at all? But let us alſo grant them that: why doe they not by the ſame argument affirme, that Biſhops alone ought to touch the Sacrament of the blood in the Supper of the Lord: which they therefore denie to lay men, becauſe the Lord gave to the Apoſtles alone? If to the Apoſtles alone, why do they not conclude: therefore to the Biſhops alone? But in that place they make the Apoſtles, ſimple Prieſts: but now the giddineſſe of their head carrieth them another way, ſuddenly to create them Biſhops. Finally Ananias was no Apoſtle, to whom yet Paul was ſent that he ſhould receive his ſight, be baptiſed, and be filled with the holy Ghoſt. I will adde this alſo to the heape. If by the law of God this was the proper office of Biſhops, why have they been ſo bold to give it away to common Prieſts? as we reade in a certaine Epiſtle of Gregorie.

Act. 19. 17. Diſt. 19. cap. prevenit.

Confirmation the worthier becauſe in it the former, in baptiſme the binder part of the head annointed.

12 As for their other reaſon, how trifling, fond, and fooliſh is it, to call their confirmation worthier than the baptiſme of God, becauſe in it the forehead is anointed with oyle, and in baptiſme the hinder part of the head, as though baptiſme were done with the oyle and not with the water? I call all the godly to witneſſe, whether thoſe loſels doe not endeavour themſelves to this onely end, to corrupt the pureneſſe of the Sacraments with their leaven. I have already ſpoken this in another place, that in the Sacraments, that which is of God, ſcarcely glimmereth through at holes, among the rout of the inventions of men. If any man did not beleeve me therein, let him now beleeve his owne Maſters. Loe paſſing over the water, and making no account of it, they highly eſteeme the onely oyle in baptiſme. Wee therefore on the contrary ſide do ſay that in Baptiſme the forehead alſo is dipped in water. In compariſon of this, wee eſteeme not their oyle worth one peece, whether it be in baptiſme or in confirmation. If any alleadge that it is ſold for more, by this adding of price, the goodneſſe (if any were in it) is corrupted: ſo much leſſe may they commend a moſt filthy deceit by theft. In the third reaſon they bewray their owne ungodlineſſe, while they prate that in confirmation is given a greater increaſe of vertues than in Baptiſme. By the laying on of hands the Apoſtles diſtributed the viſible graces of the ſpirit. In what thing doe theſe mens fat liquor ſhew it ſelfe fruitfull? But away with theſe qualifiers, that cover one ſacriledge with many ſacriledges. It is like the Gordian: which it is better to breake in ſunder, than to labour ſo much in undoing it.

Confirmation not eſtabliſhed by conſent of antiquity, and if it were yet not proved thereby a ſacrament.

12 But now when they ſee themſelves deſtitute of the word of God and probable reaſon, they pretend as they are wont, that it is a moſt ancient obſervation and ſtabliſhed by conſent of many ages. Although that were true, yet they winne nothing thereby. A Sacrament is not from the earth, but from heaven: not from men, but from God alone. They muſt prove God to be the authour of their Confirmation if they will have it taken for a Sacrament. But why do they object antiquity, whereas the old writers, when they minde to ſpeake properly, do no where reckon moe Sacraments than two? If a fortreſſe of our faith were to be ſought from men, wee have an invincible tower, that the old fathers never acknowledged thoſe for ſacraments which theſe men doe lyingly faigne to the ſacraments. The old writers ſpeake of laying on of hands: but doe they call it a Sacrament? Auguſtine plainely affirmeth that it is no other thing than prayer. Neither let them here barke againſt mee with their ſtinking diſtinctions, that Auguſtine meant that, not of the laying on of hands uſed to confirmation, but which was uſed to healing or reconciliation. The booke remaineth and is abroad in the hands of men. If I wreſt it to any other ſence than Auguſtine himſelfe wrote it, I give them leave after their ordinary manner to oppreſſe me, not onely with railing: but alſo with ſpitting at me. For he ſpeaketh of them that returned from ſchiſme to the unity of the Church. He denieth that they needed to be newly baptiſed: for hee ſaith, that the laying on of hands ſufficeth, that by the bond of peace the Lord may give them the holy Ghoſt. But for as much as it might ſeeme an abſurdity, that the laying on of hands ſhould be done of new rather than Baptiſme: he ſheweth a difference. For (ſaith he) what other thing is the laying on of hands, than prayer upon a man? And that this is his meaning appeareth by another place, where he ſaith: Hand is laid upon Heretikes amended, for the coupling of Charitie, which is the greateſt gift of the holy Ghoſt, without which whatſoever holy things are in man, they availe not to ſalvation.

Liber 2. de bap. contra Donat. c. 16.

Lib. 5. c. 23.

The ancient right and profitable uſe of the confirmation.

13 But I would to God we did keepe ſtill the manner which I have ſaid to have beene in the old time, before that this untimely delivered image of a Sacrament was borne: not that it ſhould be ſuch a confirmation as they faigne, which cannot once be named without injury to baptiſme: but a Catechiſing, whereby children or they that were neere to the age of diſcretion did declare an account of their faith before the Church. But it ſhould be the beſt manner of Catechiſing, if a forme were written to that uſe, containing and familiarly ſetting out a ſumme in a manner of all the Articles of our Religion, in which the whole Church of the faithfull ought without controverſie to agree: that a child being ten yeeres old ſhould offer himſelfe to the Church to declare a confeſſion of his faith, ſhould be examined of every article, and anſwer to every one: if hee were ignorant of any thing, or did not underſtand it, he might be taught. So ſhould he before the Church witneſſing and beholding it, profeſſe the onely, true, and pure faith, wherewith the people of the faithfull doth with one minde worſhip the one God. If this diſcipline were at this day in force, truely the ſlothfulneſſe of ſome parents would be whetted, who doe careleſſly neglect the inſtruction of their children as a thing nothing belonging to them, which then without open ſhame they could not omit: there ſhould bee among Chriſtian people a greater conſent of faith, and not ſo great ignorance and rudeneſſe of many: ſome ſhould not be ſo raſhly carried away with new and ſtrange doctrines: finally all ſhould have as it were a certaine orderly inſtruction of Chriſtian learning.

Of Penance.

The ancient laying on of hands by the Biſhop and Clergie after penance holy and healthfull for the Church.

14 In the next place they ſet penance, of which they intreat ſo confuſedly and diſorderly, that conſciences can beare away no ſure or ſound thing of their doctrine. We have already in another place declared at large what we have learned out of the Scriptures concerning repentance, and then what they alſo teach of it. Now we have this onely to touch, what reaſon they had that raiſed up the opinion, which hath heretofore reigned in Churches and Schooles, that it is a Sacrament. But firſt I will briefly ſay ſomewhat of the uſage of the old Church, the preſence whereof they have abuſed to ſtabliſh their faigned invention. This order they kept in publike penance, that they which had fully done the ſatisfaction enjoyned them, were reconciled with ſolemne laying on of hands. That was the ſigne of abſolution, whereby both the ſinner himſelfe was raiſed up before God with truſt of pardon and the Church was admoniſhed gently to receive him into favour, putting away the remembrance of his offence. This Cyprian oftentimes calleth, to give peace. That this doing might be of great dignity, and have more commendation among the people it was ordained that the biſhops authority ſhould alway be vſed for the meane herein. From hence came that decree of the ſecond Councell at Carthage: Be it not lawfull to a Prieſt at the Maſſe publikely to reconcile a penitent. And another decree of the Councell at Arauſium, let thoſe which in time of their penance depart out of this life, be admitted to the Communion without the laying on of hands used in the reconciling: if they recover of their sicknes let them stand in the degree of penitents, and when the time is fully expired, let them receive of the Bishop the laying on of hands used in reconciling. Againe the decree of the third Councell at Carthage: Let not the Priest without the authoritie of the Bishop, reconcile a penitent. All these tended to this end, that the severitie which they would have to be used in that behalfe, should not with too much lenitie grow to decay. Therefore they willed the Bishop to be judge of it, which was likely that he would be more circumspect in the examination thereof. Howbeit Cyprian in a certaine place sheweth, that not onely the Bishop, but also the whole Clergie laid their hands on him. For thus he saith. At the full time they doe penance, then they come to the Communion, and by the laying on of hands of the Bishop and the Clergie they receive power to partake of the Communion. Afterward by processe of time it came to this point, that beside publick penance they used this ceremonie also in private absolutions. Hereupon came that distinction in Gratian betweene publick and private reconciliation. I judge that same old usage of which Cyprian maketh mention, to haue beene holy and healthfull for the Church, and I would that it were at this day restored. As for this latter, although I dare not disallow it, or speake more sharply against it, yet I thinke it to be lesse necessarie. Howsoever it be, yet we see that the laying on of hands in penance is a ceremonie ordained of men, not of God, which is to be set among meane things and outward exercises: and those verily which are not to be despised, but which ought to be in a lower degree than those that are commended unto us by the word of the Lord.

Cap. 33.

Decret. 26. quæst. 6.

15 But the Romanists and Schoolemen, (which have an ordinarie custome to corrupt all things with wrong expounding them) doe here very carefully travell in finding out a Sacrament. Neither ought it to seeme any marvell, for they seeke a knot in a rush. But where they have it best, they leave a thing entangled in suspense, uncertaine, and confounded and troubled with diversitie of opinions. They say therefore that the outward penance is a Sacrament, and if it bee so, that it ought to bee taken for a signe of the inward penance, that is, of the contrition of heart, which shall bee the thing of the Sacrament: or that they both together are a Sacrament, not two Sacraments, but one full one. But, that the outward penance is onely the Sacrament: the inward is both the thing and the Sacrament: and that the forgivenesse of sinnes is called the thing and not the Sacrament. Let them which keepe in remembrance the definition of a Sacrament which we have above set, examine thereby that which these men call a Sacrament, and they shall finde that it is not an outward ceremonie ordained of the Lord for the confirming of our faith. If they cavill that my definition is not a law which they need to obey: let them heare Augustine, whom they faigne that they esteeme as most holy. Visible Sacraments (saith hee) were ordained for carnall mens sake, that by degrees of Sacraments they may bee conveighed from those things that are seene with eyes to those things that are understood. What like thing doe either they themselves see, or can they shew to other in that which they call the Sacrament of Penance? The same Augustine saith in another place: It is therefore called a Sacrament, because in it one thing is seene, and another thing is to be understood. That which is seene hath a bodily forme, that which is understood, hath a spirituall fruit. Neither doe these things in any wise agree with the Sacrament of Penance such as they faigne it, where there is no bodily forme that may represent a spirituall fruit.

Sermone De bap. infant.

16 And, to kill these beasts upon their owne fighting place, if there be any Sacrament here to be sought, may it not bee much more colourably said that the absolution of the Priest is a Sacrament, than Penance either inward or outward? for it might readily bee said, that it is a ceremonie to assure our faith of the forgivenesse of sinnes, and hath a promise of the keyes as they call it, Whatsoever yee shall binde or loose upon earth, shall be bound or loosed in heaven. But some man would have objected, that the most part of them that are absolved of the Priests obtaine no such thing by such absolution, whereas by their doctrine the Sacraments of the new law ought to worke indeed that which they figure. This were but to bee laughed at. For, as in the Supper, they make a double eating, a Sacramentall eating, which is equally common to good and to evill, and a ſpirituall eating which is onely proper to the good: why might they not alſo faigne that abſolution is received two wayes? Yet could I not hitherto underſtand what they meant with this their doctrine, which wee have alreadie taught how far it diſagreeth from the truth of God, when we purpoſely intreated of that argument. Here my mind is onely to ſhew, that this doubt withſtandeth not, but that they may call the abſolution of the Prieſt a Sacrament. For they might anſwer by the mouth of Auguſtine that ſanctification is without the viſible Sacrament, and the viſible Sacrament without inward ſanctification. Againe, that the Sacraments doe worke in the onely elect that which they figure. Againe, that ſome doe put on Chriſt ſo farre as to the partaking of the Sacrament, otherſome to ſanctification: the one, the good and evill equally doe: this other the good onely. Truly they have more than childiſhly erred and be blinded in the cleere ſunne, which travelling with great hardneſſe, yet eſpied not a thing ſo plaine and open to every man.

Absolution after penance though not a Sacrament, yet rather a Sacrament than penance it selfe.

Lib. 3 quæ. vet. Teſtament. De bap. par. Liber 5. de bap. contr. Donat.

Reaſons why penance can be no Sacrament.

17 Yet leaſt they ſhould waxe too proud, in what part ſoever they ſet the Sacrament, I denie that it ought rightfully to bee taken for a Sacrament. Firſt, becauſe there is no ſpeciall promiſe to it, which is the onely ſubſtance of a Sacrament. Againe, becauſe whatſoever ceremonie is here ſhewed forth, it is the meere invention of men: whereas wee have already proved that the ceremonies of Sacraments cannot be ordained but of God. Therefore it was a lie and deceit which they have invented of the Sacrament of Penance. This faigned Sacrament they have garniſhed with a meete commendation, calling it a ſecond boord after ſhipwracke, becauſe if a man have by ſinning marred the garment of innocencie which hee received in Baptiſme, he may by penance repaire it. But it is the ſaying of Hierom. Whoſoever it be, it cannot be excuſed but that it is utterly wicked if it be expounded after their meaning. As though Baptiſme bee blotted out by ſinne, and is not rather to bee called to remembrance of every ſinner, ſo oft as hee thinketh of the forgiveneſſe of ſinne, that he may thereby gather up himſelfe, and recover courage, and ſtrengthen his faith? that hee ſhall obtaine the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes which is promiſed him in Baptiſme. But that which Hierome hath ſpoken hardly and unproperly, that by penance Baptiſme is repaired (from which they fall away that deſerve to be excommunicate from the Church) theſe good expoſitors draw to their wickedneſſe. Therefore you ſhall moſt fitly ſpeake, if you call Baptiſme the Sacrament of Penance, ſith it is given for a confirmation of grace, and ſeale of confidence, to them that purpoſe repentance. And leaſt you ſhould thinke this to be our deviſe, beſide this that it agreeth with the words of the Scripture, it appeareth that it was in the old Church commonly ſpoken like a moſt certaine principle. For in the booke of Faith to Peter, which is ſaid to be Auguſtines, it is called the Sacrament of Faith and of Penance. And why flee we to uncertaine ſayings? As though we could require any thing more plaine, than that which the Evangeliſt reciteth: that Iohn preached the Baptiſme of repentance unto forgiveneſſe of ſinnes?

Of Extreme unction as they call it.

The annointing of the ſicke which was uſed in the time of the Apoſtles, no ſuch matter as popiſh extreme unction.

18 The third faigned Sacrament is Extreme unction, which is not done but of the Prieſt, and that in extremes (ſo they terme it) and with oyle conſecrate of the Biſhop, and with this forme: By this holy annointing, and by his moſt kinde mercie, God pardon thee, whatſoever thou haſt offended by ſeeing, by hearing, by ſmelling, feeling, taſting. They faigne that there be two vertues of it, the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, and eaſe of bodily ſickneſſe if it be ſo expedient: if not, the ſalvation of the ſoule. They ſay that the inſtitution of it is ſet of Iames, whoſe words are theſe: Is any ſicke among you? Let him bring in the Elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, annointing him with oyle in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith ſhall ſave the ſicke man, and the Lord ſhall raiſe him up: and if he be in ſinnes, they ſhall be forgiven him. Of the ſame ſort is this annointing, of which wee have above ſhewed that the other laying on of hands is, namely a playerlike hypocriſie, whereby without reaſon and without fruit they would reſemble the Apoſtles. Marke rehearſeth that the Apoſtles at their firſt ſending, according to the commandement which they have received of the Lord, raised up dead men, cast out devils, cleansed leprous men, healed the sicke, and that in healing of the sicke they used oyle. They annointed (saith hee) many sicke men with oyle, and they were healed. Hereunto James had respect, when he commanded the Elders to bee called together to annoint the sicke man. That under such Ceremonies is contained no higher mystery, they shall easily judge which marke how great liberty the Lord and his Apostles used in these outward things. The Lord going about to restore sight to the blind man, made clay of dust and spettle, some he healed with touchings, othersome with his word. After the same manner the Apostles healed some diseases with the word only, some with touching, other some with annointing. But it is likely that this annointing was not (as all other things also were not) causelessly put in ure, I grant: yet not that it should bee a meane of healing, but onely a signe, that the dulnesse of the unskilfull might be put in mind from whence so great power proceeded, to this end that they should not give the praise thereof to the Apostles. And that the holy Ghost and his gifts are signified by oyle it is a common and usuall thing. But that same grace of healing is vanished away, like as also the other miracles, which the Lord willed to bee shewed for a time, whereby he might make the new preaching of the Gospell marvellous for ever. Therefore though we grant never so much, that annointing was a Sacrament of those powers which were then ministred by the hands of the Apostles, it now nothing pertaineth to us to whom the ministration of such powers is not committed.

John 9.6. Mat. 9.29. Luce 18.42. Act. 3.6. & 5.15. & 19.12. Psal. 45.8.

19 And by what greater reason doe they make a Sacrament of this annointing, than of all other signes that are rehearsed to us in the Scripture? Why doe they not appoint some Syloah to swim in, whereinto at certaine ordinary recourses of time sicke men may plunge themselves? That (say they) should bee done in vaine. Truly no more in vaine than annointing. Why doe they not lye along upon dead men, because Paul raised up a dead child with lying upon him? Why is not clay made of spittle and dust, a Sacrament? But the other were but singular examples: but this is given of James for a commandement. Verily James spake for the same time, when the Church yet still enjoyed such blessing of God. They affirme indeed that there is yet still the same force in their annointing: but we find it otherwise by experience. Let no man now marvell, how they have with such boldnesse mocked soules, which they know to be senslesse and blind when they are spoiled of the Word of God, that is, of their life and light: sith they are nothing ashamed to goe about to mocke the living and feeling senses of the body. Therefore they make themselves worthy to be scorned, while they boast that they are endued with the grace of healings. The Lord verily is present with his in all ages, and so oft as need is he helpeth their sicknesses no lesse than in old time: but he doth not so utter those manifest powers, nor distributeth miracles by the hands of the Apostles: because this gift both was but for a time, and also is partly fallen away by the unthankfulnesse of men.

Extreme annointing a fruitelesse and unwarranted ceremonie.
John 9.7. Act. 10.16.

20 Therefore as not without cause the Apostles have by the signe of oyle openly testified, that the grace of healings committed to them was not their owne power, but the power of the holy Ghost: so on the other side they are wrong doers to the holie Ghost, which make a stinking oyle and of no force, to be his power. This is altogether like as if one would say that all oyle is the power of the holy Ghost, because it is called by that name in Scripture: that every dove is the holy Ghost, because hee appeared in that forme. But these things, let them looke too. So much as for this present is enough for us, wee doe most certainly perceive that their annointing is no Sacrament: which is neither a Ceremonie ordained of God, nor hath any promise. For when wee require these two things in a Sacrament, that it be a ceremonie ordained of God, and that it have a promise of God: we doe therewithall require that the same ceremonie be given to us, and that the promise belong unto us. For no man doth affirme that Circumcision is now a Sacrament of the Christian Church, although it both was an ordinance of God, and had a promise knit unto it: because it was neither commanded to us, nor the promise which was adjoyned to it was given to us with the same condition. That the promise which they proudly boast of in their annointing, is not given to us, we have evidently shewed, and they themselves declare by experience.

But this annointing hath neither ordinance of God to be grounded on nor promise of grace annexed.
Mar. 3.16. John 1.32.

rience. The ceremonie ought not to have beene used, but of them that were endued with the grace of healings, not of these butchers that can more skill of slaying and murthering than of healing.

S. James did command annointing as a thing to continue in the Church, yet not annointing at such unseasonable time, by such persons, with such oyle, in such perswasion, as the Church of Rome useth. Jam. 5. 14.

21 Howbeit although they obtaine this, that that which James commandeth concerning annointing, agreeth with this age (which they are most farre from) yet even so they shall not have much prevailed in proving of their unction wherewith they have hitherto annointed us. James willeth that all sicke men be annointed: these men infect with their fat liquor, not sicke men, but corpses halfe dead, when the life lyeth alreadie labouring at the top of their lips, or (as they themselves terme it) in extremes. If they have in their Sacrament a present medicine, whereby they may either ease the sharpnesse of diseases, or at least may bring some comfort to the soule, they are too cruell that doe never heale in time. James willeth that the sicke man bee annointed of the elders of the Church: these men allow no annointer but the petty sacrificing Priest. Whereas they expound in Iames presbyteros the Elders to bee Priests, and fondly say that the plurall number is there set for comelinesse sake: that is but trifling: as though the Churches at that time abounded with swarms of sacrificing Priests, that they might goe in a long pompous shew to carrie a Pageant of holy oyle. When Iames simply biddeth that sicke men bee annointed, I understand by it none other annointing but of common oyle: and none other is found in Markes rehersall. These men vouchsafe to have none other oyle, but that which is hallowed of the Bishop, that is to say, warmed with much breathing on it, enchanted with much mumbling, and with the knee bowed nine times saluted in this manner: thrise haile holy oyle: thrise haile holy Chrisme: thrise haile holy balme. Out of whom have they sucked such conjurations? Iames saith: that when the sicke man is annointed with oyle, and prayer hath beene pronounced over him, if he be in sinnes they shall be forgiven him: namely, that the guiltinesse being taken away, they may obtaine release of the paine: not meaning that sinnes are put away with fat liquor, but that the prayers of the faithfull whereby the afflicted brother is commended to God, shall not be vaine. These men doe wickedly lye, that by their holy, that is to say, abominable annointing, sinnes are forgiven. Loe how gaily they shall prevaile, when they have beene at large suffered to abuse the testimony of Iames at their pleasure. And least we should need to travell long in proofe hereof, their owne Chronicles doe discharge us of this hardnesse. For they report that Pope Innocentius, which in Augustines time governed the Church of Rome, ordained that not only Priests, but also all Christians should use oile to annoint for their necessity and others. Author hereof is Sigebert in his Chronicles.

Of Ecclesiasticall Orders.

In their Sacrament of orders seven petite Sacraments contained or no some of them doe thinke more.

22 The fourth place in their register hath the Sacrament of Order, but the same so fruitfull, that it breedeth out of it selfe seven little Sacraments. But this is very worthy to bee laughed at, that whereas they affirme that there bee seven Sacraments, when they goe about to rehearse them, they reckon upon thirteene. Neither can they alleadge for themselves, that they are but one Sacrament, because they tend all to one Priesthood, and are as it were certaine degrees unto it. For sith it is evident that in every one of them are severall Ceremonies, and they themselves say that there bee divers graces: no man can doubt but that they ought to bee called seven Sacraments, if there opinions bee received. And why strive wee about it as though it were a thing doubtfull, for as much as they themselves doe plainely and severally declare seven? But first wee will briefly knit up by the way, how many and how unsavoury absurdities they thrust in unto us, when they goe about to commend to us their Orders in stead of Sacraments; and then wee will see whether the Ceremonie which Churches use in ordering of Ministers, ought to bee called a Sacrament at all. They make therefore seven Ecclesiasticall orders or degrees, which they garnish with the name of a Sacrament. Those bee dorekeepers, Readers, Exorcistes, Acoluthes or followers, Subdeacons, Deacons, Priests. And seven they say that they bee, for the sevenfold grace of the holy Ghost, wherewith they ought to bee endued that are promoted unto them. But it is increased and more largely heaped to them in their promotion. Now the number it ſelf is hallowed with a wrongful expounding of the Scripture, when they thinke that they have read in Eſay ſeven vertues of the holy Ghoſt, whereas both indeed Eſay there rehearſeth but ſixe, and alſo the Prophet meant not to comprehend them all in that place: for he is elſewhere as well called the Spirit of life, of ſanctification, of adoption of the children, as hee is in that place called the Spirit of wiſedome, of underſtanding, of councell, of ſtrength, of knowledge, and of the feare of the Lord. Howbeit ſome ſubtill-men, make not ſeven orders, but nine, after the likeneſſe (as they ſay) of the Church triumphing. But among them alſo there is ſtrife: becauſe ſome would have the ſhaving of the cleargie to bee the firſt order of all, and Biſhopricke the laſt: otherſome excluding ſhaving altogether, reckon Archbiſhopricke among the orders. Iſidore otherwiſe divideth them. For hee maketh Pſalmiſts and Readers to bee divers: hee appointeth the Pſalmiſts for ſongs, and the Readers to the reading of the Scriptures, wherewith the people may bee inſtructed. And this diſtinction is kept by the Canons. In ſo great diverſity what will they have us to follow or flee? Shall wee ſay that there bee ſeven orders? So teacheth the maſter of the ſchoole: but the moſt illuminate doctors doe otherwiſe determine. Againe they alſo diſagree among themſelves. Moreover the moſt ſacred Canons call us another way. Thus forſooth do men agree, when they diſpute of godly matters without the word of God.

23. But this exceedeth all folly, that in every one of theſe they make Chriſt fellow with them. Firſt (ſay they) he executed the office of dore-keeper, when hee did with a whip made of cords, drive the buiers and ſellers out of the temple. Hee ſignifieth himſelfe to be a dore-keeper, when he ſaith, I am the dore. Hee tooke upon him the office of a Reader, when he read Eſay in the Synagogue. Hee did the office of an Exorciſt, when touching the tongue and eares of the deafe and dumbe man, hee reſtored to him his hearing. He teſtified himſelfe to bee an Acoluth or follower in theſe words. He that followeth mee walketh not in darkeneſſe. Hee executed the office of a Subdeacon, when being girded with a linnen cloth he waſhed the diſciples feet. He did beare the perſon of a Deacon, when hee diſtributed his Body and Bloud in the Supper. Hee fulfilled the office of Prieſt, when hee offered himſelfe upon the croſſe a ſacrifice to his Father. Theſe things cannot ſo bee heard without laughing, that I marvell that they were written without laughing, if yet they were men that wrote them. But moſt notable is their ſubtiltie wherewith they play the Philoſophers about the name of Acoluth, calling him a Ceroferar, a taper bearer with a word (as I thinke) of ſorcery, truly ſuch a one as was never heard of in all nations and languages, whereas Acoluthos in Greeke ſimply ſignifieth a follower. Howbeit if I ſhould earneſtly tarry in confuting theſe men, I ſhould my ſelfe alſo worthily bee laughed at, they are ſo trifling and very mockeries.

24. But that they may not bee able yet ſtill with falſe colours to deceive even very ſilly women, their vanitie is by the way to bee uttered. They create with great pompe and ſolemnity their Readers, Pſalmiſts, Dorekeepers, Acoluthes, to execute thoſe offices, whereunto they appoint very children, or thoſe whom they call lay men. For who for the moſt part lighteth the candles, who powreth wine and water into the cruet, but a childe or ſome baſe fellow of the laity, that maketh his gaine thereof? Doe not the ſame men ſing, Doe they not ſhut and open the Church dores? For who ever ſaw in their Temples an Acoluth, or Dorekeeper executing his office? But rather he that when hee was a boy did the office of an Acoluth, when hee is once admitted into the order of Acoluthes, ceaſeth to bee that which hee beginneth to bee called, that they may ſeeme to will of purpoſe to caſt off the office when they take upon them the title. Behold why they have need to be conſecrate by Sacraments, and to receive the holy Ghoſt, namely, that they may doe nothing. If they alleage for excuſe, that this is the frowardneſſe of times, that they forſake and neglect their miniſteries: let them therewithall confeſſe that there is at this day in the Church no uſe nor fruit of their holy orders, which they marvellouſly advance, and that their whole Church is full of curſe; becauſe it ſuffereth tapers and cruets to bee handled of children and prophane men, which none are worthy to touch but they that are conſecrate Acoluthes: and because it committeth the songs to children, which ought not to be heard but of a hallowed mouth. As for their Exorcists, to what end doe they consecrate them? I heare that the Jewes had their Exorcists: but I see that they were so called of the exorcismes or conjurations which they used. Of these counterfait exorcists who ever heard it spoken, that they shewed any example of their profession? It is fained that they have power given them to lay their hands upon mad men, them that are to be catechised, and men possessed with devills: but they cannot perswade the divels that they have such power, because the devills doe not onely not yeeld to their commandements, but also use commanding authority over them. For a man can scarcely find every tenth of them, that is not led with an evill Spirit. Therefore whatsoever things they babble concerning their petty Orders, they are patched together of fooliſh and unsavory lies. Of the old Acoluthes, and Dorekeepers, and Readers, wee have spoken in another place, when we declared the order of the Church. Our purpose here is onely to fight against that new found invention of the sevenfold sacrament in Ecclesiasticall orders. Of which there is no where any thing read, but among these fooliſh praters the Sorboniſts and Canoniſts.

Rasure of the crowne ministred in token of spiritual kinglike dignity, and sceptre to that purpose ab sed.

Cap. Dupl. 12 quæſt.

25. Now let us consider of the ceremonies which they use about it. First whomsoever they receive into their order of soldiers, they doe with one common signe enter them into Clergie. For they shave them in the crowne, that the crowne may betoken kingly dignity, because Clearks ought to bee kings, that they may rule themselves and other. For Peter speaketh thus of them, Ye are a chosen kinde, a kingly priesthood, a holy nation, a people of purchase. But it was sacrileage to take to themselves alone that which is given to the whole Church, and proudly to glory of the title which they had taken from the faithfull. Peter speaketh to the whole Church: these fellowes wrest it to a few shaven men: as though it were said to them alone: bee yee holy: as though they alone were purchased by the bloud of Christ, as though they alone were by Christ made a Kingdome and Priesthood to God. Then they assigne also other reasons: the top of their head is made bare, that their mind may be declared to bee free unto the Lord, which with open face may behold the glory of God. Or that they may bee taught that the faults of their mouth and their eies must bee cut off. Or the shaving of their head is the putting away of temporall things, and the hairie compasse about the crowne are the remnants of goods that are retained for their sustenance. All in signes: because forsooth the vaile of the temple is not yet cut in sunder. Therefore being perswaded that they have gaily discharged their duties, because they have figured such things by their crowne, of the very things indeed they performe nothing at all. How long will they mocke us with such false colours and deceits? The Cleargie by shearing off a few haires doe signifie that they have cast away the abundance of temporall goods, that they behold the glory of God, that they have mortified the lust of the eares and eies: but there is no kind of men more ravening, more senslesly dull, more lustfull. Why doe they not rather truly performe holinesse, than with false and lying signes counterfeit a shew of it?

Act. 18. 18.

26 Moreover when they saw that the crowne of the Cleargie hath the beginning and reason from the Nazarites: what other thing doe they alleadge than that their mysteries are sprung out of the Iewish cerimonies, or rather that they are meere Jewishnesse? But whereas they further say, that Priscilla, Aquila, and Paul himselfe, taking a vow upon them did shearе their heads, that they might bee purified: they bewray their grosse ignorance. For it is no where read of Priscilla: and of Aquila also it is doubtfull: for that same shearing may as well be referred to Paul as to Aquila. But, that wee may not leave to them that which they require, that they have an example of Paul: the simpler must note that Paul did never shearе his head for any sanctification, but onely to serve the weakenesse of his brethren. I am wont to call such vowes the vowes of charity not of godlinesse: that is to say, not taken in hand for any service of God, but to beare with the rudenesse of the weake: as hee himselfe saith, that he was made a Iew to the Iewes, &c. Therefore hee did this, and the same but once, and for a short time, that hee might for a time fashion himselfe to the Iewes. These men when they will without any use counterfait the purifying of the Nazarites. what doe they elſe but raiſe up another Jewiſhneſſe, when they wrongfully covet to follow the old Jewiſhneſſe? With the ſame religiouſneſſe was that decretall Epiſtle made, which according to the Apoſtle, forbiddeth Clearkes that they ſhould not ſuffer their haire to grow, but ſheare it round like a bowle. As though the Apoſtle, when he teacheth what is comely for all men, were carefull for the round thearing of the Cleargie. Hereby let the Readers conſider, of what force and worthineſſe are thoſe other myſteries that follow, into which there is ſuch an entrie.

Cap. prohibemus. Diſt. 25. 1 Cor. 11. 4.

27 Whence the ſhearing of Clerkes tooke beginning, appeareth ſufficiently even by Auguſtine alone. Whereas at that time none ſuffered their haire to grow, but nice men, and ſuch as coveted a ſmoothneſſe and trimneſſe not meete enough for men: it ſeemed to be a point of no good example, if that were permitted to the Clergie. Therfore Clearkes were commanded either to ſheare their head or to ſhave it, that they ſhould not beare any ſhew of woman-like trimming. But this was ſo common, that certaine Monkes, that they might the more ſet out their holineſſe with notable and ſeverall attire from other men, did let their haire grow long. But afterward when the faſhion turned to wearing of haire, and certaine nations were added to Chriſtiandome which alway uſed to weare long haire, as Fraunce, Germanie, and England: it is likely that Clerkes did every where ſhaare their heads, leaſt they ſhould ſeeme to covet the gaineſſe of haire. At the laſt in a corrupter age, when all old ordinances were either perverted or gone out of kinde into ſuperſtition, becauſe they ſaw no cauſe in the ſhearing of the Cleargie (for they had retained nothing but a fooliſh counterfaiting) they fled to a myſterie, which now they ſuperſtitiouſly thruſt in unto us for the approving of their Sacrament. The doore-keepers at their conſecration receive the keyes of the Church, whereby they may underſtand that the keeping of it is committed to them. The readers receive the holy Bible. The exorciſts receive the formes of exorciſmes, which they ſhould uſe over mad men & them that are to bee catechiſed. The Acoluthes receive their tapers and cruet. Loe theſe are the ceremonies wherein (if God will) there is ſo much ſecret power, that they may be not onely ſignes and tokens, but alſo cauſes of inviſible grace. For this they require by their definition, when they will have them taken among the Sacraments. But to make an end in few words, I ſay it is an abſurditie that in their Schooles and Canons they make theſe leſſer orders Sacraments: whereas even by their owne confeſſion that teach this, they were unknowne to the primitive Church, and deviſed many yeeres after. For Sacraments, ſith they containe the promiſe of God, cannot bee ordained of Angels, nor of men, but of God alone, whoſe office alone it is to give promiſe.

Lib. 4. Sent. Diſt. 24. c. 8.

28 There remaine three orders, which they call the greater. Of the which, Subdeaconrie (as they call it) was removed into that number, ſince that the route of the ſmaller ones began to grow. But becauſe they ſeeme to have a teſtimonie for theſe out of the Word of God, they doe peculiarly for honours ſake, call them holy orders. But now it is to bee ſeene, how crookedly they abuſe the ordinances of God to their pretence. Wee will begin at the order of the Prieſtood or the ſacrificers office. For by theſe two names they ſignifie one thing, and ſo they call them to whom they ſay that it pertaineth to offer upon the Altar the ſacrifice of the bodie and bloud of Chriſt, to pronounce prayers, and to bleſſe the gifts of God. Therefore at their conſecration they receive the Patine with the hoſtes, for tokens of power given to them, to offer acceptable ſacrifices to God. And their hands are annointed: by which ſigne they are taught, that they have power given them to conſecrate. But of the Ceremonies wee ſhall ſpeake hereafter. Of the thing it ſelfe I ſay: it ſo hath no title of the Word of God which they pretend, that they could not more wickedly corrupt the order ſet by God. Firſt verily this ought to ſtand for a thing confeſſed (which wee have affirmed in entreating of the Popiſh Maſſe) that they are all wrong-doers to Chriſt, which call themſelves ſacrificing Prieſts, or offer a ſacrifice of appeaſment. Hee was appointed and conſecrate of the Father a Prieſt with an oath, according to the order of Melchiſedech, without any end, without any ſucceſſour. Hee once offered a ſacrifice of eternall ſatisfactorie cleanſing, and reconciliation: and now alſo being entred into the ſanctuarie of heaven, hee maketh interceſſion for us. In him we we are all ſacrificing Prieſts, but to praiſes and givings of thankes, finally to offer us and ours to God. It was his ſingular office alone, with his offering to appeaſe God, and to purge ſinnes. When theſe men take that upon them, what remaineth but that their ſacrificing Prieſthood is ungodly and full of ſacriledge? Truly they are too wicked, when they dare garniſh it with the name of a Sacrament. As touching the true office of Prieſthood, which is commended to us by the mouth of Chriſt, I willingly account it in that degree. For therein is a ceremonie, firſt taken out of the Scriptures, then ſuch a one as Paul teſtifieth not to be vaine nor ſuperfluous, but a faithfull ſigne of ſpirituall grace. But whereas I have not ſet it for a third in the number of Sacraments, I did it becauſe it is not ordinarie and common among all the faithfull, but a ſpeciall rite for one certaine office. But ſith this honour is given to the Chriſtian miniſterie, there is no cauſe therefore why the Popiſh ſacrificers ſhould bee proud. For Chriſt commanded diſtributers of his Goſpell and myſteries to bee ordained, not ſacrificers to be conſecrated. Hee gave them commandement to preach the Goſpell and to feede the flocke, not to offer ſacrifices. Hee promiſed them the grace of the Holy Ghoſt, not to make ſatisfactorie purging of ſinnes, but rightly to execute and to maintaine the government of the Church.

Blowing and giving the holy Ghoſt in ordaining of Prieſts. John 20. 22.

29 The ceremonies agree very well with the thing it ſelfe. Our Lord when hee ſent forth the Apoſtles to preach the Goſpell, did blow upon them. By which ſigne hee repreſented the power of the holy Ghoſt which he gave unto them. This blowing theſe good men have retained, and as though they did put forth the holy Ghoſt out at their throate, they whiſper over their ſilly Prieſts that they make, Receive the holy Ghoſt. So leave they nothing which they doe not overthwartly counterfait: I will not ſay like players (which uſe their geſturings neither without art nor without ſignification) but like Apes, which counterfait every thing wantonly and without any choice. Wee keepe (ſay they) the example of the Lord. But the Lord did many things which hee willed not to be examples to us. The Lord ſaid to the Diſciples, Receive the holy Ghoſt. Hee ſaid alſo to Lazarus, Lazarus come forth, Hee ſaid to the Man ſicke of the Palſie, Riſe, and walke. Why doe not they ſay the ſame to all dead men and ſicke of the Palſie? Hee ſhewed a proofe of his divine power, when in blowing upon the Apoſtles hee filled them with the grace of the holy Ghoſt. If they goe about to doe the ſame thing, they enviouſly counterfait God, and doe in a manner chalenge him to ſtrive with them: but they are far from the effect, and doe nothing with this fooliſh geſturing but mocke Chriſt. Verily they bee ſo ſhameleſſe, that they dare affirme that they give the holy Ghoſt. But how true that is, experience teacheth, which crieth out that ſo many as bee conſecrated Prieſts are of Horſes made Aſſes, of fooles made mad men. Neither yet doe I ſtrive with them for that: onely I condemne the ceremonie it ſelfe, which ought not to have beene drawne to bee an example, foraſmuch as it was uſed of Chriſt for a ſingular ſigne of one miracle: ſo farre it is off, that the excuſe of following his example ought to defend them.

John 20. 22. John 11. 43. Matt. 9. 5. John 5. 8.

Vnction of Prieſts to the imitation of the Sonnes of Aaron. Lib. 4. Sent. diſt. 24. cap. 8. & in can diſt. 21. cap. 1.

30 But of whom received they the annointing? They anſwer that they received it of the Sonnes of Aaron, from whom their order alſo tooke beginning. Therefore they had rather alway to defend themſelves with wrongfull examples, than to confeſſe that themſelves have deviſed that which they uſe without cauſe. But in the meane time they conſider not, that while they profeſſe themſelves the ſucceſſors of the Sons of Aaron, they are wrong doers of the Prieſthood of Chriſt, which alone was ſhadowed and figured by all the old ſacrificing Prieſthoods. In him therefore they were all contained and fulfilled, in him they ceaſed, as wee have ſometimes already repeated, and the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes without helpe of any gloſſes teſtifieth. But if they bee ſo much delighted with the ceremonies of Moſes, why doe they not haſtily take Oxen, Calves, and Lambes to make ſacrifices? They have indeed a good part of the old Tabernacle and of the whole Jewiſh manner of worſhipping: but yet this wanteth in their religion, that they doe not ſacrifice Calves and Oxen. Who cannot ſee, that this obſervation of annointing is much more hurtfull than Circumciſion, ſpecially when there is adjoyned ſuperſtition and Phariſaicall opinion of the worthineſſe of the worke? For the Jewes did ſet in Circumciſion, truſt of righteouſneſſe: theſe men men doe set in annointing, spirituall graces. Therefore while they covet to be counterfaiters of the Levites, they are made Apostates from Christ, and doe put themselves from the office of Pastors.

31 This is (if God will) the holy oyle that printeth the marke that cannot bee raced out. As though oyle could not be wiped away with dust and salt, or if it sticke faster, with sope. But this marke is spirituall. What hath oyle to doe with the Soule? Have they forgotten that which they oft chaunt to us out of Augustine, that if the word be taken from the water, it shall be nothing but water, and that it hath this from the word that it is a Sacrament? What word will they shew in their fat liquor? Will they shew the commandement that was given to Moses, concerning the annointing of the Sonnes of Aaron? But there is also commandement given, of the coate, the Ephod, the hat, the crowne of holinesse, with which Aaron was to be garnished, and of the coates, girdles, and miters, wherewith the sonnes of Aaron were to be clothed. There is commandement given, to kill a Calfe, and burne the fat of him for incense, to cut Rammes and burne them, to sanctifie their eares and garments with the bloud of another Ramme, and innumerable other observations, which being passed over, I marvell why the only annointing of oyle pleaseth them. But if they love to bee sprinkled, why are they rather sprinkled with oyle than with bloud? Forsooth they goe about a wittie thing, to make one Religion of Christianitie, Jewishnesse, and Paganisme, as it were of patches sowed together. Therefore their annointing stinketh which is without the salt, that is, the Word of God. There remaineth laying on of hands, which as I grant in true and lawfull Orderings to bee a Sacrament, so I denie that it hath any part in this play, where they neither obey the commandement of Christ, nor have respect to the end whereunto the promise ought to lead us. If they will not have the signe denyed them, they must apply it to the thing it selfe, whereunto it is appointed.

No reason why the Church of Rome should in the making of her Priests, use the ceremonie of annointing more than the rest, which were used in the making of Levitical Priests: the laying on of hands in that action which no commandement of God doth warrant. Exod. 30. 31.

32 About the order also of Deaconrie I would not strive with them, if that same ministerie which was in the Apostles time and in the purer Church, were restored to the uncorrupted state thereof. But what like thing have they whom those men faigne to be Deacons? I speake not of the men (least they should complaine that the doctrine is wrongfully weighed by the faultes of the men) but I affirme that for those whom they deliver us by their doctrine, they unworthily fetch testimonie from the example of them whom the Apostolicke Church ordained Deacons. They say that it pertaineth to their Deacons to stand by the Priests, to minister in all things that are done in the Sacraments, namely in Baptisme, in the Chresme, in the Patine, in the Chalice: to bring in the offerings and lay them upon the Altar, to make ready the Lords Table, and to cover it: to carry the Crosse, to pronounce and sing the Gospell and Epistle to the people. Is here any one word of the true ministerie of Deacons? Now let us heare the instituting of them. Upon the Deacon that is ordered, the Bishop alone layeth his hand. He layeth a prayer booke and a Stole upon his left shoulder, that he may understand that hee hath received the light yoke of the Lord, whereby hee may subdue to the feare of God those things that pertaine to the left side. Hee giveth him the text of the Gospell, that hee may perceive himselfe to bee a publisher of it. And what belong these things to Deacons? They doe even like as if a man would say that hee ordained them Apostles whom hee appointed onely to burne frankincense, to trim the Images, to sweepe the Churches, to catch Mice, to drive away Dogs. Who could suffer such kinde of men to bee called Apostles, and to bee compared with the very Apostles of Christ? Therefore let them not hereafter lyingly say that those be Deacons, whom they institute onely for their enterlude-like playes. Yea and by the very name it selfe they sufficiently declare what manner of office they have. For they call them Levites, and will have their order and beginning referred to the children of Levi. Which I give them leave to doe, so that they doe not afterward garnish them with the feathers of other.

The order of Deaconrie.

33 Of Subdeacons to what purpose is it to speake? For whereas indeed they were in old time appointed for care of the poore, they assigne to them I wot not what trifling businesse, as to bring the Chalice with the Patine, the little cruet with water, and the the towell to the Altar, to powre water to wash hands, &c. Now whereas they speake of receiving and bringing in of offerings, they meane those which they devoure as abandoned to their holy use. With this office very well agreeth the forme of their consecrating. That he receive of the Bishop, the Patine and the Chalice: of the Archdeacon, the cruet with water, the manuale, and such other baggage. Within these trifles they require to have us confesse that the holy Ghost is enclosed. What godly man can abide to grant this? But, to make once an end, wee may determine the same of them that we doe of the rest. Neither need wee to repeat further these things that are above declared. This may be enough to teach the sober and willing to learne (whom I have taken in hand to instruct) that there is no Sacrament of God but where is shewed a Ceremonie joyned with a promise: or rather verily but where is a promise seen in a Ceremonie. Here is not found one syllable of any certaine promise: therefore it were in vaine to seeke a Ceremonie to confirme the promise. Againe of those Ceremonies that they use, it is not read that any one is institute of God. Therefore here can be no Sacrament.

The order of Subdeaconrie and the trifling use thereof.

Of Matrimonie.

Matrimonie not thereby proved a Sacrament, because it resembleth our conjoyning with Christ.

34 The last is Matrimonie, which as all men confesse to be ordained of God, so no man untill the time of Gregorie ever saw that it was given for a Sacrament. And what sober man would ever have thought it? It is a good and holy ordinance of God, so tillage, carpentrie, shoomakers craft, barbers craft, are lawfull ordinances of God, and yet they are no Sacraments. For there is not onely this required in a Sacrament, that it be the worke of God, but that it be an outward Ceremonie appointed of God to confirme a promise. That there is no such thing in Matrimonie, very children also can judge. But (say they) it is a signe of the holy thing, that is, of the spirituall conjoyning of Christ with the Church. If by this word Signe, they understand a Token set before us of God to this end to raise up the assuredness of our faith, they are far beside the truth. If they simply take a signe for that which is brought to expresse a similitude, I will shew how wittily they reason. Paul saith, as one starre differeth from another star in brightnesse, so shall bee the resurrection of the dead. Loe here is one Sacrament. Christ saith, The kingdome of heaven is like a graine of mustard seed. Loe here is another. Againe, The kingdome of heaven is like unto leaven. Loe here is the third. Esay saith, Behold, the Lord shall feed his flocke as a shepheard. Loe here the fourth. In another place, The Lord shall goe forth as a Giant. Loe here is the fifth. Finally what end or measure shall there be? There is nothing but by this meane it shall be a Sacrament. How many parables & similitudes are in the Scripture, so many Sacraments there shall be. Yea and theft shall be a Sacrament because it is written, the day of the Lord is like a theefe. Who can abide these Sophisters prating so foolishly? I grant indeed that so oft as wee see a Vine, it is very good to call to remembrance that which Christ saith, I am a Vine, ye be branches, my Father is the vine-dresser. So oft as shepherd with his flocke commeth toward us, it is good also that this come to our minde, I am a good shepherd, my sheepe heare my voice. But if any man adde such similitudes to the number of Sacraments, he is meet to be sent to Antycira.

John 15. 1. John 10. 11. Antycira where groweth Hellebor, a good purgation for phrenetike heads.

35 But they still lay forth the words of Paul, in which hee giveth to Matrimonie the name of a Sacrament: he that loveth his wife, loveth himselfe. No man ever hated his owne flesh, but nourisheth it and cherisheth it, even as Christ doth the Church: because we are members of his bodie, of his flesh and of his bones. For this a man shall leave his Father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall bee two in one flesh. This is a great Sacrament: but I say in Christ and in the Church. But so to handle the Scriptures, is to mingle heaven and earth together. Paul, to shew to maried men what singular love they ought to beare to their wives, setteth forth Christ to them for an example. For as he powred forth the bowels of his kindnesse upon the Church which he had espoused to himselfe: so ought every man to be affectioned toward his owne wife. It followeth after, he that loveth his wife loveth himselfe: as Christ loved the Church. Now to teach how Christ loved the Church as himselfe, yea how he made himselfe one with his Spouse the Church, hee applyeth to him those things things which Moſes reporteth that Adam ſpake of himſelfe. For when Eueh was brought into his ſight, whom he knew to have beene ſhapen out of his ſide: This woman (ſaith hee) is a bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh. Paul teſtifieth that all this was ſpiritually fulfilled in Chriſt and us, when he ſaith that wee are members of his bodie, of his fleſh, and of his bones, yea and one fleſh with him. At length he addeth a concluding ſentence, This is a great myſterie. And leaſt any man ſhould bee deceived with the double ſignifying of the words, hee expreſſeth that hee ſpeaketh not of the fleſhly conjoyning of man and woman, but of the ſpirituall marriage of Chriſt and the Church. And truly it is indeed a great myſterie, that Chriſt ſuffered a rib to be taken from himſelfe, whereof wee might be ſhapen: that is to ſay, when he was ſtrong, he willed to be weake, that we might be ſtrengthned with his ſtrength: that now we may not our ſelves live, but he may live in us.

S. Pauls words wrested to prove Matrimonie a Sacrament. Ephe. 5. 29.

Gal.2.20.

36 The name of Sacrament deceived them. But was it rightfull that the whole Church ſhould ſuffer the puniſhment of their ignorance? Paul ſaid Myſterie: which word when the tranſlator might have left being not unuſed with Latin eares, or might have tranſlated it a Secret: hee choſe rather to put in the word Sacrament, yet in no other ſenſe than Paul had in Greeke called it a myſterie. Now let them goe and with crying out raile againſt the skill of tongues, by ignorance whereof they have ſo long moſt fowly beene blinde in an eaſie matter, and ſuch as offereth it ſelfe to bee perceived of every man. But why doe they in this one place ſo earneſtly ſticke upon this litle word Sacrament, and ſome other times doe paſſe it over unregarded? For alſo in the firſt Epiſtle to Timothie the Tranſlator hath uſed it, and in the ſelfe ſame Epiſtle to the Epheſians: in everie place for Myſterie. But let this ſlipping bee pardoned them: at leaſt the lyers ought to have had a good remembrance. For, when they have once ſet out Matrimonie with title of a Sacrament, afterward to call it uncleanneſſe, defiling, and fleſhly filthineſſe, how giddy lightneſſe is this? how great an abſurditie is it to debarre Prieſts from a Sacrament? If they denie that they debarre them from the Sacrament, but from the luſt of copulation: they eſcape not ſo away from mee. For they teach that the copulation it ſelfe is a part of the Sacrament, and that by it alone is figured the uniting that wee have with Chriſt in conformitie of nature: becauſe man and woman are not made one but by carnall copulation. Howbeit ſome of them have here found two Sacraments: the one of God and the Soule, in the betrothed man and woman: the other of Chriſt and the Church, in the husband and the wife. Howſoever it be, yet copulation is a Sacrament, from which it is unlawfull that any Chriſtian ſhould bee debarred: Unleſſe peradventure the Sacraments of Chriſtians doe ſo ill agree, that they cannot ſtand together. There is alſo another abſurditie in their doctrines. They affirme that in the Sacrament is given the grace of the holy Ghoſt: they teach that copulation is a Sacrament: and they denie that at copulation the holy Ghoſt is at any time preſent.

For when they once obtained this, they drew to themſelves the hearing of cauſes of Matrimonie: for it was a ſpirituall matter, which prophane Judges might not meddle with. Then they made lawes, whereby they ſtabliſhed their tyrannie, but thoſe partly manifeſtly wicked againſt God, and partly moſt unjuſt toward men. That ſpirituall kinſfolkes may not bee coupled in mariage. That there bee no mariages celebrated, from Septuageſime to the nеas of Eaſter, in three weekes before Midſommer, nor from Advent, to Twelfetide. THE TVVENTIETH CHAPTER.

Of Civill Government.

Magistracie not taken away by the libertie which is promised in the Gospell.

NOw whereas wee have above set two kindes of government in man, and whereas wee have spoken enough of the one kinde which consisteth in the Soule or in the inward man, and hath respect to eternall life: this place requireth that we speake somewhat also of the other, which pertaineth onely to the civill and outward righteousnesse of manners. For the course of this matter seemeth to bee severed from the spirituall doctrine of Faith, which I tooke in hand to entreat of: yet the proceeding shall shew that I doe rightfully joyne them together, yea that I am of necessitie compelled to doe it: specially sith on the one side, madde and barbarous men doe furiously goe about to overthrow this order stablished by GOD: and on the other side the flatterers of Princes, advancing their power without measure, sticke not to set it against the Empire of God himselfe. Unlesse both these mischiefes bee met withall, the pureness of Faith shall bee lost. Beside that it is not smally for our behoofe, to know how lovingly God hath in this behalfe provided for mankinde, that there may flourish in us a greater desire of godlinesse to witnesse our thankfulnesse. First, ere wee enter into the thing it selfe, wee must hold fast that distinction which we have above set, (least as it commonly happeneth to many) wee unwisely mingle these two things together, which have altogether diverse consideration. For when they heare that libertie is promised by the Gospell, which acknowledgeth among men no King and no Magistrate, but hath regard to Christ alone: they thinke that they can take no fruit of their libertie, so long as they see any power to have preeminence over them. Therefore they thinke that nothing shall bee safe, unlesse the whole world be reformed into a new fashion: where may neither be Judgements, nor Lawes, nor Magistrates, nor any such thing which they thinke to withstand their libertie. But whosoever can put difference betweene the bodie and the Soule, betweene this present and transitorie life, and that life to come and eternall: hee shall not hardly understand that the spirituall kingdome of Christ, and the civill government are things farre a sunder. Sith therefore that is a Jewish vanitie, to seeke and inclose the kingdome of Christ under the elements of the world: let us rather thinking, as the Scripture plainly teacheth, that it is a spirituall fruit, which is gathered of the benefit of Christ, remember to keepe within the bonds thereof this whole libertie which is promised and offered us in him. For what is the cause why the same Apostle which biddeth us to stand, and not to bee made subject to the yoke of bondage, in another place forbiddeth bond-servants to be carefull of their state: but because spirituall libertie may very well agree with civill bondage? In which sense also these his sayings are to bee taken: In the kingdome of God there is no Jew, nor Grecian, no male, nor female, no bondman, nor freeman. Againe, There is no Jew, nor Grecian, Circumcision, Uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, Bondman, Freeman: but Christ is all in all. Whereby he signifieth, that it maketh no matter in what estate thou be among men, nor under the lawes of what nation thou livest: for asmuch as in these things consisteth not the kingdome of Christ.

The use of civill government amongst Christians.

2 Yet doth not this distinction tend hereunto, that wee should thinke that the whole order of Policie is an uncleane thing, nor pertaining at all to Christian men. So indeed doe the phrenticke men, that are delighted with unbridled licentiousnesse, cry out and boast. For sith wee be dead by Christ to the elements of the world, and being removed into the kingdome of God doe sit among the heavenly ones: they thinke that it is unworthy for us, and farre beneath our excellence, to bee occupied with these prophane and uncleane cares that are busied about affaires not pertaining to a Christian man. To what purpose (say they) are lawes without judgements and judgement seates? But what hath a Christian man to doe with judgements themselves? yea if it be not lawfull to kill, whereto serve lawes and judgements among us?

But

But as wee have even now given warning, that this kinde of government is severall from that spirituall and inward kingdome of Christ: so it is also to be knowne that they nothing disagree together. For the Civill government doth now begin in us upon earth certaine beginnings of the heavenly kingdome, and in this mortall and vanishing life, doth as it were enter upon an immortall and incorruptible blessednesse: but the intent of his spirituall government is, so long as we shall live among men, to cherish and maintaine the outward worshipping of God, to defend the sound doctrine of Godlinesse and the state of the Church, to frame our life to the fellowship of men, to fashion our manners to civill righteousnesse, to procure us into friendship one with another, to nourish common peace and quietnesse: all which I grant to bee superfluous, if the kingdome of God, such as it is now among us doe destroy this present life. But if the will of God bee so, that we while we long toward the heavenly countrey, should be wayfairing from home upon the earth: and sith the use of such wayfairing needeth such helpes: they which take them from man, doe take from him his very nature of man. For whereas they alleadge that there is so great perfection in the Church of God, that her owne moderate government sufficeth it for a law: they themselves doe foolishly imagine that perfection which can never bee found in the common fellowship of men. For sight of naughtie men the pride is so great, and the wickednesse so obstinate, as cannot be restrained with great sharpnesse of lawes: what thinke wee that they will doe, if they see unpunished libertie lye open to their lewdnesse, which cannot even with force be sufficiently compelle not to doe evill.

Religion by civill policie maintained.

3 But of the order of Policie, there shall be another fitter place to entreat. Now our meaning is to have this onely understood, that to thinke to drive it away, is outragious barbarousnesse, the use whereof is no lesse among men, than of bread, water, the sunne, and aire, but the dignitie much more excellent. For it tendeth not only hereunto (which is the onely commoditie of all those things) that men may breath, eat, drinke, and bee cherished (although indeed it comprehendeth all these things, while it maketh that they live together) yet I say, it tendeth not hereunto onely: but also that idolatrie, sacriledges against the name of God, blasphemies against his truth, and other offences of religion may not rise up and bee scattered among the people, that common quiet bee not troubled, that every man may keepe his owne safe and unappalled, that men may use their affaires together without hurt, that honestie and modestie bee kept among them: finally that among Christians may be a common shew of religion, and among men may be man-like civilitie. Neither let any man bee moved, for that I doe now referre the care of stablishing of religion to the Policie of men, which I seemed before to have set without the judgement of men. For I doe no more here, than I did before, give men leave after their owne will to make lawes concerning religion and the worshipping of God, when I allow the ordinance of Policie, which endevoureth hereunto, that the true religion which is contained in the law of God, be not openly and with publicke sacriledges freely broken and defiled. But the Readers being holden by the very plainnesse of order, shall better understand what is to bee thought of the whole kinde of Civill government, if we severally entreat of the parts thereof. There be three parts of it: the Magistrate which is the governour and keeper of the lawes: the Lawes according to which hee governeth the People, which are governed by the lawes, and obey the Magistrate. Therfore let us first consider of the office of the Magistrate, whether it be a lawfull vocation and allowed of God, what manner of office he hath, and how great is his power, then with what lawes a Christian civill state is to be ordered: then last of all, what profit of the lawes commeth to the people, what reverence is due to the Magistrate.

The magistrates office allowed of God.
Exod. 22.8.
Psal. 82.1. & 6.

4 The Lord hath not onely testified that the office of Magistrates is allowed and acceptable to him, but also setting out the dignitie thereof with most honourable titles, hee hath marvellously commended it unto us. That I may rehearse a few of them. Whereas whosoever bee in place of Magistrates are named Gods, let no man thinke that in that naming is small importance. For thereby is signified that they have commandement from God, that they are furnished with the authoritie of God, doe altogether beare the person of God, whose stead they doe after a certaine manner upply. This is not my cavillation, but the exposition of Christ. If the Scripture (saith hee) called them Gods to whom the word of God was given: What is this else, but that God hath committed his businesse to them, that they should serve in his office, and (as Moses and Iosaphat said to their Judges whom they appointed in every several City of Iuda) that they should sit in judgement, not for man but for God? To the same purpose maketh this that the wisdome of God affirmeth by the mouth of Salomon, that it is his worke, that Kings raigne, and counsellers decree righteous things, that Princes beare principality, and all the Iudges of the earth execute judgement. For this is all one in effect as if it had beene said, that it commeth not to passe by the perversitie of men, that the government of all things in earth is in the hand of Kings and other Rulers, but by the providence and holy ordinance of God, to whom it so seemed good to order the matters of men: for as much as hee is both present and President among them in making of lawes and in executing uprightnesse of judgements. Which Paul also plainely teacheth, when he reckoneth governments among the gifts of God, which being diversly distributed according to the diversitie of grace, ought to bee employed of the servants of Christ to the edification of the Church. For although hee there properly speaketh of a Councell of grave men, which in the primitive Church were appointed that they should have the rule of ordering the publik discipline (which office in the Epistle to the Corinthians he calleth Government) yet for as much as wee see that the end of civill power commeth to the same point, it is no doubt but that hee commendeth unto us all kinde of just government. But hee speaketh more plainely, where he purposely maketh a full discourse of that matter. For both he sheweth that power is the ordinance of God, and that there are no powers, but they are ordained of God: and that the Princes themselves are the ministers of God, to the well doers unto praise: to the evill, revengers unto wrath. Hereunto may be added also the examples of holy men: of which some have possessed kingdomes, as David, Iosias, Ezechias: other some, Lordships, as Ioseph and Daniel: other some Civill governments in a free people, as Moses, Josue, and the Iudges: whose offices the Lord hath declared that he alloweth. Wherefore none ought now to doubt that the civill power is a vocation not onely holy and lawfull before God, but also the most holy, and the most honest of all other in the whole life of men.

The office of the civill magistrate no lesse allowable in the sight of God and needfull for men under Christ than it was before.

5. They which covet to bring in a state without Rulers, take exception and say that although in old time there were Kings and Iudges over the rude people, yet at this day that servile kinde of governing agreeth not with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his Gospell. Wherein they bewray not onely their ignorance, but also their devillish pride, while they take upon themselves perfection, of which not so much as the hundreth part is seene in them. But what manner of men soever they bee, it is easie to confute it: because where David exhorteth all Kings and Rulers to kisse the Sonne of God, hee doth not bid them, giving over their authoritie, to take themselves to a private life, but to submit the power that they beare to Christ, that hee alone may have preeminence above all. Likewise Esay, when hee promiseth that Kings shall bee foster-fathers of the Church, and Queenes shall bee Nurses, hee doth not depose them from their honour: but rather doth by an honourable title make them defenders to the godly worshippers of God. For, that Prophecie pertaineth to the comming of Christ. I doe wittingly passe over many testimonies which doe each where offer themselues, and especially in the Psalmes wherein all Governours have their right maintained. But most cleare of all is the place of Paul, where admonishing Timothie that in the common assembly prayers must bee made for Kings, hee by and by addeth a reason, that wee may under them lead a quiet life with all godlinesse and honestie: in which words he committeth the state of the Church to their defence and save-garding.

 The benefit which Magistrates themselves may take by considering that they are appointed ministers of the righteousnesse of God.*

* 6 Which consideration ought continually to busie the Magistrates themselves, for as much as it may put a great spurre to them whereby they may bee pricked forward to their dutie, and bring them a singular comfort whereby they may mitigate the hardnesse of their office, which truly are both many and great. For with how great an endevor of uprightnes, wisdome, mildues, continency, and innocency, ought they to charge themselves, themselves, which know themselves to be appointed ministers of the righteousnesse of God? By what assurance shall they admit iniustice to their iudgement seate, which they heare to be the throne of the living God? By what boldnesse shall they pronounce a wrongfull sentence with that mouth, which they understand to bee appointed an instrument for the truth of God? With what conscience shall they subscribe to wicked decrees with the hand which they know to bee ordained to write the actes of God? In a summe, if they remember that they bee the vicegerents of God, they must watch with all care, earnestnesse, and diligence, that they may represent in themselves unto men a certaine image of the providence, preservation, goodnes, good will, and righteousnesse of God. And they must continually set this before their eyes, that if all they be accursed, that doe execute in deceit the worke of the vengeance of God, they are much more grievously accursed, that use themselves deceitfully in a rightfull vocation. Therefore when Moses and Iosaphat minded to exhort their iudges to their dutie, they had nothing more effectuall to move their minds withall, than that which wee have before rehearsed, Looke what yee doe. For yee sit in iudgement not for man but for God: namely, hee which is neere to you in the cause of iudgement. Now therefore let the feare of the Lord be upon you. Looke and bee diligent: because there is no perversnesse with the Lord our God. And in another place it is said, God stood in the assemblie of the Gods, and sitteth iudge in the middest of the gods, that they may be encouraged to their durie when they heare that they be the deputies of God, to whom they must one day yeeld account of the government of their charge. And worthily this admonition ought to bee of great force with them. For if they make any default, they are not onely wrong doers to men whom they wickedly vexe, but also slanderers to God himselfe, whose holy iudgements they defile. Againe they have also whereupon they may singularly comfort themselves, when they consider with themselves that they are not busied in prophane affaires, and such as are not fit for the servant of God, but in a most holy office, namely forasmuch as they are the deputies of God.

7 As for them that are not moved with so many testimonies of Scripture from being bold to raile at this holy ministerie, as a thing disagreeing with Christian religion and godlinesse: what doe they else but raile at God himselfe, the dishonour of whom cannot but be joyned with the reproch of his ministerie? And verily they doe not refuse the Magistrates, but doe cast away God, that he should not raigne over them. For if the Lord said this truly of the people of Israel: because they had refused the government of Samuel: why shall it be lesse truly said at this day of them that give themselves leave torage against all goverments ordained of God? But sith the Lord said to the Disciples, that the kings of nations beare rule over them, but that among them it is not so, where hee that is the first must bee made the least: by this saying it is forbidden to all Christians that they should not take kingdomes or government upon them. O handsome expositors. There rose a strife among the Disciples which of them excelled other: the Lord, to suppresse this vaine ambition, taught them that their ministerie is not like unto kingdomes, in which one man hath preeminence above the rest. I beseech you, what doth this comparison make to the dishonour of kingly dignitie? yea what doth it prove at all, but that the ministerie of an Apostle is not the office of a king? Moreover although among the Magistrates themselves there be divers formes, yet there is no difference in this behalfe but that we ought to take them all for the ordinances of God. For Paul also doth comprehend them altogether, when he saith, that there is no power but of God: and that which best liked him of all, is commend with notable testimonie above the other, namely the power of one: which because it bringeth with it a common bondage of all (except that one man to whose will it maketh all things subject) in old time could lesse be allowed of noble and the excellent sort of natures. But the Scripture to meete with their unjust judgements, expressly by name affirmeth, that it is the providence of Gods wisedome that Kings doe raigne, and peculiarly commandeth the King to be honored.

Revilers of Magistrates, are railers at God: the rule of kings not taken away because the Apostles were by Christ forbidden to rule as kings.

awfull to consult of the framing of any common weale. And also the same could not bee simply determined without rashnesse, forasmuch as a great part of the order of this question consisteth in circumstances. And if thou compare also the states themselves together without circumstances, it shall not be easie to discerne, which of them overweigheth the other in profitablenesse, they match so equally together. There is an easie way to fall from kingdome into tyranny; but not much harder is it to fall from the rule of the chiefest men to the faction of a few: but most easie of all from the peoples government, to sedition. Truly if those three formes of governments which the Philosophers set out, to be considered in themselves, I will not deny that either the government of the chiefest men, or a state tempered of it and common government far excelleth all other, not of it selfe, but because it most seldome chanceth that kings so temper themselves that their will never swarveth from that which is just and right: againe, that they bee furnished with so great sharpnesse of judgement and wisdome that every one of them seeth so much as is sufficient. Therfore the fault or default of men maketh, that it is safer and more tolerable that many should have the government, that they may mutually one helpe another, one teach and admonish another, and if any advance himselfe higher than is meete, there may bee overseers and masters to restraine his wilfulnesse. This both hath alway beene approved by experience, and the Lord also hath confirmed it with his authoritie, when hee ordained among the Israelites a government of the best men very neere unto common government, at such time as he minded to have them in best estate, till hee brought forth an image of Christ in David. And as I willingly grant that no kinde of government is more blessed than this, where liberty is framed to such moderation as it ought to be, and is orderly stablished to continuance: so I count them also most blessed, that may enjoy this estate: and if they stoutly and constantly travell in preserving and retaining it, I grant that they doe nothing against their duty. Yea and the magistrates ought with most great diligence to bend themselves hereunto, that they suffer not the liberty of the people, of which they are appointed governours, to be in any part minished, much lesse to be dissolved: if they be negligent and litle carefull therein, they are false Faith-breakers in their office, and betrayers of their Country. But if they would bring this kinde to themselves, to whom the Lord hath appointed another forme of government, so that thereby they be moved to desire a change, the very thinking thereof shall not onely be fooliish and superfluous, but also hurtful. But as if thou bend not thine eyes onely to one City, but looke about or behold the whole world together, or at least spread abroad thy sight into farther distances of countries, without doubt thou shalt finde that this is not unprofitably appointed by the providence of God, that diverse Countries should be ruled by diverse kindes of governement. For the elements hang together but by an unequall temperature, so Countries also are with their certaine inequality very well kept in order. Howbeit all these things also are spoken in vaine to them whom the will of the Lord shall satisfie. For if it be his pleasure to set Kings over kingdomes, Senates, or Officers over Free-cities, whomsoever hee maketh Rulers in the places where wee are conversant, it is our dutie to shew our selves yeelding and obedient unto them.

The office of the magistrate reaching unto both the tables of the law.

9 Now the office of Magistrates is in this place to be declared by the way, of what sort it is described by the Word of God, and in what things it consisteth. If the Scripture did not teach, that it extendeth to both the Tables of the Law, we might learne it out of the prophane writers. For none hath intreated of the duty of Magistrates, of making of lawes and of publike weale, that hath not begun at religion and the worshipping of God. And so have they all confessed, that no policy can bee happily framed, unlesse the first care be of godlinesse, and that those lawes be preposterous which neglecting the right of God, doe provide onely for men. Sith therefore withall the Philosophers religion hath the first place, and sith the same hath alway beene observed by the universall consent of all Nations, let Christian Princes and Magistrates be ashamed of their slothfulnesse, if they endevour not themselves to this care. And wee have already shewed, that this duty is specially enjoyned them of God: as it is meete, that they should imploy their travell to defend and maintaine his honour, whose Vicege-

rents they be, and by whose benefit they governe. For this cause also chiefly are the holy Kings praised in Scripture, for that they restored the worship of God being corrupted or overthrowne, or tooke care of religion, that it might flourish pure and safe under them. But contrariwise the holy history reckoneth states without governours, among faults, saying, that there was no King in Israel, and that therefore every man did what pleased himselfe. Whereby their folly is confuted, which would have them, neglecting the care of God, onely to apply themselves to bee Judges of law among men. As though God appointed governours in his name to decide controversies, and omitted that which was of much weightier importance, that hee himselfe should bee worshipped according to the prescribed rule of his Law. But a desire to innovate all things without punishment moveth troublesome men to this point, that they wish all revengers of the breach of peace to be taken away. As for so much as pertaineth to the second table, Ieremie warneth kings, to doe judgement and righteousnesse, to deliver the forceably oppressed from the hand of the false accuser, not to grieve the stranger and widow, not to doe wrong, and not to shed innocent bloud. To the same purpose maketh the exhortation which is read in the 82. Psalme, that they should render right to the poore and needie, acquite the poore and needie, deliver the poore and needie from the hand of the oppressor. And Moses giveth charge to the Princes whom hee had sent in his stead: let them heare the cause of their brethren, and judge betweene a man and his brother and a stranger, and not know faces in judgement, let them heare as well the little as the great, and bee not afraid of any man; because it is the judgement of God. But I speake not of these things; that kings should not get to themselves multitudes of horses, nor cast their mindes to covetousnesse, not to be lifted up above their brethren: that they may bee continually busied in studying upon the Law of the Lord all the daies of their life: that Judges swarve not to the one side, nor receive gifts: because in declaring here the office of Magistrates, my purpose is not so much to instruct the Magistrates themselves, as to teach other what Magistrates bee, and to what end they are set of God. Wee see therefore that they bee ordained, defenders and revengers of innocencie, honestie, and quietnesse, whose onely endevour should bee to provide for the common safetie and peace of all men. Of which vertues David professeth that he will be an exemplar, when hee shall bee advanced to the royall seat: that is that hee will not consent to any evill doings, but abhorre wicked men, slanderers, and proud men, and get to himselfe from each where honest and faithfull men. But sith they cannot performe this, unlesse they defend good men from the wrongs of the evill, let them helpe the good with succour and defence, let them also bee armed with power whereby they may severally suppresse open evill doers and wicked men, by whose lewdnesse the common quiet is troubled, or vexed. For wee throughly finde this by experience which Solon said, that commonweales consist of reward and punishment, and that when those bee taken away, the whole discipline of Cities faileth and is dissolved. For the care of equitie and justice waxeth cold in the minds of many, unlesse there bee due honour ready for vertue: neither can the wilfulnesse of wicked men bee restrained but by severitie and chastisement of paines. And these two parts the Prophet comprehendeth, when hee biddeth kings and other governours to doe judgement and righteousnesse. Righteousnesse is, to take into charge of tuition, to imbrace, to defend, to revenge, to deliver the innocent. Judgement is, to withstand the boldnesse of wicked men, to represse their violence, to punish their offences.

If by the Law of God all Christians are forbidden to kill, and the Prophet prophecieth of the holy Mount of God, that is, the Church, that in it they shall not afflict nor hurt: how many magistrates be together both godly and bloud-shedders? But if wee understand, that the Magistrate in executing of punishments, doth nothing of himselfe, but executeth the very selfe judgements of God, wee shall be nothing combred with this doubt. The law of the Lord forbiddeth to kill: least manslaughter should be unpunished, the lawmaker himselfe giveth to the ministers the sword in their hand, which they should draw forth against all man slayers. To afflict and to hurt, is not the doing of the godly: but this is not to hurt, nor to afflict, by the Lords commandement to revenge the afflictions of the godly. I would to God that this were alway present before our mindes, that nothing is here done by the rashnesse of man, but all things by the authority of God that commandeth, which going before us, we never swerve out of the right way. Unlesse perhaps there bee a bridle put upon the righteousnesse of God, that it may not punish wicked doings. But if it bee not lawfull to appoint any law to it, why shall we cavill against the ministers of it? They beare not the sword in vaine, saith Paul Rom. 13.4. for they be the ministers of Gods wrath, revengers to evill doers. Therefore all Princes and other Rulers know that nothing shall be more acceptable to God than their obedience, let them apply this ministery, if they desire to shew their godlinesse, righteousnesse, and uncorruptnesse allowable to God. With this affection was Moses led, Exod. 2.12. Act. 7.28. when knowing himselfe appointed by the power of the Lord to be the deliverer of his people, he laid his hand upon the Ægyptian. Againe, when by slaying of three thousand men in one day, he tooke vengeance of the sacriledge of the people. Exod. 32.27. David also when nie to the end of his life he gave commandement to Salomon his sonne to slay Ioab 1 King. 15. and Semei. Whereupon he also rehearseth this among the vertues of a king, to slay the wicked of the land, that all workers of wickednesse may be driven out of the City of God to which purpose also pertaineth the praise that is given to Salomon. Thou hast loved righteousnesse and hath hated wickednesse. How doth that milde and gentle nature of Moses burne out into so great cruelty, that being sprinkled and embrued with the bloud of his brethren, he runneth throughout the Campe to new slaughters? How doth David, a man of so great gentlenesse in all his life, among his last breathings make that bloudy testament, that his sonne should not bring the hoare haire of Ioab and Semei in peace to the grave? But they both when they executed the vengeance committed to them of God, so farre fired with cruell dealing, their hands which they had defiled with sparing. It is an abomination with kings, saith Salomon, to doe iniquity, because his throne is stablished in righteousnesse. Againe, The king which sitteth in the throne of Prou. 16.12. judgement spreadeth his eies upon every evill man. Againe, A wise king scattereth Prou. 20.8. the wicked, and turneth them upon the wheele. Againe. Take away the drosse from Prou. 20.26. the silver, and there shall come forth a vessell to the melter; take way the wicked man Prou. 25.4. from the sight of the king, and this throne shall be fast set in righteousnesse. Againe, hee Prou. 17.2.5. that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the righteous, both are abomination to the Lord. Againe, A rebellious man purchaseth evill to himselfe and a cruell messenger is sent unto him. Againe, Who so saith to the wicked man, thou art righteous, him Prou. 17.11. peoples and nations do curse. Now if their true righteousnesse be, with drawne sword to Prou. 14.24. pursue guilty and wicked men: let them put up their sword and hold their hands pure from blood, while in the meane time desperate men do raigne with murders, and slaughters: then they shall make themselves guilty of most great wickednesse, so much lesse shall they get thereby the praise of godlinesse and righteousnesse. Onely let there bee no precise and cruell rigorousnesse, and that judgement seat which may worthily bee called the rocke of accused men. For I am not hee that either favour extreame cruelty, or doe thinke that righteous judgement can bee pronounced, but while clemency the best and surest Counseller of Kings, as Salomon affirmeth, the preserver of the kings throne is assistant, which a certaine man in old time truly said to be the principall gift of Princes. Yet a magistrate must take heed to both, that he doth neither with rigorousnesse of minde, wound rather than heale, or by superstitious affection of clemency fall into a most cruell gentlenesse, if with soft and loose tendernesse he be dissolute to the destruction of many men. For this was in old time not without cause commonly spoken under the Empire of Nerva, that it is indeed evill to live under a Prince, under whom nothing is lawfull, but much worse under whom all things are lawfull.

The lawfulnesse of warres if they be rightly taken in hand.

11. But sith sometime kings and peoples must of necessity take sword in hand, to execute such publike vengeance, by this reason wee may also judge that the warres are lawfull which are so taken in hand. For if there be power delivered them, whereby they may maintaine quiet to their dominion, whereby they may keepe downe the seditious stirres of unquiet men, whereby they may helpe the forceably oppressed, whereby they may punish evill doings: can they at fitter seasons utter it, than to suppresse his rage which troubleth both privately the rest of every man, and the common quiet of all men, which licentiously maketh uprores, which committeth violent oppressions and many such evill doings; If they ought to bee preservers and defenders of the lawes, they must also overthrow the enterprises of all them by whose wicked doing the discipline of lawes is corrupted. Yea if they worthily punish those theeves whose injuries have extended only to a few: shall they suffer a whole country to be without punishment vexed and wasted with robberies? For it maketh no difference whether he be a king or one of the basest of the comonalty, that invadeth anothers country into which hee hath no right, and spoileth it like an enemie: all are alike to be taken and punished for robbers. This therefore both naturall equity, and the rule of duty teacheth that Princes are armed not onely to restraine private duties with judicall punishments, but also to defend with warre the dominions committed to their charge, if at any time they be enemy-like assailed. And such warres the holy Ghost by many testimonies of scripture declareth to be lawfull.

War not forbidden Christians in the Gospell.

12 If it be objected against me, that in the New Testament is neither witnesse nor example which teacheth that warre is a thing lawfull for Christians: first I answer, that the same rule of making warre which was in old time remaineth also at this day, and that on the contrary side there is no cause that may debarre Magistrates from defending of their subiects. Secondly, that an expresse declaration of these matters is not to be sought in the writings of the Apostls, where there purpose is not to frame a civill state but to stablish the spirituall kingdome of Christ. Last of all I say that in them also is shewed by the way, that Christ hath by his comming changed nothing in this behalfe. For if Christian doctrine (that I may speake in Augustines owne words) condemned all warres, this should rather have beene said to souldiers when they asked councell of salvation, that they should cast away their weapons, and utterly withdraw themselves from the warre. But it was said to them: Strike no man, doe no man no wrong, let your wages suffice you. Whom he taught that their wages ought to suffice them, he did verily not forbid them to be warriers. But all Magistrates ought here to take great heed, that they nothing at all follow their owne desires: but rather, if they must punish let them not be borne away with a headlong angrinesse, let them not be violently carryed with hatred, let them not broile with unappeaseable rigor, yea let them (as Augustine saith) pity common nature in him in whom they punish his private fault. Or if they must put on armour against the enemy, that is, the armed robber, let them not lightly seeke occasion thereof, nor take it being offered unlesse they be driven to it by extreame necessity. For if we ought to performe much more than that heathen man required, which would have war to seeme a seeking of peace: truely we ought first to attempt all things ere we ought to try the matter by warre. Finally, in both kindes let them not suffer themselves to be carryed with any private affection, but be led onely with common feeling. Otherwise they doe very ill abuse their power, which is given them, not for their owne commodity, but for others benefit and ministery. Moreover of the same rightfull rule of making of warre hangeth the order both of Garisons, and Leagues, and other civill fortifications. Garisons I call those that are placed in townes to defend the borders of the Countrie: Leagues, which are made with Princes adioyning for this covenant that if any trouble happen in their lands they may mutually helpe them, and joyne their forces in common together to suppresse the common enemies of mankinde: Civill fortification, whose use is in the art of war.

Luke 3.14.

Cicero of duties.

The lawfulnesse of tributes and taxes with the duty of Princes in that respect.

13 This also I will last of all adde, that tributes and taxes are the lawfull revenues of Princes, which they may chiefely employ to sustaine the common charges of their office: which yet they may likewise use to their private royalty which is after a certaine manner conjoyned with honour of the princely state that they beare. As we see that David, Ezechias, Iosias, Iosephat, and other holy Kings, and Ioseph also and Daniel, according to the estate of the person that they did beare, were without offence of godlinesse sumptuous of the common charge, and we reade in Ezechiel that there was a very large portion of land assigned to the Kings. Where although he paint out the spirituall kingdome of Christ, yet he fetcheth the examplar of his similitude from the lawfull kingdome of men: But yet so that Princes againe on their behalfes should remember, that their treasure chambers are not so much their owne private coffers, as the treasuries of the whole people (for so Paul testifieth) which they may not without manifest wrong prodigallly waste or spoile: or rather that it is the very bloud of the people, which not to spare, is most cruell unnaturalnesse: and let them thinke, that their impositions, and subsidies, and other kindes of tributes, are nothing but the supports of publike necessitie, wherewith to wearie the poore communalty without cause, is tyrannicall extortion. These things doe not encourage Princes to wastfull expence and riot, (as verily there is no need to adde a fire brand to their lusts that are of themselves too much already kindled) but sith it much behooveth that they should with pure conscience before God be bold to doe all that they are bold to doe, least with wicked boldnesse they come into the despising of God, they must be taught how much is lawfull for them. Neither is this doctrine superfluous for private men, that they should not rashly and stubbornly give themselves leave to grudge at any expences of Princes, although they exceed common and civill measure.

A false and foolish opinon, that a state cannot bee well ordered by the common lawes of nations except the civill lawes of Moses be observed.

14 Next to the Magistrate in civill states are lawes, the most strong sinewes of common-wealthes, or (as Cicero calleth them according to Plato) the soules, without which the Magistrate cannot stand, as they againe without the Magistrate have no lively force. Therefore nothing could be more truly said, than that the law is a dumbe Magistrate, and that the Magistrate is a living law. But whereas I promised to speake, with what lawes a Christian civill state ought to be ordered, there is no cause why any man should looke for a long discourse of the best kinde of lawes, which both should bee infinite, and pertained not to this present purpose and place: yet in a few words, and as it were by the way, I will touch what lawes it may use godlily before God, and be rightly governed by them among men. Which selfe thing I had rather to have utterly passed over with silence, if I did not understand that many doe herein perillously erre. For there bee some that denie that a common-weale is well ordered, which neglecting the civill lawes of Moses, is governed by the common lawes of nations. How dangerous and troublesome this sentence is, let other men consider, it shall bee enough for me to have shewed that it is false and foolish. That common devision is to be kept, which divideth the whole law of God published into morall ceremoniall, and iudiciall lawes; and all the parts are to be severally considered, that we may know what of them pertaineth to us, and what not. Neither in the meane time let any man be combred with this doubt, that judicials and ceremonials also pertaine to the morall lawes. For although the old writers which have taught this division, were not ignorant that these two latter parts had their use about manners, yet because they might bee changed and abrogate, the morals remaining safe they did not call them morals. They called that first part peculiarly by that name, without which cannot stand the true holines of manners, and the unchangeable rule of living rightly.

Men of all ages bound to the morall law of Moses the ceremoniall given for a time, judiciall instituted of God for them, not for all men to be governed by.

Gal 4.4.

15 Therefore the morall law (that I may first begin thereat) sith it is contained in two chiefe points, of which the one commandeth simply to worship God with pure faith and godlinesse, and the other to embrace men with unfained love, is the true and eternall rule of righteousnesse prescribed to the men of all ages and times that will bee willing to frame their life to the will of God. For this is his eternall and unchangeable will, that he himselfe should be worshipped of us all, and that we should mutually love one another. The ceremonall law was the schooling of the Iewes, wherewith it pleased the Lord to exercise the certaine childhood of that people, till that time of fulnesse came, wherein he would to the full manifestly shew his wisdome to the earth, and deliver the truth of those things which then were shadowed with figures. The judiciall law given to them for an order of civill state, gave certaine rules of equity and righteousnesse, by which they might behave themselves harmelesly and quietly together. And as that exercise of ceremonies properly pertained indeed to the doctrine of godlinesse (namely which kept the Church of the Iewes in the worship and religion of God) yet it might be distinguished from godlines it selfe; so this forme of judiciall orders (although it tended to no other end, but how the selfe-same charity might best be kept which is commanded by the eternall law of God) yet had a certaine thing differing from the very commandement of loving. As therefore the Ceremonies might he abrogate, godlineſſe remaining ſafe and undeſtroyed: ſo theſe judiciall ordinances alſo being taken away, the perpetuall duties and commandements of charitie may continue. If this be true, verily there is liberty left to every nation to make ſuch lawes as they ſhall foreſee to be profitable for them: which yet muſt bee framed after the perpetuall rule of charitie, that they may in deed varie in forme, but have the ſame reaſon. For I thinke that thoſe barbarous and ſavage lawes, as were thoſe that gave honour to theeves, that allowed common copulations, and other both much more filthie and more againſt reaſon, are not to bee taken for lawes: for as much as they are not onely againſt all righteouſneſſe, but alſo againſt naturall gentleneſſe and kindneſſe of men.

The diverſity of lawes, and the neceſſity that they ſhould be divers, as times and places and occaſions differ.

16 This which I have ſaid ſhall be plaine, if in all lawes we behold theſe two things as wee ought, the making and the equity of the law, upon the reaſon whereof the making it ſelfe is founded and ſtayeth. Equitie, becauſe it is naturall, can bee but one of all lawes: and therefore one law, according to the kind of matter, ought to bee the propounded end to all lawes. As for making of lawes, becauſe they have certaine circumſtances upon which they partly hang, if ſo that they tend all together to our marke of equitie, though it be divers it maketh no matter. Now ſith it is certaine that the law of God which we call morall is nothing elſe but a teſtimonie of the naturall law, and of that conſcience which is engraven of God in the mindes of men, the whole rule of this equity whereof wee now ſpeake is ſet forth therein. Therefore it alone alſo muſt bee both the marke and rule and end of all lawes. Whatſoever lawes ſhall bee framed after that rule, directed to that marke, and limited in that end, there is no cauſe why wee ſhould diſallow them, howſoever they otherwiſe differ from the Iewiſh law or one from another. The law of God forbiddeth to ſteale. What paine was appointed for theefs in the civill ſtate of the Iewes, is to be ſeene in Exodus. The moſt ancient lawes of other Nations puniſhed theft with recompence of double: the lawes that followed afterward, made difference betweene manifeſt theft and not manifeſt. Some proceeded to baniſhment, ſome to whipping, ſome at laſt to the puniſhment of death. Falſe witneſſe was amongſt the Iewes puniſhed with recompence of equall paine, in ſome places onely with great ſhame, in ſome places with hanging, in other ſome with the Croſſe. Manſlaughter all lawes univerſally doe revenge with blood, yet with divers kinds of death. Againſt adulteries in ſome places were ordained ſeverer paines, in ſome places lighter. Yet wee ſee how with ſuch diverſity all tend to the ſame end. For with one mouth they altogether pronounce puniſhment againſt all the offences which have beene condemned by the eternall law of God, as manſlaughters, theſts, adultery, falſe witneſſings: but in the manner of puniſhment they agree not. Neither is the ſame needfull, nor yet expedient. There is ſome country, which unleſſe it ſhew rigor with horrible examples againſt man-ſlayers, ſhould immediately bee deſtroied with murders and robberies. There is ſometime that requireth the ſharpeneſſe of paines to bee increaſed. If there ariſe any trouble in a common-weale, the evills that are wont to grow thereof muſt bee amended with new ordinances. In time of warre all humanity would in the noiſe of armour fall away, unleſſe there were caſt into men an unwonted feare of puniſhments. In barrenneſſe, in peſtilence, unleſſe greater ſeverity bee uſed, all things will come to ruine. Some nation is more bent to ſome certaine vice, unleſſe it bee more ſharply ſuppreſſed. How malicious and envious ſhall hee bee againſt the publike profit, that ſhall bee offended with ſuch diverſitie which is moſt fit to hold faſt the obſerving of the law of God? For, that which ſome ſay, that the Law of God given by Moſes is diſhonoured, when it being abrogate, new are preferred above it, is moſt vaine. For neither are other preferred above it, when they are more allowed, not in ſimple compariſon, but in reſpect of the eſtate of the times, place, and nation: neither is that abrogate which was never made for us. For the Lord gave not the Law by the hand of Moſes, which ſhould bee publiſhed into all Nations, and flouriſh every where: but when hee had received the nation of the Iewes into his faith, defence, and protection, hee willed to bee a lawmaker peculiarly to them, and like a wiſe lawmaker, hee had in making of his lawes a certaine ſingular conſideration of them.

Exod. 22. 1.

Deut. 19. 18.

17 Now remaineth that wee conſider that which wee have ſet in the laſt place, what

What profit Christians receive by lawes, judicial orders and magistrates.

what profit of lawes, judicial orders, and magistrates, commeth to the common fellowship of Christians. Wherewith also is coupled another question, how much private men ought to yeeld to Magistrates, and how farre their obedience ought to proceed. Many thought the office of Magistrates to bee superfluous among Christians, because forsooth they cannot godlily crave their aide, namely such they are forbidden to revenge, to sue in the Law, and to have any controversie. But whereas Paul contrariwise plainly testifieth, that hee is the Minister of God to us for good: we thereby understand, that hee is so ordained of God, that wee being defended by his hand and succours against the maliciousnesse and injuries of mischievous men, may live a quiet and assured life. If he be in vaine given us of the Lord for defence, unlesse it bee lawfull for us to use such benefit: it sufficiently appeareth that hee may also without ungodlinesse bee called upon and sued unto. But here I must have to doe with two kindes of men. For there be many men that boile with so great rage of quarrelling at the law, that they never have quiet with themselves unlesse they have strife with other. And their controversies they exercise with deadly sharpnesse of hatred, and with mad greedinesse to revenge and hurt, and doe pursue them with unappeasable fiercenesse even to the very destruction of their adversarie. In the meane time, that they may not bee thought to doe any thing but rightfully, they defend such perverseness with colour of Law. But though it be granted thee to goe to law with thy brother, yet thou mayest not by and by hate him, nor be carried against him with furious desire to hurt him, nor stubbornly to pursue him.

Rom. 13. 4.

A rule according whereunto both plaintifes and defendants may use the help of the Magistrate in a question of their right well and lawfully.

18. Let this therefore be said to such men, that the use of lawes is lawfull, if a man doe rightly use it. And that the right use both for the plaintife to sue, and for the defendant to defend, as if the defendant being summoned doe appeare at an appointed day, and doth with such exception as he can, defend his cause without bitternesse, but onely with this affection to defend that which is his owne by law: and if the plaintife being unworthily oppressed either in his person or his goods, doe resort to the defence of the Magistrate, make his complaint, and require that which is equity and conscience, but farre from all greedie will to hurt or revenge, farre from sharpnesse and hatred, farre from burning heate of contention, but rather ready to yeeld of his owne and to suffer any thing, than to bee carried with an enemie like minde against his adversary. Contrariwise when being filled with malice of minde, corrupted with envie, kindled with wrath, breathing out revenge, or finally so enflamed with the heate of the contention, they give over any part of charitie, the whole proceeding even of a most just cause cannot but be wicked. For this ought to be a determined principle to all Christians, that a controversie though it be never so righteous, can never bee rightly pursued of any man, unlesse he beare as good will and love to his adversary, as if the matter which is in the controversie were alreadie concluded and ended by composition. Some man will here peradventure say, that such moderation is so never used in going to law, that it should be like a miracle, if any such were found. I grant indeed, as the manners of these times be, that there is seldome seene an example of a good contender in law, yet the thing it selfe being defiled with addition of no evill, ceaseth not to bee good and pure. But when we heare that the helpe of the Magistrate is a holy gift of God: wee must so much the more diligently take heede, that it bee not defiled by our fault.

All contending at law not precisely to be condemned.

Act. 22. 1. and 24. 12. and 25. 10. Numb. 19. 18. Matt. 5. 19. Deut. 32. 35. Rom. 12. 19.

20. As for them that precisely condemne all contending at law, let them understand that they doe therewithall despise the holy ordinance of God, and a gift of that kind of gifts which may be cleane to the cleane: unlesse peradventure they will accuse Paul of wicked doing, which did both put away from himselfe the slanders of his accusers with declaring also their deceit and maliciousnesse, and in judgement claimed for himselfe the prerogative of the City of Rome, and when need was hee appealed from an unrighteous governour to the Emperours judgement seat. Neither withstandeth it, that all Christians are forbidden to desire revenge, which we also doe drive far away from Christian judgements seate. For, if the contention be about a common case, he goeth not the right way that doth not with innocent simplicity, commit his cause to the Judge as to a common defender, thinking nothing lesse than to render mutuall recompence commence of evill, which is the affection of revenge? or if any matter of life and death, or any great criminall action bee commenced, wee require that the accuser be such a one, as commeth into the Court being taken with no boiling heate of revenge, and touched with no displeasure of private injurie, but onely having in minde to withstand the enterprises of a mischievous man, that they may not hurt the common weale. But if thou take away a revenging minde, there is no offence done against that commandement whereby revenge is forbidden to Christians. But they are not only forbidden to desire revenge, but they are also commanded to waite for the hand of the Lord, which promiseth that hee will bee a present revenger for the oppressed and afflicted: but they doe prevent all revenge of the heavenly defendor, which require helpe at the Magistrates hand either for themselves or other. Not so. For wee must thinke that the Magistrates revenge is not the revenge of man, but of God, which (as Paul saith) hee extendeth and exerciseth by the ministerie of man for our good. Rom. 13. 4.

The patience which Christians are injoyned to use, doth not let but that they may also use the Magistrate against the injuries of wicked men. Matth. 5. 39.

20 And no more doe wee disagree with the words of Christ, by which he forbiddeth to resist evill, and commandeth to turne the right cheeke to him that hath given a blow on the left, and to suffer him to take away thy cloake that taketh away thy coate. Hee willeth indeed there that the mindes of his should so much abhorre from desire of recompensing like for like, that they should sooner suffer double injurie to be done to themselves, than to desire to reacquire it: from which patience neither doe we also lead them away. For Christians truly ought to bee a kinde of men made to beare reproches and injuries, open to the malice, deceits, and mockages, of naughtie men: and not that onely but also they must bee bearers of all these evils, that is to say, so framed with all their hearts, that having received one displeasure they make themselves ready for another, promising to themselves, nothing in their whole life but the bearing of a continuall crosse. In the meane time also they must doe good to them that do them wrong, and wish well to those that curse them, and (which is their onely victorie) strive to overcome evill with good. Being so minded they will not seeke eye for eye, tooth for tooth, as the Pharisees taught their Disciples to desire revenge, but (as we are taught of Christ) they will so suffer their bodie to be mangled, and their goods to bee maliciously taken from them, that they will forgive, and of their owne accord pardon those evils so soone as they are done to them. Yet this evenesse and moderation of mindes shall not withstand, but that the friendship toward their enemies remaining safe they may use the helpe of the Magistrate to the preserving of their goods, or for zeale of publike commoditie may sue a guiltie and pestilent man to be punished, whom they know that hee cannot bee amended but by death. For Augustine truly expoundeth that all these commandements tend to this end, that a righteous and godly man should bee readie to beare patiently the malice of them whom hee seeketh to have made good men, that rather the number of the good may increase, not that hee should with like malice adde himselfe also to the number of the evill: then, that they more pertaine to the preparation of the heart, which is inwardly, than to the worke which is done openly: that in secret may be kept patience of minde with good will, but openly that may be done which wee see may bee profitable to them to whom wee ought to beare good will. Epist. 5. ad Marcel.

All contendings at law not condemned by the Apostle. 1 Cor. 6. 6.

21 But this which is wont to bee objected, that contendings in law are altogether condemned of Paul, is also false: It may easily bee perceived by his words, that there was an innumerable rage of striving at law in the Church of the Corinthians: so farre forth that they did make the Gospell of Christ and the whole religion which they professed, open to the cavillations and evill speakings of the wicked. This is the first thing that Paul blameth in them, that by their intemperance of contentions, they brought the Gospell in slander among the unbeleevers. And then this point also, that in such sort they strived among themselves brethren with brethren. For they were so farre from bearing of wrongs, that they greedily gaped one for anothers goods, provoked one another, and being unprovoked did hurt. Therefore hee invelgheth against that rage of contending, and not simply against all controversies. But hee pronounceth that it is a fault or a weaknesse, that they did not rather suffer losse of their goods than to travell even to contentions for the preserving of them: namely when they were so easily moved with every damage, and for most small causes did runne to the Court of Law and to controversies, hee saith that this is a proofe that they were of a minde too readie to anger, and not well framed to patience. Christians verily ought to doe this, that they had alway rather to yeeld of their owne right than to goe to law, from whence they can scarcely get out againe but with a minde too much moved and kindled to hatred of their brother. But when a man seeth that without losse of charitie he may defend his owne, the losse whereof should be a sore hinderance unto him: if hee doe so hee offendeth nothing against this saying of Paul. Finally (as wee have taught in the beginning) charitie shall give every man best counsell, without which whatsoever controversies are taken in hand, and beyond which whatsoever doe proceede, we hold it out of controversie that they be unjust and wicked.

The reverend estimation which subjects ought to have of their Magistrates.

22 The first duetie of Subjects toward their Magistrates is, to thinke most honorably of their office, namely which they acknowledge to be a jurisdiction committed of God, and therefore to esteeme them and reverence them as the ministers and deputies of God. For a man may finde some, which yeeld themselves very obedient to their magistrates, and would not that there were not some whom they should obey, because they so know it to bee expedient for the common benefit: but of the Magistrates themselves they thinke no otherwise than of certaine necessarie evils. But Peter requireth somewhat more of us, when hee commandeth that the King be honored, and Salomon, when hee commandeth God and the King to bee feared: For Peter under the word of honoring containeth a syncere and well deeming estimation: and Salomon joyning the King with God, sheweth that he is full of a certaine holie reverence and dignitie. This is also a notable commendation in Paul, that wee obey not onely for wrath but for conscience. Whereby hee meaneth that Subjects ought to be led not onely with feare of Princes and Rulers to be holden in their subjection (as they are wont to yeeld to their armed enemie, which see that vengeance shall readily be taken upon them if they resist) but because the obediences that are shewed to them are shewed to God himselfe, for as much as their power is of God. I speake not of the men, as if the visor of dignitie did cover foolishnesse, or sluggishnesse, or cruelties or wicked manners, and full of mischievous doing: but I say that the decree it selfe is worthie of honour and reverence: that whosoever be rulers may be esteemed with us, and have reverence, in respect of their being rulers.

1 Pet. 2. 17.
Prov. 24. 21.
Rom. 13. 5.

The obedience which we owe unto Magistrates in our outward actions.

23 Of this then also followeth another thing: that with minds bent to the honouring of them, they declare their obedience in proofe to them: whether it be to obey their proclamations, or to pay tribute, or to take in hand publicke offices and charges that serve for common defence, or to doe any other of their commandements. Let every soule (saith Paul) be subject to the higher powers. For he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. The same Paul writeth to Titus: Warne them that they be subject to rulers and powers, that they obey the Magistrates, that they bee readie to every good worke. And Peter saith, Bee yee subject to everie humane creature (or rather as I translate it, Ordinance) for the Lords sake, either to the King as most excellent, or to the rulers that are sent by him, to the punishment indeed of evill doers, but to the praise of well doers. Moreover that they should testifie that they doe not faigne subjection, but are sincerely and heartily subject, Paul addeth that they should commend to God the safetie and prosperitie of them under whom they live. I exhort (saith hee) that there bee made prayers, beseechings, intercessions, thankesgivings for all men, for Kings and for all that be set in superioritie, that wee may live a peaceable and quiet life with all godlinesse and honestie. Neither let any man here deceive himselfe. For sith the Magistrate cannot be resisted, but that God himselfe must also bee resisted: although it may bee thought that an unarmed magistrate may freely be despised, yet God is armed which will strongly take vengeance on the despising of himselfe. Moreover under this obedience I containe moderation, which private men ought to binde themselves to keepe in cases touching the publicke state, that they doe not of their owne head intermedle in publicke businesse, or rashly breake into the office of the Magistrate, and enterprise nothing publikely. If any thing shall in a publike ordinance be behoovefull to bee amended, let not themselves raise uprores, nor put their hands to the doing of it, which they all ought to have fast bound in this behalfe: but let them commit it to the judgement of the Magistrate, whose hand alone is herein at liberty. I meane, that they presume to doe nothing uncommanded. For when the commandement of the ruler is adjoyned, then are they also furnished with publike authority. For as they are wont to call the counsellers of a King, his eares and eies: so not unfitly, a man may call them the hands of the Prince, whom by his commandement he setteth in authority for the doing of things.

The evill dealings of Magistrates the cause why men thinke they may withdraw both reverence and obedience from them.

24 Now for asmuch as wee have hitherto described a Magistrate such as is indeed the same that he is called, namely, the father of the country, and (as the Poet calleth him) the pastor of the people, the keeper of peace, the protector of righteousnesse, the revenger of innocency: hee is worthily to be judged a mad man, that alloweth not such a government. But whereas this is in a manner the experience of all ages, that of Princes some being careless of all things, to the foreseeing whereof they ought to have beene heedfully bent, doe without all care slothfully wallow in delights: othersome addicted to their gaine, doe set out to sale all lawes, priviledges, judgements, and grants: othersome spoile the poore communalty of mony, which they may after waste upon mad prodigall expendings: othersome exercise meere robberies, in pilling of houses, defiling of virgins and matrones, murdering of innocents: many cannot be perswaded that such should bee acknowledged for Princes, whose authority they ought to obey so farre as they may. For in so great hainous unworthinesse among doings, so much contrary to the duty not onely of a Magistrate, but also of a man, they behold no forme of the image of God, which ought to shine in a Magistrate, when they see no token of that minister of God, which was given for praise to the good, and for vengeance to the evill: so neither doe they also acknowledge such a governor, whose dignity and authority the Scripture commendeth unto us. And truely this feeling of affection hath alway been naturally planted in the minds of men, no lesse to hate and abhor tyrants, than to love and honour lawfull kings.

Subjection due from us even to those Magistrates who towards us neglect their duty and abuse their authority.

25. But if we looke to the word of God, it will lead us further, that we be subject not only to the government of those princes, which execute their office toward us well, and with such faithfulnesse as they ought, but also of all them, which by what meane soever it be, have the dominion in possession although they performe nothing lesse than that which pertaineth to the dutie of Princes. For though the Lord testifieth that the Magistrates is a speciall great gift of his liberality for preserving of the safetie of men, and appointeth to Magistrates themselves their bounds: yet hee doth therewithall declare, that of what sort soever they be, they have not their authority but from him: that those indeed, which rule for benefit of the commonweale, are true examplars and patternes of his bountifulnesse: that they that rule unjustly and wilfully are raised up by him to punish the wickednesse of the people: that all equally have that majesty wherewith he hath furnished a lawfull power. I will proceed no further, till I have added some certaine testimonies of that point. Yet wee need not much to labour to prove that a wicked King is the wrath of God upon the earth, forasmuch as I thinke that no man will say the contrary, and otherwise there should bee no more said of a King than of a common robber that violently taketh away thy goods, and of an adulterer that defileth thy bed, of a murderer that seeketh to kill thee, whereas the Scripture reckoneth all such calamities among the curses of God. But let us rather tarry upon proving that which doth not so easily settle in the minds of men: that in a most naughty man, and most unworthy of all honour, if so that hee have the publike power in possession, remaineth that noble and divine power which the Lord hath by his word given to the ministers of his righteousnesse and judgement, and therefore that he ought of his subjects to be had in as great reverence and estimation, so much as pertaineth to publike obedience, as they would have the best King if he were given them.

26 First, I would have the readers to perceive and diligently to marke that providence

The providence of God in disposing kingdomes and using the service of wicked Kings.
Dan. 2. 21.

dence and singular doings of God, which is in the Scripture not without cause so oft rehearsed unto us, in distributing of kingdomes and making Kings whom it pleaseth him. In Daniel, it is said: The Lord changeth times and courses of times, hee casteth away and maketh Kings. Againe: That the living may know that the Highest is mighty in the kingdome of men, and he shall give it to whom he will. With which manner of sentences whereas the whole Scripture aboundeth, yet that same Prophecie of Daniel specially swarmeth full. Now what manner of King was Nebuchadonozar, he that conquered Hierusalem, it is sufficiently knowne, namely a strong invader and destroyer of others. Yet in Ezekiel the Lord affirmeth that he gave him the land of Ægipt for the service that hee had done to him in wasting of it. And Daniel said to him. Thou King art King of Kings, to whom the King of heavens hath given a mighty, and strong, and glorious kingdome: to thee, I say, he hath given it, and all the lands where dwell the children of men, the beasts of the wood and foules of the aire: he hath delivered them into thy hand, and hath made thee to beare rule over them. Againe hee said to his son Belshazzer: the highest God hath given to Nebuchadonezar thy Father, kingdome and royalty, honour and glory: and by reason of the royalty that he gave him, all peoples, tribes, and languages were trembling and fearefull at his sight. When we heare that a King is ordained of God; let us thereof call to remembrance those heavenly warnings concerning the honour and fearing of a King: then wee shall not doubt to account, a most wicked Tyrant in the same place wherein the Lord hath vouchsafed to set him: Samuel when hee gave warning to the people of Israel, what manner of things they should suffer at the hands of their Kings, said: This shall bee the right of the King that shall raigne over you: he shall take your sonnes and put them to his Chariot, to make them his horsemen, and to plough his land, and reape his crop, and to make instruments of warre. Hee shall take your daughters, that they may bee his dressers of oyntments, his Cookes and Bakers. Your lands, your Vineyards, and your best Olive plants, he shall take away and give to his bond-servants. He shall take tithes of your Seeds and Vineyards, and shall give them to his Eunuches and bond-servants. He shall take away your bond-men, your bond-women and your Asses, and set them to his worke. Yea and he shall take tithes of your flockes, and ye shall bee his bond-servants. Verily Kings should not have done this of right, whom the law did very well instruct to all continence: but it was called a right over the people which it behooved them of necessitie to obey, and they might not resist it: as if Samuel had said. The wilfulnesse of Kings shall runne to such licentiousnesse, which it shall not be your part to resist, to whom this only thing shall be left, to obey their commandements, and hearken to their word.

The Iewes commanded of God to yeeld honour unto a proud & cruell King.
Ier. 27. 5.

27 But chiefly there is in Jeremie a notable place and worthie to bee remembred, which although it be somewhat long, yet I will be content to rehearse, because it most plainely determineth this whole question. I have made the earth and men, saith the Lord, and the living creatures that are on the overface of the earth in my great strength and stretched out arme, and I will deliver it to him, whom it pleaseth in mine eyes. And now therefore I have given all these lands into the hands of Nabuchadnezar my servant, and all nations and great Kings shall serve him, till the time shall come of that land. And it shall bee as a nation and a kingdome that hath not served the King of Babell. I will visite that nation in sword, famine, and pestilence. Wherefore serve ye the King of Babell and live. Wee see with how great obedience the Lord willed that cruell and proud Tyrant to bee honoured, for no other reason but because he possessed the kingdome. And the same was by the heavenly decree, that hee was set in the throne of the kingdome, and taken up into kingly majestie, which it was unlawfull to violate. If wee have this continually before our mindes and eyes, that even the most worst Kings are ordained by the same decree, by which the authoritie of Kings is stablished, these seditious thoughts shall never come into our minde, that a King is to bee handled according to his deservings, and that it is not meete that we should shew our selves subjects to him that doth not on his behalfe shew himselfe a King unto us.

28 In vaine shall any man object that this was a peculiar commandement to the Israelites Israelites. For it is to be noted with what reason the Lord confirmeth it. I have given (saith he) the kingdome to Nebuchadnezar: Wherefore serve yee him and live. To whomsoever therefore it shall be certaine that the kingdome is given, let us not doubt that hee is to be obeyed. And so soone as the Lord advanceth any man to the royall estate, he therein declareth his will to us, that he will have him raigne. For thereof are generall testimonies of the Scripture. Salomon in the xxviij. Chapter, Many Princes are because of the wickednesse of the people. Againe, Job in the xij. Chapter, He taketh away subjection from Kings, and girdeth them againe with the girdle. But this being confessed, there remaineth nothing but that we must serve and live. There is also in Jeremie the Prophet, another commandement of the Lord, wherein he commanded his people to seeke the peace of Babylon, whither they had beene led away captive, and to pray to him for it, because in the peace of it should be their peace. Behold the Israelites being spoiled of all their goods, plucked out of their houses, led away into exile, and cast into miserable bondage, are commanded to pray for the safety of the conquerour: not as in other places we are commanded to pray for our persecutors: but that the kingdome may be preserved to himselfe, and quiet, that they themselves may also live prosperously under him. So David being already appointed King by the ordinance of God, and annointed with his holy oyle, when he was without any his deserving unworthily persecuted of Saul, yet the head of him that layed wait for his life, hee esteemed holy, whom the Lord hath hallowed with the honour of Kingdome. Farre be it from me (said he) that I should before the Lord doe this thing to my Lord, the annointed of the Lord, that I should lay my hand upon him: because hee is the the annointed of the Lord. Againe, My Soule hath spared thee, and I have said, I will not lay my hand upon my Lord, because he is the annointed of the Lord. Againe, Who shall lay his hand upon the annointed of the Lord, and shall be innocent? So sure as the Lord liveth, unlesse the Lord strike him, or his day be come that he die, or he goe downe into battell: farre bee it from me that I should lay my hand upon the annointed of the Lord.

The reasons why the people of Israel were commanded to honour evill Kings, doe as effectually binde us to the like dutie.

29. Finally, wee owe this affection of reverence, yea, and devotion to all our Rulers, of what sort soever they be, which I doe therefore the ofter repeat, that wee may learne not to search what the men themselves be, but take this for sufficient, that by the will of the Lord they beare that personage in which the Lord himselfe hath imprinted and engraved an inviolable Majestie. But (thou wilt say) Rulers owe mutuall duties to their Subjects. That I have already confessed. But if thou thereupon conclude, that obediences ought to be rendred to none but to just Governours, thou art a foolish reasoner. For, husbands are also bound to their wives, and parents to their children with mutuall duties. Let Parents and Husbands depart from their dutie: let Parents shew themselves so hard and unpleasable to their children, whom they are forbidden to provoke to anger, that with their peevishnesse they doe unmeasurably wearie them: let the husbands most despitefully use their wives, whom they are commanded to love, and to spare them as weake vessels: shall yet therefore either children be lesse obedient to their parents, or wives to their husbands? but they are subjects both to evill parents and husbands, and such as doe not their dutie. Yea, whereas all ought rather to endevour themselves not to looke behinde them to the bagge hanging at their backe, that is, not to enquire one of anothers duties, but every man set before him that which is his owne dutie: this ought chiefly to have place among those that are under the power of other. Wherefore if wee be unmercifully tormented of a cruell Prince, if wee be ravenously spoiled of a covetous or riotous Prince, if we be neglected of a slothfull Prince, finally, if we be vexed for godlinesse sake, of a wicked and ungodly Prince; let us first call to minde the remembrance of our sinnes, which undoubtedly are chastised with such scourges of the Lord. Thereby our humility shall bridle our impatience. Let us then also call to minde this thought, that it pertaineth not to us to remedie such evils: but this onely is left for us, that we crave the helpe of the Lord, in whose hands are the hearts of Kings, and the bowings of Kingdomes. Hee is the God that shall stand in the assembly of Gods, and shall in the middest judge the Gods, from whose face all Kings shall fall, and bee broken, and

The provident care of God to deliver his people from their Rulers tyranny. Exod.2.7. Iud 3.9 &c.

30 And here both his marvellous goodnesse, and power, and providence sheweth it selfe: for sometime of his servants hee raiseth up open revengers, and furnisheth them with his commandement, to take vengeance of their unjust government, and to deliver his people many waies oppressed out of miserable distresse: sometime hee directeth to the same end the rage of men that intend and goe about another thing. So he delivered the people of Israell out of the tyranny of Pharao by Moses: and out of the violence of Chusan King of Syria, by Othoniel: and out of other thraldomes, by other Kings and Judges. So hee tamed the pride of Tyrus, by the Ægyptians: the insolence of the Ægyptians, by the Assyrians: the fiercenesse of the Assyrians by the Chaldees: the Boldnesse of Babylon, by the Medians, and by the Persians when Cyrus had subdued the Medians. And the unthankefullnesse of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, and their wicked obstinacy toward his so many benefits, hee did beat downe and bring to distresse sometime by the Assyrians, sometime by the Babylonians, albeit not all after one manner. For the first sort of men when they were by the lawfull calling of God sent to doe such acts: in taking armour against Kings, they did not violate that majestie which is planted in Kings by the ordinance of God: but being armed from heaven they subdued the lesser power with the greater: like as it is lawfull for Kings to punish their Lords under them. But these latter sort, although they were directed by the hand of God whether it pleased him, and they unwittingly did worke, yet purposed in their minde nothing but mischiefe.

The revenge of unbridled government belongeth not to private men.

31 But howsoever the very doings of men bee judged, yet the Lord did as well execute his worke by them, when hee did breake the bloody scepters of proud Kings, and overthrew their intolerable governments. Let Princes heare and bee afraide, But we in the meane time must take great heed, that we doe not despise or offend that authority of Magistrates full of reverend majesty, which God hath established with most weighty decrees, although it remaine with most unworthy men, and which doe with their wickednesse, so much as in them is, defile it. For though the correcting of unbridled government bee the revengement of the Lord, let us not by and by thinke that it is committed to us, to whom there is given no other commandement but to obey and suffer. I speake alway of private men. For if there bee at this time any Magistrates for the behalfe of the people, (such as in old time were the Ephori, that were set against the kings of Lacedemonia, or the Tribunes of the people, against the Roman Consuls: or the Demarchi, against the Senate of Athens: and the same power also which peradventure, as things are now, the three estates have in every Realme, when they hold their principall assemblies) I doe so not forbid them according to their office to withstand the outraging licentiousnesse of kings: that I affirme that if they winke at kings wilfully ranging over and treading downe the poore communalty, their dissembling is not without wicked breach of faith, because they deceitfully betray the liberty of the people, whereof they know themselves to bee appointed protectors by the ordinance of God.

Parliaments.

The duty which we owe unto Kings must not lead us from our obedience to the King of Kings.

32 But in that obedience which wee have determined to bee due to the authorities of Governours, that is alway to be excepted, yea chiefely to be observed, that it doe not lead us away from obeying of him, to whose will the desires of all kings ought to be subject, to whose decrees all their commandements ought to yeeld, to whose Majesty their maces ought to bee submitted. And truely how unorderly were it, for the satisfying of men to runne into his displeasure for whom men themselves are obeyed? The Lord therefore is the King of kings, who when he hath opened his holy mouth, is to bee heard alone for altogether and above all: next to him wee bee subject to those men that are set over us: but no otherwise than in him. If they command any thing against him, let it have no place and let no account bee made of it: neither let vs herein any thing stay upon all that dignity wherewith the Magistrates excell, to which there is no wrong done, when it is brought into order of subjection in comparison of that singular and truely soveraigne power of God. After this

reaſon Daniel denieth that he had any thing offended againſt the king, when he obeyed not his wicked proclamation: becauſe the king had paſſed his bounds, and had not onely beene a wrong doer to men, but in lifting up his hornes againſt God he had taken away power from himſelfe. On the other ſide the Iſraelites are condemned becauſe they were too much obedient to the wicked commandement of the king. For when Ieroboam had made golden calves, they forſaking the Temple of God, did for his pleaſure turne to new ſuperſtitions. With like lightneſſe their poſterity inclined themſelves to the ordinances of their kings. With this the Prophet ſharpely reprocheth them, that they embraced the commandements of the king: ſo farre is it off, that the pretence of humility may deſerve praiſe, wherewith the flatterers of the court doe cover themſelves and deceive the ſimple, while they ſay that it is not lawfull for them to refuſe any thing that is commanded them of their prince: as though God reſigned his right to mortall men, giving them the rule of mankinde: or as though the earthly power were miniſhed, when it is made ſubject to the author of it, before whom even the heavenly powers do humbly tremble for feare. I know how great and how preſent perill hangeth over this conſtancy, becauſe kings doe moſt diſpleaſantly ſuffer themſelves to be deſpiſed, whoſe diſpleaſure (ſaith Salomon) is the meſſenger of death. But ſith this decree is proclaimed by the heavenly herald Peter: That we ought to obey God rather than men, let us comfort our ſelves with this thought, that we then performe that obedience which the Lord requireth, when we ſuffer any thing rather, what ſoever it be, than ſwarve from godlineſſe. And that our courages ſhould not faint, Paul putteth alſo another ſpurre to us: That wee were therefore redeemed of Chriſt with ſo great a price as our redemption coſt him, that we ſhould not yeeld our ſelves in thraldome to obey the perverſe deſires of men, but much leſſe ſhould bee bound to ungodlineſſe.

Adams fall.

The fall of Adam proceeded not of intemperance, of gluttony, but of infidelitie: for he despising the word and truth of God, turned out of the way to the lies of Satan: which infidelity opened the gate to ambition and pride, whereunto was adjoyned unthankefulnesse: and ambition was the mother of disobedience. 2.1.4.

By the fall of Adam sith other creatures have beene after a sort deformed, it is no marvell, that all mankind was corrupted, that is to say, swarved out of kind from his first originall, and made subject to curse. This the old Doctors called Originall sinne, but yet did not so plainely set foorth this point of doctrine as was convenient. In the meane time it is proved by reasons and testimonies of Scripture, that Pelagius fowly erred when hee said that by imitation only, not by propagation, sinne passed from the first man into all his posterity. 2.1.5.6.

And though the pestilence of sinne doe principally abide in the soule, yet it doth not therefore pertaine to the discussing of this Doctrine, to dispute whether the soule of the child commeth of the engendring substance of the father: for as much as the cause of the infection is not in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was ordained of God, that those gifts which hee at the first had given to man, man should have and loose them for him and his. Finally it maketh not against this doctrine, that the children of the faithfull are sanctified. 2.1.7.

That by the fall of Adam the naturall gifts in man were corrupted and the supernaturall were taken away, is a saying that many have used, but few have understood. 2.2.4. 16. which saying is expounded. 2.2.12. that is to say, that the supernaturall gifts, faith, the love of God, charity toward our neighbours, desirous endevour of holinesse and righteousnesse were taken away, but are restored by Christ: and that the naturall gifts, namely the understanding mind, and the heart are corrupted, because the soundnesse of understanding and the uprightnesse of heart were both taken away: Also that reason in man was not utterly blotted out, but partly weakned and partly corrupted: and so will, because it cannot be severed from the nature of man, was not utterly destroyed, but made thrall to corrupt desires. 2.2.12.

It is prooved by the testimonyes of Augustine and of the Scripture, that God not only foresaw or suffered, but also by his will disposed the fall of the first man, and in him the vaine of his posterity, 3.23.7.8.

Angels.

Angels are creatures of God although Moses doe not expresse them in the history of the creation. 1.14.3.

Of the time or order wherein they were created, it is not expedient to enquire, forasmuch much as the Scripture (which wee ought to follow for our rule) declareth nothing thereof. 1.14.4.

Why the heavenly spirits are called Angels, Armies, Vertues, Principalities, powers, dominions, thrones, Gods. 1.14.5.

Concerning Angels the Scripture teacheth so much as is availeable for our comfort and for the confirming of our faith, namely that they are distributers and ministers of Gods bountifulnesse towards us, and the same by divers waies. 1.14.6. 9.

Not only one Angell hath severall care of every one of us, but they all with one consent doe watch for our safety: and therefore it is superfluous to inquire whether every man have his severall Angell assigned to be his keeper. 1.14.7.

Of the number and degrees of Angels, it is curiousnesse to enquire, and rashnesse to determine: And why, whereas they be spirits, the Scripture painteth them with wings under Cherubin and Seraphin. 1.14.8.

Against the Sadducees and such other fantasticall men, it is proved by sundry testimonies of the Scripture, that Angels are not qualities or inspirations without substance, but very spirits indeed. 1.14.9.

That superstition is herein to bee avoided, and that wee give not to Angels those things that belong only to God and Christ. 1.14.10.

For avoiding of this perill, we must consider that whereas God useth their service, hee doth it not of need, as though he could not bee without them, but for the comfort of our weakenesse. 1.14.11. And therefore whatsoever is said of the ministery of Angels, ought to be referred to this end, that overcomming all distrust, our trust in God should bee thereby the more strongly stablished, and not that they should lead us away from God. 1.14.12.

That the Angels also were created after the likenesse of God. 1.15.3.

Of the ascending of Christ into heaven.

Although Christ in his rising againe began more fully to shew forth his glory and power: yet in his ascending into heaven hee first truely began his kingdome, because he then powred out greater abundance of his spirit more royally advanced his raigne, and shewed greater power both in helping them that are his, and in overthrowing his enemies. And yet that he is so absent according to the presence of his flesh, that he is alway every where according to the presence of his maiesty, and with the faithfull according to his unspeakeable and invisible grace. 2. 16. 14.

Baptisme.

THE definition of Baptisme. The first end thereof is to serve our faith before God, the other end, to serve our confession before men. It bringeth to our faith three things first that it is a signe of our clensing, assuring us that all our sinnes are done away. 4. 15. 1. which is proved by testimonies of the Scripture, and that it is not the water that clenseth us, but the bloud of Christ. Sect. 2.

The force of Baptisme is not restrained to the time past: but we are by it washed and clensed once for all our life: and yet that we may not hereof take a liberty to sinne from thence forward. 4. 15. 3.

The power of the daies (as they call it) that is to say, the ministery of the Church, by which the forgivenesse of sinnes is daily preached unto us, is not tobe severed from Baptisme. 4. 15. 4.

The Second fruit of faith by Baptisme, is that it sheweth to us our mortifying in Christ, and a new life in him. 4. 15. 5.

The third fruit is, that it testifieth that we are so united to Christ, that we are partakers of all his good things. For which cause Christ is called the proper object of Baptisme, and the Apostles baptised into the name of Christ, in whom we doe so obtaine the matter both of our clensing and of our regeneration, as we obtaine the cause thereof in the father, and the effect in the holy Ghost. 4. 15. 6.

It is prooved that the Baptisme was all one which was ministred of Iohn and of the Apostles, although some of the old doctors thought otherwise. 4. 15. 7. and that it maketh not to the contrary, that more abundant graces of the Spirit are powred out, since the resurrection tion of Christ. But yet there is in Baptisme a difference to be made of the person of Christ from Iohn, and from the Apostles and other Ministers. 4. 15. 8.

Both our mortifying and our clensing were as by shadow signified among the people Israel, by the passage through the sea, and the comfortable calling of a cloud. 4. 15. 9.

It is false which some have taught, that by Baptisme wee are restored to the same righteousnesse and pureneſſe of nature which Adam had at the beginning. And there is shewed that in the children of God doe remaine yet some leavings of sin, although the same raigne not in them: which doe whet their endevours, and dooh not give them occasion to flatter themselues. 4. 15. 10. 11. the same is proved by Paul. Sect. 12.

How Baptisme serveth our confession before men. 4. 15. 13.

What is the order to use Baptisme, both for confirmation of our faith, and for a confession before men. Where it is shewed that the graces of God are not inclosed in the Sacrament, so as they bee given to us by the vertue thereof. 4. 15. 14. 15.

Baptisme is nothing encreased by the worthinesse of him that doth minister it, nor diminished by his unworthinesse: against the donatists, and our Catabaptists which require a rebaptising, because wee have beene baptized in the kingdome of the Pope. 4. 15. 16. their arguments are confuted Sect. 17. 18.

Baptisme is a continnall Sacrament of repentance for all our life, so that we need no other Sacrament of penance. 4. 19. 17.

Of the conjuring of the water, the wax candle, the chresme, the blowing, the spittle, and such other trifles added to the simple ceremony of Christ: and the order of purely ministring it in the Church is shewed. 4. 15. 19.

It is shewed that to minister Baptisme pertaineth to the Ministers of the Church and not to private men, much lesse to Women: and the contrary objections are confuted. 4. 15. 20. 21. 22.

Baptisme of Infants.

The Baptising of infants doth very well agree with Christs institution, and with the nature of the signe. 4. 16. &c.

Baptisme succeeded in the place of Circumcision, wherein they be like, and wherein they be unlike. 4. 16. 3. 4.

Infants are not to bee debarred from Baptisme, sith the Lord doth make them partakers of the thing signified in baptisme: 4. 16. 5. and that the Lord doth regenerate infants. Sect. 17. 18. 19.

Sith it is certaine that the same covenant which it pleased God to make with Abraham is sealed in infants with the outward Sacrament, therefore ought Baptisme also to have place among them. 4. 16. 6.

Baptising of infants is well proved by this that Christ embraced children and laid his hands upon them. 4. 16. 7.

A confutation of certaine arguments of the enemies of infants Baptisme. 4. 16. 8. 22. 23. 25. 27. 28. 29.

There commeth great fruit by the Baptizing of infants, both to the Faithfull parents and to the children. 4. 16. 9. Which fruit Satan travaileth by the Anabaptists to take from us. 4. 16. 32.

A confutation of the Adversaries arguments saying, that there be other things signified in Baptisme than there are in Circumcision: that our covenant differeth from the olcovenant, that other are called children at thid day then were at that time. 4. 16. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15.

A confutation of their other faigned differences betweene Circumcision and Baptisme. Sect. 16. Also of this objection, that Baptisme is a sacrament of repentance and of faith neither of which can be in tender infancy. 4. 16. 20. 21.

In them of ripe age, faith and understanding ought to goe before Baptisme: but in infants the Baptisme of the faithfull goeth before understanding. 4. 16. 24.

A confutation of their error, which condemne to eternall death all that are not baptized. 4. 16. 26.

Bearing of the Crosse.

It behooveth that we deny our selves, that we wee may beare the Crosse, because it is Gods will to exercise all his under the Crosse, beginning at Christ his first begotten sonne. Which fellowship with Christ doth already give us great ground of patience and comfort. 3.8.1.

It is for many causes necessary for us to lead our life under a continuall Crosse: first to beate downe our arrogancy and trust of our owne strength. And this remedy even the most holy doe need, as is proved by the example of David. 3.8.2. Hereby our trust in God is confirmed, and our hope increased. Sect. 3.

Secondly, that our patience may be tried, and we may be framed to obedience. 3.8.4. Which is most needfull for us, sith the wantonnesse of our flesh is so great to make us shake off the yoke of God when he doth once handle us gently. Sect. 5.

Sometime also to punish our offences committed: wherein we acknowledge that he doth the office of a good father towards us, but contrariwise the unfaithfull are oftentimes made more obstinate. 3.8.6.

A singular comfort when wee suffer either shame or losse, or any other calamity for righteousnesse: which Crosse most properly belongeth to the faithfull. 3.8.7.

How necessary it is for the faithfull, in the bitternesse of afflictions, to be furnished with this thought, that God loveth them, but is angry with their faults. 3.4.34.

Bishops.

The name of Bishop in the old Church was given to some one in every severall company of Ministers, for politike order, and not that they should beare a Lordly rule over others. 4.4.2.

It was the office as well of the Bishop as of other Priests, to preach and minister the Sacraments. 4.4.3.

The old Church did commonly observe the order appointed by the Apostles in calling of Ministers. 4. 4.10.11.12.13.

Of the dissolute licentiousnesse in all parts of their life, which priests and Bishops, &c. use in the Papacy. 4.5.14.

C

Calling.

OF the effectual or inward calling, which is a sure testimony of election, and hangeth upon the only free mercy of God. 3.24.1.2.

Against them, which in predestination doe make man a worker with God. Also against them that hang election upon that which followeth election. 3.24.3.

The certaintie of our election is to be knowne by the word and calling of God, and we ought not to pearse into the eternall councell of God. 3.24.4.

The father hath chosen us onely in Christ, in him therefore let us hold the stedfast ground of our election. 3.24.5. and so, that thereof also we may conceive a sure confidence of perseverance to the end. 3.24.6.7.8.9.

Two kinds of calling universall, and speciall. 3.24.8.

It is proved by divers examples and testimonies of Scripture, that the elect before there calling do differ nothing from other men, and that it is false which some men do dream, that there is a certain seed of election planted in their hearts, even from their nativity. 3.24. 10.11.

It is shewed at large that as God doth by the effectuallnesse of his calling toward the elect, make perfect the salvation to which hee had by his eternall councell appointed them: so he he hath his judgements against the reprobats, wherby he putteth his purpose concerning them in execution, and maketh way for his predestination. 3.24.12.13.14. &c.

Cardinals.

When the name of Cardinals first began, and how they have so suddainely start up to so great honour. 4.7.30.

Ceremonies.

The old Ceremonies are taken away, as touching their use onely, but not as touching their effect, for we have the same effect at this day most evidently and effectually in Christ. And this doth nothing diminish their holines as it is prooved 2.7.16. and being weighed by themselves and without Christ, they are worthily called of Paul handwritings against us. 2.7.17.

The ordinances concerning Ceremonies in the Popes law, doe command observation for the most part unprofitable, and sometime also foolish although they have a great seeming of wisdome: moreover they oppresse consciences with their infinite multitude. 4.10.11. 12.13.

The Popish Ceremonies cannot be excuted by this colour, that they bee ordained for the instruction of the ignorant as the ceremonies of the law were: because there appeareth in in this point a manifest difference betweene us and the people before Christ. 4.10. 14.

The Popish Ceremonies are beleeved to bee sacrifices cleansing sins, and deserving eternall life: they are without doctrine, and are snares to catch mony. 4.10.15.

Charity toward our neighbour.

It is proved, against the Sorbonists that Charity is the love of our neighbour and not of our selves. 2.8. 54.

Vnder the name of neighbour is contained every man, be hee never so much a stranger to us, and our enemy, 2.8.55. and therefore the Schoolemen are condemned of ignorance which of the commandements of God, not to desire revenge, and to love our enemies, have made Counsels, to the necessary keeping whereof Monkes alone doe binde themselues: and it is proved that the old doctors of the Church. yea and Gregory himselfe thought otherwise. 2.8.56.57.

Wee have need of patience, that we be not weary of doing good to other. And we ought not to have respect to the unworthinesse or other qualities of men which might withdraw us, but to God which so commandeth us. 3. 7.6.

To the fulfilling of all the parts of charity, it is not enough if we performe all the dutifull deeds of charity, but we must doe it with a sincere affection of heart. Wherein the chiefe point is, that we take upon our selves the person of him whom we see to need our helpe. So shall we avoide disdainefull pride and other corruptings of charity. 3. 7. 7.

Christ and the Apostles in rehearsing the summe of the Law doe sometime leave out the first table: not for that it more availeth to the summe of righteousnesse to live innocently with men, than to honour God with godlines: but because unfained charity is the proofe of true godlinesse. 2.8.52.53.

A confutation of the Pharisees of our time which hold that we are justified by charity, because Paul saith that charity is greater than faith and hope. 3.18.8.

An exposition of the tenth commandement wherein (as in the former commandements) is forbidden not only all purpose to hurt our neighbor, but also all lust or desire against charity. 2.8.49.58.

God doth for good cause and worthily require of us so great ferventnesse and uprightnesse of love. 2. 8.50.

Where-

Whereſoever thoſe ſignes are, we ought not to depart from that fellowſhip. 4.8.12.

There may ſome fault creepe in, either in doctrine or in miniſtration of Sacraments, for the which yet we ought not to caſt off the communion of that Church. and much leſſe for the imperfection of life and corruptneſſe of manners. And herein the Anabaptiſts are reproved. 4.1.12.13.14.15.16.

The Church is none otherwiſe holy, but that it alwaies hath many faults, and yet it ceaſeth not to be the Church, as is prooved by teſtimonies of Scripture and the experience of all ages. 4.1.17.18.19.

See Miniſtery of the Church.

Churches power as touching Articles of faith.

It is prooved by the example of the Apoſtles and Prophets, and of Chriſt himſelfe, that whatſoever authoritie the Church hath, is properly not given to men, but to the word, the miniſtration whereof is committed to them: And therefore it was never lawfull for the Church, to teach any other thing, than that which ſhe received of the Lord. 4.8.1.2.3.4.8.9.

Chriſt hath ever taught his Church: and yet he hath uſed divers maners of teaching according to the diverſitie of times, ere the law was written, in the time of the Law and the Prophets, and laſt of all ſince that he himſelfe was openly ſhewed in the fleſh. 4.8.5.6.7.

False Church.

Where lying and falſhood hath gotten the upper hand and reigneth, there is not the Church. And this is proved to be in the Papacie, although they there boaſt of a perpetuall ſucceſſion of Biſhops. 4.2.1.2.3.4.

They are not Heretikes or Schiſmatikes that depart from the Papacie. 4.2.5.6.

How much ſoever a man make the beſt of the fruits of the Popiſh Church, yet the ſtate thereof is no better than was in the kingdome of Iſrael under Ieroboam. 4.2.7.8.9.10.

And so did Augustine thinke, if be he diligently weighed. 3.3.12. and this is proved by many places of his writings. 3.3.13.

Confession Auricular.

Concerning Confession, the schoole Divines doe fight against the Canonists, affirming that it is not by the commandement of God. A confutation of the arguments whereupon the first sort doe stand, first because the Lord in the Gospell did send the Leprous whom he had clensed to the Priests: and there is shewed the true meaning of the doing. 3.4.4.

A confutation of their second argument, for that the Lord commanded his Disciples to loose and unwinde Lazarus when he was raised from death. 3.4.5.

A true exposition of two places by which they travell to uphold their confession: that is to say, that they which came to the Baptisme of John did confesse their sins, and James willeth us to confesse our sins one to another. 3.4.6.

The use of confessing to a Priest was very ancient, but yet free as a politicke order, not as a law set by Christ or his Apostles: and afterward the same was abrogated by Nectarius bishop of the Church of Constantinople because of a Deacon which had under that pretence abused a woman. This tyrannous law was not laid upon Churches before the time of Innocent the third, about three hundred yeeres past, and the foolishnesse and barbarousnesse of that ordinance is declared. 3.4.7.

The lewdnesse of all the particular articles of the law of confessing, and specially of that concerning the rehearsing of all sins. 3.4.16. and a plaine description of the cruelty wherewith poore consciences were by divers circumstances tormented therein. 3.4.17.

By a similitude is described how a great part of the world hath hitherto obeyed such illusions. That it is an impossible law, and maketh men hypocrites. And then is shewed a most certaine rule of confession according to the example of the Publican. 3.4.18.

A confutation of this article, that sins are not forgiven, and that the gate of Paradise is shut, &c. unlesse there be first firmly conceived a vow of confession, where also their objection is confuted that judgement cannot be pronounced till the cause be heard, that is to say, that absolution cannot be given till all the sins be rehearsed. 3.4.18.

It is no marvell that we condemne and abolish auricular confession, and our adversaries doe safely assigne so great profit unto it, for so much as on the other side it armeth men to boldnesse of sinning. 3.4.19.

They doe falsly pretend that they have the power of the keyes, sith they are not the successors of the Apostles, nor have the holy Ghost, forasmuch as they doe daily without consideration lose those things which the Lord hath commanded to be bound, and binde what hee hath commanded to be loosed. 3.4.20.

It is proved false that they say that the power of the keyes may sometime bee used without knowledge, forasmuch as by that meane the absolution should be uncertaine. Where also is spoken of the absolution and condemnation which the ministers of the Gospell or the Church doe pronounce according to the word, of the certainty thereof. 3.4.22.

The absolution of the Priests in the Papacy is uncertaine, as well on the behalfe of him that assoileth, as of him that confesseth: but contrariwise contrariewise it is in the absolution of the Gospell which hangeth upon this only condition, if the sinner seeke his purging in the only sacrifice of Christ, and to yeeld to the grace offered unto him. 3.4.22.

The Popish Doctors, when they alleadge for themselves the power of loosing given to the Apostles, doe wrongfully wrest to auricular confession those sayings which Christ spake partly of preaching of the Gospell, and partly of Excommunication. The errours of Lombard and such other in this matter: and concerning the manner of remission with enjoyning of penance and satisfaction. 3.4.23.

True Confession.

What kind of confession is taught us by the word of God, namely to confesse to God the knower of our hearts and of all our thoughts. 3.4.9.

Out of this secret confession made to God, followeth a voluntary confession before men, so oft as it is behoovefull for the glory of God, or the humbling of our selves. And of this second kind there was an ordinary use in the old Church, and is also in the Church at this day. But yet extraordinarily it ought after a speciall manner to be used, whensoever it shall happen that the people be guilty in any generall offence, or to be plagued with any calamity. Of the profit of such confession. 3.4.10.11.

Of two other sorts of private confession: of which the first is used for our owne cause, when wee require comfort of our brethren, because the feeling of sinnes doth vexe and trouble us: in which case we must chiefly resort to our Pastours: and this remedy is warily and moderately to be used, that no bondage be brought in. The other sort is to appease and reconcile our neighbour, if he be in any thing offended by our fault, under which kinde is contained their confession which have sinned so far as to the offence of the whole Church. 3.4.12.13.

The power of the keyes hath place in the three kindes of confession. Of the fruit which they that confesse doe receive thereby, because they know that forgivenesse of sinnes is declared to them by the messenger of Christ. 3.4.14.

Of confession of sinnes one sort is generall, another speciall. 3.20.9.

It is to bee wished, that the manner of the old Church were brought in use againe, to call children to give account of their faith. 4.19.13.

Conscience.

Consciences, when they seeke assurance of their justification before God ought to forget all the righteousnesse of the law. 3.19.2.3.

The consciences of the faithfull doe not follow the law as constrained by necessity of the law, but being free from the yoke of the law, doe voluntarily obey the will of God. 3.19.4.5.6.

Of Councels.

Wee must keepe a meane in honouring of Councels, that wee take nothing away from Christ, and our doctrine for the most part is confirmed by the ancient Councels. 4.9.1.

By the Scripture the Councels have no authority, unlesse they be assembled in the name of Christ: and what that is. 4.9.2.

It is false which the papists affirme that truth remaineth not in the Church unlesse it bee among the Pastors, and that the Church it selfe is not unlesse it remaine to be seene in generall Councels. 4.9.3.4.5.6.7.

What things are to be weighed in searching the authority of any Councell: and that Augustine prescribeth a very good way therin. 4.9.8.

Councels one against another. 4.9.9. and even in those former and ancient Councels are found faults and errours. 4.9.10.11.

Creation of the world.

Although God ought to be knowne by the creation of things, yet lest the faithfull should fall away to the fained inventions of the heathen, his will was that the history of the creation should remaine written, and the time thereof expressed in the Scripture. 1.14.1. where there ungodly scoffing is confuted, which aske why it came not sooner in Gods minde to create heaven and earth. 1.14.1.

For the same purpose it is rehearsed that God ended his worke, not in a moment, but in six dayes: and likewise the order is set foorth, namely that Adam was not created till God had first furnished the world with all plenty of good things. 1.14.2.22.

A confutation of the errour of Manicheu concerning two originall beginnings. 1.14.3.

It is proved by the Scriptures that the knowledge of God which appeareth in the workmanship of the world cannot by it selfe alone bring us into the right way. 1.5.13. & yet are we rightfully without all excuse. Sect. 14.

Although the beholding of heaven & earth and the consideration of the ordering of things pertaining to men, doe move us to worship God, yet all these things passed away without profit, even from the wisest philosophers. 1.5.10.

Hereupon came the infinite number of gods, and the contrarieties of opinion among the sects of Philosophers concerning God. 1.5.11.

The substance of God is incomprehensible: but in his works, by engraving certaine points of his glory therein hee hath after a certaine manner presented himselfe to be seene. 1.5.1.

The wisdome of God is testified, not only by those things which Philosophers and learned men do find by speculation in heaven & earth, but also which common men do perceive by the onely helpe of their eyes. 1.5.2.

That wee may with true faith conceive so much as behooveth us to know concerning God, it is good to learne the history of the creation of the world, in such sort as Moses hath set it forth, the chiefe points wherof are briefly rehearsed. 1.14.20.

The consideration of the works of God, that is to say, of the creation of all things, ought to be applied to two principall ends, first that we doe not with unthankfull neglecting or forgetfulnesse passe over his vertues which he presenteth apparantly to bee seene in his creatures. 1.14.21. Secondly, that we may learne to apply them to our selves whereby wee may stir up our selves to the trust, invocation, praise, and love of him. 2.14.22.

The Papists have no true Deaconrie left, forasmuch as all the disposition of Church goods among them is openly turned to sacriledge and robbery. 4.5.16.18.19.

A confutation of the shamelesnesse of certaine Papists, which say that the riotous excesse of Priests, and of all the Popish Church, is the gloriousnesse of the Kingdome of Christ which the holy Prophets spake of before. 4.5.17.

Death of Christ.

Although Christ hath by the whole course of his obedience, that is to say, by his whole life, & all the parts thereof, redeemed us, yet the Scripture to set forth more plainly the manner of our salvation, doth ascribe the same as peculiar & proper to the death of Christ. In the which the voluntary yeelding of Christ hath the first place which yet was so voluntary as he gave over his owne affection not without strife. Also his condemnation is to bee considered: Wherein two things are to be noted, namely that Christ was reputed among the wicked, and yet that his innocency was oftentime testified even by the judges owne mouth. 2.1.5.

The manner of his death is to bee marked, that is to say, the accursed crosse. And it is declared by many testimonies of Esay and the Apostles, that this behooved so to be, that the curse which was due to us being cast upon him and so overcome and taken away, we should be delivered. And this was figuratively represented in the sacrifices of Moses law, which at the last was performed in Christ, the originall truth of all figures. 2.1.6.

Both in the death and buriall of Christ a double benefit is set before us, that is to say, deliverance from death whereunto we were in bondage and the mortifying of our flesh. 2.1.6.

Descending of Christ to hell.

The descending of Christ to hell conteineth the mysterie of a great thing, and is of no small importance to the effect of our redemption. Divers expositions of this article are rehearsed and confuted. 2.16.8.9.

A true, godly, holy and comfortable exposition thereof out of the word of God, which is also confirmed by the testimony of the old doctors, that Christ did not only suffer a bodily death, but also did feele the rigour of Gods vengeance, whereby hee might both appease his wrath and satisfie his just judgement: and therefore it behooved that he should, as it were hand to hand wrastle with the power of hell and with the horrour of everlasting death, yet was God not at any time either his enemy, or angry with him. But he did suffer the grievousnesse of Gods severity, in respect that he being stricken and beaten with the hand of God, did feeleall the tokens of Gods wrath and punishment. 2.16.10.11.

A confutation of certaine wicked and unlearned men, which at this day doe find fault with this exposition crying out, that the Son of God hath wrong done to him, and that he is charged with desperation, which is contrary to faith. Therefore it is prooved against them with manifest testimonies, that these two things doe very well stand together, that Christ feared, was troubled in spirit, was afraid, was tempted in every point as we are, and yet that he is without sinne. 2.16.12

Divels.

Those things that the Scripture teacheth concerning divels, tend commonly to this end, that we should bee carefull to beware of their deceits, and furnish our selves with those weapons which may be able to beate backe the most mighty enemies. 1.14.13.

That we should be the more stirred up to do so, it sheweth us that there is not one or two divels, but great armies of evill spirits that make warre against us: and in what sence it sometime speaketh of the devill in the singular number. 1.14.14.

This ought to enflame us to a continuall war with the diuell, for that he is every where called enemy to God and us. 1.14.15.

The divell is naturally wicked, a murderer, a lyar, and forger of all maliciousnesse. 1.14.15. But this evilnesse of nature is not by creation, but by corruption. 1.14.16.

It is curiosity to enquire of the cause, manner, time and fashion of the fall of the evill angels, forasmuch as the Scripture leaveth it unspoken. 1.14.16.

This the devill hath of himselfe and of his owne naughtinesse, desirously and purposely to striue against God, but he can do and performe nothing unlesse God be willing and grant it. 1.14.17.

God so tempereth this government, that he giveth Satan to reigne over the soules of the faithfull, forasmuch as in the end they ever obtaine the victory, although in some particular doings they be wounded and beaten downe: but hee only giveth the wicked to him to governe, and to use his power upon their soules and bodies. 1.14.18.

A confutation of them which say that divells are nothing else but evill affections or perturbations: and it is prooved by testimonies of Scripture, that they are mindes or Spirits endued with sence and understanding. 1.14.19.

Discipline.

Discipline is a thing most necessary in the Church. 4.12.1.

Of private admonishings, which is the first foundation of the discipline of the Church. 4.12.2.

Of the Ecclesiasticall Senate, that is to say, the Seniors or Elders, which together with the Bishops have the oversight of manners. 4.3.8.

Of the power of binding and loosing so much as pertaineth to discipline, wherin there is spoken of excommunication. 4.11.2.

This power of the Church is distinct from the civill power, and the one is a helpe to the other. Therfore the opinion of some men is false which thinke that it ought to have no place where are Christian magistrates. 4.11.1.3.8.

This is a staied and continuall order in the Church, and not enduring only for a time. 4.11.4.

The ends which the Church hath regard unto in corrections and Excommunication. 4 12.5.

Of exercising the discipline of the Church according to the proportion of sinnes, forasmuch as some be private and some be publike, some be negligent defaults, some be hainous offences. 4.12.3.4.6.

In excommunication severity ought to be tempered. And in this behalfe is noted the extreame rigorousnesse of them in old time. 4. 12.8.

Every private man ought to esteeme them that bee excommunicate as strangers from the Church, but not to account them past hope, but to endevour to the vttermost of theire power to bring them into the way again. 4.12.9.10.

If the bench of Elders doe not so diligently correct faults as they ought, or if the Pastors cannot amend all things as they would, yet private men ought not to depart from the Church, neither ought the Pastors to shake off their ministery. 4.12.11.

Against the preciseneſse of the old Donatists and of the Anababtists of our dayes, which doe acknowledge no Congregation of Christ, but where there is in every point an Angelike perfection. 4.12.12.

If the corruption of any sinne have infected the whole multitude, the rigorousnesse of discipline must be tempered with mercy, lest the whole body be destroyed. 4.12.13.

F

Faith.

THe name of faith otherwise taken among holy writers than it is among the profane. 4.22.13.

How it is to be understood that God is the object of faith. 2.6.4.

Of faith. And here the Sophisters are reproved, which understand nothing else by this word faith, but a common assent to the history of the Gospell, and doe simply call God the object of faith, in the meane time leaving out Christ, without whom there is no faith, nor any accesse to God. 3.2.1.

A confutation of the Schoolemens doctrine concerning unexpressed faith, whereas faith requireth an expresse reknowledging of the goodnesse of God, in which standeth our righteousnesse. 3.2.2.

Our faith, so long as wee are wavering in the world, is wrapped with many remnants of ignorance, and in all things infidelity is ever mingled with faith, whereof many examples are seene in the disciples of Christ before that they came to perfect light, yet this is still most true, that understanding is ever joyned with faith. 3.2.3.4.

There is a certaine obedience to Christ, and aptnesse to learne, with a desire to profit, which is called by the name of faith, whereas it is but a preparation to faith, and that same may be called an unexpressed faith: yet it far differeth from the Papists invention. 3.2.5.

The true faith or knowledge of Christ, is when we conceive him in such sort as he is offered of the father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. And faith hath a mutuall relation to the word and the word to faith, because the word is the fountaine of faith, the ground of faith, and the mirror in which faith beholdeth God. 3.2.6.

Faith, although it assent to all the parts of the word of God, yet most properly it hath regard therin to the good will and mercy of God, that is to say, the promises of grace grounded upon Christ, for the understanding and certainty whereof, the holy Ghost lighteneth our mindes and strengthneth our hearts: Hereupon is gathered the definition of faith. 3.2.7.

A confutation of the Sophisters distinction of Faith, formed and formelesse: whereby it appeareth that they never thought of the singular gifts of the holy Ghost, for as much as Faith can in no wise be severed from a godly affection. 3.2.8.

This word faith hath divers significations and is sometime taken for the power to doe myracles, with which gift of God, sometime the wicked are endued: sometime it is figuratively taken for that knowledge of God which is in some wicked men, which is rather a shadow and image of Faith, of which faith there are divers sorts in them. 3.2.9.10.

The reprobate have also sometime such a like feeling as the elect have, yet they doe not fully conceive the force of spirituall grace, but onely confusedly. Nevertheless the same is a certaine inferiour working of the holy Ghost. But this feeling differeth far from the peculiar testimonie which hee giveth to the Elect. 3.2.11.

Yet is not the Spirit deceitfull, which lightly sprinkleth the reprobate sometime with such a knowledge of the Gospell, and feeling of the love of God as afterward doth vanish away. Sometime also there is stirred up in their hearts a certaine desire of mutuall love toward God, but such a love as is hyred and not a harty love. At length it is concluded that there be some which doe not faigne a faith, and yet doe lacke the true faith. Which is also prooved by testimonies. 3.2.12. and such a feeling is in the Scripture called faith, although it be unproperly so called. 3.2.13.

Faith is sometime taken for the sound doctrine of religion, and the whole summe thereof: contrariewise sometime it is restrained to some particular object, and sometime it signifieth the ministery of the Church. 3.2.13.

Faith is most rightfully called knowledge and science, and yet such a knowledge as rather consisteth of certaine perswasion than of understanding, for as much as that which our minde conceiveth by faith is most infinite. 3.2.14.

Faith is not content with a doubtfull opinion or a darke conceiving, but requireth a full and setled assurednesse: and hereunto are to be referred all those titles of commendation wherwith the holy Ghost setteth forth the authority of the word of God. 3.2.15.

Many doe so conceive the mercy of God, that they receive very little comfort therof, because they doubt whether he will be mercifull to themselves or no: but there is a farre other feeling of the abundant store of Faith, the chiefe ground whereof is that we do not thinke the promises to be true without our selves onlie, but rather that by inwardly imbracing them, we may thinke them our owne. Hereupon is gathered, who may truely bee called faithfull. 3.2.15.16.

Though the faithfull in reknowledging the goodnesse of God toward them are not only oftentimes tempted with unquietnesse, but also are sometime shaken with: most grievous terrours: yet this withstandeth not but that faith bringeth assurednesse with it because howsoever they be troubled, yet they never faile and depart from that sure affiance which they have conceived of the mercy of God, but striving with their owne weakenesse they alwaies get the upper hand at last: which is prooved by many examples in David. 3.2.17.

A description of the battell of the flesh and the spirit within a faithfull soule. 3.2.18.

The assurednesse of Gods good will. 3.2.18.

A confutation of the most pestilent subtill reasoning of certaine halfe Papists, which although they confesse that so oft as we looke upon Christ, we finde plentifull matter to hope well, yet will needs have us to waver and doubt in consideration of our owne unworthinesse. And it is prooved that we ought nevertheless to looke for assured salvation, for as much as Christ by a certaine marvellous communion doth dayly grow together more and more into one body with us. 3.2.24.

So soone as wee have any one drop of faith we begin to behold God mercifull unto us, although a far off in deede, yet with so assured sight, as we know we are not deceived: both these points are prooved by testimonies of Paul 3.2.19.20.

It is shewed by examples, how faith armeth and fortifieth it selfe with the word of God to beare the violent assaults of tentations, and how the godly minde never suffereth the affiance of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it, although it be assailed with many remnants of unbeliefe and distrust. 3.2.21.

In the good will of God, which faith is said to have respect unto, although faith doe chiefly looke unto the assured expectation of eternall life, yet there are also contained promises of this present life and a perfect surety of all good things, but the same such as may be gathered of the word: both these points are confirmed by testimonies of Scripture. 3.2.28.

Faith although it embrace the word of God in every point, that is to say, in the commandements dements also and in the prohibitions and threatnings, yet hath her foundation and proper marke whereunto it is directed, in the free promise of mercie, and for this reason the Gospell is called the word of faith, and is set as contrarie to the law. 3.2.29.

Yet doe we not by this distinction teare faith in sunder as Pighius shamefully cavilleth. 3.2.30.

Faith doth no lesse need the word of God, than the fruit doth need the lively root of the tree, and with the word must be joyned a consideration of the power of God, without the which mens eares will either not willingly, heare the word, or not esteeme it worthily. His power is to be considered: in that that it is effectuall, that is to say, by the workes of God, and by his benefits either particular or ancient, and such as he hath bestowed upon the whole church. 3.2.31.

The faithfull oftentimes so behave themselves, that some errors are mingled with their faith, and they seeme to passe the bounds of the word, but yet so that faith hath alway the upper hand: This is prooved by the examples of Sara and Rebecca, whom in the crooked turnings of their minde, God did by a secret bridle hold fast in the obedience of his word. 3.2.31.

By reason of our blindnesse and stiffenecked-nesse, the word sufficeth not to make us have faith, unlesse the spirit of God doe enlighten our minde, and strengthen our heart with his power: and the same spirit is not only the beginner of our faith, but also doth encrease it by degrees. 3.2.33.

Although it seeme to the most part of men a most strange doctrine, that no man can beleeve in Christ, but hee to whom it is given, yet is prooved to be most true by reasons, testimonies of Scripture, and examples. 3.2.34.

Therefore faith is called the spirit of faith, the worke and good pleasure of God: and it is a singular gift, which hee giveth by singular priviledge to whom he will, as it is prooved by notable sentences taken out of Augustine. 3.2.35.

It is not enough that the minde be enlightened with understanding of the word, unlesse also the assurednesse of the word be powred into the very heart, both which things the spirit worketh, which is therefore called the seale, the pledge, and the spirit of promise. 3.2.36.

Although faith bee tossed with divers doubtings, yet it alway at the last, escapeth out of the gulfe of tentations, and receveth most sweet quietnesse. 3.2.37.

A confutaton of the damnable doctrine of the Schoolmen, which say that we can none otherwise determine of the grace of God toward us, than by morall conjecture. 3.2.38.

They are prooved to be miserably blinde, in saying that it is rashnesse for us to conceive an undoubted knowledge of the will of God: A good comparison of them and Paul in this point of doctrine. 3.1.39.

A confutation of their trifling shift that although we may take upon us to judge of the grace of God according to the present state of righteousnesse, yet the knowledge of persevering to the end abideth in suspence. 3.2.40.

It is proved that the definition of faith taught in this chapter, Sect. 7. agreeth with the Apostles definition: Heb. cap. 11. And the errour of the Schoolmen, that charity is before faith and hope, is confuted by the testimonie of Bernard. 3.2.41.

Hope is alway engendred of faith, and is the undivided companion of faith, so that whosoever lacketh hope, is proved also to have no faith. Also faith is nourished and strengthened by hope, and how necessary are the helpes of hope to stablish faith which is assailed with so many sorts of tentations. 3.2.42.

By reason of this conjoyning and alliance of faith and hope, the scripture doth many times use those two words without difference, and sometime joyneth them together. A confutation of the errour of Peter Lombard, which maketh two foundations of faith, that is to say, the grace of God, and the merit of workes. 3.2.43.

Feare.

The faithfull are oftentimes troubled with Feare and distrust by reason of the feeling of their owne weakneſſe. 3.2.17.

Another kinde of feare conceived in a godly heart, either by examples of Gods vengeance againſt the wicked, or by conſideration of his owne miſery: Such feare is ſo much not contrary to faith, that the faithfull are much exhorted to have it. Neither is it any marvell, if there bee in a faithfull ſoule both feare and faith, ſith on the other ſide in the wicked there are both dull negligence and carefulneſſe. 3.2.22.23.

The feare of God proceedeth out of a double feeling, namely, when we honour God as our father, and feare him as our Lord: Neither is it any marvell if one minde have both thoſe affections.

This feare differeth from the feare of the unfaithfull, which they commonly call a ſervile feare. 3.2.27.

Of forſaking our ſelves.

The firſt beginning of framing our life after the rule ſet forth in the law, is to conſider that we are not at our owne liberty, but hallowed and dedicated to God. And therefore we ought to forſake our ſelves, and our owne reaſon, (which as the Philoſophers thinke, ought alone to be obeyed) to the end that wee may be governed by the Word and Spirit of the Lord. 3.7.1.

Alſo that we ought not to ſeeke thoſe things that are our owne, but thoſe things that are according to the will of the Lord, and doe ſerve to advance his glory. And that this is the forſaking of our ſelves, without the which there is a world of vices enclоſed in the ſoule of man, and if there be any ſeeming of vertue at all, the ſame is corrupted with wicked deſire of glory. 3.7.2.

The forſaking or mortifying of our ſelves, is partly in reſpect of men, and partly, yea, and chiefly in reſpect of God. Toward other men, the Scripture commandeth us to doe two things: namely, to preferre them to honour before our ſelves, and with unfained truth to imploy our ſelves wholly to procure their commodities. How the firſt of theſe points is to be performed, is taught in the 3.4.7. and alſo how the Scripture leadeth us by the hand to the ſecond point, is ſhewed in the 3.7.5.

See certaine things pertaining to this purpoſe. 3.20.43.

Free-will.

Man was endued with free-will in the firſt eſtate of his creation. 1.15.8. which he loſt by his fall. Of this the Philoſophers were ignorant, and ſo all ſuch as follow them, giving free-will to man, are utterly deceived. 1.15.8.

The pliableneſſe or weake power of free-will which was in the firſt man, doth not excuſe his fall. 1.15.8.

It is as well for our profit as for the glory of God, to acknowledge our ſtrength to be but a ſtaffe made of a reed, yea, but a ſmoke. In the meane time we muſt beware, that while we take all uprightneſſe from man, wee doe not thereof take occaſion of ſlothfulneſſe. But rather we ought thereby to bee ſtirred up to ſeeke in God all the goodneſſe whereof we our ſelves are void. The defenders of free-will doe rather throw it downe headlong than ſtabliſh it. 2.2.1.

The Philoſophers determine three powers of the ſoule, Underſtanding, Senſe, and Will or Appetite: and they thinke that the reaſon of mans underſtanding ſufficeth for his good governance: that will is by ſenſe moved to evill, ſo that it doth hardly yeeld it ſelfe to reaſon, and ſometime is diverſly drawne from the one to the other, but yet that it hath a free election, and cannot be ſtopped, that it may follow reaſon, her guide in all things: finally, that vertues and vices are in our powers. 2.2.2.3.

The Eccleſiaſticall Writers, although they acknowledged the ſoundneſſe of underſtanding and the freedome of will to have beene ſore wounded by ſinne, yet have ſpoken too much Philoſophically of this matter. The old Writers did it for this purpoſe, firſt becauſe they were loth to teach a thing that ſhould be an abſurdity in the common judgement of men, and alſo ſpecially, leſt they ſhould give a new occaſion of ſlothfulneſſe to the fleſh being already too much dull to godlineſſe, as appeareth by many ſayings of Chryſoſtome and Hierome. The Greeke Doctors above all other, and ſpecially Chryſoſtome, doe exceed meaſure in advan- advancing free will. But all the old writers generally, except Auguſtine, doe ſo vary and waver in this point of doctrine, that there can almoſt no certainty be gathered of their writings. They which came after them, fell one after another to worſe and worſe. The definitions of freewill out of Origen, Auguſtine, Bernard, Anſelme, Peter Lombard, and Thomas. 2.2.4.

In what things they doe commonly give freewill to man, and of the three ſorts of mans will. 2.2.5.

Alſo of the common diſtinction of the three ſorts of liberty. 2.2.5.

Whether man be wholly deprived of power to doe good, or whether he have yet ſome power though it be weake: where it is ſpoken of the common diſtinction of grace working and grace working together, and what is amiſſe in the ſame diſtinction. 2.2.6.

Foraſmuch as it cannot otherwiſe bee ſaid that man hath freewill, but becauſe he doth evill of his owne will, and not by compulſion, it had beene very good for the Church that this word freewill had never been uſed, which had raiſed up men to a damnable truſt of themſelues. The old writers alſo do oft declare what they meane by that word, ſpecially Auguſtine, out of whom there are many places alleadged, where he weakneth and mocketh the ſtrength thereof, both when he calleth it Bondwill, and when hee expoundeth the thing it ſelfe as it is at large. 2.2.7.8.

Although the old Eccleſiaſticall writers doe ſometime too much advance freewill, and have ſpoken doubtfully and diverſly in that matter: yet it appeareth by very many of their ſayings, that they little or nothing eſteeming mans power, gave the whole praiſe of all goodneſſe to the holy Ghoſt. Many ſuch ſentences are rehearſed out of Cyprian, Auguſtine, Eucherivs, Chryſoſtome. 2.2.9.

The power of mans will is not to be weighed by the ſucceſſe of things, but by the choice of judgement and the affection of will. 2.4.8.

It is prooved againſt the defenders of freewill that ſinne is of neceſſity, and yet nevertheleſſe ought to be imputed: alſo that it is voluntarie, and yet cannot be avoided. 2.5.1.

A ſolution of another objection of theirs, where they ſay that unleſſe both vertues and vices proceede of free election of will, it were no reaſon that man ſhould either be puniſhed or rewarded. 2.5.2.

Alſo another objection, where they ſay that if this were not the power of our will, to chooſe good or evill, then of neceſſitie either all men ſhould be good, or all men evill. 2.5.3.

Againſt the ſame men alſo it is prooved that exhortations, admonitions, and rebukings are not in vaine, although it be not in the power of the ſinner to obey: and there is ſhewed what effect the ſame do worke both in the wicked and the faithfull. 2.5.4.5.

It is not to bee gathered by the commandements and law of God, that man hath freewill and ſtrength to performe them, for God doth not only command what ought to be done, but alſo promiſeth grace to obey. 2.5.6.7.9.

This is prooved as well in the commandements which require the firſt converſion to God, as alſo in thoſe which ſpeake ſimply of the obſerving of the law: and thoſe which command men to continue in the received grace of God. For the ſame God which requireth thoſe things, doth teſtifie that the converſion of a ſinner, holineſſe of life, ſteadfaſtneſſe of continuance, are his free gifts, and the praiſe thereof is not to be parted betweene God and man. 2.5.8.9.11.

The conditionall promiſes, as, if ye will, if ye heare, and ſuch like, doe noe proove that there is in man a free power of willing or hearing: yet it is prooved that God doth not mocke men in ſo bargaining with them. Alſo what is the uſe of ſuch proteſtations, both toward the godly and toward the ungodly. 2.5.10.

The reprochings, wherein God ſaith to his people that they were the cauſe that they received not all kind of good things at his hand, doe not proove that it was mans power to eſcape the evils wherewith they were afflicted. And there is ſpoken of the uſe of ſuch reprochings as well toward them that obſtinatly goe forward in their faults, as toward the conformeable that are converted to repentance. Alſo whereas the Scripture doth ſometime give to us the office of doing, it doth ſo for no other reaſon but to awaken the ſlothfulneſſe of the fleſh. 2.5.11.

The ſaying of Moſes, The commandement is neere to thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, &c. maketh nothing for the defenders of free will, foraſmuch as he there ſpeaketh not of the bare commandements, but of the Evangelicall promiſes of the Law. 1.5.12.

No more doe thoſe places make for them, where it is ſaid, that the Lord looketh and watcheth to ſee what men will doe. 2.5.13.

Alſo thoſe places where good workes are called ours: and we are ſaid to doe that which is holy and pleaſing to the Lord. And here is ſhewed ſhewed that the onely ſpirit of God worketh all good motions in us, but yet not as in ſtocks. 2.5.14.15.

God.

THe Scripture teaching the immeaſurable and ſpirituall ſubſtance of God, doth overthrow not onely the follies of the common people, but alſo the ſubtill inventions of prophane philoſophy, and the errour of the Manichees concerning two originall beginnings, and the falſe opinion of the Anthropomorphites concerning a bodily God. 1.13.1.

Goſpell.

Chriſt, although hee were knowne to the Jewes in the time of the Law, was yet ſhewed indeed only by the Goſpell: and the holy Fathers taſted of that grace, which is now offered to us with full abundance: they ſaw the day of Chriſt, albeit with a dim ſight, the glory whereof now ſhineth in the Goſpell, without any vaile betweene us and it. 2.9.1.2.

In the ſame place alſo is ſhewed, that the Goſpell is properly and ſpecially called the publiſhing of the grace given in Chriſt, and not the promiſes that are written by the Prophets concerning the remiſſion of ſins. Againſt the doctrine of Servetus, which taketh away the promiſes under this pretence, that by the faith of the Goſpell we have the fulfilling of all the promiſes, it is proved that though Chriſt offer to us in the Goſpell a preſent fulneſſe of ſpirituall good things, yet the enjoying thereof lieth hidden under the cuſtody of hope ſo long as we live in this world, and therefore we muſt yet reſt upon the promiſes. 2.9.3.

Holy Ghoſt.

Teſtimonies whereby the God-head of the Holy Ghoſt is proved. 1.13.14.15.

The Holy Ghoſt is the bond wherewith Chriſt doth effectually binde us to him, and without it, all that Chriſt hath ſuffered and done for the ſalvation of mankinde, doth nothing profit us. 3.1.1.3.

Chriſt came after a ſingular manner furniſhed with the Holy Ghoſt, to ſever us from the world, and therefore he is called the Spirit of ſanctification. Why he is ſometime called the Spirit of the Father, and ſometime the Spirit of the Sonne. He is called the Spirit of Chriſt, not only in reſpect that Chriſt is the eternall Word, but alſo according to his perſon of Mediator. 3.1.2.

An expoſition of the titles wherewith the Scripture ſetteth forth the Holy Ghoſt: and there is entreated of the beginning and whole reſtoring of our ſalvation: The titles be theſe, the Spirit of adoption, the earneſt and ſeale of our inheritance, life, water, oyle, ointment, fire, a fountaine, the hand of God, &c. 3.1.3.

Faith is the chiefe worke of the Holy Ghoſt, and therefore to it for the moſt part are all thoſe things referred which are commonly found in the Scripture to expreſſe the force and effectuall power of the Holy Ghoſt. 3.1.4.

Humility.

It is not the true humility which God requireth of us, unleſſe we acknowledge our ſelves utterly void of all goodneſſe and righteouſneſſe. 3.12.6.

Of

Of this humilitie there is an example shewed in the Publicane. 3.12.7.

That wee may give place to the calling of Christ, both presumtion and carelessenesse must be far away from us. 3.12.8.

There is no danger lest man should take too much from himselfe, so that hee learne that which wanteth in himselfe, is to bee recovered in God. It is a diveliſh word, although it be sweete to us, that lifteth up man in himselfe: for repulsing wereof, there are recited out of the Scripture many weighty sentences, which do rigorously throw downe man: and also there are recited certaine promises, which doe promise grace to none but to them that doe pine away with feeling of their owne poverty. 2.2.10

Idoles.

An exposition of the first commandement: where is shewed that worshipping, trust, invocation, and thanksgiving, belong wholly to God, and no whit thereof may be conveyed any otherwhere without great injurie to him, to whose eyes all things are open. 2.8.16.

An exposition of the second commandement: where is spoken of idols and images. 2.8.17.

The Scripture to the intent to bring us to the true God, doth expresly exclude all the gods of the Gentiles, 1.10.3. and specially all idols and images. 1.11.1.

God is severed from idols, not only that he alone should have the name of God, but that he alone should be wholy worshipped, and nothing that belongeth to the Godhead should be conveyed to any other. 1.12.1.

The glorie of God is corrupted with false lying, when any forme is appointed to it. 1.11.1

It is proved by texts and reasons, that God generally misliketh all Portraitures and Images that are made to expresse a figure of him, and this prohibition pertained not to the Jewes onely. 1.11.2.

God did in old time so shew his presence by visible signes either to the whole people or to certaine chosen men, that the same signes admonished them of the incomprehensible substance of God. 1.11.3.

It is prooved even of Juvenals testimonie that the Papists are mad, which defend the Images of God and of Saints with the example of the Cherubs covering the propitiatorie 1.11.3.

The stuffe it selfe and also the workemanship which is done with the hands of men, doe shew that images are not gods. 1.11.4.

Against the Grecians, which make no graven image of God, yet doe give themselves leave to paint him. 1.11.4.

The saying of Gregorie, upon which the Papists say that they stand, that images are unlearned ments bookes, is confuted by the testimonie of Hierom, Habacuc, Lactantius, Eusebius, Augustine, Varro, and the decree of the Elebertine Councell. 1.11.5.6.7.

The Papists portraitures or images whereby they represent the holy Martyrs and Virgins, are paterns of most wicked riotous excesse and unchastenesse. 1.11.7.12.

The people shall learne much more by the preaching of the word and ministration of Sacraments, than by a thousand wooden crosses. 1.11.7.

The antiquitie and beginning of idolatrie: for that men thinking God not to bee neere them, unlesse hee did shew him selfe carnallie present, raised up signes in which they beleeved that hee was carnally conversant before their eyes. 1.11.8.

After such an invention by and by followeth the worshipping of the image, like as of God or of any other creature in the image: both which the law of God forbiddeth. 1.11.8.9.

Against them, which for defence of abominable idolatrie, doe pretend that they doe not take the images for Gods, it is prooved that neither the Jewes did thinke their calfe to be God, nor the heathen when they made to themselves images did ever thinke the same to bee God, whom no man excuse. 1.11.9.

The Papists are so perswaded as the Heathen and idolatrous Jewes were, that they worship God himselfe under images. 1.11.10. Neither can they escape away with their distinction of service and worship. 1.11.11.16. and 1.12.2.

When idolatry is condemned, graving and painting are not utterly reprooved, but there is required a true and right use of them both, that God bee not counterfeited with bodily shape, but only those things which our eies may behold. 1.11.12.

Of images in the Temples of Christians. 4.9.9.

Even the Idolaters themselves in all ages, naturally understood that there is one onely God: but this understanding availed no further than to make them to bee unexcusable. 1.10.3.

Idolatry is an evident proofe that the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of all men. 1.3.1.

Image of God in man.

What it is, that man was create after the Image of God: And here are confuted the fond expositions of Osiander, and of other: and here is declared that though the Image of God doe appeare also in the outward man, and doe extend tot he whole excellencie wherewith the nature of man passeth all kinde of living creatures, yet the principall seat thereof is in the minde and in the heart, or in the soule and in the powers thereof. 1.15.3. & 2.2.1.

The Image of God at the beginning appeared in Adam, in light of minde, uprightnesse of heart, and the soundnesse of all his parts, which is proved by the repairing of corrupted nature, wherein Christ newly fashioneth us after the image of God, and by other arguments. 1.15.4.

Justification of Faith.

Of the justification of faith, and first of the definition of the name, and of the thing it selfe. 3.11.

The article of doctrine concerning the Justification of Faith, is of great importance. 3.11.1.

It is shewed by the Scripture what it is to be justified by workes, and what it is to be justified by faith. 3.11.2.3.4.

A confutation of the errour of Osiander, concerning essentiall righteousnesse, which taketh from men the earnest feeling of the true grace of Christ. 3.11.5.6.7. &c. to the 13.

A confutation of Osianders invention, that whereas Christ is both God and Man, he was made righteousnesse to us in respect of his nature of God-head, and not of his Manhood. 3.11.8.9.

Against them which imagine a righteousnesse compounded of faith and works, it is proved that when the one is stablished, the other must needs bee overthrowne. 3.11.13. 14.15.16.17.18.

It is proved by the Scripture against the Sophisters, that this is a sure principle, that we are justified by faith onely. 3.11.19.20.

It is proved by testimonies of Scripture, that the righteousnesse of faith is reconciliation with God, which consisteth onely upon the remission of sinnes. 3.11.21.22.

By the only intercession or meane of the righteousnesse of Christ, we obtaine to be justified before God. 3.11.23.

That wee may be throughly perswaded of the free justification, wee must lift up our mindes to the Judgement seat of God: before which, nothing is acceptable but that which is whole and perfect in every behalfe, the dreadfull majestie whereof is described by many places of Scripture. 3.1.2.12.

All godly writers doe ſhew that when men have to doe with God, the only place of refuge for conſcience, is in the free mercy of God, excluding all truſt of works: And this is proved by teſtimonies of Auguſtine and Bernard. 3.12.3.

Two things are to be obſerved in free juſtification: the firſt, that the Lord keepe faſt his glory unminiſhed: which is done when he alone is acknowledged to be righteous, for they glory againſt God, which glory in themſelves. 3.13.1.2. the ſecond, that our conſciences may have quietneſſe in the ſight of his judgement. 3.13.3.4.5.

Good works are not deſtroyed by the doctrine of Juſtification of faith. 3.16.1.

It is moſt falſe that mens minds are drawne away from affection of well doing, when we take from them the opinion of deſerving. 3.16.2.3.

Knowledge of God.

To know God, is not onely to conceive that there is ſome God, but to underſtand ſo much as behoveth us to know of him, and ſo much as availeth for his glory, and is expedient. 1.2.1.

The knowledge of God ought to tend to this end: firſt, to frame us to feare and reverence: and then that by it guiding and teaching us, we may learne to aske all good things of him, and to account the ſame received at his hand. 1.2.2. & 1.5.8.

The Philoſophers had no other knowledge of God, than that which made them unexcuſable, but did not bring them to the truth. 2.2.18.

This perſwaſion is naturally planted in all men, that there is ſome God. 1.2.3. and that to this end, that they which doe not worſhip him, may be condemned by their owne judgement. 1.3.1.

Law.

The Law, that is to ſay, the forme of Religion ſet forth by Moſes, was not given to hold the old people ſtill in it, but to nouriſh in their hearts the hope of ſalvation in Chriſt, untill his comming, which is proved by this, that Moſes repeateth the mention of the covenant: and by the order of the ceremonies appointed as well in Sacrifices as in waſhings, alſo by the office of Prieſthood of the tribe of Levi, and the honour of kingdome in David and his poſterity. The Law alſo of the ten Commandements was given to prepare men to ſeeke Chriſt. 2.7.1.2. and that is done, when it maketh us unexcuſable, being on every side convicted of our sinnes, to move us to seeke for pardon of our guiltinesse. 2.7.3.4.

being

It is proved by the Scripture, and declared that the observing of the law is impossible. 2.7.5.

There are three uses and offices of the morall Law: The first is, that shewing unto us the righteousnesse which onely is acceptable unto God, it may be as a glasse for us, wherein wee may behold our weaknesse, and by it our wickednesse, and finally by them both, our accursednesse: Neither turneth this to any dishonour of the Law, but maketh for the glory of the bountifulnesse of God, which both with help of grace aideth us to doe that which we are commanded, and by mercy putteth away our offences. Neither yet doth this office altogether cease in the reprobate. 2.7.6.7.8.9.

The second office is to restraine the reprobate with feare of punishment, lest they unbrideledly commit the wickednesse which inwardly they alway nourish and love: and also to draw backe the children of God before their regeneration from outward licentiousnesse. 2.7.10.11.

The third office concerneth the faithfull: for the Law although it be already written with the finger of God in their hearts, yet profiteth them two wayes: First by studying upon it they are more confirmed in the understanding of the will of the Lord, and are stirred up and strengthned to obedience, that they goe not out of kinde by the sluggishnesse of the flesh. 2.7.12.13. For as touching the curse of the Law, it is taken away from the faithfull, that it can no more extend it selfe against them in damning and destroying them. 2.7.14.

By the ten commandements of the law we learne the same things which we but slenderly taste by instruction of the Law of nature: First that we owe to God reverence, love, and feare, that righteousnesse pleaseth him, and wickednesse displeaseth him: finally, that examining our life by the rule of the Law, we are unworthy to bee accounted among the creatures of God, and that our power is unsufficient, yea no power at all to performe the Law. Both these points ingendred in us humility, and abasing of our selves, which teacheth us to flee to the mercy of God, and to crave the helpe of his grace. 2.8.1.2.3.

Forasmuch as God the Law-maker is spirituall, that is to say, speaketh as well to the soule as to the body, therefore the Law likewise requireth not only an outward honesty, but also an inward and spirituall righteousnesse, and a very angelike pureneſſe. 2.8.6. which is proved by Christs own exposition, when he confuted the Pharisees wrong interpretation, which required onely a certaine outward observation of the Law. 2.8.7.

There is alway more in the commandements & prohibitions of the Law, than is expressed. Therefore for the right and true expounding of them, it behooveth to weigh what is the intent or end of every of them: Then from that which is commanded or forbidden, we must draw an argument to the contrarie, that wee may understand, that not only an evill is forbidden, but also the good is commanded which is contrarie to that evill. 2.8.8.9.

Why God spake by way of implyed comprehending, in setting forth the forme of his commandements. 2.8.10.

Of the division of the ten commandements, and how many commandements are to be appointed to the first Table, and how many to the second. 2.8.12.50.

An exposition of the commandements of God: Where is declared that the Lord in the beginning of the Law, to stablish his owne majesty useth three arguments: First by challenging to himselfe the soveraigne power and right of dominion over us, he doth as it were by necessity draw us to obey him: secondly, he alloureth us with the sweetnesse of the promise of grace: thirdly, he moveth us to obedience with rehearsall of the benefit that we have received. 2.8.13.14.15.

The Law teacheth not onely certaine introductions and principles of righteousnesse, but the very accomplishment thereof, the expressing of the image of God, and the perfection of holinesse: which Law is all contained in two points, that is to say, the love of God and of our neighbour. 2.8.51.

Lawes Politicke.

Neither can Lawes be without the Magistrate, nor the Magistrate without Lawes. A confutation of them which say, that a common weale is not well ordered, unlesse it be governed by the politicke Lawes of Moses. For this purpose is rehearsed a division of the Lawes of Moſes into morall Lawes, ceremonies, and judiciall Lawes, and the end of every one of them being diſcuſſed it is proved that it is lawfull for every ſeverall nation to make politicke Lawes, 4.20.14.15. ſo that they agree with that naturall equity, the reaſon whereof is ſet forth in the morall Law of Moſes. Therefore it is ſhewed by examples that they may alter the ordinances of penalties according to the diverſity of the Countrey, time, and other circumſtances. 4.20.16.

We many times ſinne againſt this commandement, although we doe not Lye. But in this point there muſt bee a difference wiſely made betweene the ſlandering which is here condemned, and judiciall accuſation or rebuking, which is uſed upon deſire to bring to amendment. 2.8.48.

Life of a Chriſtian man.

The Law containeth a rule how to frame a mans life, and divers places alſo of the Scripture doe here & there declare it, and not without an orderly manner of teaching, although not ſo exquiſite and curious as the Philoſophers doe. 3.6.1.

Herein the Scripture doth two things : it ſtirreth us up to the love of righteouſneſſe, and teacheth a rule how to follow the ſame. The firſt point it worketh by divers arguments and reaſons, 3. 6. 2. and herein the Scripture layeth much better foundations, than can bee found in all the bookes of the Philoſophers, 3.6.3.

Againſt them that pretend a knowledge of Chriſt, when there life and manners reſemble not the doctrine of Chriſt. 3.6.4.

Though perfection were to be wiſhed in all men, yet we muſt alſo acknowledge, for Chriſtians the moſt part of men which have not yet proceeded ſo farre. We muſt alway endevour forward, and not deſpaire for the ſmalneſſe of our profiting. 3.6.5.

Out of a place of Paul theſe are gathered to be the parts of a well framed Life : conſideration of the grace of God, forſaking of wickedneſſe and of worldly luſts, ſobernesſe, righteouſneſſe, godlineſſe, (which ſignifieth true holineſſe) and the bleſſed hope of immortality, 3.7.3.

And there ſhall bee an equall meaſure of glory to all the children of God in heaven. 3.25.10.11. In which place alſo is an anſwer to the queſtions which ſome men doe move concerning the ſtate of the children of God after the reſurrection.

In what ſenſe eternall life is ſometime called the reward of works. 3.18.2.4.

M.

Magistrates.

The office of Magistrates is not onely holy and lawfull before God, but also the most holy and honourable degree in all the life of men, and this is proved by divers titles wherewith the Scripture doth set it forth, and by the examples of holy men which have borne civill power. 4.20.4.

This consideration is a pricke to godly Magistrates, to move them to the doing of their duty, and also it is a comfort to ease the hard travels of their office. 4.20.6.

A confutation of them, which say that though in the old time under the law Kings and Judges ruled over Gods people, yet this servile kind of government doth not agree with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his Gospell. 4.20.5.7.

They erre which exclude the Magistrates from the charge of Religion, forasmuch as their office extendeth to both the tables of the Law. It is proved by Scripture, that they are ordained Protectors and defenders, as well of the worshipping of God as of common peace and honesty, which they cannot throughly performe without the power of the sword. 4.20.9.

A declaration of this question by Scripture, how the Magistrates may be godly, and also draw their sword, and shed the bloud of men, and it is proved, that they are so farre from sinning in punishing of offenders, that this is one of the vertues of a King, and a proofe of their godlinesse. Herein the Magistrates must beware of two faults, namely, extreame rigorousnesse, and superstitious desire of piety. 4.20.10.

It is the duty of subjects towards Magistrates, to thinke honourably of them as of the Ministers and Deputies of God, forasmuch as concerneth their degree, but not that they should esteeme the vices of men for vertues. 4.20.22.

It is also their duty with minds heartily bent to the honouring of them, to declare their obedience toward them, whether it bee in following their decrees or paying of tributes, &c. to pray to God for their safety and prosperitie, to raise no tumults, and not to thrust themselves into the office of the Magistrate. 4.20.23.

Even wicked Princes of evill life, and whoch rule tyrannously (forsomuch as pertaineth to publike obedience) ought to be had in as great reverence and honour as we would give to the best King that might be, 4.20.24.25. because even they also have the publike power not without the providence & singular power of God. Which is proved by divers testimonies and examples of Scripture: and there is shewed with what considerations those subjects ought to bridle their owne impatience which live under such ungodly and wicked Tyrants. 4.20.26.27.28.29.31.

It is not lawfull for private men to rise up against Tyrants, but onely for them which by the lawes of the Kingdome or of the Countrey, are the defenders of the libertie of the people. 4.20.31.

The Lord by his marvellous goodnesse and providence doth sometime raise up some of his servants to punish Tyrants, and sometime also bee directeth thereunto the rage of wicked men, while they intend another thing. 4.20.30.

In the obedience which is due to the commandements of Kings and Rulers this is alway to be excepted, that it draw us not away from the obedience of God. Neither is any wrong done to them when wee refuse to obey them in such things as they command against God: And this is our duty, how great and present perill soever doe hang upon such constancie. 4.20.32.

Man.

Man is by knowledge of himselfe not onely moved to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him. 1.1.1.

The creation of Man is a notable shew of the power, wisdome, and goodnesse of God: Wherefore Man is by some of the Philosophers called a little world. 1.5.3.

The unthankfulnesse of men, which feeling tokens of the providence of God both in their soule and body, yet doe not give God praise. 1.5.4.

Two sorts of knowledge of our selves, the one in our first originall estate, the other after Adams fall, and the later is not to be received without considering the first, lest we should seeme to impute corruption to God the Author of nature. 1.15.1.

The knowledge of himselfe is most necessary for man, which consisteth in this (as the truth of God prescribeth) that first considering to what end hee is created and endued with excellent gifts, he should hang altogether upon God, of whom hee hath all things by gift: then, that weighing his owne miserable estate after the fall of Adam, hee should truly loath himself and conceive a new desire to seeke God, that in him he may recover these good things, of which he himselfe is found utterly void and empty. Wherefore wee must beware that in this point we hearken not to the judgement of the flesh and to the bookes of Philosophers, which while they withholdus in considering only our good things, would carry us away into a most wicked ignorance of our selves. 2.1.1.2.3.

Man can never come to the true knowledge of himselfe, unlesse hee have first beheld the face of God, that is to say, till he have begun to know and weigh by the Word of God, what, and how exact is the perfection of his righteousnesse, wisdome, and power, to the which we ought to be made of like forme. 1.1.2.

Even the most holy men were stricken with feare and astonishment, when God did extraordinarily shew his presence and glory unto them. 1.1.3.

That whole Man is corrupted in both parts of him (that is to say both in understanding, minde, and in heart or wil) is proved by divers titles wherewith the scripture describeth him, specially when it saith that hee is flesh: And there is declared that this word flesh is not referred onely to the sensuall part but also to the superiour part of the soule. 2.3.1.

That men doe in vaine seeke for any good thing in their owne nature, is proved by Paul, which entreating of the universall kindred of the children of Adam, & not rebuking the corrupted maners of some one age alone, but accusing the perpetuall corruption of nature taketh from men righteousnes, that is to say, uprightnesse and pureneſſe, and then understanding, and last of all the feare of God. 2.3.2.

A confutation of the objection concerning certaine Heathen men, which forasmuch as they were all their life long by the guiding of nature bent to the endevour of vertue and honesty, do seeme to warne us, that we should not esteeme the nature of man, altogether corrupt. Therefore it is declared that in the unbelevers God doth not inwardly cleanse the corruption of nature wherewith man is in each part defiled, (as he doth in the elect) but by this providence sometime he bridleth it in them, that it breake not forth into deeds, and restraineth it by divers waies, so much as he knoweth to be expedient for preserving of the universall state of things. 2.3.3.

Those vertues which we read to have beene in heathen Men, are not sufficient proofes of the pureneſſe of nature, for as much as their mind was inwardly not upright, being corrupted with ambition or some other poison, & not directed with desire to set forth the glory of God: and also for as much as those vertues are not the common gifts of nature, but the speciall graces of God, which he diversly and by a certaine measure giveth to prophane Men, as oftentimes to Kings, and sometime to private men. 2.3.4.

See image of God in Man.

Mariage.

An exposition of the seventh commandement, wherin the Lord forbiddeth fornication and requireth chastity and cleanneſſe, which we ought to keepe and preserve both in our minde, and in our eies, and in the apparell of our body, and in our tongue, and in the moderate use of meat and drinke. 2.8.41.44.

Continence is a singular gift of God, which he giveth not to all men, but to some, yea and that sometime for a season: As for them to whom it is not granted, let them alway flee to marriage. which is ordained of the Lord for the remedy of mans necessity. 2.8.41. 42.43.

Maried persons must beware that they commit nothing unbeseeming the honesty and temperance of Mariage: Otherwise they seeme to be adulterers of their owne wives, and not husbands. 2.8.44.

The Papists doe wrongfully call Mariage a Sacrament: And their reasons are confuted. 4.19.34. It is proved that the place of Paul, wherewith they seeke to cloke themselves, maketh nothing for them. 4.19.35.

In the meane they disagree with themselves when they exclude Priests from this sacrament, and do say that it is uncleanneſſe and defiling of the flesh. 4.19.36.

By this false colour of Sacrament, the Pope with his Clergy have drawne to themselves the hearing of causes of Matrimony, and have made lawes of mariage, which partly are manifestly wicked against God, and partly most unjust toward men, which lawes are rehearsed. 4.19.37.

Mediator Christ.

It behooved that Christ, to the end that hee might might performe the office of Mediator, should be made man, forasmuch as God had so ordained, because it was best for us, sith none other could bee the meane for restoring of peace betweene God and us, none other could make us the children of God, none other could assure unto us the inheritance of the heavenly kingdome, none other could for remedy set mans obedience against mans disobedience. 2.12.1. 2.3.

A confutation of their fantasticall conceit, which affirme that Christ should have become man, although there had needed no remedy for the redeeming of mankind. And it is proved by many reasons and texts, that forasmuch as the whole Scripture crieth out that he was clothed with flesh, to the end that hee might be the redeemer, therefore it is too great rashnesse to imagine any other cause or purpose 2.12.4.

Neither is it lawfull to search further concerning Christ: and those that do search further, doe with wicked boldnesse runne forward to the faigning of a new Christ: And herein Osiander is reprooved, which hath at this time renued this question, and affirmeth that this error is confuted by no testimony of Scripture. 2.12.5.

And the principle is overthrowne which he buildeth on, that man was create after the image of God, because he was formed after the likenesse of Christ to come, that he might resemble him whom the father had already decreed to clath with flesh: And there is shewed that the image of God in Adam, was the markes of excellency wherewith God had garnished him, which doth also shine in the Angels. 2.12.6.7.

A solution of other objections or absurdities which the same Osiander feareth: namely, that then Christ was borne and create after the image of Adam but as it were by chance: and that the Angels should have lacked their head, and men should have lacked Christ their king. 2.12.6.7.

How the two natures do make one person of the Mediator in Christ: Which is shewed by a similitude taken of the joyning of the soule and body in one man: And then it is prooved by divers places that the Scripture doth many times give unto Christ those things which properly belongeth to the Godhead, and sometime those things which must be referred only to the manhood, and sometime giveth to the one nature that which is proper to the other: which figurative manner of speech is called communicating of propertier. 2.14.1.2. and sometime also giveth to Christ those things which doe comprehend both natures together, but doe severally well agree with neither of them. Which last point the most part of the old writers have not sufficiently marked: Yet it is good to be noted, for the dissolving of many doubts, and for avoiding of the errors of Nestorius and Eutiches. 2.14.3.4.

A confutation of the error of Servetus, which had put in the stead of the Son of God, an imagined thing made of the substance of Gods spirit, flesh, and three elements uncreat: His subtilty is disclosed, and there is proved (which thing he denieth) that Christ was the Sonne of God, even before that he was borne in the flesh, because he is that word begotten of the father before all worlds. 2.14.5.

Also it is proved that he is truly and properly the Son of God in the flesh, that is to say in the nature of man, but yet in respect of his Godhead, and not of his flesh, as Servetus babbleth. 2.14.6.

An exposition of certaine places which Servetus and his disciples doe enforce for defence of their error: There is also another cavillation of his disclosed, that Christ before that he appeared in the flesh, is in no place called the son of God but under a figure. 2.14.7.

Also there is opened the error of all them which doe not acknowledge Christ the Son of God but in the flesh: and there are briefly rehearsed the grosse subtilties of Servetus, wherewith hee hath bewitched himselfe and other, overthrowing that which pure faith beleeveth concerning the person of the Sonne of God. And thereupon is gathered that with the crafty subteltie of that filthy dog, the hope of salvation is utterly extinguished. 2.14.8.

Merit of Christ.

It is truly and properly said that Christ merited for us the grace of God and salvation. Where it is proved that Christ was not onely the instrument or minister of salvation, but also the Author and principall doer thereof. And in so saying, the grace of God is not defaced, because the merit of Christ is not set against mercy, but hangeth upon it. And those things which are Subalterna, fight not as contraries. 2.17.1.

The distinction of the merit of Christ and of the grace of God is proved by many places of Scripture. 2.17.2.

There are alleadged many testimonies of Scripture,

Scripture, out of which it is certainly and soundly gathered, that Christ by his obedience hath truly purchased and deserved favour for us with his Father. 2.17.3.4.5.

It is a foolish curiosity to enquire whether Christ hath deserved, any thing for himselfe: and it is rashnesse to affirme it. 2.17.6.

Merits of works.

The boastings that are made of the Merits of works, doe overthrow as well the praise of God in giving righteousnesse, as also the certainty of salvation. 3.15.1.

Whosoever first applied the name of Merit to good works in the sight of Gods judgement, he did against the pureneſſe of Faith. And though the old fathers used that name, yet they so used it, that they have in many places shewed, that they attribute nothing to works. 3.15.2.

An exposition of certaine places, wherewith the Sophisters goe about to prove that the name of merit toward God is found in the Scripture. 3.15.4.

It is proved by authority of the Apostles and Augustine, that the rewards of righteousnesse doe hang upon the meere liberality of God. 2.5.2.

It is proved that this is a false saying, that Christ merited for us onely the first grace, and that afterward we doe merit by our owne workes. 3.15.6.7.

There be certaine things touching Merits, in the title of Justification by Faith.

Ministerie of the Church.

Of the Ministery of the Church, and of them which despise this manner of learning. 4.1.5.

Of the efficacie of the Ministerie. 4.5.6.

God, which might teach the Church either himselfe alone, or by Angels, yet doth it by the Ministerie of men for three causes. 4.3.1.

The Ministerie of the Church is garnished with many notable titles of commendation in the Scripture. 4.3.2.3.

Of Apostles, Prophets, Evangelists, Pastors and Teachers: and what is the severall office of every of them. 4.3.45.

The chiefe parts of the office of Apostles and Pastors are to preach the Gospell, and Minister the Sacraments. 4.3.6.

Pastors are so bound to their Churches, that they may not remove to any other place without publicke authority. 4.3.7.

They are called in the Scripture, Bishops, Priests, Pastors and Ministers which governe Churches. 4.3.8.

No man ought to thrust himselfe into the Church to teach or governe: But there is a calling required. 4.3.10.

The preaching of the word of God, is compared to seed which is scattered in the ground: Whereby wee understand that the whole encrease proceedeth of the blessing of God and the effectuall working of the holy Ghost. 4.14.11.

What manner of men ought to be chosen Bishops, and in what sort and whom they are to bee chosen, and with what forme or ceremony they are to be ordered. 4. 3.11.12.13.14.15.16.

The old Church before the Papacy divided all their Ministers into three degrees, Pastors, Elders, and Deacons. 4.4.1.

Of the commission to remit and retaine sins or to binde or loose, which is a part of the power of the keies, and pertaineth to the Ministery of the word. 4.11.1.

Monkery.

Monasteries in the old time were the seed plots of Ecclesiasticall orders: And there is described out of Augustine the forme of the old Monkery, and how they were wont at that time to get their living with the Labor of their hands. Whereby appeareth that at this day the manner of Popish Monkery is far otherwise. 4.13.8.9.10.

Of the proud title of perfection wherewith the Monkes doe set out their kinde of life. 4.13.11. because they binde themselves to keepe the counsels of the Gospel (as they call them) whereunto other Christian men are not bound. Sect. 12. and because they have forsaken all their possessions. Sect. 13.

As many as go into Monasteries, doe depart from the Church, sith they openly affirme that their Monkery is a forme of second Baptisme. 4.13.14.

The Popish Monkes doe in manners much differ from the old Monkes. 4.13.15.

Some things are to be misliked even in the profession of the old Monkery, and they that were the Authors thereof brought a perillous example into the Church. 4.13.16.

Monks with their vowes doe consecrate themselves not to God but to the devil. 4.13.17.

As all vowes unlawfull and not rightly made, are of no value before God, so they ought to be void to us. 4.13.20.

Therefore they which depart from Monkerie to some honest trade of life, are wrongfully accused of Faith breaking and perjurie. 4.13.21.

Obedience of Children to Parents.

A Nexposition of the fifth Commandement: the end and summe thereof. 2.8.35.

How farre this word honouring extendeth, and there be three parts thereof, Reverence, Obedience, and Thanksgiving. 2.8.36.

Of the promise adjoyned to the fifth Commandement, concerning long continuance of life, and how farre the same pertaineth to us at this day. 2.8.37.

How, and by how divers meanes God sheweth his vengeance upon the disobedient: Yet obedience is not due to Parents and other, but saving the law of God. 2.8.38.

Offences.

What offences are to be avoided, and what to be neglected: what is an offence given, and what an offence taken. 3.19.11.

It is declared by the doctrine and example of Paul who he weake, to whom we must beware that we give no Offence. 3.19.12.

Whereas we are commanded to beware that we offend not the weake, the same is meant only in things indifferent: Therefore they doe wrongfully abuse this doctrine, which say, that they beare Masse for the weakes sake. 3.19.13.

Officials.

Of Popish Bishops Officials, as they call them. 4.11.7.8.

Orders Papisticall.

The Sacrament of Order breedeth to the Papists seven other pettie Sacraments, of whose names and differences they themselves be not yet agreed. 4.19.22.

Their fond and ungodly foolishnesse, praysmuch as they make Christ fellow Officer with them in every one of them. 4.19.23.

Of Acoluthes, Doore-keepers and Readers, whom the Papists doe make Orderers of the Church and Sacraments, 3.19.24. and with what ceremonies they consecrate them. Sect. 27.

Of Exorcists or Conjurers an order of the Popish Church. 4.19.24.

The orders of Psalmists, Doore-keepers and Acoluthes, are vaine names among the Papists, forasmuch as they themselves doe not execute the Offices, but some boy, or any layman. 4.19.24.

Of the shaving of the Clergie, and the signification thereof by the doctrine of the Papists. 4.19.25.

They doe wrongfully apply it to Pauls example, which shaved his head when he tooke a vow, or to the old Nazariter. 4.19.26.

It is shewed out of Augustine, whence it first began, 4.19.27.

Of the three higher Orders: and first of Priest-hood or sacrificership: where is shewed that the Papists have most wickedly perverted the order appointed by God, and doe wrong to Christ, the only and eternall sacrificing Priest. 4.19.28.

Of their blowing at the making of the Popish Priests, and how in that ceremonie they do wrongfully counterfeit Christ: Where is declared that the Lord did many things which he would not have to be examples for us to follow. 4.19.29.

Of the undeleble character, or undefaceable marke of the oyle wherwith Popish Priests are annointed at their creation. And how the same is wrongfully applyed to the children of Aaron. But these Priests in coveting to be like the Levite, are Apostates from Christ. 4.19. 30.31.

Originall sinne.

A definition and expounding of Originall sinne. 4.15.10.11.12.

A true definition of Originall, and a declaration of the same definition: Wherein is shewed, that not only punishment came from Adam upon us, but also that the infection distilled from him, remaineth in us, and how it is the sin of another, and also our owne sinne: Finally, that such infection pierced not only into the inferiour desire, but also into the very understanding minde, and bottome of the heart, so that there is no part of the soule free from corruption. 2.1.8.9.

A confutation of them that dare charge God with their faults, becauſe we ſay that men are naturally faulty: and there is proved, that man is corrupt by naturall vitiouſneſſe: (to the end that no man ſhould thinke it to be gotten by evill cuſtome) but yet ſuch as proceeded not from nature, but is an accidentall quality, and not a ſubſtantiall property from the beginning. 2.1.10.11.

P

Patience.

A part of the forſaking of our ſelves, in reſpect of God, is contentation of minde and ſufferance: Which we ſhall performe, if in ſeeking the commoditie and quiet of this preſent life, wee yeeld our ſelves wholly to the Lord, and doe not deſire, hope for, or thinke upon any other meane of proſpering than by his bleſſing. 3.7.8.

So ſhall it come to paſſe that we ſhall never ſeeke our owne commodities by unlawfull meanes, or with wronging of our neighbours: alſo that we ſhall not burne with unmeaſurable deſires of riches or of honors: finally, if things proſper well with us, we ſhall yet be holden from pride, and if they happen ill, we ſhall yet be reſtrained from impatience. 3.7.9. Which extendeth to all chances whereunto our preſent life is ſubject, whereof the faithfull doe alwayes acknowledge the hand of God their Father, and not fortune, to be the governour. 3.7.10.

The Patience of the faithfull is not ſuch as is without all feeling of ſorrow, but ſuch as being upholden by godly comfort, fighteth againſt the naturall feeling of ſorrow. Therefore the patience of the Stoikes is to be rejected: neither is it in it ſelfe any fault to weepe or feare. 3.8.8.9.

A deſcription of that ſtriving which is ingendred in the hearts of the faithfull by the feeling of nature, which feeling cannot be cleane done away, and by the affection of godlineſſe, wherewith that ſame feeling muſt be ſubdued and tamed. 3.8.10.

There is a great difference betweene Philoſophicall and Chriſtian patience. Forasmuch as the Philoſophers doe teach us to obey, becauſe we ſo muſt of neceſſity: but Chriſt teacheth it, becauſe it is righteous, and alſo becauſe it is profitable for us. 3.8.11.

Pardons.

The ſo long continuing of pardons declareth in how deepe darkneſſe of errours men have beene drowned, theſe certaine ages paſt. 3.5.1.

What pardons are by the Papiſts doctrine: Whereby is proved that they are a diſhonouring of the bloud of Chriſt: A compariſon of Chriſt and Popiſh pardons. 3.5.1.

A confutation of the wicked doctrine of pardons, by the notable ſaying of Leo Biſhop of Rome, and of Auguſtine. And there is ſhewed that the bloud of Martyres is not unlawfull, although it have no place in forgiveneſſe of ſins. 3.5.3.4.

Either the Goſpell of God muſt lie, or pardons muſt be lying deceits. And there is ſhewed what ſeemeth to have beene the beginning of them. 3.5.5.

Penance, the Popiſh Sacrament.

Of the uſage of the old Church in publike penance: and of the laying on of hands at reconciliation. Alſo how in proceſſe of time the laying on of hands was uſed in private abſolutions. 4.19.14.

The divers opinions of the Schoolemen how Penance is a Sacrament: And there is ſhewed that the definition of a Sacrament doth not agree with it. 4.19.15.16.

It is a lie, and a deceitfull errour which they have invented concerning the Sacrament of Pennace: and it is a wicked and blaſphemous title wherewith they have garniſhed it, a ſecond boord after ſhip-wracke from Baptiſme. 4.19.17.

Perſeverance.

See Booke 2. Chap. 5. Sect. 3.

A confutation of the moſt wicked errour that Perſeverance is given of God according to the Merit of men, ſo as every man hath ſhewed himſelfe not unthankfull for the firſt grace: and in this opinion is ſhewed a double errour. Of the common diſtinction of grace working, and working together: and how Auguſtine uſed it, qualifying it with an apt definition. 2.3.11.

Politicke Government.

There is a difference to be made betweene

Policie,

Policy, and the inward government of the Soule. There doctrine is to be reiected which goe about to overthrow Policy as a thing not necessary for Christians, or as a thing that overthroweth the spirituall liberty of the Soule. Also those flatterers are to be rejected, which doe give too much unto it, and doe set it in comparison against the authority of God. 4.20.1.23.

Policy is the gift of God, which bringeth great commodities to mankinde and no small helpe to the defence of the state of religion. Politicke government hath three parts, the Magistrate, The Lawes, and the People. 4.20.3.

Of the three formes of Civill government, Aristocracy the government of the best choisest men. Democracy the government of the people, Monarchy the government of one: it cannot simply be determined which of these is the best: yet it commeth to passe by the fault of men, that it is safer and more tolerable to have many to governe, than one to raigne. But all these formes are of God, and diversly disposed by him, therefore it is the duty of private men to obey, and not to make innovation of states after their owne will. 4.20.8.

Of the immunity that the Romish Clergy take to themselves, which was altogether unknowen to the Bishops of the old Church. 4 11.15.

In matters of Faith, the judgement in the old time pertained to the Church and not to Princes, although sometime princes entermedled their authority in ecclesiasticall matters, but the same was done to preserve and not to trouble the order of the Church. 4.11.15.16.

Of the authority of the sword usurped by the Bishops in the Papacy: and how they have by little and little from so small beginnings growne to so great encrease. 4.11.9.10.

Pope.

It is proved that the supremacy of the sea of Rome is not by the institution of Christ. 4.6.1.2.3.4.

Neither had Peter any principality in the Church or among the Apostles. 4.6.5.6.7.

Neither is it profitable nor may be, that one man should beare rule over the whole Church 4.6.8.9.10.

Although Peter had had a supremacy in the Church, yet it followeth not that the seat of that supremacy ought to be at Rome. 4.6.11.12.13.

It is proved by many arguments that Peter was not Bishop of Rome. 4.6.14.15.

The supremacy of the sea of Rome is not according to the use of the old Church. 4.6.16.17

Of the beginning and encreasings of the Romish Papacy, untill it advanced it selfe to that height, whereby both the liberty of the Church is oppressed, and all moderate government hath beene overthrowne. 4.7.

In the most part of the Councels, the Bishop of Rome, nor his Legates had not the chiefe place, but some other of the Bishops had it at the Councell of Chalcedon: but yet without order. 4.7.1.2.

Of the title of supremacy and other titles of pride wherewith the Pope boasteth himselfe, and when and how they crept in. 4.7.3.

Gregorie pronounceth that the title of universall Bishop was devised by the Devill, and published by the crier of Antichrist. 4.7.4.

It is proved by the use of the old Church, that it is false which the Bishop of Rome, boasteth that he hath jurisdiction over all Churches. 4.7.5. Whether ye consider the ordering of Bishops, Sect. 6. or ecclesiasticall admonitions and censures, Sect. 7. or summoning of Councels, Sect. 8. *or authority of higher appeales. The old Bishops of Rome, in the most part of their Epistles did ambitiously set forth the glory of their sea, but those Epistles at that time had no credit. Also they did thrust in certaine forged things, as though they had been written in thold time by holy men. 4.7.11.20.

Although in the time of Gregorie, the authority of the Bishop of Rome was greatly encreased, yet it is proved by his writings that it was then farre from unbrideled dominion and tyranny. 4.7.12. 13. 22.

There was strife for the supremacy betweene the Bishop of Constantinople and the Bishop of Rome. 4.7.14.15.16. untill Phocas granted to Boniface the third, that Rome should be the head of all Churches: which afterward Pipine confirmed, when he gave to the sea of Rome jurisdiction over the Churches of France. 4.7.17.

From thenceforth the tyranny of the Sea of Rome encreased more and more, partly by ignorance and partly by negligence of Bishops: which destruction of the whole order of the Church Bernard lamenteth and layeth to the Popes charg. 4.7.18.22.

The first rule of well framing our prayer, is that wee be no otherwise disposed in heart and minde, than becommeth them that enter into talke with God. 3.20.4.5.

The second rule is, that in praying we alway feele our owne needinesse, and that earnestly considering that wee want all these things that wee aske, wee joyne with our prayer an earnest and fervent desire to obtaine. 3. 20.6.

Wee ought to pray at all times, and in the greatest quietnesse of our estates, the onely remembrance of our sinnes ought to bee no small provocation to move us to that exercise. 3.20.7.

The third rule of praying well, is that wee forsake all confidence of our owne glory, lest if wee presumptuously take any thing, be it never so little, unto our selves, wee with our vaine pride fall downe from his face. 3.20.8.

The beginning of praying well is the obtaining of pardon, with an humble and plaine confession of offence. 3.20.9.

Of Predeſtination.

It is proved that the doctrine of predeſtination is a doctrine of moſt ſweet fruit. There are rehearſed three principall profits thereof: and they are admoniſhed which being moved with a certaine curioſity, do beyond the bounds of Scripture breake into the ſecrets of the wiſdome of God. 3.1.1.2. *and alſo they which would have all mention of Predeſtination to be buried. Sect.*3.4.

A confutation of them which gather of the doctrine of Predestination, that God hath respect of persons. 3.23.10.11.

Against those hogges which under colour of Predestination, doe goe carelesly forward in their sins: and against all them which say that if this doctrine take place, all endevour of well-working decayeth. 3.23.12.

Against them which say that this doctrine overthroweth all exhortations to godly life, it is proved by Augustine, that preaching hath his course, and yet the knowledge of Predestination is not hinderd thereby. 3.23.13.

In this point of doctrine we must so temper our manner of teaching the truth, that so farre as we may, we wisely beware of offence. 3.23.14.

Whereas some obey the preaching of the Word of God, and othersome despise it, or bee more blinded and hardned thereby, although this come to passe by their owne malice and unthankfulnesse, yet wee must therewith also know, that this diversity hangeth upon the secret counsell of God, than which it is unlawfull for to search for any further cause. 3.24. 12.13.14.

An exposition of certaine places wherein God seemeth to deny that it commeth to passe by his ordinance, that the wicked perish, but in as much as against his will they wilfully bring destruction upon themselves. And there is shewed that those places make nothing against the doctrine of Predestination. 3.24. 15.16.

The universality of the promises of salvation, maketh nothing against the doctrine of the predestination of the reprobate: and yet not without cause are they framed universally. 3.24.16..

Here also are confuted certaine objections of them which deny this point of doctrine.

Priesthood, Kingdome, and Propheticall office of Christ.

That we may know to what end Christ was sent of his father, and what he brought unto us, three things are cheifly to be considered in him, his Propheticall office, his Kingdom, and his Priesthood: and therefore is given to him the title of Christ (or Messias which signifieth annointed) although he be specially so called in respect of his Kingdome. Albeit that God alway gave Prophets and teachers to his Church, yet it is proved that all the godly looked for full light of understanding, only at the comming of Messias: and that he when he appeared was annointed a Prophet, not onely for himselfe, but also for all his body, 2.15. 1.2.

As touching his Kingdome, first we must note the spirituall nature thereof, whereupon also is gathered the eternall continuance of it, which is of two sorts: the one pertaineth to the whole body of the Church, the other is proper to every member: both sorts are declared and plainly set forth by testimonies of Scripture. 3.15.3.

It is declared that the profit of the Kingdome of Christ cannot otherwise be perceived of us, but when we acknowledge it to be spirituall: and the same profit consisteth in two things, namely, that it enricheth us with all good things necessary to eternall salvation, secondly, that it fortifieth us with strength and vertue against the devill and all his assaults. And so Christ reigneth for us rather than for himselfe, wherenpon we are rightfully called Christians: Where it is said, that at the last day he shall yeeld up his Kingdome to God and his father, and such like sayings, the same maketh nothing against the eternity of his kingdome. 4.15.4.5.

As touching his Priesthood, that the efficacie and profit thereof may come to us, it is shewed that wee must beginne at the death of Christ. Hereupon it followeth that he is an everlasting intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine favour, whereby ariseth to godly consciences both boldnesse to pray, and quietnesse: finally that he is so a Priest, that he joyneth us in the fellowship of so great an honour, to the end that the Sacrifices of prayers and praise which come from us, may be acceptable to God. 2.15.6.

Promises.

Not without cause all the promises are concluded in Christ: for as much as every promise is a testifying of the Law of God toward us, and none of us is beloved of God without Christ. Neither was Naaman the Syrian, Cornelius the Captaine, nor the Eunuch to whom Philip was carried, without knowledge of Christ, although they had but a very small taste to him, and a faith in some part unexpressed. 3.2.32.

The Lord, to the end to fill our hearts with love of righteousnes and hatred of wickednes, was not content to set forth bare commandements onely, but addeth Promises of blessings both of this present life and of eternall blessednes, and also threatnings both of present miseries and of eternall death: The threatnings declare the great pureneſſe of God: the Promises doe shew his great love to righteousneſſe, and his wonderfull goodneſſe toward men. 2. 8.4.

Providence of God.

Prophane men, by fleshly understanding doe confeſſe God the Creator, otherwiſe than wee doe by faith: forasmuch as faith doth teach that he is also the governour of all things not by a certaine universall motion, but by a singular providence which extendeth even to the leaſt sparrow. 1.16.1.

They which give any thing to fortune, doe bury the Providence of God, by whoſe secret counſell all ſucceſſes are governed. 1. 16.2.

Things without life, although each of them have their property naturally planted in them, yet doe not put foorth their force, but ſo far as they bee directed by the preſent hand of God: which is proved by the Sunne, before which hee would, both light to be, and the earth to abound with all kinde of good things: which alſo we read to have stood ſtill by the ſpace of two daies, and gone backe two degrees at the commandement of God. 1, 16. 2. alſo by the ſtarres and ſignes of the heaven, which the unbeleevers doe feare. Sect. 3.

The almightineſſe of God is buſied in continuall doing, ſo that it extendeth to every particular act, and nothing hapneth but by his counſell: Which who ſo doe not acknowledge, they defraude God of his glory and doe extenuate his goodneſſe: But wee on the other ſide doe receive double fruit thereof. 1. 16. 3.

It is proved that the providence of God doth not onely behold things that are done, but governeth all ſucceſſes: Whereby is overthrown the fained invention of bare foreknowledge, and of univerſall providence onely: alſo the error of the Epicures is confuted, and of them which give to God a governance onely above the middle region of the aire. Yet there may a certaine univerſall providence bee granted, but ſo, that the ſpeciall providence bee not darkened, which doth governe not onely certaine but all particular doings. 1. 16.4.5.

That not onely the beginning of motion is in the diſpoſing of God, is proved by the plentifulneſſe of one yeere and the barreneſſe of another, for whereas God calleth the one his bleſſing, and the other his curſe and vengeance. 1. 16.5.

The providence of God in governing the world, is chiefly to be conſidered in mankind, and in the divers eſtate of all men, and divers diſpoſing of ſucceſſes 1.16.6.7.

Againſt them which cavill, that this doctrine of the providence of God, is the Stoicke doctrine of fate or deſtiny. 1.16.8.

Whether any thing happen by fortune or chance: Where is rehearſed the saying of Baſilius Magnus, that chance and fortune are words of heathen men: alſo the ſaying of Auguſtine, that he repented that hee had uſed the name of Fortune. Yet thoſe things may be ſaid to happen by fortune in reſpect of us, which being conſidered in their nature, or weighed according to our knowledge, doe ſeeme ſo, although in the ſecret counſell of God they be neceſſarie: Alſo all things that are to come, may be ſaid to be happening, in aſmuch as they bee uncertaine to us. 1.16.8.9.

What things are to bee conſidered, that the doctrine of the Providence of God, may be referred to a right hand, that wee have the profit thereof: and where the cauſes of thoſe things that happen, appeare not unto us, wee muſt beware that wee doe not thinke, that things are rolled by the ſway of fortune: but wee muſt ſo reverence his ſecret judgements, that we eſteeme his will the moſt juſt cauſe of all things. 1.17.1.

Againſt certaine dogges which at this day doe barke againſt the Providence of God, it is proved by the Scripture that whereas God hath ſo revealed his will in the Law, and the Goſpell, that hee illuminateth the mindes of them that bee hit with the Spirit of underſtanding, to perceive the myſteries therein contained, which otherwiſe are incomprehenſible, yet the order of governing the world is called a bottomlesse depth, because when we know not the causes thereof, yet we ought reverently to honour it. 1. 17. 2.

Such prophane men doe foolishly comber themselves, when they alleadge that if the doctrine of the Providence of God be true, then the praiers of the faithfull in which they aske any thing for time to come are vaine, no counsell is to be taken for things to come, and then men which doe any thing against the Law of God, doe not sinne: These dangerous errours they shall avoid, which in considering the providence of God, shall frame themselves to true modesty. 1. 17. 3.

As concerning things to come, it is proved that the Scripture doth well joyne the advisements of men with the Providence of God: because wee are not hindred by his eternall decrees, but that under his will, wee may both foresee for our selves, and order our owne things: For the knowledge of consulting and taking heede, are inspired into men by the Lord, whereby wee may serve his Providence, in the preserving of our owne life 1. 17. 4.

In all successes of times past the will of God doth governe: and yet the doers of wicked deeds are not excused, because they are accused by their owne conscience, and doe not obey the will of God, but their owne lust. They are indeed the instruments of Gods providence, but so, that they finde the whole evil in themselves, and in God is found nothing but a lawful use of their evilnesse. 1. 17. 5. and 1. 18. 4. Where also the same thing is shewed in the election of King Jeroboam, the tenne Tribes forsaking the house of David, the slaughter of the sonnes of Achab, and in the betraying of the sonne of God.

A godly and holy meditation of the Providence of God, which is taught by the rule of godlinesse first that being certainely perswaded that nothing happeneth by Fortune, wee alwaie cast our eies to God the chiefe cause of all things: then that wee doubt not that his singular Providence watcheth for us, whether wee have to doe with men as well evill as good, or with his other Creatures: To which use wee must apply the promises of God in the Scripture which testifie the same, the examples whereof are rehearsed. 1. 17. 6.

We must also adjoyne those testimonies of Scripture which teach that all men are under the power of God, whether we need to get their good wils to restraine the malice of our enemies: which last point God worketh divers waies, sometime by taking away their wit, sometime when hee granteth them wit, hee fraïeth them that they dare not goe about that which they have conceived: and sometime also when he suffereth them to goe about it, hee breaketh their enterprises; Vpon which knowledg necessarily followeth a thankfulnesse of minde in so prosperous successe of things. 1. 17. 7.

In adversity when we are hurt by men, is required patience and quiet moderation of minde: Which is shewed in the examples of Joseph being afflicted of his brethren, Job persecuted of the Chaldees, and David railed upon of Semei. If we happen to be distressed with any misery without the worke of men this selfe same doctrine is the best remedy against impatience because the Scripture testifieth, that even adversities also doe come from God. 1. 17. 8.

A Godly man principally regarding the prouidence of God, yet will not leave inferiour causes unmarked. Therefore if he have received a benefit of any man, he will heartily know and confesse himselfe to be bound unto him. If he have taken harme or done harme to any other by his negligence or want of heed, he will impute it unto himselfe, much lesse will he excuse his owne offences. In things to come chiefly he will have consideration of inferiour causes, but yet so that in determining he will not be caried away with his owne wit, but commit himselfe to the wisedome of God: neither shall his trust so stay upon outward helps, that hee will carelesly rest upon them if hee have them, nor bee dismaied for feare if hee want them. 1. 17. 9.

A large description of the inestimable felicity of a godly minde which resteth upon the providence of God: and on the other side the miserable carefulnesse wherewith wee must needes bee distressed when the weakenesse of this earthly cottage maketh us subject to so many diseases, sith our life and safety is besieged with infinite dangers at home, abroad, upon the Land, in the water, by men, and by devels. 1. 17. 10. 11.

Those places of Scripture, where it is said that God repented him: maketh nothing against the doctrine of Providence, forasmuch as therein (like as also when he is said to bee angry) the Scripture applying it selfe to our capacity describeth him, not such as hee is, but such as we feele him to bee. Likewise, where he ſpared the Ninivites, to whom hee had threatned deſtruction within fortie daies, whereas he prolonged the life of Ezechias for many yeeres, to whom he had declared preſent death: becauſe ſuch threatnings containe an unexpreſſed condition. Which is well proved by a like example in King Abimelech, which was rebuked for Abrahams wife. 1. 17. 12. 13. 14.

A confutation of them which coveting to get a praiſe of modeſtie, goe about to maintaine the righteouſneſſe of God with a lying defence, when they ſay: that thoſe things which Satan and all the reprobate doe naughtily, are done by the ſufferance of God, and not by his providence and will. And it is proved by the affliction of Iob, the deceiving of Achab, the killing of Chriſt, the inceſtuous adulterie of Abſolon, and many other examples, that men doe worke nothing but that which he hath alreadie decreed with himſelfe, and doth appoint ſo to be by his ſecret direction. 1. 18. 1.

And this hath place, not onely in outward doings, but alſo in ſecret motions. For it is proved by the hardning of Pharao, and other teſtimonies, that God worketh even in the minds alſo and hearts of the wicked. Neither maketh it any thing to the contrarie, that oftentimes the worke of Satan is uſed therein: for God worketh nevertheleſſe, but after his owne manner, uſing a juſt revenge 1. 18. 2. therefore God is not the Author of ſinnes. Sect. 4.

They are proved guilty of intollerable pride, which refuſe this doctrine under pretence of modeſtie. A confutation of their objection when they ſay that if nothing happen but with the will of God, then hath he in himſelfe two contrarie wils, foraſmuch as he doth appoint thoſe things to be done by his ſecret counſell, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawes. And there is ſhewed, that God doth not diſagree with himſelfe, that the will of God is not changed, that hee doth not faigne himſelfe to will that which he willeth: but whereas there is in God, but one ſimple will, the ſame to us appeareth divers, becauſe for the weakeneſſe of our underſtanding, wee conceive not how hee diverſly both willeth not, and willeth one ſelfe thing to bee done. Finally it is proved by Auguſtine, that man ſometime with good will willeth ſomething which God willeth not, and ſometime willeth that thing with evill will, which God willeth with good will. 1. 18. 3.

The conſideration of Gods power in governing this frame of heaven and earth, and all parts that are in them. 1. 5. 5.

The fellowſhip of men is ſo governed by the providence of God, that he ſheweth himſelfe liberall, merciſull, righteous, and ſevere. 1. 5. 6.

Thoſe things which in the life of men are counted chances, as well of proſperitie as adverſitie are ſo many tokens of the heavenly providence. 1. 5. 7. and ought to awaken us to the hope of the life to come. Sect. 9.

How God worketh in the harts of them that be his, and Sathan in them that be his, but yet ſo that they are not excuſed. 2. 4. 1.

God worketh alſo in the wicked, and even in the ſame worke wherein Satan worketh, and yet is not God ſo ſaid to be the Author of ſinne, neither is Satan or the wicked excuſed, but there is difference betweene the one and the other, both in the end and manner of doing 2. 4. 2. 3.

The old writers oftentimes referred theſe things not to the working of God, but to his foreknowledge or ſufferance, leaſt the wicked ſhould thereby take occaſion to ſpeake irreverently of the workes of God. But the Scripture when it ſaith that God blindeth, hardeneth, and ſuch like, declareth ſomewhat more than a ſufferance: although God doe worke two waies in the reprobate, namely by forſaking them, and taking his Spirit from them, and alſo by delivering them to Satan the miniſter of his wrath. 2. 4. 3. 4.

The miniſterie of Satan is uſed to ſtir forward the reprobate, whenſoever the Lord by his povidence directeth them hither or thither. 2. 4. 5.

Purgatory.

We ought not to winke at the doctrine of Purgatorie, foraſmuch as it is a damnable invention of Satan which maketh void the croſſe of Chriſt, &c. 3. 5. 6.

An expoſition of certaine places of Scripture which the Papiſts doe wrongfully wreſt to the confirmation of their Purgatorie. 3. 5. 7. 8. 9.

An anſwere to the objection of the Papiſts, that it hath beene ancient uſage of the Church that praiers ſhould bee made for the dead. Where is ſhewed that this was done by them in the old time, without the word of God, by a certaine wrongfull imitation, leaſt Chriſtians if they were ſlow in having care of funerals and the dead, ſhould ſeeme worse than heathen men. Yet herein was a great difference betweene this slipping of these old men, and the obstinate errour of the Papists. 3.5.10.

R

Redeemer Christ.

THe knowledge of God the Creator is unprofitable unto us, unlesse faith doe also follow, setting him forth in Christ a Father and Redeemer to us, and this doctrine from the beginning of the world in all ages hath beene holden among the children of God. 2.6.1.

It is proved by divers arguments and testimonies of Scripture, that the happy state of the Church hath alway beene grounded upon the person of Christ. For both the first adoption of the chosen people, and the preserving of the Church, the deliverance of them in perils, and the restoring after their dissipation, did alway hang upon the grace of the Mediator. And the hope of all the godly was never reposed any other where than in Christ. 2.6.2.3.4.

It is to be diligently considered how Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, that wee may find in him all things necessary for us, sith (as Bernard saith) he is to us light, meat, oile, salt, &c. 2.16.1.

An exposition how we should say that God was our enemy until he was reconciled to us by Christ, whereas to give Christ to us, and to prevent us with mercy, were signes of the love wherewith he before imbraced us. And there is shewed that the Scripture useth this speech and such other, to apply it selfe to our capacity: and yet it doth not the same falsly. And all this is proved by the authority of Scripture, and the testimony of Augustine. 2.16.2.3.

Regeneration.

Against certaine Anabaptists, which invent a phrenticke intemperance in stead of spirituall Regeneration, namely that the children of God being now restored into the state of innocencie, ought no more to bee carefull to bridle the lust of the flesh, but onely to follow the spirit for their guide. 3.3.14.

The rest pertaining to this matter, see in the title of Repentance.

Religion.

Necessity enforceth the Reprobate to confesse that there is some God. 1.4.4.

They are deceived which say that Religion was devised by the subtilty of certaine men to hold the simple people in order. 1.3.2.

The very wicked and godlesse men are compelled whether they will or no to feele that there is a God. 1.3.2. and in what sense David saith, that they thinke that there is no God. 1.4.2.

Remission of Sinnes.

Against them which dreame a perfection in this life, which taketh away neede of asking pardon. 3.20.45.

Of Remission of sinnes: and in what sense sinnes are called debts, and how we are said to forgive other that have offended against us. ibid.

Of the distinction of fault and paine, where with most strong testimonies of Scripture the doting errour of the Papists is confuted, namely, that when the fault is forgiven, yet God retaineth the paine, which remaineth to bee redeemed with satisfactions. 3.4.29. 30. and there also is shewed that they cannot scape away with their distinction betweene everlasting paine and temporall paine.

Of certaine places of Scripture wherewith they goe about to confirme their errour; where it is declared that there are two kindes of the judgement of God: the one of Vengeance, the other of Chastisement, which are wisely to bee distinguished asunder. 4.4.31.

The first of these, that is to say, vengeance, the faithfull have alway earnestly praied to escape: the other that is to say, chastisement, they have received with quiet minde, because it hath a testimonie of love. And where it is said that God is angry with his Saints, the same is not meant of his purpose or affection to punish them, but is spoken of the vehement feeling of sorrow wherewith they are striken so soone as they beare any part of his severity: and this is profitable for them. On the other side the reprobate, when they are stricken with the scourges of God doe already after a certaine manner begin to feele the paines of his judgement.

All which things are proved by testimonies of the Scripture, and also by the expositions of Chrysostome and Augustine. 3.4.32.33.

God when he had forgiven the adultery of David, chastised him both for common example, and also to humble him: and for this reason he daily maketh the faithfull (to whom he is mercifull) subject to the common miseries of this life. 3.4.35.

An exposition of the article of the Creed concerning remission of sinnes. 4.1.20.21.

The keyes were given to the Church, to forgive sins, not only to men at their first conversion to Christ, but to the faithfull all their life long. 4.1.22.

This doctrine is proved by testimonies of Scripture against the Novations, and certaine of the Anabaptists which faine that the people of God are by baptisme regenerate into an angelike life, and afterward there remaineth no pardon for them that fall. 4.1.23.24.25.26.27.

A confutation of them which make a voluntary transgression of the law a sinne unpardonable. 4.1.28.

Repentance.

Repentance commeth of faith, and goeth not before it. 3.3.1.

A confutation of their reasons, which thinke otherwise, but hereby is not signified any space of time wherein faith breedeth repentance: but onely is shewed that no man can earnestly endevour himselfe to repentance unlesse hee know himselfe to be Gods. Of the error of certaine Anabaptists, Iesuits, and such other which appoint to their novices certaine daies for repentance. 3.3.2.

Certaine learned men long before this time, made two parts of repentance, namely mortification, which they commonly call contrition, Vivification which they wrongfully expound to be comfort by the feeling of the mercy of God: whereas it rather signifieth a desire to live well 3.3.3.

They doe also make two other sorts of repentance, the one of the Law, the other of the Gospell: where also are shewed examples of either sort out of the Scripture. 3.3.4.

A true definition of repentance taken out of the Scripture, and here repentance though it cannot be severed, yet ought to be distinguished from faith. 3.3.5.

A plainer declaration of the definition of repentance: where first is shewed, that there is required a turning to God, that is to say, an alteration, not only in outward works, but also in the soule it selfe. 3.3.6. then that it proceedeth of an earnest feare of God: where also is entreated of the sorrowfulnesse that is according to God. 3.3.7.

Thirdly, that saying is declared that repentance consisteth of two parts, the Mortification of the flesh, and the quickning of the Spirit 3.3.8.

Both these things doe we obtaine by partaking of Christ, the first by communicating of his death, the second of his Resurrection. Therfore repentance is a new forming of the image of God in us, and a restoring into the righteousnesse of God by the benefit of Christ: and this restoring is not fulfilled in us in one moment. 3.3.9.

But there remaineth in all the Saints, while they live in mortall body, matter of strife with their flesh, and so thought all the Ecclesiastical writers that have been of sound judgement: and specially Augustine, which calleth this nourishment of evill and disease of lusting in the elect, weaknesse, and sometime sinne: and indeed it is sinne. 3.3.10.

This is confirmed by the testimony of Paul, and by the sum of the commandements. Whereas it is said that God clenseth his Church from all sinne, the same is spoken rather of the guiltines of sinne, then of the matter of sinne it self, which ceaseth not to dwell in the regenerate (but ceaseth to raigne in them) though it bee not imputed. 3.3.11.

A declaration of the seven causes or effects, or parts or affections of repentance, which Paul rehearseth. Those be study or carefulnesse, excusing, displeasure, feare, desire, zeale, revenge. Whereunto also is added out of Paul, and declared by an excellent admonition of Bernard, that in such renewing we must keepe a measure. 3.3.15.

The fruits of repentance are devotion toward God, charity toward men, holinesse and pureneſse in all our life: but all these ought to begin at the inward affection of the heart, from whence outward testimonies may afterward spring forth: where also is spoken of certaine outward exercises of repentance, which the old writers seeme to enforce somewhat too much. 3.3.16.

Turning of the heart to God is the chiefe point of repentance: Sackcloth and Ashes, weeping and fasting, were used of them in the old time before Christ, as tokens of publike repentance: of which the two last may yet bee used uſed to appeaſe the wrath of God in the miſerable times of the Church. 3.3.17.

The name of repentance or penance is unproperly drawne from his naturall ſenſe, to this outward profeſſion. Publike confeſſion is not alway neceſſary in ſins: but private confeſſion to God may never bee omitted, wherein wee ought to confeſſe not only thoſe things that we have lately committed, but the diſpleaſure of our grievous fall, ought alſo to call us backe to remembrance of our paſſed offences. Of ſpeciall penance which is required of hainous offenders and certaine other: and of the ordinances which the children of God, even the moſt perfect ought to uſe all their life long. 3.3.18.

God doth therefore freely juſtifie them that be his, that hee may alſo with the ſanctification of his Spirit reſtore them into true righteouſneſſe: therefore John, Chriſt, and the Apoſtles preached repentance and remiſſion of ſinnes. The effect of which ſaying is declared. 3.3.19.

Chriſtians ought to exerciſe themſelves in a continuall repentance, and he hath moſt profited, that hath learned moſt to miſlike himſelfe. 3.3.20.

Repentance is a ſingular gift of God, unto which he calleth all men, which he giveth to all them whom hee purpoſeth to ſave, and which the Apoſtle pronounceth, that it ſhall never be given to wilfull Apoſtates, whoſe wickedneſſe is unpardonable, that is to ſay, ſuch as have ſinned againſt the holy Ghoſt. 3.3.8.

Although fained repentance doth not pleaſe God, yet he ſometime for a ſeaſon ſpareth hypocrites which make a ſhew of ſome converſion, which he doth not for their ſakes, but for common example, that we may learne more cheerefully to give our minds to unfained repentance: and this is proved by the examples of Achab, Eſau, and the Iſraelites. 3.3.25.

The Schoole Sophiſters doe foully erre in thoſe definitions which they make of repentance, and no better doe they divide it, when they part it into contrition of heart, confeſſion of mouth, and ſatisfaction of worke: where is entreated of certaine queſtions which they move: whereupon is eaſily gathered, that they babble of things which they know not, when they ſpeake of repentance. 3.4.1.

When they require thoſe three things in repentance, they muſt needs binde thereunto forgiveneſſe of ſinnes: And if it be ſo, then are we moſt miſerable, for as much as wee can never have quietneſſe of conſcience: which is proved firſt in that contrition of heart, ſuch as they require. 3.4.2.

There is a great difference betweene the doctrine of ſuch contrition, and that contrition which the Scripture requireth of ſinners, that they truly hunger and thirſt for the mercy of God, 3.4.3.

In what ſenſe the old writers thought that ſolemne penance, which was then required for hainous offences, might no more bee eſtſoones done then Baptiſme. 4.1.29.

Reaſon of Man.

Mans underſtanding is not ſo to be condemned of perpetuall blindneſſe, that we leave it no whit of underſtanding in any kinde of thing: but it hath ſome knowledge in as much as he is naturally carried with deſire to ſearch out truth: And yet this deſire by and by falleth into vanity, becauſe the minde of man cannot for dulneſſe keepe the right way to ſearch out truth, and for the moſt part he diſcerneth not of what things it is behovefull for him to ſeeke the true knowledge. 2.2.12.

As touching earthly things it is proved by examples, that the mind of man hath a ſharpe underſtanding, as firſt of houſholds, ſith every man underſtandeth that the fellowſhip of men muſt be holden together by lawes, and comprehendeth in minde the principles of thoſe lawes. 2.2.13.

Alſo in liberall Arts and handy crafts for learning whereof, yea, for amplifying and garniſhing of the ſame, there is in man a certaine aptneſſe, although ſome be more apt than other. But the light of reaſon, and underſtanding of men, is ſo generall a good quality in all men, that yet it is a free gift of Gods liberality toward every man: which thing God ſheweth when he createth ſome Idiots und dull witted: alſo when he maketh one man to excell in ſharp invention, another in judgement, another in quickneſſe of minde, againe, when he powreth into men ſingular motions, according to every mans calling, and according to the time and matter that is to be done. 2.2.14.17.

The invention of Arts, the orderly teacking of deep and excellent knowledge thereof, which appeare to have beene in the old Lawyers, Philoſophers, Phyſitians, being prophane men, doe declare unto us, that the minde of men how much ſoever it be fallen from his firſt uprightneſſe, is yet ſtill garniſhed with excellent gifts of God. 2.2.15.

They are the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt which the the Lord giveth to whom he will, even to the ungodly for the publike benefit of mankinde: therefore we ought to use them although they be communicate unto us by the ministerie of the wicked, to whom they are but transitorie and fleeting, because they are without the sound foundation of truth. 2.2.16.

It is shewed in the first two points that mans reason seeth nothing that concerneth the kingdome of God and heavenly matters, which are contained in three things, that is to say, to know God, his fatherly favour toward us, and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his law. 2.2.18. and to that purpose are alleadged divers testimonies of Scripture. Sect. 19.20.21. In the third it seemeth that he hath some more understanding than in the other, forasmuch as man is instructed by the law of nature to a right rule of life. But such knowledge is unperfect in the unbeleevers, and availeth to no other end, but to make them unexcusable: neither doe they by that naturall light, see the truth in every thing. And here is expounded the saying of Themistius, that understanding, in the universall definition is seldome deceived, but the error is when it descendeth to particular causes, and there is shewed that mans universall judgement in the difference of good and evill, is not alway sound and upright. For it attaineth not those which are the chiefe things in the first table of the law namely, of confidence in God, &c. In the second table, although it have some more understanding, yet it appeareth that it sometime erreth: as when it judgeth that it is an absurditie to suffer too imperious government, and not to revenge wrong: also it knoweth not the disease of desire in the whole observation of the law. 2.2.22.23.24.

It is proved by the Scripture, that the sharpnesse of our reason in all the parts of our life is nothing before the Lord, and our minds doe reape the grace of enlightning, not onely at the beginning, or for one day, but at every moment. 2.2.25.

See under the title of freewill, certaine things pertaining to this matter.

Resurrection of Christ.

Without the resurrection of Christ all it unperfect that wee beleeve concerning his crosse, death, and buriall, thereof wee receive three profits: forasmuch as it hath both purchased us righteousnesse before God, and is to us a pledge of the Resurrection to come, and by his life we are now regenerate into newnesse of life. 2.16.13.

A declaration of the history of the Resurrection of Christ. 3.25.3.

Last Resurrection.

Forasmuch as the faithfull, doe chiefly need hope and patience, least they should faint in the course of their calling: he hath soundly profited in the Gospel which is accustomed to a continuall meditation of the blessed Resurrection. 3.25.1.2.

The article concerning the last Resurrection, containeth a doctrine of great weight: grave and hard to beleeve: for the overcomming of which hardnesse by faith, the Scripture giveth two helpes, the example of Christ, and the almightinesse of God. 3.25.3.4.

A confutation of the Sadducet, which deny the Resurrection: and of the Millenaries which appoint the Kingdome of Christ to endure but a thousand yeeres. 3.25.5.

A confutation of their error, which imagine that soules at the last day shall not receive againe the bodies wherewith they are now clothed, but shall have new and other bodies. 3.25.7.8.

Of the manner of the last Resurrection. 3.25.8.

By what reason the last resurrection, which is a singular benefit of Christ, is common also to the wicked and the accursed of God. 3.25.2

Sabboth.

An exposition of the fourth Commandement, the end thereof and the three causes whereupon we must note that it consisteth. 2.8.28.

The first cause is a shadowing of spirituall rest, that is to say, of our sanctification: this is proved by divers places to have beene the chiefe thing in the Sabboth. 2.8.29.

Why the Lord appointeth the seventh day. 2.8.30.31.

This part, forasmuch as it was Ceremoniall is taken away by the death of Christ. 2.8.31.

The two latter causes, that is to say, that there should bee certaine dates appointed for assemblies in the Church, and that there should be given to servants, a rest from their labour, do serve for all ages. 2.8.32.

Of daies of meeting in the Church to heare the word of God and common praiers: where is spoken of observing of the Sunday. 2.8.32. 33. and of superstition to bee avoided in this behalfe. 2.8.34.

Sacraments.

What is a Sacrament. 4.14.1.

For what reason the old Writers used this word in that sense. 4.14.2.13.

A Sacrament is never without a promise going before, which the Lord sealeth by that meane, wherein hee provideth helpe for our ignorance and dulnesse, and also for our weakenesse. 4.14.3.5.6.12.

A Sacrament consisteth of the word and the outward signe: but the sacramentall word is to be taken otherwise than the Papists think 4.14.4.

Sacraments cease not to bee testimonies of the grace of God, although they be given also to the wicked, which doe gather to themselves more grievous damnation thereby. 4. 14.7.

Our faith is so confirmed by Sacraments, that yet it hangeth upon the inward effectuall working of the spirit. 4.14.10.11. and no vertue is to be put in the creatures. Sect. 12.

A confutation of the devilish doctrine of the Sophisticall Schooles, that the Sacraments of the new law doe justifie and doe give grace, so that we doe not stop it with deadly sinne. 4. 14.14.

Augustines good distinction betweene a sacrament and thing of the Sacrament, whereby is proved that though God in Sacraments doe truly offer Christ, yet the wicked receive nothing but the Sacrament, that is to say, the outward signe. 4.14.15.16.

We must not thinke that there is joyned or fastened to the Sacraments any secret vertue, wherby they by themselves do give us the graces of the holy Ghost. 4.14.17.

In the old time God gave unto his people some sacraments in miracles and some in naturall things. And there is spoken of the tree of life and of the raine-bow. 4.14.18.

Sacraments are on the Lords behalfe testimonies of grace and salvation, and on our behalfe tokens of our profession. 4.14.19.

The Sacraments of the old Church under the law, tended to the same end that our Sacraments doe, that is to say, Christ: whom yet our Sacraments doe more plainly represent wherefore the Schoolemens doctrine is to bee rejected, which say, that the old sacraments did shew a shadow of the grace of God, and ours doe give it presently. 4. 14. 20. 21. 22. 23. &c.

The five falsely called Sacraments.

When we deny those five to be Sacraments, which are invented by men, we strive not about the name but the thing: because the Papists will have them to be visible formes of invisible grace. 4.19.1.

Many reasons are brought, why it is not Lawfull for men to make sacraments. Also there is a difference to bee put betweene sacraments, and other ceremonie. 4.19.2.

The number of seven Sacraments cannot be proved by the authority of the old Church. 4.19.3.

Although the old Church under the law, had moe Sacraments, yet at this day, the Christian Church ought to be content with those two, which Christ hath ordained: and it is not lawfull for men to make other, nor to adde unto those any thing of their owne. 4.18.20.

Sacrifices.

A difference between the sacrifices of Moses his law, and the supper of the Lord in the Christian Church. 4.18.12.

What the name of a Sacrifice properly signifieth: and of the divers kindes of Sacrifices under the law: which may be devided into two sorts, whereof some may be called of thankesgiving, and other some propitiatory or of cleansing. 4.18.13.

Our onely propitiatory sacrifice is the death of Christ. Sacrifices of thankesgiving we have many, as all the duties of charity, praiers, praises, giving of thankes, and all that we doe to the worshipping of God. 4.18.13.16.17.

This manner of sacrificing is daily used in the Church, and in the Supper of the Lord: And thereupon all Christians are sacrificing Priests.

Satisfactions Papisticall.

Of satisfaction, which they make the third thing in penance, of retaining the paine, the fault being forgiven, and such like lies, which all are overthrowne, by setting against the free forgivenesse of sinnes, by the name of Christ. 3. 4.25.

A confutation of the blasphemous errour of the Schoolemen, that forgiveneſſe of ſinnes, and reconciliation is once done in Baptiſme, but after Baptiſme we muſt riſe againe by ſatisfactions. 3.4.26.

By ſuch errour, Chriſt is ſpoiled of his honour, and the peace of conſcience is troubled, foraſmuch as they can never certainly determine, that their ſinnes are forgiven them. 3.4.27.

In Daniel, when Nebuchadnezar is commanded to redeeme his ſinnes with righteouſneſſe: that ſame redeeming is referred to God, rather than to men, and the cauſe of pardon is not there ſet forth, but rather the manner of true converſion. The ſame is to be ſaid of certaine other places of Scripture. 3 4.36.

An expoſition of that place in the Goſpell, Many ſinnes are forgiven her becauſe ſhee hath loved much: Meaning that love is not the cauſe, but the proofe of forgiveneſſe. 3.4.37.

The old writers of the Church did not ſpeake of ſatisfactions in ſuch ſenſe as the Papiſts doe: for they underſtand that the penitent doe make ſatisfaction to the Church, and not to God. 3.4.38.39.

Scripture, the Word of God, and the authority thereof.

Men doe not ſufficiently know God the Creator, and diſcerne him from feigned gods, by conſideration of his creatures, unleſſe they be alſo holpen by the light of the Word. And God hath kept this order in teaching them that be his, not onely ſince that hee choſe the Jewes for his peculiar people, but alſo from the beginning, even toward Adam, Noe, and the other Fathers. 1.6.1.

Either by Oracles, or by Viſions, or by the miniſterie of other, the Fathers had the word which they were certainly perſwaded to be the Word of God, whereby they knew the true God, the creator and governour of all things: which word afterward, that he might provide for men in all ages, he cauſed to be written in the Law and the Prophets, as it were in publike Regiſters. 1.6.2.3. in which place alſo is proved by teſtimonies of Scripture, that the doctrine of the Word, muſt bee joyned to the conſideration of creatures, leſt we conceive a fickle knowledge of God.

Of them which ſay, that the authority of Scripture hangeth upon the judgement of the Church, and in how ill caſe we ſhould be, if it were ſo. 1.7.1.

This errour is well confuted by the place of Paul in the ſecond Chapter to the Epheſians, where he ſaith, that the faithfull are builded upon the foundation of the Apoſtles and Prophets. 1.7.2.

In what ſenſe Auguſtine ſaith, that hee would not have beleeved the Goſpell, unleſſe the authority of the Church did move him: which place they doe cavillouſly wreſt to the confirmation of their errour. 1.7.3.

Although there be many other arguments, which doe prove, yea, doe enforce the wicked to confeſſe, that the Scripture came from God, yet by none other meane than by the ſecret teſtimony of the Holy Ghoſt, our hearts are truly perſwaded, that it is God which ſpeaketh in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Goſpell. And this is proved by many places of Eſay. 1.7.4.5.

The orderly diſpoſition of the wiſdome of God, the doctrine ſavouring nothing of earthlineſſe, the goodly agreement of all the parts among themſelves, and eſpecially that baſeneſſe of contemptible words, uttering the high myſteries of the heavenly kingdome, are ſecond helps to ſtabliſh the credit of Scripture. 1.8.1.2.11.

Alſo the antiquity of the Scripture, whereas the Bookes of other Religions are later than the Bookes of Moſes, which yet doth not himſelfe invent a new God, but ſetteth forth to the Iſraelites the God of their Fathers. 1.8.3.4.

Whereas Moſes doth not hide the ſhame of Levi his father, nor the murmuring of Aaron his brother, and of Mary his ſiſter, nor doth advance his owne children: the ſame are arguments, that in his Bookes is nothing faigned by man. 1.8.4.

Alſo the miracles which hapned, as well at the publiſhing of the Law, as in all the reſt of time. 1.8.5.

Which miracles, when the prophane writers could not deny, they cavilled, that Moſes did them by Magicall arts. Which ſlander is confuted by moſt ſtrong reaſons. 1.8.6.

Alſo whereas Moſes ſpeaking in the perſon of Jacob, aſſigneth the government to the Tribe of Juda, and where he telleth before of the calling of the Gentiles, whereof the one came to paſſe foure hundred yeares after, and the other almoſt two thouſand yeares: theſe are arguments, that it is God himſelfe which ſpeaketh in the bookes of Moſes, 1.8.7.

Whereas Eſay telleth before of the captivitie

vity of the Jewes, and their restoring by Cyrus (which was borne an hundred yeares after the death of Esay) and where Jeremie before that the people was led away appointeth their exile to continue threescore and ten yeares, whereas Jeremie and Ezechiel being farre distant in places the one from the other, doe agree in all their sayings, where Daniel telleth before of things to come, for six hundred yeares after: these are most certaine proofes, to stablish the authority of the Bookes of the Prophets. 2.8.8.

Against certaine ungodly scoffers which aske how we know that those are the writings of Moses and the Prophets, which are read in their names: and how we know whether there were any such Moses. 1.8.9.

Also of them that aske, from whence the copies of the Books of the Scripture came to us, forasmuch as Antiochus commanded them all to be burned. And there is spoken of the wonderfull providence of God in preserving them so many ages, among so many enemies, and so cruell persecution. 1.8.10.

The simplicity of the speech of the first three Evangelists, containing heavenly mysteries, the phrase of John thundring from on high with weighty sentences, the heavenly Majesty shining in the writings of Peter and Paul, the sudden calling of Mathew from the boord, the calling of Peter and John from their fisherboats to the preaching of the Gospell, the conversion and calling of Paul, being an enemie to Apostleship, are signes of the holy Ghost speaking in them. 1.8.11.

The consent of so many ages, of so sundry nations, and of so divers minds in embracing the Scripture, and the rare godlinesse of some, ought to stablish the authority thereof among us. 1.8.12.

Also the bloud of so many Martyrs which for the confession thereof, have suffered death with a constant and sober zeale of God. 1.8.13.

Against certaine frentick men, which forsaking the reading of Scripture and learning, doe boast of the Spirit and doe flie to revelations. 1.9.1.2.

A confutation of their objections that it is not meet that the spirit of God, to whom all things ought to be subject, should be subject to the Scriptures. 1.9.2.

Also where they say that we rest upon the letter which slayeth. 1.9.3.

The Lord hath joyned with a mutuall knot the certainty of his doctrine and of his Spirit. 1.9.3.

Such as the beholding of the heaven and earth, and other creatures doth depaint out God unto us, such doth the Scripture set him forth, that is to say, eternall, full of goodnesse, clemencie, mercy, righteousnesse, judgement and truth: and also to the same end. 1.10.1.2.

What is to be thought of the power of the Church in exposition of Scripture. 4.9.13.

The Romish Doctors doe wrongfully abuse this colour to the confirmation of their errours and blasphemie. 4.9.14.

Of singing in the Church.

Voice and singing availe nothing in prayer, without affection of the heart. 3.20.31.33.

Of the usage of singing in Churches. 3.20.32.

Single life.

Their shamelesnesse which doe set forth the comelinesse of single life for a thing necessarie, to the great reproach of the old Church. By what degrees this tyranny crept into the Church: and how it cannot be defended by the pretence of certaine old Canons. 4.12.26.27.28.

Priests were forbidden to marry by wicked tyranny, and against the Word of God, and against all equity. 4.12.23.

An answer to the adversaries objection, that the Priest must by some marke differ from the lay people. 4.12.24.

The blasphemie of the Pope, saying that mariage is defiling and uncleannesse of the flesh. 4.12.24.

It is found to defend the forbidding of mariage with the examples of the Levitical Priests, which when they should goe into the Sanctuary, lay asunder from their wives. 4.12.25.

Sinne.

A confutation of Plato's saying, that men sinne not but by ignorance: also of their opinion which say, that in all sinnes there is an advised malice and frowardnesse. 2.2.22.23.25.

Against the false imagination of the Sophisters concerning veniall sinnes, which they call desires without a determined assent, which doe not long rest in the heart: it is proved that every sinne, even the lightest desire deserveth death death, and is deadly, except in the Saints which obtaine pardon by the mercy of God, 2.8.58.59.

A confutation of their fond diſtinction betweene deadly and veniall ſinnes, and of their ſlander when they ſay that we make all ſinnes equall. 3.4.28.

How it is to be expounded, that God viſiteth the iniquity of the Fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation: and whether ſuch revengement be unſeemely for the righteouſneſſe of God. 2.19.20.

Sinne againſt the Holy Ghoſt.

The true definition of ſinne againſt the holy Ghoſt, and examples thereof out of the Scripture. 3.3.22.

It is not one or another particular falling, but a generall forſaking, the deſcription whereof is declared by the Apoſtle. Neither is it any marvell if God will be alwayes unappeaſeable to them that have ſo fallen. 3.3.23. foraſmuch as he promiſeth pardon onely to them that repent, which they ſhall never doe. And though the Scripture doe ſay that ſome ſuch have groned and cryed, yet that was not repentance or converſion, but rather a blinde torment by deſperation. 3.3.24.

Of the Soule.

That the Soule or Spirit of man is not only a breath, but an immortall ſubſtance, although it were created, is proved by conſcience, by the knowledge of God, and by ſo many excellent gifts wherewith the minde of man is endued, yea, and by thoſe things which it conceiveth in ſleepe and alſo by many arguments taken out of the Scripture. 1.15.2. Finally, by this that is ſaid, that man was created after the image of God. Sect. 3.

Againſt them that under the colour of nature doe deny the providence and governance of God, uttering it ſelfe in the marvellous and in a manner innumerable powers of the ſoule. 1.5.4.5.

A confutation of the errour of the Manichees, and of Servetus, that the ſoule is a derivation of the ſubſtance of God: alſo of the errour of Oſiander, which acknowledgeth no image of God in man without an eſſentiall righteouſneſſe. 1.15.5.

Concerning the immortality of the Soule, in a manner none of the Philoſophers hath certainly ſpoken: but they doe binde the powers thereof to this preſent life, whereas the Scripture doth ſo give to it the chiefe rule in governance of life, that it alſo ſtirreth up man to the worſhipping of God. Alſo of the diverſity of ſoules, and of the diviſion of the powers of the ſoule according to the Philoſophers. 1.15.6.

Another diviſion more agreeable with Chriſtian doctrine, that is to ſay, that the powers of the ſoule are underſtanding and will: and the office and force of either of them in mans firſt eſtate. 1.15.7.8.

That there yet remaineth ſomewhat of the ſeed of religion yet imprinted even in the corruption of the ſoule. 1.15.6.

Of their errour which thought that whole man periſheth by death, and that the ſoules at the laſt ſhall riſe againe with the bodies. 3.25.6.

Of the ſtate of the ſoules from death to the laſt day. 3.25.6.

A deſcription taken out of Bernard, of the miſeries of a faithfull ſoule, being conſidered as it is in it ſelfe and of it ſelfe: and on the other ſide, of the aſſured glorying of a faithfull ſoule in Chriſt, which blotteth out all her unworthineſſes. 3.2.25.

Superſtition.

The ſimplicity of the ſuperſtitious doth not excuſe them, becauſe their blindneſſe is found to bee mingled with vanity, pride, and obſtinacie. 1.4.1.3.

When ſuperſtition goeth about to pleaſe God, it mocketh him with lying colours. 1.4.3.

The ſuperſtitious doe not approach unto God, but againſt their will, and with ſervile feare. 1.4.4.

Whoſoever doe corrupt the true religion, although they follow the conſent of antiquity, or the cuſtome of any Citie, yet they depart from the one and true God. 1.5.12.

It is proved by the etymologie of the words Superſtition, Religion, Euſebeia or godlineſſe, what difference is betweene Religion and Superſtition. 1.12.1.

The craft of ſuperſtition, when granting the chiefe place to the one God, it beſetteth him with a rout of ſmaller gods. 1.12.1.3.

Supper of the Lord.

Of the Bread and Wine the ſignes in the holy Supper: and it is declared by his owne words at his Supper, why the Lord willed that we should use them. 4.17.1.

We gather a great fruit of confidence and sweetnesse out of this Sacrament, which testifieth that we are so growne together into one body with Christ, that whatsoever is his, we may lawfully call it ours. 4.17.2.

This is declared by the words of the Supper. 4.17.3.

The chiefe office of the Sacraments is not to give unto us the body of Christ without any higher consideration, but rather to seale that promise wherein hee testifieth that his flesh is verily meat. 4.17.4.

The Supper maketh not Christ then first to begin to be the bread of life, but that we should feele the force of that bread. He once gave his flesh for the life of the world, and daily giveth it to them that be his. We must beware that wee doe not too much abase or advance the signes. The eating of the flesh of Christ is not faith, but rather the effect of faith. 4.17.5.

So thought Chrysostome and Augustine, and in what sense Augustine saith, that in beleeving we eat the flesh of Christ. 4.17.6.

They doe not say enough, which passing over the mention of flesh and bloud, doe thinke that wee are made partakers onely of the spirit of Christ. The mysterie of the Supper is so great, that neither the tongue can expresse with speaking, nor the heart comprehend with thinking the greatnesse thereof. 4.17.7.

How farre the perfect communicating of Christ extendeth. Where is declared that Christ, which from the beginning was the life giving word of the father, made the flesh which hee tooke upon him to be also life giving to us. 4.17.8.9.

The faithfull doe truly eat of the same flesh, how great distance of place soever there be betweene them and it. 4.17.10.

The mystery of the Supper consisteth of two things, the bodily signes, and the spirituall truth: Which spirituall truth containeth three things. signification, matter, and effect. 4.17.11.

Of the transubstantiation of bread and wine into the body and bloud of Christ, which the Crafts-men of the court of Rome have forged. 4.17.12.13. &c. & 20.

They are without testimonie of antiquity. And in what sense the old writers said, that in the consecration is made a secret turning. Also the signification of the Supper agreeth not unlesse the substance of the outward signes remaine. 4.17.14.

The bread is a Sacrament to none but to men to whom the word is directed. And here are confuted certaine arguments of the teachers of transubstantiation. 4.17.15.

Of some men, which though they doe at one word grant that the substance of the signes remaineth, yet placing the body of Christ in bread and under bread, they fall backe into the locall presence, and feigne a being every where. 4.17.16. 17.18.20.

A confutation of their objections. 4.17. 21.22.23. &c.

It is proved that this doctrine is not maintained, neither by the testimonie of Augustine, nor by authority of Scripture. 4.17.28. 29.30.31.

A confutation of certaine other of their objections, and chiefly of this that they say, that whatsoever we teach of spirituall eating, is against the true and reall eating: where also is declared that the body of Christ is in the Supper offered to the Iusidels, but they receive it not. 4.17.33.

Neither can the saying of Augustine bee drawne to this purpose, that the Sacraments are nothing appaired by the infidelity of men. Which is proved by divers other testimonies of the same man. 4.17.34.

How the body and bloud of Christ is given to us in the Supper, and what manner of presence of Christ wee ought to hold therein. 4.17.18.19.32.

Of the exposition of the words of Christ in the Supper. 4.17.20.20.21.

The body of Christ is contained in quantity, and comprehended in heaven untill the last day, as it is proved by the Scriptures. 4.17.26.27.

Of the Papists carnall adoration, and concomitance, and consecration of the host (as they call it) and carrying it about in pompe. 4.17.35.36.37.

The mysterie of the Supper ought to stirre us up to giving of thanks, to exercise us in remembring the death of Christ, to kindle us to holinesse of life, and chiefly to charity. 4.17.37.38.

In the Papacie the Supper (the true ministration whereof is not without the word) is turned into a dumbe action. And here is spoken of the laying up of the Sacrament to bee extraordinarily distributed to sicke men. 4.17.39.

The doctrine of the Papists, when they

goe about to prepare men to the worthinesse of eating the body of Christ, doth in cruell wise torment consciences: And the devill could not by any readier way destroy men. Of the best remedy to avoid this destruction. They erre which in the Supper doe require of the faithfull perfection of faith. 4.17.41.42.

As touching the outward usage of the ministration of the Supper, there are many things indifferent: And how it ought to be administred most comely. 4.17.43.

Of the small assembly at this day at the partaking of the Supper, which is a token of contempt, wherewith the holy Fathers in old time were much displeased: And how the custome which commanded men to communicate once every yeare, was a most certaine invention of the devill. 4.17.44.45.46.

It is proved by authority of the Scripture, and by the usage of the old Church, foure hundred yeares before the death of Gregory, and by many other arguments, that the constitution which tooke away from lay men the cup of the Lord, came out of the Devils work-shop. 4.17.47.48.49.50.

Of the concomitance of the bloud in the flesh of Christ, which is a popish invention. 4.17.47.

The Supper of the Lord is prophanely abused, if it be given to all men without choice. Of the duty of ministers in rejecting the unworthy. 4.12.5.

A briefe summe of those things which wee ought to know concerning the two Sacraments. And why the Supper is ostentimes ministred, and Baptisme but once. 4.18.19.

Swearing.

An exposition of the third commandement, in which these three things are contained, that we neither thinke nor speake any thing of God, nor of his word and honourable mysteries, nor yet of any of his workes, otherwise than reverently. 2.8.22.

A definition of Swearing: where is declared that it is a kinde of worshipping of God. And therefore we must beware that our oaths containe not any dishonour to the name of God, which is done in forswearing: or any contempt of it, which is done in superfluous oaths, or in which the name of any other than God is used. 2.8.23.24.25.

It is proved by Scripture against the Anabaptists: that all oaths are not forbidden us, that Christ in the Gospell changed nothing as touching the rule of Swearing, set forth in the law. 2.8.26. Which is proved by his owne example: and not onely publike, but also private oaths are permitted, keeping the moderation which the Law commandeth. 2.8.27.

T

Temples.

OF Temples of Christian men for assemblies of the congregation. 3.20.30.

It is proved by the authority of the old Church, and the reasons of Augustine, that it is not expedient, that there should bee any images in Christian Temples. 1.11.13.

The preaching of the Word and the Sacraments, are lively images which onely are fit to be in Christian Temples. 1.11.7.13.

The wickednesse of the Nicene Synode which was holden by the commandement of Irene the Empresse, and the filthy follies thereof in allowing images in Temples, and the worshipping of them. 1.11.14.15.16.

Of the garnishing of Temples and holy things in the old Church. 4.4.8. & 4.5.18.

Temptations.

Of divers kinds of Temptations: and in what sense it is said that God tempteth us. 3.20.46.

Testament, old and new.

Of the likenesse of the old and new Testament: Where is declared, that they are all one in substance and matter, but onely doe differ in ministration. The likenesse standeth chiefly in three points. 2.10.1.2.

The first point is, that the old Testament did not hold the fathers in earthly felicity, but had chiefe regard to the life to come. Which is proved by Paul, which saith, that the promises of the Gospell are contained under it. 2.10.3.

The same also is proved by the Law and the Prophets: First, by considering the words of the covenant: I am your God. 2.10.7.8.

Againe, I will be the God of your seed after you. Sect. 9. Also by the life of the holy Fathers, as Adam, Abel, Noe. Sect. 10. Abraham. Sect. 11. Isaac, Jacob, Sect. 12.13. 14. And by many testimonies of David. Se. 15. 16.17.18. Of Job, Sect. 19. Generally of all the Later Prophets. Sect.20. But namely of Ezechiel. Sect.21. of Esay and Daniel. Sect. 22. A conclusion of this point with rehearsing certaine testimonies out of the new Testament. Sect.23.

The second point is that the old Testament did not stand upon the merits of men, but upon the free mercy of God. The third point is that the covenant of the fathers with God, did then stand upon like knowledge of Christ the Mediator.2.10.4.

Also in signification of Sacraments the Israelites under the law were equall with the Christian people.2.10.5.6.

Their are foure differences of the old Testament from the new, wherunto we may adde a fift. The first is, that although in the old time also the Lords will was to direct the soules of his people to the heavenly inheritance: Yet to the end that they might be the better nourished in the hope thereof, he gave it to them to be holden, and after a certaine manner tasted under earthly benefits. But now the grace of the life to come, being more clearely revealed by the Gospell, hee directeth our mindes the straight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferiour manner of exercising which hee used among the Israelites. 2.11.1.

Therefore the old Church is compared to an heire under age, which is governed by Gardians.2.11.2.

For this reason, the Father so much esteemed this life, and the blessings thereof.2.11.3.

The second difference is in figures wherewith the old Testament did shew forth the image and shadow of spirituall good things. The new Testament giveth the present truth and perfect bodie. There is also a reason shewed why the Lord kept this order: And a definition of the old Testament.2.11.4.

In this sense it is said, that the Jewes were by the introduction or schooling of the Law led unto Christ: before that hee was delivered in the flesh. 2. 11. 5. which appeared in the most excellent Prophets that were endued with Singular grace of the Spirit. Sect.6.

The third difference is taken out of the one and thirtieth Chapter of Jeremy, and the third Chapter of the second Epistle to the Corinthians, that the old Testament is literall, and the new Testament is spirituall: the old bringeth death, the new is the instrument of life.2.11.7.8.

The fourth difference is, that the Scripture calleth the old Testament, the Testament of bondage, because it engendreth feare in ment minds: but the new is called the Testament of liberty, because it raiseth them up to confidence and surety. The three latter differences are comparisons of the law and the Gospell. The first containeth also the promises made before the law. The Fathers lived so under the law and the old Testament, that they stayed not there, but alwaies aspired to the new, yea and embraced a certaine communicating thereof.2.11.9.10.

The fift difference is, that before the comming of Christ, the Lord had severed one nation, in which he would keepe the covenant of his grace, in the meane time neglecting all other nations. So the calling of the Gentiles is a certaine signe, wherewith the excellencie of the new Testament is set forth above the old: a thing so incredible, that it seemed yet new to the Apostles themselues, being exercised in reading of the Prophets, and endued with the holy Ghost. 2.11.11.12.

A conclusion of this matter, and an answer to divers objections of some men, which say that this variety in the Church, this divers manner of teaching, so great change of usages and ceremonies, is a great absurdity. Where is declared that the constancy of God appeareth in this changing, and he hath done nothing but wisely, righteously, and in mercy, when he governeth his Church, after one sort in childhood, and after another sort in riper age, and also when hee did keepe close in one people the shewing forth of his grace before the comming of Christ, which afterward he powred forth upon all Nations.2.11. 13.14.

Theft.

An exposition of the eight Commandement: where is entreated of divers kinds of Theft, and some which although men judg otherwise yet are accounted Thefts before God. And so hee that doth not performe that which by the office of his calling hee oweth to other, is a theefe.2.8.43.

What we ought to doe, that wee may obey this commandement, is shewed by divers examples according to the diversity of persons and offices.2.8.46.

Traditions.

For as much as the Lord, willing to teach a rule of true righteousnesse, hath drawne all the parts thereof to his owne will, thereby it appeareth, that all the good workes which men deviſe of their owne wits, are nothing worth before him: But the true worſhipping ſtandeth upon obedience only, which is the beginning, mother, and preſerver of all vertues. 2. 8. 5.

Of Traditions of men, that is to ſay, ordinances proceeding from men, concerning the worſhipping of God: And of the ungodlineſſe and neceſſity of them. 4. 10. 1. 2. 5. 6. 7. 8.

A diviſion of Papiſh conſtitutions, which they call Traditions of the Church, into ſuch as containe ceremonies, and other which are ſaid to pertaine to diſcipline. The wickednesſe of both ſorts, becauſe they place the worſhip of God in them, and conſciences are bound with preciſe neceſſity of them. 4. 10. 9.

For them the commandement of God is made void. 4. 10. 10.

A true marke for mens Traditions, which ought to be rejected of the Church, and of all godly men. 4. 10. 16.

A confutation of the pretence which ſome men uſe that defend Papiſh Traditions to be of God, becauſe the Church cannot erre, and is governed by the holy Ghoſt. 4. 10. 17.

It is a meere mockery to ſay, that the Apoſtles were authours of the Traditions, wherewith the Church hath heretofore beene oppreſſed. 4. 10. 18. 19. 20.

The example of the Apoſtles, when they commanded the Gentiles to abſtaine from things offered unto Idols, from ſtrangled, and from bloud, is falſly alleaged to excuſe the tyranny of the Popes Lawes. 4. 10. 21. 22.

The Lords kingdome is taken from him, when he is worſhipped with the lawes of mens Traditions: which is proved by examples and teſtimonies of Scripture to have alwaies beene a moſt hainous offence in the ſight of God. 4. 10. 23. 24.

The invention of men cannot be defended by the example of Menoha, which being a private man offered ſacrifice, nor of Samuel which ſacrificed in Ramath. 4. 10. 25. nor of Chriſt that willed men to beare the burdens that the Scribes and Phariſees did bind together. 4. 10. 26.

Of holy and profitable ordinances of the Church, and the end that they tend unto. 4. 10. 1.

Of ſuch ordinances of the Church as ought to bee accounted holy, namely thoſe which ſerve for comlineſſe, or doe preſerve order and peace in the Church. 4. 10. 27. 28. 29. We muſt wiſely conſider, which be of that ſort. 4. 10. 30.

It is the duty of Chriſtian people, to obſerve ſuch ordinances: And what errors herein are to be taken heed of: And how in the meane time, the liberty of conſciences may ſtill be preſerved ſafe. 4. 10. 31. 32.

Tributes.

Of Tributes, Taxes, Impoſitions, and Finances, which are paid to Princes: And how Princes may uſe them with a good conſcience 4. 20. 13.

Trinity.

In one ſimple eſſence of God, we muſt diſtinctly conſider three perſons, or (as the Greeks call them) Hypoſtaſes. 1. 13. 2.

A confutation of them which in this matter doe condemne the name of perſon, and reject it for newneſſe. 1. 13. 3. 4. 5.

The holy doctors have been compelled to invent certain new words, to defend the truth of God againſt certaine ſubtle men, which mocked it out with ſhifting: as againſt Arrius they invented this word Homouſion Conſubſtantiall, and againſt Sabellicus the name of three properties or perſons. 1. 13. 4. 16.

The divers ſentences of Hierome, Hillary, and Auguſtine, in the uſe of theſe words. 1. 13. 5.

As God hath more clearely opened himſelfe by the comming of Chriſt, ſo he is ſince that time more familiarly made known in the three Perſons. 1. 13. 16.

Teſtimonies of Scripture, whereby is ſhewed the diſtinction of the Father from the Word, and of the word from the Spirit. 1. 13. 17.

Alſo in the Scripture there is a diſtinction made of the Father, from the Word and the Spirit, and of the Spirit from them both, as well by obſervation of order, as by propheſies aſcribed to them. 1. 13. 18.

This diſtinction of Perſons maketh not againſt the moſt ſimple unity of God. 1. 13. 19.

In what ſenſe the Fathers ſay, that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, and yet that the Sonne hath the eſſence of himſelfe. 1. 13. 19.

A briefe ſumme of thoſe things which we ought to beleeve concerning the one eſſence of God and the three perſons. 1. 13. 20.

And herein wee muſt diſpute ſoberly, and with great moderation, that neither our thought, nor our tongue, doe paſſe beyond the bounds of the word of God. 1. 23. 21.

A confutation of the doting errors of Servetus in this point of doctrine. 1. 13. 22.

A confutation of the error of certaine lewd men, which ſay, that the Father is truely and properly the one only God, which in making the Sonne and the holy Ghoſt, did powre his Godhead into them. 1. 13. 23.

It is falſe which they ſay, that when mention is made of God in the Scripture, only the Father is meant thereby. 1. 13. 24.

Alſo it is falſe which they dreame of undivided ſubſtances, of which every one hath a part of the eſſence. 1. 13. 25.

An anſwer to their objection, that Chriſt, if he bee properly God, is wrongfully called the ſonne of God. 1. 13. 26.

An anſwer to many places which they bring out of Ireneus for proofe of their opinion, where hee affirmeth the Father of Chriſt to bee the one onely and eternall God of Iſrael. 1. 13. 27.

Laſt Unction as they call it.

WHat manner of adminiſtration is of the Popiſh laſt Vnction, and in what forme of words: And how it cannot be defended by the authority of Iames, or by the example of the Apoſtles. 4. 19. 18.

Foraſmuch as the grace of healing which was in the old time given to the Apoſtles, hath long agoe ceaſed in the Church. Sect. 19. 20. And though it ſtill remained yet this their wicked obſervation is farre from that holy ceremony of the Apoſtles. A declaration of the blaſphemies thereof when they conjure the oyle, and aſcribe unto it that which is proper to the holy Ghoſt. 4. 19. 21.

Vocation.

Vowes.

Of Vowes which are made againſt the expreſſe word of God: whether they may well be vowed of Chriſtian men, and how they are to be eſteemed. 4. 13. 1. 6.

Three things are to be conſidered in Vowes: Who it is to whom we vow, namely God which delighteth in obedience. 4. 13. 2. Who wee bee that doe Vow, that wee meaſure our owne ſtrength and looke upon our calling, that wee neglect not the benefit of liberty which God hath given us. Sect. 3. And with what mind we Vow. Sect. 4.

Of the Prieſts, Monkes and Nunnes Vowes of ſingle life. 4. 13. 3. 17. 18. 19.

There bee foure ends of Vowes, to have reſpect to the time paſt, and two the time to come. 4. 13. 4. 5.

There is one common Vow of all the faithfull which they make in baptiſme. 4. 13. 6.

Of the raſhneſſe and ſuperſtition of the world in making of Vowes. 4. 13. 1. 7.

W

Of Warres.

WArres are lawfull, when Magiſtrates are driven of neceſſity to take weapon in hand, to execute publike revenge upon thoſe that trouble the peace of their dominion, whether they bee civill or forraigne enemies. 4. 20. 11.

It maketh not to the contrary hereof, which many alleadge, that there is not in the new Teſtament any teſtimony or example which proveth that warre is a thing lawfull for Chriſtians. But Magiſtrates ought to take great heed, that in taking of weapon in hand, they nothing at all follow their owne luſts. As War, ſo garriſons alſo, leagues and civill fortifications are things lawfull for Chriſtians to uſe. 4. 20. 12.

Will of God.

Of the ſecret will of God. Alſo of another Will, whereunto anſwereth Willing obedience. 3. 20. 43. & 3. 24. 1. 7.

Will of Man.

Whether the Will of man be in every part thorow defiled and corrupted, so that it bringeth forth nothing but evill: Or whether it yet retaine some liberty of choice. Where is declared the common saying taken out of the Philosophers, that all things by naturall disposition covet that which is good. And there is shewed that the liberty of will cannot be proved thereby. 2.2.26.

The soule hath not onely a weake power, but no power at all of it selfe to aspire to goodnesse. And sith the whole man is subject to the dominion of sinne, it is proved by testimonies of Scripture and of Augustine, that the will of man is bound with most straight bands. 2.2.27.

Man by his fall lost not his Will, but the soundnesse of his Will, so that he cannot move, much lesse apply himselfe to goodnesse, but is necessarily drawne or led unto evill, howbeit not by compulsion but voluntarily. Which is proved by Augustine and Bernard. A large declaration of the difference betweene compulsion and necessity. 2.3.5.

Sith the Lord both beginneth and perfiteth good in our hearts, sith hee worketh in us to will, that is to say, the good will, sith he createth a new heart, taketh away the stony heart, and giveth a fleshie heart, it followeth, that the Will of man is utterly corrupted, and hath no goodnesse at all. 2.3.6.

It is clearly proved by reasons and divers testimonies of Scripture, that God worketh good will in them that be his, not onely in preparing or turning them from the beginning, so as it may afterward doe some good of it selfe. But because it is his only worke that the Will conceiveth a love of goodnesse, that it is enclined to the study thereof, that it is stirred and moved to endevour to follow it, and againe, that the choice, study, and endevour doe not faint, but proceed to effect; finally, that man goeth constantly forward in them, and continueth to the end. 2.3.7.8.9.

Therefore it is proved by the authority of Scripture, and of Augustine, that this which hath beene taught these many ages, that God so moveth our Will, that it is afterward in our owne choice to obey or disobey his motion, and other like sayings are utterly false. 2.3.10.11.12.13.14.

Also in doings, which of themselves are neither righteous nor unrighteous, and belong rather to the bodily than the spirituall life, the will of man is not free, but by the speciall motion of God is inclined to clemencie, mercie, wrath, feare, and other divers affections, when it pleaseth him to make way for his providence. Which is proved by Scripture, by daily experience, and by the authority of Augustine. 2.4.6.7.

Workes.

A comparison of the pureneſſe of God with all the righteouſneſſe of men. 3.12.4.5.

All the off-spring of Adam being divided into foure kindes of men, it is proved that they have no holineſſe or righteouſneſſe: First, in them which are endued with no knowledge of God, in whom although there doe sometime appeare excellent qualities (which are the gifts of God) yet there is in them nothing pure. 3.14.1.2.3.4.5.6.

The same is shewed in them which being profſed by Sacraments, are Christians onely in name, denying God in their deeds: Also in hypocrites, which with vaine false colours doe hide the wickedneſſe of their heart. 3.14.7.8.

Finally, it is proved that even the children of God truly regenerated by his Spirit, cannot stand by any righteouſneſſe of their owne workes before the judgement of God, because they can bring forth no good worke that is not sprinkled with some uncleanneſſe of the flesh, and therefore damnable. Moreover, although they could bring forth any such worke, yet one sinne is enough to blot out the remembrance of all former righteouſneſſe. 3.14.9.10.11.

A confutation of the Papists shifts concernyng the righteouſneſſe of workes: and especially of the same horrible monster of workes of supererogation. 3.14.12.13.14.15.

When we intreat of works wee must thrust two pestilences out of our mindes: that wee put no trust in the righteouſneſſe of our owne works, and that wee ascribe no glory unto them. 3.14.16.

The Scripture setteth out and declareth foure kinds of causes in stabliſhing our salvation: And it is proved that in them all, there is no regard of works. 3.14.17.

Where sometimes the Saints doe bolden themselves with remembrance of their owne innocencie and uprightneſſe: how the same is to be taken: and how it doth in no wiſe abate any thing from the free righteouſneſſe in Christ. 3.14.18.19.20.

Where

Where the Scripture ſaith that the good workes of the faithfull doe move God to doe them good, the order is therein rather expreſſed than the cauſe. 3.14.21.

Why the Lord in the Scripture calleth good workes ours, and promiſeth reward to them. 3.15.3.

A confutation of the Sophiſters invention, concerning Morall workes, whereby men bee made acceptable to GOD, before that they be graffed in Chriſt. 3.15.6. and 17.4.

Thoſe rewards are given to the workes of the faithfull, which the Lord in his Law hath promiſed to the followers of righteouſneſſe: but thereof there are three cauſes to be conſidered. 3.17.3.

We may note in the Scripture two acceptances of man with God, of which the latter although it have reſpect to the good workes of the faithfull, yet is alſo the free mercy of God. 3.17.4.5.

When it is ſaid that God doth good to them that love him, heere is not rehearſed a cauſe why he ſhould doe them good, but rather the manner of what ſort they be by his grace. 3.17.6.

An expoſition of certaine place wherein the Scripture giveth to good workes the name of righteouſneſſe. And there is ſhewed that thoſe places are not againſt the doctrine of juſtification of faith. 3.17.7.

One good worke or many doe not ſuffice for righteouſneſſe before God, although one ſinne ſuffice to condemne. And here the principle hath no place, the contraries have all one rule. 3.18.10.

Why the Lord ſaid that hee rendereth to workes that which he had freely given before Workes. 3.18.3. And therein hee helpeth our weakeneſſe leaſt wee ſhould bee diſcouraged. 3.18.4.6.7.

Hereupon hangeth the righteouſneſſe of the good Workes which the faithfull doe, that by pardon they are allowed of God. 3.18.5.

The End of the Table.

TO THE CHRISTIAN and Studious Readers of this Booke, AVGVSTINE MARLORATE. wiſheth health.

WHoſoever ſhall read and peruſe theſe two Tables following, and eſpecially the latter, may marvell what I meant (after ſo many impreſſions and corrections of this worke) to collect and gather all the places of holy Scriptures therein alleaged: and a great part of the authorities therein expounded, whereas if any fruit or profit thereof were to be had, the ſame long before might have been done: and eſpecially about three yeares paſt, when the Author himſelfe was ſo diligent therein: who beſides the many and profitable additions (which it containeth) hee himſelfe ſetting the ſame in order, with his owne hands, and reducing it to a moſt exact perfection did then ſet and publiſh it forth, in ſuch ſort, that in Foure Bookes, being divided into Chapters and divers Sections, hee hath right worthily and in familiar manner, comprized the ſumme of the whole Chriſtian Religion. And certainly I cannot deny but it would have been very good and commodious, if that any one man would have taken the paine, faithfully and truly to have collected thoſe places: which thing I thought once to have done by the advice of the Imprinter, ſaving that my charge and office did elſewhere call me, as alſo when I had peruſed and ſet it in an other order than it was before, and had even finiſhed it, I was compelled to omit it, or at the leaſt to ſurceaſe for the time. And after that this Booke being put forth both in Latine and French, was ſet to ſale in every place, becauſe I ſaw no man who then did take the paine to reduce the places of Scriptures to a Table, and underſtanding how profitable the ſame would be to all men: I could not chuſe but after my power, and as leaſure ſerved in thoſe troubleſome times, to imploy my whole care and travell therein. And becauſe all things ſhould bee done and come forth more certaine and in better order: I would not give credit, nor truſt to the numbers which the Imprinter had before ſet and made: for when I had diligently conferred them all, I found many falſe, many omitted, and ſome diſorderly ſet: And ſurely that hapneth very ſoone to ſuch as are not beſt skilfull in examining and peruſing the places of holy Scripture to bee ſoone deceived. Wherefore all things diligently reſtored, and that ſupplied which ſeemed to want, I did ſo order the places of Scripture collected out of the old and new Teſtament, that if there were any, through forgetfulneſſe, or by any other meanes omitted or overskipped: (as it cannot bee but that in a great harveſt ſome one eare of corne ſhall eſcape the reapers hand) I durſt warrant ſo few ſhall be found, that this Table being brought to triall, you ſhall not finde one much more plentifull or larger. Nevertheleſſe I doe pray and requeſt the Readers, that if they doe finde any, they ſhall adverтiſe the Imprinter, whereby the ſame may better bee examined and corrected. And this is to be noted, that ſuch whole verſes as I have compriſed in this Table, they were not wholly but in part alleaged, much leſſe expounded in the Inſtitution: which thing I did upon good conſideration. For oftentimes it hapneth that in divers places of the Inſtitutions, ſome authorities are alleaged, which are proved but by ſome part of the verſe. And becauſe in noting the places and numbers, we muſt uſe repetitions (which for the moſt part bring a loathſomneſſe to the Reader) I thought it better to put in the whole verſe, then by often diviſions, to uſe vaine and ſuperfluous repetitions. And as concerning the commodity which the Reader may gather by this my travell (beſides that which by uſe and experience I am taught by theſe Tables, which for mine owne private ſtudie and exercite I wrote upon the Inſtitutions heretofore ſet forth) I durſt to affirme this much that they which are not exerciſed in entreating the holy Scripture, and yet deſirous to ſerve the Church of God, doe diligently endevour themſelves thereunto, they ſhall finde a large and plaine way, both with dexteritie to expound the writings of the Prophets and Apoſtles, as alſo aptly to apply the authorities here alleadged, and ſuch like to the edifying of the Church, which is the very end of the whole. And although wee want not good Commentaries to diſcover unto us the naturall ſenſe of the Scripture, which we doe now ſtudie and apply: yet becauſe they who wrote the ſame, and who with good ſucceſſe have travelled therein, were contented with the plaine and ſincere expoſition of the text: none could tell by the uſe of the ſaid Commentaries onely, (unleſſe they were well practiſed in the principles of religion) how and to what common place they ought to apply the argument then in hand. But who can bee ſo contented to uſe this Table, whenſoever he ſhall finde the places which he entreateth, he ſhall ſee how and to what end the ſame is to be applied, whether to the confirmation of true doctrine, or to the confuting of the adverſaries, or to the reconciling of ſuch places as ſeeme to be repugnant. And this ſhall be very commodious and profitable, not onely for the amplifying of any argument, but alſo to ſatisfie them, which are deſirous to bee confirmed in the principall points of Chriſtian Religion. For it is manifeſt how ſimple and ſlender is their oration and ſpeech, which bring and alleadge nothing elſe, but as they read in the Commentaries: where the Authors themſelves (being moſt worthy and well learned) doe chiefly deſire brevitie, becauſe the readers ſhould uſe and ſtudie the common places themſelves, to the end they ſhould the more largely bee applied to thoſe things which in the Commentaries are but briefly expounded. Againe, for as much as we have not alwaies in readineſſe, what good Authors haue written upon the Scripture: and very few Commentaries upon ſome Bookes, and namely upon this Inſtitution, are to be found or had: This Table expounding the obſcure and hard authorities, ſhall greatly further and helpe the readers. For they ſhall either finde ſome ready interpretation, or ſome entrance whereby to ſearch and finde out the true ſence. And as touching the tranſlation, I truſt it ſhall not ſeeme ſtrange to the reader, in that I have rather followed the ſelfeſame words, as they bee in the Bible, than as they bee alleaged by Calvin in this his Inſtitution. For hee being a man moſt excellently well learned, and of great reading (as by his workes it doth appeare, how ready and familiar the Scriptures were to him) had not alwaies the bookes in readineſſe, or lying open before him, when hee wrote: neither was it neceſſary that whatſoever hee did anouch out of the old or new Teſtament, hee ſhould expreſſe or write it in the ſelfe ſame words: for it is ſufficient, that the ſenſe be faithfully retained, and the true propriety of the word obſerved, and ſo to eſchew the cavillings of all men, ſaving ſuch as will finde fault in that, which in the leaſt part cannot be followed nor obſerved. Being therefore perſwaded, that neither hee himſelfe will be offended, nor the Reader miſlike, if the ſentences in the Bible, bee tranſlated according to the Hebrew, as concerning the old Teſtament, and according to the Greeke, as touching the new Teſtament: I have adventured to avouch the authorities of Scriptures in another order (as concerning the words) than they are alleaged in this booke of Inſtitutions. And therefore ſometimes that which is recited in the third perſon, this Table doth expreſſe in the ſecond, and ſo contrariwiſe: but yet ſo, that the ſenſe and meaning is alwaies reſerved, which thing every man ſhall eaſily perceive, if diligently and without haſty judgement, hee doe conferre every thing together: for elſe curious heads doe looſe that fruit, which by adviſed reading they might have and receive. And as concerning the names and numbers of the bookes, and of the Chapters of the old Teſtament, we have not followed the common tranſlation, but that which is moſt agreeable to the Hebrew. And therefore we doe advertiſe the readers, that they doe not take the firſt booke of the Kings, for the firſt of Samuel: nor the ſecond of Kings for the ſecond of the ſame Prophet: which is ſo done by them, who heretofore have quoted the Chapters in this imprinted booke, becauſe they followed the Concordances of the Bible, called the great Concordances, which is collected according to the common tranſlation: and by that meanes, as it may evidently appeare to all men, ſome bookes of the old Teſtament are not lightly intituled: and the Pſalmes otherwiſe and in another order divided, than did the Hebrewes. And foraſmuch as all the principall points of religion are in this Booke copiouſly and faithfully expounded, we may eaſily refute the falſe opinions of the Adverſaries. Whoſoever ſhall come to the reading thereof, either with the minde to learne or a deſire to profit: there is no doubt, but he ſhall very much profit himſelfe, and helpe others: whoſe conſciences he may ſo ſtrengthen and aſſure, as they neede not to quaile in any point, becauſe they be aſſured, that their Faith is grounded upon the firme foundation of the Prophets and Apoſtles, who wrote and ſpake, being inſpired by the holy Ghoſt, who hath willed and commanded his moſt precious and deare word, to be read, heard, and handled, in all feare and reverence, without adding thereunto, or taking from the ſame: leaſt wee be worthily reproved of our folly. Let us therefore, in all ſimplicity and feare of God, read ſo wholſome and neceſſary things, and daily proceed therein, in the grace and knowledge of God, who onely is the Saviour, head and Doctor of the Church: To whom now and for ever be all glory. 29 And alwaies thou shalt suffer reproch, and thou shalt bee oppressed by violence, neither hast thou any to deliver thee. 4.20.25.

36 The Lord shall leade thee and the King which thou doest ordaine over thee, into a nation which thou doest not know, neither thy father, &c. 2.11.1.
65 For the Lord shall give unto thee a fearefull heart, and failed eies, and a soule consumed with griefe. 2.4.6.
29.2 Yon have seene all that the Lord did before you in the land of Egypt, &c. 2.2.20.
4 And the Lord gave not unto you an understanding heart, and seeing eyes, and eares which might heare, untill this present day 2.2.20.
18 Lest there bee amongst you a man or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart this day is contrary from the lord our God, that it should goe and serve, &c. 3.17.5.
19 And when he hath heard the words of this oath, he blesse himselfe in his heart, saying: Peace shall be unto me, and I will walke in the wickednesse of my heart: and so he take with drunkennesse thirst. 3.17.5.
20 And the Lord shal not forgive him, but then most of all shall his rage fume, & his zeale against that man, and all the curses shall light upon him that are written in this book, &c. 3.3.7.
29 The secret things belong unto our Lord God, but those that bee manifest unto us and our children for ever, that wee may doe every thing of this law. 1.17.2.&.3.21.3.
30.2 And thou shalt returne unto him, and thou shalt be obedient vnto his government, as I have commanded thee this day, with thy children, &c. 3.3.6.
3 The Lord thy God shall bring thee backe from thy captivity, and he shall have mercy of thee, and hee shall gather thee together againe from amongst all the nations amongst whom he had scattered thee. 4.1.24.
6 The Lord thy God will circumcise thy heart, and the heart of thy seed that thou maist love the Lord thy God, &c. 2.5.8.& 2.5.12.& 3.3.6.& 4.16.3.
10 If thou shalt for all this heare the voice of the Lord thy God, and shall keep his precepts and ceremonies which bee commanded in this law, &c. 1.7.5.
11 The commandement that I doe command thee this day is not above thee, neither a farre off. 2.5.12.
13 Neither is it set beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say: who of us shall goe over the sea & fetch it us, that we may heare it? 2.5.12
14 But the word is very neere unto thee, in thy mouth and heart, that thou majest do it. 2.5.12.& 3.24.3.
15 Consider that this day I have put before thy sight life and good, and contrariwise, death and evill. 3.17.1.
19 I doe call heaven and earth this day to witnesse, that I have put before you, life and good, blessing and cursing: choose therefore life that thou mayest live and thy seed. 2.5.4 & 2.7.3.
32.5 They have corrupted themselves toward him by their vice, not being his children, but a froward and crooked generation 1.8.6.

17 All people before him be as nothing, and they are counted to him lesse than nothing and vanity. 3.2.25.
18 To whom therefore will you make God like? or what image will you set us like him? 1.11.1.12.
21. Hath not this beene shewed you from the beginning of things? have you not beene taught by the foundations of the earth? 1.11.4. & 1.14.1.
22. Who sitteth upon the circle of the earth, &c. 1.5.5.
29. Hee giveth rather strength to the weary, and unto him that might faileth, hee doth increase power. 2.2.10.
41.7 So the workman comforted the founder, and hee that smote with the hammer him that smote by course, saying. It is ready for the sodering: and he fastened this image with nailes, that it should not bee moved out of his place. 1.11.2.
9 I have chosen thee and not cast thee away. 3.21.5.
29 Behold they are all vaine, and their works be nothing, their images are wind and confusion. 1.11.2.
42.1 Behold my servant, I will stay upon him, &c. 2.14.2.
8 I will not give my glory to another, nor my prayers to carved images. 1.13.9.
9 Behold the former things have come to passe, and I shew new things, the which I declared unto you before they hapned. 1.8.7.
10 Sing unto the Lord a new song, sing forth his praise even unto the outmost parts of the earth. 3.20.28.
13 The Lord shall goe forth as a Giant, hee shall stir up his courage like a man of warre. 4.19.34.
43.1 Feare not, for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine. 3.2.31
10 You are my witnesses, saith the Lord, and my servant, whom I have chosen: therefore yee shall know and beleeve mee, and yee shall understand that I am: Before mee there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me. 1.7.5.
11 I, I say, I am the Lord, and besides mee there is no Saviour. 3.4.15.
25 I my selfe am even he, which doe blot out thy transgressions, and that for mine owne sake, and I will not be mindfull of thy sinnes. 1.13.12. & 3.4.15.25. & 3.20.45
44.3. I will powre out waters upon the thirsty, and flouds upon the dry ground, that is, I will powre out my spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thy buds. 2.2.10. & 3.1.3. & 3.2.39.
6 I am the first and I am the last, and besides me there is no God. 1.13.23.24.
12 The Smith taketh an instrument and worketh in the coales, and fashioneth it with hammers, and worketh it with the strength of his arme: but hee hungreth in the meane time, so that his strength faileth, neither drinketh he water, so that he falleth downe weary. 1.11.4.
22 I have put away thy transgression as mists, and thy sinnes as a cloud, returne therefore unto mee, because I have redeemed thee. 3.4.29.
45.1 Thus saith the Lord God unto Cyrus, his annointed, whose right hand I have holden, that I might subdue nations before him: Therefore will I weaken the loynes of Kings, and open the doores before him, and the gates shall not be shut. 1.8.7.
7 Making light, and creating darknesse, making peace, and creating evill: I the Lord doe all these. 1.17.8. & 1.18.3.
9 Woe be to him that striveth with his Maker, the potsheard with the potsheards of the earth, shall the clay say unto him that fashioneth it, what makest thou? or thy worke, it hath no hands? 1.11.2.
23 Every knee shall bow unto mee, and every tongue shall sweare by my name. 1.13.11. & 1.13.23. & 3.5.8. & 3.25.7.

25 The whole seed of Israel shall bee justified and glorified in the Lord. 1.13.2. & 3.14. 16.

46.5 To whom will you make me like, or equall me, or compare me, that I should be like unto him? 1.11.2.

47.6 I truly was angry with my people, that I did prophane my inheritance. 3.4. 32.

48.10 Behold, I have fined thee, but not as silver: I have chosen thee, approved in the fornace of affliction. 3.4.32.

16 The Lord God and his spirit sent me. 1. 13.14.

23 And Kings shall be thy nurse-fathers, and Queenes thy nurses, &c. 4.20.5.

51.6 The heavens shall vanish away like smoake, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall in like manner perish, but my salvation shall continue for ever, and my righteousnesse shall not faile. 2.10.15.

52.1 Arise: arise: put on thy strength O Sion: put on the garment of comlinesse O Ierusalem, the holy City: for henceforth there shall not come into thee the uncircumcised and unclean. 4. 1. 17. & 4. 5. 17.

3 You were sold for nought, and therefore shall be redeemed without mony. 3.4.25.

7 O how beautifull upon the mountaines bee the feet of them that declare and publish peace. 4. 3. 3.

53.1 Who hath beleeved our preaching? and the arme of the Lord unto whom hath it beene revealed. 1.7.5. & 3.22.10.

4 Whereas notwithstanding hee bore our infirmities, and carryed our griefes, but wee esteemed him plagued with the striking of God, and afflicted. 2.12. 4. & 3.4.27. & 4.17.17.

5 But hee was wounded for our transgressions, and was broken for our iniquities, the paine of our correction was put upon him, and by his wounds health is unto us. 2. 12. 4. & 2. 16. 5. & 2.16.9. & 2.17.4. & 3. 4.30

6 All wee like sheepe have strayed, every one hath followed his owne waies, and the Lord hath laid upon him the iniquity of us all. 2 16.6. & 3. 4. 29. & 3. 12.5. & 3.24 11.

7 He was punished and afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth, hee was led as a sheepe unto the slaughter, and hee was still as a Lambe before the shearers, and opened not his mouth 2.16.5.

8 Without delay and without judgement was he taken, and who shall shew his generation, for hee was cut out of the land of the living, 2.15.3.

10 Yet the Lord would breake him in weakening him, that when hee should make his soule an offring for sinnes, he might see his seed, &c. 2.7.2.

12 For he shall beare their iniquity. 2.16.5. & 3.11.8.

12 And hee was reckoned among the transgressors. 2.16.5.

10 Their watchmen are all blinde, they have no knowledge, they be dum dogs, &c. 4.9.3.

57.15 Thus saith the high and excellent, he that inhabiteth the eternitie, and whose name is holy, &c. 3.12.6.

58.5 Is

58.5 Is it such a fast that I have chosen, that a man should afflict his soule for a day that he should bow his head? &c. 4.12.19.
6 And doe not I choose rather this fast, to lose the bands of iniquity, &c. 3.3.6.
7 And hide not thy selfe from thine owne flesh. 3.7.6.
9 Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall heare: thou shalt cry, and he shall say, here I am. 3.20.14.
13 If thou turne away thy foot from the Sabbath, so that thou doe not thine owne will on my holy day, &c. 2.8.31. & 2.8.34.
59.1 Behold the Lords hand is not shortned, that he cannot save, neither is his eare heavie that he cannot heare. 3.11.21.
2 But your iniquities have separated betweene you and your God, and your sinnes hath hid his face from you that he will not heare. 2.12.1. & 3.11.21.
7 Their feet doe runne to evill, and they make haste to shed innocent bloud: the thoughts of them are vaine thoughts, desolation and destruction is is their paths. 2.3.2.
36 And when the Lord did see (and that being abashed and wondred) that there was none, that there was none I say, that would offer himselfe, he made his arme the safegard thereof, and his righteousnesse did sustaine it. 3.14.6.
17 He put on righteousnesse for a brest-plate, and the helmet of salvation on his head, &c. 1.11.12.
20 And the Redemptor shall come to Sion, and unto them that turne from their wickednesse in Jacob. 3.3.20.21.
21 My spirit which is upon thee, and my word which I have put in thy mouth, shall never depart out of thy mouth, nither out of the mouth of thy seed, &c. 1.7.4. & 1.9.1. & 4.1.5.
60.2 Behold, darknesse shall cover the earth, and amist the people, but the Lord shall rise upon thee, and his glory shall appeare upon thee. 2.3.1.
6 All they of Saba shall come, bringing gold and incense, and they shall shew forth the praises of God. 4.5.17.
7 All the sheepe of Cedar shall be gathered unto thee. 4.5.17.
19 The Sunne shall serve thee no more for day light, and the brightnesse of the Moone shall not shew to thee, &c. 2.2.10.
61.1 The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, for because the Lord anointed me, and sent me that I should shew glad things unto the weake, &c. 2.15.2. & 3.3.20. & 3.4.3. & 3.12.7.
3 And they shall be called trees of righteousnesse, and the planting of the Lord that he might be glorified. 3.14.16.
93.10 But they did rebell and vexed his holy spirit. 1.13.15.
16 For thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel knoweth us not, thou Lord art our Father, our Redeemer. 3.20.25.26.
7 O Lord, why hast thou made us to erre from thy wayes? why hast thou hardned our hearts that we should not feare thee? 2.4.4. & 3.3.21.
64.5 Behold, thou art angry because we have sinned. 3.20.8.
6 We have beene all as an uncleane thing, and all our righteousnesse is as a filthy cloth, and we all doe fade like a leafe, &c. 3.1.25.
65.1 I have beene sought of them that asked not: I was found of them that sought mee not, &c. 3.24.2.
2 I have stretched out my hands all the day to a rebellious people, which goe not in a good way. 3.24.16.
16 Hee that will blesse himselfe in the earth, shall blesse himselfe in the the true God: and he that will sweare, shall sweare by the true God, &c. 2.8.23.
24 It shall come to passe, that before they call, I will answer: and as yet they speaking, I will heare. 3.20.14.
25 They shall no more hurt or destroy in my holy mountaine, &c. 4.10.10.
66.1 Heaven is my throne, and the earth my foot stoole: where is that house therefore that you build for mee? and where is that place of my rest? 3.20.30. & 4.17.24.
2 But to whom shall I have regard, but unto him that is humble, and of a broken spirit, and who doth tremble at my Word? 3.12.6
22 For as the new heaven and the new earth that I will make shall remaine before mee, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and name continue. 2.10.22.
23 And there shall be continuall new Moones, and continuall Sabbaths, and all flesh shall come that it may worship before me. 2.8.30.
24 Their wormes shall not die, and their fire shall not be put out, and they shall be loathsome unto all flesh. 3.25.112.

Jeremie.

1.6. O Lord God, behold, I cannot speake, for I am a childe. 4.8.3.

9 Behold, I have put my word into thy mouth. 4.8.3.
10 Behold, this day have I set thee over the nations and over kingdomes, to plucke up and to roote out, and to destroy and scatter, that thou maiest build and plant. 4.8.3.
2.13 For my people have committed two evils, they have forsaken me the fountaine of living waters, to dig them pits, even broken pits that can hold no waters. 3.20.14.
3.1 They say, if a man put away his wife, and she goe from him, and become another mans, &c. 2.8.18. & 4.1.25.
2 Lift up thy eyes unto the high places, and behold where thou hast not played the harlot, &c. 2.8.18.
12 Goe and crie these words towards the North, and say: thou disobedient Israel, returne saith the Lord: & I will not let my wrath fall upon you, for I am mercifull, &c. 4.1.25.
4.1 O Israel, if thou returne, returne unto me saith the Lord, and if thou put away thine abhominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not remove. 2.5.10. & 3.3.6.
4 Breake up your fallow ground, and sow not among thornes: bee circumcised to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your hearts, ye men of Iudah, and inhabitants of Ierusalem, &c. 2.5.8. & 3.3.6,7. & 4.16.21.
9 And in that day, saith the Lord, the heart of the king shall perish, and the heart of the princes, and the priest shall be astonished, and the Prophets shall wonder. 4.9.6.
11 At that time shall it be said to this people, and to Ierusalem, a dry winde in the high places of the wildernesse, commeth toward the daughter of my people, &c. 1.16.7.
14 O Ierusalem, wash thine heart from wickednesse, &c. 2.5.8.
5.3 O Lord, are not thy eies upon the truth? thou hast stricken them but they have not sorrowed: thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction: they have made their faces harder than a stone, and have refused to turne. 3.4.35. & 3. 14.8.
7 How should I spare thee for this? thy children have forsaken me, and sworne by them that are no Gods, &c. 2.8.23.
14 Because ye speake such words, behold, I will put my word into thy mouth, like a fire, and this people shall bee as wood, and it shall devour them. 3.24.13
6.13 For from the least of them, even to the greatest of them, every one is given to covetousnesse: and from the Prophet even to the Priest, they shall deale falsly. 4.9.3.
7.4 Trust not in lying words, saying, the Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord: this is the Temple of the Lord. 4.2.3.
5 For if you amend and redresse your waies, and your workes, if you execute judgement betweene a man and his neighbour, &c. 3. 17.11
13 Therfore now because ye have done all these works, saith the Lord, and I rose up early and spake unto you: but when I spake, you would not heare mee, neither when I called would ye answer. 2.5.11.
14 I will doe unto this house, whereupon my name is called, &c. as I have done unto Shilo. 2.5.11.
22 For I spake not unto your Fathers nor commanded them, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt offrings and sacrifices. 4.10.15.
23 But this thing commanded I them, saying obey my voice, so I will be your God, &c. 4.10.15.17.
27 Therefore shalt thou speake all these words unto them, but they will not heare thee: thou shalt also cry unto them, but they will not answer thee. 2.5.11.
28 This is a nation that heareth not the voice of the Lord their God, nor receiveth discipline. 2.5.11.
9.32 Let not the wise man glory in his wisdome, nor the strong man glory in his strength neither the rich man glory in his riches. 3. 13.1.
24 But let him that glorieth, glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, for I am the Lord which shewe th mercy and judgement, and righteousnesse in the earth, &c. 1.10.2.
10.2 Bee not afraid for the signes of heaven, though the heathen be afraid of them. 2. 16.3
8 But altogether they dote and are foolish, for the stocke is a doctrine of vanity. 1.11.5.
11 The Gods that have not made the heavens and the earth, shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens. 1.13.23.
23 O Lord, I know the way of man is not in himselfe, neither is it in man to walke and to direct his steps. 2.16.6.
24 O Lord correct mee, but with judgement not in thine anger, least thou bring me to nothing. 3.4.32.

11.7 For I have protested unto your fathers when I brought them up out of the land of Egypt unto this day, rising early, and protesting, saying, obey my voyce. 3.20.7. & 4. 10.17.

8 Neverthelesse they would not obey, nor encline their eare, &c. therefore I will bring upon them all the words of this covenant, which I command them to doe, &c. 3.20.7

11 Behold, I will bring a plague among them which they shall not bee able to escape, and though they cry unto me, I will not heare them. 3.20.7.

19 Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof, and cut him out of the land of the living &c. 4.17.15.

12.16. And if they will learne the waies of my people, to sweare by my name, the Lord liveth, as they taught my people to sweare by Baal, &c. 2.8.23.

14.7 O Lord though our iniquities testifie against us, deale with us according to thy name: for our rebellions are many: we sinned against thee. 3.20.8.

14 The Prophets prophecie lies in my name, I have not sent them, neither did I command them, &c. 4.9.3.

15.1 Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet mine affection could not be toward this people: cast them out of my sight and let them depart. 3.20.23.

17.1 The sinne of Iudah is written with a pen of iron, and with a point of a Diamond, and graven upon the table of your heart, and upon the hornes of your altars. 3.4.29.

5 Thus saith the Lord, cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arme, and withdraweth his heart from the Lord. 2.2.10.

9 The heart is deceitfull and wicked above all things, who can know it. 2.3.2.

21 Take heede to your soules, and beare no burden on the Sabbath day, nor bring it in by the gates of Ierusalem. 2.8.29

22 Neither carry forth burdens out of your houses on the Sabbath day, neither doe you any worke, but sanctifie the Sabbath, &c. 2.8.29

27 But if you will not heare me to sanctifie the Sabbath day, and not to beare a burden nor to goe through the gates, &c. 2.8.29.

18.8 But if this nation against whom I have pronounced, turne from their wickednesse, I will repent of the plague that I thought to bring upon them. 1.17.12.

18 Come and let us imagine some devise against Ieremias: for the law shall not perish from the Priest, nor counsell from the wise, nor the word from the Prophet. 4.9.5

20.2 Then Pashur smote Ieremias the Prophet, and put him in the stockes that were in the high gate of Benjamin, which was by the house of the Lord. 4.9.6.

21.12 Execute judgement in the morning and deliver the oppressed out of the hand of the oppressor, &c. 4.20.9.

22.3 Execute yee judgement and righteousnesse, and deliver the oppressed from the hand of the oppressor, &c. 4.20.9

23.1 Woe be unto the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheepe of my pasture, saith the Lord. 4.9.3.

5 Behold, the daies come saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch and a king shall raigne and prosper, and shall execute judgement and justice in the earth. 2.6.3

6 And this is the name whereby they shall call him the Lord our righteousnesse. 1.13.9. & 3.11.8.

16 Heare not the words of the Prophets that prophecy unto you and teach you vanity, &c 4.9.2.

24 Doe not I fill heaven and earth, saith the Lord. 4.1.5.

28 The Prophet that hath a dreame, let him tell a dreame, and he that hath my word, let him speake my word faithfully. 4.8.3.

24.7 And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the Lord, and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, for they shall return unto me with their whole heart 2.2.20.

25.11 And this whole land shall be desolate, and astonished, and these nations shall serve the King of Babel seventy yeeres. 1.8.7.

12 And when the seventy yeeres are accomplished, I will visit the king of Babel, and that nation, saith the Lord, for their iniquity, &c. 1.8.7.

29 For lo, I begin to plague the city, where my name is called upon, and should you goe free? &c. 3.4.34.

27.5 I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground, &c. 4. 4.20.27.

6 But now I have given all these lands unto the hand of Nabuchadnezzer the king of Babylon my servant, &c. 4.20.27.28.

7 And all nations shall serve him, and his son and his sons son untill the very time of his land come also, &c. 4.20.27

8 And.

8 And the nation and kingdome which will not serve the same Nebuchadnezzar king of Babel, and that will not put their neck under the yoke of the king of Babel, &c. 4.20.27.

9 Therefore heare not your prophets, nor your Soothsayers, nor your dreamers, nor your Inchanters, nor your Sorcerers which say unto you thus, ye shall not serve the king of Babel, &c. 4.9.3.

24 Therefore heare not the words of the Prophets that speake unto you saying, yee shall not serve the king of Babel, &c. 4.9.3.

17 Heare them not, but serve the king of Babel, that ye may live, &c. 4.20.28.

29.7 And seeke the prosperity of the city, whether I haved caused you to bee carried away captives, and pray unto the Lord for it, for, &c. 4.20.28.

31.18 I have heard Ephraim lamenting this, thou hast corrected me & I was chastised as an untamed calfe: convert thou me and I shall be converted: for thou art the Lord my God. 2.3.5. & 3.5.8. & 3.24.15.

19 Surely after that I converted, I repented, and after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh, &c. 2.5.8.

31 Behold the daies come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Iudah. 2.11.7. & 3.4.29.

32 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, when I tooke them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt, the which my covenant they brake, &c. 2.5.9. & 2.11.7.

33 After those daies saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. 2.8.14. & 3.20.45.

34 For I will forgive their iniquity, and will remember their sins no more. 3.4.29. & 3.20.45.

35 Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the Sun for a light to the day, and the course of the Moone and of the Stars, for a light to the night, &c. 4.17.17.

32.16 Now when I shall deliver the booke of the profession unto Baruch, the sonne of Neriah, I prayed unto the Lord saying. 3.20.15.

18 Thou shewest mercy unto thousands, and recompensest the iniquitie of the fathers into the bosome of their children after them, &c. 2.8.19.

23 But they obey not thy voice, neither walked in thy lawes all that thou commandest them to doe, they have not done, therefore thou hast caused this whole plague to come upon them, &c. 2.5.11.

39 And I will give them one heart and one way, that they may feare me for ever, for the wealth of thee, and of their children after them, &c. 2.3.8.

33.8 And I will cleanse them from all their iniquity whereby they have sinned against me: yea I will pardon all their iniquities, whereby they have sinned against me, &c. 3.10.45. & 4.1.20 16 And in those dayes shall Iudah be saved, and Ierusalem shall dwell safely, and be that shall call her is the Lord our righteousnesse, &c. 1.13.9.

MATTHEW.

1.5 AND Salomon begat Booz of Rachab, and Booz begat Obed of Ruth, and Obed begat Iesse. 2.13.3.
16 And Iacob begat Ioseph the husband of Marie, of whom was borne Iesus which is called Christ. 2.13.3.
21 And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Iesus, for he shall save his people from their sinnes. 2.6.1.
23 Behold, a virgin shall be with childe, and shall bear a sonne, and they shall call his name Emanuel, which is by interpretation God with us. 2.12.1.
2.6 And thou Bethleem in the land of Iuda art not the least among the princes of Iuda: for out of thee shall come the gouvernour that shall feede my people Israel 2.14.7.

3.2 Iohn said, repent: for the kingdome of heaven is at hand. 3.2.6. & 3.3.5. & 3.3.19.

6 And they were baptised of him in Iordan, confessing their sinnes. 3.4.6. & 4.15.6. & 4.16.24.

11 Indeed I baptize you with water to amendement of life, &c. 4.11.6. & 4.15.8. & 4.16.25.

12 Which hath his fanne in his hand, and will make cleane his floore, and gather his wheat into his garner, but will burne up the chaffe with unquenchable fire. 3.25.12. & 4.1.13. & 4.1.19.

13 Then came Iesus from Galilee to Iordan unto Iohn, to be baptized of him. 4.15.6. & 16.27

15 Let be now: for thus it becommeth us to fulfil all righteousnesse. So he suffered him. 2.16.5.

16 And Iohn saw the spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting up him. 1.11.3. & 4.17.21. & 4.19.20.

17 And lo, a voice came from heaven saying: this is my beloved sonne, in whom I am well pleased. 2.16.11. & 3.2.32. & 3.8.1. & 3.24.5.

4.2 And when he had fasted forty daies and fortienights, he was afterwards hungry. 4.12.20.

3 Then came to him the tempter, and said, if thou be the Sonne of God, command that these stones be made bread. 3.20.46.

4 Man shall not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. 3.20.44.

10 Then said Iesus unto him, avoid Satan: for it is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God and him only shalt thou serve. 1.12.3.

11 Then the devill left him: and behold the angels came and ministred unto him. 1.14.6.

17 From that time Iesus began to preach, and to say, Amend your lives for the kingdome of heaven is at hand. 2.9.2. & 3.3.2 & 3.3.19.

19 Follow me and I will make you fishers of men. 4.16.31.

5.3 Blessed are the poore in spirit, for theirs is the kingdome of heaven. 3.17.10

4 Blessed are they that mourne, for they shall be comforted. 3.8.9.

8 Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. 3.25.6.

10 Blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousnesse sake: for theirs is the kingdome of heaven. 2.8.7.

12 Rejoyce and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven, &c. 3.18.1.

13 Ye are the salt of the earth, &c. 4.3.3. & 5.14. & 4.8.4.

14 Ye are the light of the world, &c. 4.3.3. & 4.5.14. & 4.8.4.

15 Neither doe men light a candle and put it under a bushell, but on a candlesticke, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house 1.11.4.

16 Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorifie your father which is in heaven. 3.16.3.

17 Thinke not that I am come to destroy the law or the Prophets. I am not come to destroy them, but to fulfill them. 2.7.14.

19 Whosoever therefore shall breake one of these least commandements, & teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdome of heaven: but whosoever shall observe, &c. 2.8.59.

21 Ye have heard, that it was said unto them of the old time, thou shalt not kill: for whosoever killeth shall be culpable of judgment 4.20.10.

22 But I say unto you, whosoever is angry with his brother unadvisedly shall be culpable of judgement, &c. 2.8.7. & 2.8.39.

25 Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him least, &c. 3.5.7.

26 Verily I say unto thee, thou shalt not come out thence, till thou hast paied the uttermost farthing. 3.5.7. & 3.25.6.

28 Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. 2.8.7.

34 Sweare not at all neither by heaven, &c. 2.8.26. & 4.13.12.

39 But I say unto you, resist not evill: but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheeke, turne to him the other also. 4.20.19. & 4.20.20.

45 That ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to arise on the evill, and on the good, &c. 3.20.15. & 3.24.16. & 3.25.9.

46 For if you love them which love you, what reward shall you have? doe not the publicans even the same? 2.8.58.

6.2 Therefore when thou givest thine almes thou shalt not make a trumpet to be blowne before thee, as the hypocrites doe in the synagogues, and in the streets, to be praised

of

of men, Verily I say unto you, they have their reward. 3.7.2.
6 But when thou prayest enter into thy chamber: and when thou hast shut the doore, pray to thy father which is in secret, &c. 3.20.29.
7 Also when you pray, use no vaine repetitions as the heathen, for they think to be heard, for their much babling. 3.20.29.
9 After this manner therefore pray ye, Our father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name, &c. 3.10 6. & 3.20.34
11 Give us this day our daily bread. 2.5.14.
12 And forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors. 3.4.38. & 4.1.13.
21 For where your treasure is there will your heart be also. 3.2.25. & 3.18.6. & 3. 25.1.
23 But if thine eie be wicked, then all thy body shall be darke. Wherefore if the light which is in thee be darkenesse, how great is that darkenesse? 3.2.25.
7.7 Aske, and it shall be given you: seek, and ye shall find: knocke, and it shall be opened unto you. 3.20.13.
11 If ye then which are evill, can give to your children good gifts, how much more shall your father which is in heaven, give good things to them that aske him. 3.20. 36.
12 Therefore, whatsoever yee would that men should doe unto you, even so doe yee to them. For this is the law & the prophets. 2.8.53.
15 Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. 4.9.4.
8.4 Then Iesus said unto him, see thou tell no man: but goe, and shew thy selfe unto the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded, for a witnesse to them. 3.4. 4.
10 And when Iesus heard this, hee marvelled, and said to them which followed him: verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith even in Israel. 3.2.13.
11 Many shall come from the East and from the West, and shall sit downe with Abraham, and Isaac and Iacob, in the kingdome of heaven. 2.10.23. & 4.16.13.
12 And the children of the kingdome shall be cast out into utter darkenesse: there shall bee weeping and gnashing of teeth. 3.25. 12.
13 Then Iesus said unto the Centurion goe thy waies, and as thou hast beleeved, so be it unto thee. And his servant was healed the same houre. 3.10.11.
29 Iesus the sonne of God, what have we to doe with thee? art thou come hither to torment us before the time? 1.14.19.
9.2 And loe, they brought to him a man sicke of the palsie lying on a bed, and Iesus seeing their faith, said to the sicke of the palsie; sonne be of good comfort, thy sinnes are forgiven thee. 3.2.13. & 3.4.35. & 3. 20.9.
3 Certaine of the Scribes said within themselves, this man blasphemeth. 1. 13.12.
4 But when Iesus saw their thoughts, &c. 1.13.12.
5 For whether is it easier to say, Thy sinnes are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk. 4.19.29
6 And that yee may know that the sonne of man hath authority to forgive sinnes in earth, then said he to the sick of the palsie, arise, take up thy bed and goe to thy house. 1.13.12.
12 The whole needs not a phisitian, but they that are sicke. 2.12.4.
13 For I am not come to call the righteous, but the sinners to repentance. 3.3.20. & 3. 12.7. & 3.14.5.
15 Can the children of the marriage chamber mourne, as long as the bridegroome, &c. 3. 3.17. & 4.12.17.
29 Then touched he their eies, saying according to your faith, be it unto you. 3.2.43. & 3.4.22. & 3.20.11. & 4.19.18.
34 But the Pharises said he casteth out devils through the prince of the devils. 3. 3.22.
35 And Jesus went about all cities, and townes preaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospell of the kingdome, &c 2.9.2.
10.1 And he called his twelve disciples unto him, and gave them power against unclane spirits, &c. 4.3.5.
5 Goe not into the way of the gentiles and into the cities of the Samaritans enter ye not. 2.11.12.
8 Heale the sicke: cleanse the leapers, raise up the dead, cast out devils, &c. 1.13. 13.
18 And ye shall be brought to the governors and kings for my sake, in witnessing to them and to the Gentiles. 3.4.4.
20 For it is not ye that speake, but the spirit of your father that speaketh in you. 4.19.8.

28 And

28 And feare ye not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soule: but rather feare him which is able to destroy both soule and body in hell. 1.15.3.& 3. 25.7.

29 Are not two sparrowes sold for a farthing and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your father? 1.16.1.& 1.16.5. & 1.17.1.

30 Yea, and all the haires of your head are numbred. 1.16.2.

32 Feare ye not therefore, yee are of more value than many sparrowes. 1.17.6.

33 But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my father which is in heaven. 4.1.26.

11.10 For this is he of whom it is written: behold, I send my messenger before my face which shall prepare thy way before thee. 3.3.19.

11 Among them which are begotten of women, arose there not a greater than Iohn Baptist: notwithstanding he that is least in the kingdome of heaven, is greater than he, 2.9.5.

13 For all the Prophets and the Law prophecied unto Iohn. 2.11.5.10.

23 And thou Capernaum, which art lifted up unto heaven, shalt be brought downe to hell: for if the great works which haue beene done in thee, had beene done among them of Sodome, they had remained to this day. 3.24.15.

25 At that time Iesus answered and said: I give thee thanks, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise, and men of understanding, & hast opened them unto babes. 3.2.34.

27 Neither knoweth any man the father, but the son, and he to whom the Sonne will reveale him. 4.8.5.

28 Come unto me all ye that be weary and laden, and I will ease you. 3.3.20.& 3.4. 3.& 3.12.7.& 3.18.9.

29 Take my yoke on you, and learne of me that I am meeke and lowly in heart and ye shall finde rest unto your soules. 3.18.9.

30 For my yoke is easie, and my burden light 5.19.3.

12.24 But when the Pharisies hard it, they said, This man casteth the devils no otherwise out, but through Beelzebub the prince of devils. 3.3.22.

31 Every sinne and blasphemie shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemie against the holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. 1.13.15. & 2.3,21.& 3.3. 22.

22 And whosoever shall speake a word against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever shall speake against the holy Ghost it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. 3.5.7.

41 The men of Nineve shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemne it, for they repented at the preaching of Ionas, &c. 3.24.15.

43 Now when the unclean spirit is gone out of the man, he walketh through out drie places, seeking rest, and findeth none. 1.14. 14.& 14.19.

13.4 And as he sowed, some seeds fell by the way side, and the foules came and devoured them up. 3.22.10.& 4.14.11.& 4. 17.33.

5 And some fell upon stony ground where they had not much earth, and anon they sprung up, because they had no depth of earth. 4.17.33.

9 He that hath eares to heare, let him heare. 3.23.13.

11 Because it is given unto you to know the secrets of the kingdome of heaven, but unto them is not given. 1.7.5.& 3.24.13.

16 But blessed are your eies, for they see: and your eares, for they heare. 3.9.1.

17 For verily I say unto you, that many Prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seene them, &c. 2.11.6

24 The kingdome of heaven is like unto a man which soweth good seede in his field. 4.1.13.

29 But he said, nay: least while ye goe about to gather the tares, ye plucke up also with them the wheate. 4.12.11.

31 The kingdome of heaven is like unto a graine of mustard seede, which a man taketh and soweth in the field. 4.19.34.

33 Another parable spake he unto them, saying: the kingdome of heaven is like leven, which a woman taketh and hideth in three pecks of meale, till it be all leavened. 4.19.34.

39 And the enemy which soweth them, the devil, &c. 1.14.15

47 The kingdome of heaven is like unto a net that was cast into the sea, and gathereth of all kinde. 4.1.13.& 4.15.31.

14.25 And in the fourth watch of the night Iesus

Iesus went unto them, walking on the Sea. 4.17.29

15.3. Why doe yee also transgresse the commandement of God by your tradition? 4. 10.10

4 For God hath commanded, saying, honour thy father and mother, and he that curseth father and mother, let him die the death. 2.8.36

8 This people draweth neere unto mee with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is farre off from mee. 3.10.31

9 But in vaine they worship me, teaching for doctrines, mens precepts. 4.10.15.& 4. 10.23

13 Every plant which mine heavenly Father hath no planted, shall bee rooted up. 2.3.9. & 3.2.12.& 3.23.1.& 3.24.6

14 Let them alone, they bee blinde leaders of the blinde, and if the blinde lead the blinde, both shall fall in the ditch. 3.19.11.& 4. 9.12

24 I am not sent, but unto the lost sheepe of the house of Israell. 2.11.12

16.6 Take heed and beware of the leven of the Pharisees and Saducees. 4.10.26

12 Then understood they that he had not said that they should beware of the leven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and Saducees. 4.10.16

17 Thou art Christ the Sonne of the living God. 4.6.6

17 Blessed art thou Simon the Sonne of Jonas, for flesh and blond hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. 2.2.9.& 3.1.14.& 3.2.34

18 And I say also unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rocke I will build my Church. 4.6.3.& 4.6.5

19 And I will give unto thee the keyes of the kingdome of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt binde upon earth, shall bee bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on the earth shall be loosed in heaven. 3.4.12. & 4.1.22.& 4.2.10.& 4.6.4.& 4.11. 2.& 4.12.4

23 Get thee behinde me, Satan: thou art an offence unto me,&c. 4.7.28

24 If any man will follow me, let him forsake himselfe, and take up his crosse and follow me. 3.7.2.& 3.8.1

27 For the Sonne of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his Angels: and then shall he give to every man according to his deeds. 3.18.1

17.2 And he was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the Sunne, and his clothes were as white as the light. 4.17.17

5 While hee yet spake, behold, a bright cloud shadowed them; and behold, there came a voice out of the cloud, saying: this is my wellbeloved Sonne in whom I am well pleased, heare him. 2.15.2.& 3.2.32.& 3.8 1.& 3.20.48.& 4.8.1.& 4.8.7

18.10 For I say unto you, that in heaven their Angels alwaies behold the face of my Father which is in heaven. 1.14.7.& 1 14.9

11 For the Sonne of man is come to save that which was lost. 2.12.4

15 If thy brother trespasse against thee, goe tell him his fault betweene thee and him alone; if hee heare thee, thou hast wonne thy brother. 4.12.3

17 And if hee will not vouchsafe to heare them, tell it unto the church; and if he refuse to heare the Church also, let him bee unto thee as a heathen man, and as a Publican. 4.8.15.& 4.11.2.& 4.12.3

18 Verily I say unto you, whatsoever yee binde on earth, shall bee bound in heaven, and whatsoever yee loose on earth shall bee loosed in heaven. 3.4.12.& 3.4.20.& 4. 1.22. and 4.2.16 and 3.6.4. and 4.12.4. and 4.12.9

19 Againe verily I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree in earth upon any thing, whatsoever they shall desire, it shall be given them of my Father which is in Heaven. 3.20.30

20 For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them. 4.1.9. and 4.6.4. and 4.9.2

22 I say not to thee, untoo seven times; but unto seventy times seven times. 4.1.23

29 And his fellow therefore fell downe and besought him, saying, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. 4.1.23

19.6 Wherefore they are no more twaine, but one flesh; let not man therefore put a sunder that which God hath coupled together. 4.15.22

11 All men cannot receive this saying, save them to whom it is given. 2.8.42. and 4. 13.17

12 For there are some chaste, which were so borne of their mothers belly: and there bee some chaste which bee made chaste by men; and there bee some chaste which have made themselves chaste for the kingdome of heaven,&c. 2.8.42

13 Then were brought unto him little children, that hee should put his hands upon them, and pray: and the Desciples rebuked them. 4.16.7.

14 Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdome of heaven. 4.16.7. & 4.16.17. & 4.16.26.

15 And when he had put his hands on them, he departed thence. 4.3.16

17 There is none good but one, even God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keepe the Commandements. 1.13.13,24. & 3.18.9

18 Thou shalt not kill: thou shalt not commit adulterie: thou shalt not steale, &c. 2.8. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. &c. to the end of the Chapter.

19 Honor thy Father and thy Mother, &c. 2.8.12.35

21 If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell all that thou hast, and give to the poore, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, &c. 4.13.13.

25 And when his Disciples heard it: they were exceedingly amazed, saying, who then can be saved? 3.7.9.

26 And Iesus beheld them and said unto them: with men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible. 2.7.5.

28 And Iesus said unto them, verily I say to you: that when the Sonne of man shall sit in the throne of his majestie, ye which followed me in the regeneration, shall sit also upon twelve thrones: and judge the twelve tribes of Israel. 2.16.18. & 3.25.10

29 And whosoever shall forsake houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my names sake, he shall receive a hundred fold more, and shall inherit life everlasting. 3.25.10.

20.1 For the kingdome of heaven is like unto a certaine housholder, which went out in the dawning of the day, to hire labourers into his vineyard, 3.18.3

25 Ye know that the Lords of the Gentiles have domination over them, and they that are great, exercise authoritie over them. 4.11.8. & 4.11.9.

26 But it shall not bee so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your servant. 4.11.8.

28 Even as the Sonne of man came not to bee served, but to serve and to give his life for the ransome of many, 2.16.5.

21.9. Moreover, the people that went before and they also that followed cried, saying: Hosanna the Sonne of David : blessed bee he that commeth in the name of the Lord, &c. 2.6.4.

22 Whatsoever ye shall aske in prayer, if ye beleeve, ye shall receive it. 3.20.11.

25 The baptisme of Iohn whence was it? from heaven or of men? then they reasoned among themselves saying, if wee shall say from heaven, he will say unto us, why did ye not then beleeve him. 4.19.5.

31 Whether of them twaine did the will of the father: they said unto him, the first. Iesus said unto them, verily I say unto you that the Publicanes and the harlots shall goe before you into the kingdome of God. 2. 8.14. & 3.7.2.

22.2 The kingdome of heaven is like unto a certaine king, which married his Sonne. 3.24.8.

12 Friend how camst thou in hither, and hast not on a wedding garment? 4.17.45

13 Binde him hand and foote, take him away, and cast him into utter darkenesse: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. 3. 25.12.

14 For many are called, but few are chosen. 3.24.6.

23 The same day the Sadducees came to him, which say that there is no resurrection. 2. 10.23.

30 For in the resurrection, they neither marry wives, nor wives are bestowed in marriage, but are as the Angels of God in heaven. 1.14.9. & 1.15.3. & 2.12.6 & 3.25. 11. & 4.1.4.

32 I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Iacob: God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. 2.10 6. & 4.16.3.

37 Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soule, and with all thy minde. 2.8.11. & 2.8.51. & 3.3.11.

39 And the second is like unto this, thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. 2.8.11

23.4 For they binde heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on mens shoulders, but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers. 4.10. 1. & 4.10.16.

8 But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your doctor, to wit, Christ, and all yee are brethren. 4.8.8.

9 And call no man your father upon the earth: for there is but one, your father which is in heaven. 3.20.38.

23 And yee leave the weightier matters of the law, as judgment, and mercy, and fidelity, fidelity, these ought yee to have done, and not to have left the other. 2.8.52.

25 Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for yee make cleane the out side of the cup, and of the platter, but within they are full of bribery and excesse. 3.4.36.
37 Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the Prophets, and stonest them which are sent to thee: how often would I have gathered thy children together, &c. 3.24.16.
24.11 And many false Prophets shall arise, and shall deceive many. 4.9.4.
14 And this Gospell of the Kingdome shall be preached thorow the whole world, for a witnesse unto all Nations: and then shall the end come. 3.4.4.
24 For there shall arise false Christs, and false Prophets, and shall shew great signes and wonders: so that if it were possible, they should deceive the very elect. 4.0.4.
30 And then shall appeare the signe of the Sonne of man in heaven, and then shall all the kindreds of the earth mourne, and they shall see the sonne of man shall come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. 2.16.17.
36 But of that day and houre knoweth no man, no not the Angels of Heaven, but my Father onely. 1.14.9.
45 Who then is a faithfull servant, and wise, whom his Master hath made ruler over his houshold, to give them meat in season? 4.16.31.
25.3 The foolish tooke their lamps, but tooke not oyle with them. 3.5.7.
21 Then his Master said unto him, it is well done good servant and faithfull: thou hast beene faithfull in little, I will make thee ruler over much: enter into thy Masters joy. 2.3.11.
23 It is well done good servant and faithfull, thou hast bin faithfull in little, &c. 2.3.11.
29 For unto every man that hath, it shall bee given, and he shall have abundance; and from him that hath not, even that he hath, shall be taken away. 2.3.11. & 3.15.4.
31 And when the Sonne of man commeth in his glory, and all the holy Angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory. 2.16.17.
32 And before him shall be gathered all Nations, and he shall separate one from another, as a shepherd separateth his sheepe from the goats. 2.16.17. & 3.25.9.
34 Come yee blessed of my father, inherit the Kingdome prepared for you from the foundations of the world. 3.18.1. & 3.18.2. & 3.18.3. & 3.24.16.
35 For I was an hungred, and yee gave mee meat; I thirsted and ye gave me drinke, &c. 3.18.1.
43 Verily, I say unto you, in as much as yee have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, yee have done it to mee. 3.18.6.
41 Depart from mee yee cursed, into everlasting fire, which is prepared for the Devill and his Angels. 1.14.14. & 1.14.19. & 3.25.5.
46 And these shall goe into everlasting paine, and the righteous into life eternall. 3.25.5.
26.10 Why trouble yee the woman? for shee hath wrought a good worke upon mee. 3.25.8.
11 For yee have the poore alwayes with you, but me shall yee not have with you alwayes. 4.3.1. & 4.17.26. & 4.17.28.
12 For in that she powred this ointment upon my body, she did it to bury me. 3.25.8.
15 And he said to them, what will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? and they appointed unto him thirty peeces of silver. 4.18.14.
26 And as they did eat, Iesus tooke the bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to the Disciples, and said, take eat, this is my body. 4.14.20. & 5.16.30. & 4.17.1. & 4.17.20. & 4.19.23.
27 Also he tooke the cup, and when hee had given thanks hee gave it to them, saying, drinke yee all of it. 4.9.14.
38 Then said Iesus unto them, my soule is very heavy, even to the death; tarry ye here and watch with me. 2.16.12. & 3.8.9.
39 So he went a little further, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O my Father if it be possible let this cup passe from me, nevertheless not I as will, but as thou wilt. 2.16.12.
53 Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my father, and hee will give me more than twelve legions of Angels. 1.14.8.
74 Then began he to curse himselfe, and to sweare, saying, I know not the man. 4.1.26.
75 Then Peter remembred the words of Iesus, which said unto him, Before the Cocke crow thou shalt deny me thrice. So he went out, and wept bitterly. 3.3.4.
27.4 I have sinned betraying the innocent blood, but they said, what is that to us? see thou to it. 3.3.4.

12 And when hee was accused of the chiefe Priests and Elders, hee answered nothing. 2.16.5.
14 But he answered him not to one word, insomuch that the Governour marvelled greatly. 2.16.5.
23 Then said the Governour, but what evill hath he done? then they cryed the more saying, let him be crucified. 2.16.5.
24 When Pilate saw that he availed nothing, but that more tumult was made, he tooke water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just man, looke you to it. 2.16.5.
46 And about the ninth houre Iesus cryed with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, Lamasabachthani? that is, my God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? 2.16.11.
50 Then Iesus cried againe with a loud voice, and yeelded up the Ghost. 4.19.23.
52 And the graves did open themselves, and many bodies of the Saints, which slept, arose. 2.10.23. & 3.25.7.
53 And came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy City, and appeared to many. 2.10.23.
66 And they went and made the Sepulchre sure with the watch, and sealed the stone. 3.25.3.
28.5 But the Angell answered and said to the women, feare yee not, &c. 1.14.6.
6 He is not here, for he is risen, as he said, &c. 4.17.29.
7 Tell his Disciples that he is risen from the dead, &c. 1.24.6.
11 Now when they were gone, behold, some of the watch came into the City, and shewed unto the high Priests all the things that were done. 3.25.3.
12 And they gathered themselves together with the Elders, and tooke counsell, and gave large money to the souldiers 3.25.3.
13 Saying, Say, his Disciples came by night and stole him away while we slept. 3.25.5.
18 All power is given unto me in heaven and earth. 3.15.5.
19 Goe therefore and teach all Nations, Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost. 1.13.16. & 4.3.6. & 4.8.4. & 4.14.20. & 4.15. 6.18.20.22. & 4.16.27. & 4. 19.28.
20 I am with you alwayes untill the end of the world. 1.16.14. & 4.8.8. & 4.8.11. & 4.17.26. & 4.17.28. & 4.17.30.

MARKE.

1 THe beginning of the Gospell of Iesus Christ the Sonne of God. 2.9.2.
4 John did Baptize in the wildernesse, and preached the Baptisme of amendment of life for remission of sinnes. 3.3.19. & 4.19.17.
15 And saying, the time is fulfilled, and the Kingdome of God is at hand, repent and beleeve the Gospell. 3.3.19.
3.15 And that they might have the power to heale sicknesses, and to cast out Devils. 1.13.13
28 Verily, I say unto you, all sinnes shall bee forgiven unto the children of men, and blasphemies, wherewith they blaspheme. 3.5.7.
29 But hee that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall never be given, but is culpable of eternall damnation. 1.13.15. & 3.3.22.
6.7 And gave them power over uncleane spirits. 1.13.13.
13 And they cast out many Devils, and they anointed many that were sicke with oyle, and healed them. 4.19.18. & 4.19.21.
7.33 Then hee tooke him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers in his eares, and did spit, and touched his tongue. 4.19.23.
8.38 For whosoever shall bee ashamed of me, and of my words among this adulterous and sinfull generation, of him shall the Sonne of man be ashamed also, &c. 4.1.26.
9.24 Lord, I beleeve, helpe my unbeleefe. 4.14.7.
44 To goe into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched. 3.25.12.
44 Where their worme dieth not, and the fire never goeth out. 3.25.12.
10.9 Therefore what God hath coupled together, let no man separate. 4.1.1.
30 But hee shall receive an hundred fold now at this present: houses and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions: and in the world to come eternall life. 3.18.3.
11.24 Whatsoever yee desire when yee pray, beleeve that yee shall have it, and it shall be done unto you. 3.20.11.
12.18 Then came the Sadducees unto him (which say, that there is no resurrection) and they asked him, saying. 3.25.5.
13.32 But of that day and houre knoweth

no man, none the Angels which are in heaven, neither the Sonne himselfe, save onely the Father. 2.14.2

14.22 And as they did eat, Iesus tooke the bread, and when he had given thankes, he brake it and gave it to them, and said, take, eat: this is my bodie. 4.17.1. & 4.17.20

33 And hee tooke with him Peter, and James and John, and he began to be affraid, and in great heavinesse. 3.8.9

34 And said unto them, my Soule is very heavie even unto the death: tarrie here and watch. 2.16.12

15.28 Thus the Scripture was fulfilled which saith. And he was counted among the wicked. 2.16.5

16.9 He appeared first to Mary Magdalen, out of whom he had cast 7. devils. 1.14.14

15 Goe yee into all the world, and preach the Gospell to every creature. 4.3.4. & 4.3.12. & 4.16.27. & 4.19.28

16 He that shall beleeve and be baptised, shall be saved. 4.15.1. & 4.16.28

19 So after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was receiued into heaven, and sate at the right hand of God. 2.14.3. & 4.17.2.7

LUKE.

1.6 BOth were justified before God, and walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, without reproofe. 3.17.7

15 And he shall be filled with the holy Ghost, even from his mothers womb. 4.16.17.

17 For hee shall goe before him in the spirit and power of Elias: to turne the hearts of the Fathers to their children, and the disobedient to the wisdome of the just men, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord. 4.1.6

31 For lo, thou shalt conceive in thy wombe, and beare a Sonne, and shalt call his name Iesus. 2.16.1

32 He shall be great, and shall be called the Sonne of the most high, and the Lord shall give unto him the throne of his Father David. 2.14.4.7

33 And he shall raigne over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdome shall bee none end. 2.14.3. & 2.15.3

34 Then said Marie unto the Angell, how shall this be, seeing I know no man? 4.17.25

35 And the Angell answered, and said unto her, the holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the most high shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be borne of thee, shall bee called the Sonne of God. 2.14.5

43 And whence commeth this to me that the mother of my Lord should come to me? 2.14.4

54 He hath upholden Israel his servant, being mindfull of his mercie. 2.10.4

72 That he would shew mercie towards our Father, and remember his holy covenant. 2.10.4

73 And the oath which he sware to our Father Abraham. 2.10.4

74 That we being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, should serve him without feare. 3.16.2

77 And to give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sinnes. 3.11.22

79 To give light to them that sit in darknesse and in the shadow of death, and to guide our feet into the way of peace. 2.12.4

2.11 That is, that unto you is borne this day in the City of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. 2.15.5

13 And straight way there was with the Angel a multitude of heavenly souldiers, praising God, &c. 1.14.5

37 And shee was a widow about fourescore and foure yeeres, and went not out of the temple, and served God with fastings and prayers night and day. 4.12.16

52 And Iesus increased in wisedome and stature, and in favour with God and men. 2.14.2

3.3. And hee came into all the coasts about Jordan, preaching the baptisme of repentance for the remission of sinnes. 3.3.19. & 4.15.7. & 4.19.17.

8 Bring forth therefore fruites worthy amendment of life, and begin not to say with your selves, wee have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. 3.3.5

14 The souldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, and what shall we doe? and he said, unto them, doe violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely, and be content with your wages. 4.20.13

16 John answered, and said to them all, indeed I baptise you with water, but one stronger than I, commeth, whose shooes latchet I am not worthy to unloose: he will baptise you with the holy Ghost and with fire. 3.1.3.4.& 4.15.6.7

22 And the holy Ghost came downe in a bodily shape like a Dove, upon him, and there was a voice from heaven, saying, thou art my beloved sonne: in thee I am well pleased. 4.17.21

23 And Iesus himselfe began to bee about thirtie yeeres of age, being as men supposed the sonne of Ioseph, which was the sonne of Eli. 4.25.27.29

38 Which was the sonne of Enos, which was the sonne of Seth, which was the sonne of Adam, which was the sonne of God. 2.12 7.& 2.13.3

4.17 And there was delivered unto him the booke of the Prophet Esaias: and when hee had opened the booke, hee found the place where it is written. 4.19.23

18 The spirit of the Lord is upon me because he hath anointed me, that I should preach the Gospell to the poore: hee hath sent mee, that I heald heale the broken in heart. 2 15.3.& 3.3.20.&.3.4.3

5.13.14 And touched him, saying, I will, be thou cleane. And immediately the leprosie departed from him. And hee commanded him that he should tell it to no man: but goe saith hee, and shew thy selfe to the Priest, and offer for thy cleansing, as Moses hath commanded, for a witnesse unto them. 3 4.4

34 Can yee make the children of the wedding chamber fast, as long as the bridegroome is with them? 4.12.17

6.13 And when it was day hee, called his Disciples, and of them hee chose twelve, which also he called Apostles. 4.3.5

23 Rejoice yee in that day, and bee glad, for behold your reward is great in heaven, &c. 3.18.1

24 But woe be to you that be rich, for you have received your consolation. 3.19.9

32 Be ye mercifull therefore, as your father also is mercifull. 3.7.6

7.29 Then all the people that heard, and the Publicanes justified God, being baptised with the baptisme of Iohn. 3.11.3

35 But wisedome is justified of all her children. 3.11.3

36 And one of the Pharisees desired him that he would eate with him: and hee went into the Pharisees house, and sate downe at the table. 3.4.37

47 Wherefore I say unto thee, many sinnes are forgiven her: for shee loved much. To whom a little is forgiven, he doth love a little. 3.4.31

8.2 And certaine women, which were healed of evill spirits, and infirmities, as Marie which was called Magdalen, out of whom went seven devils. 1.14.14.

7 And some fell among thorns, and the thorns sprung up with it, and choaked it. 3.2.10

13 But they that are on the stones, are they which when they have heard, receive the word with joy, but they have no roots, which for a while believe but in the time of tentation goe away. 3.2.10

15 But that which fell on good ground, are they, which with an honest and good heart heare the word, and keepe it, and bring forth fruit with patience. 4.14.11

9.23 If any man will come after me, let him denie himselfe, and take up his crosse daily and follow me. 3.15.8

26 For whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, of him shall the sonne of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his glory, and in the glory of the Father, and of the holy Angels. 1.14.9

55 But Iesus turned about, and rebuked them, and said, ye know not of what spirit ye are. 3.20.15

10.1 After these things the Lord appointed other 70. also, and sent them two and two before him, &c. 4.3.4

6 And if the sonne of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him: if not, it shall returne to you againe. 3.23.14

16 He that heareth you, heareth me: and he that despiseth you despiseth me. 4.3.3.& 4.8.4

18 I saw Satan, like lightening, fall downe from heaven. 1.14.18

20 Nevertheless, in this rejoyce not, that the spirits are subdued unto you: but rather rejoyce because your names are written in heaven. 3.24.9

21 The same hour rejoyced Iesus in the spirit and said, I confesse unto thee Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and learned, and hast revealed them to babes, even so, father because so it pleased thee. 3.2.34

22 All things are given me of my father: and no man knoweth who the sonne is, but the father: neither who the Father is, save the sonne: and he to whom the son will reveale him. 3.2.1.and 4.18.20

23 Blessed are the eyes which see that ye see 2.9.1

24 For

24 For I tell you, that many Prophets and Kings have desired to see these things which yee see, and have not seene them, &c. 2.9. 1 & 2.11.6.

25 Master, what shall I doe, to inherit eternall life? 4.12.13

27 And he answered, and said, thou shalt love thy Lord God, with all thy heart, and with all thy soule, and with all thy strength, and with all thy thought, and thy neighbour as thy selfe. 2.8.11

30 And a certaine man went downe from Ierusalem to Iericho, and fell among theeves. 1.5.19

36 Which now of these three, thinkest thou was neighbour to him that fell among the theeves? 2.8.55

11.2 And he said unto them when yee pray, say, Our Father which art in Heaven. 3 20.6.& 3.20.24

3 Our daily bread give us for the day. 2.5. 14

21 When a strong man armed keepeth his place, the things that he possesseth are in peace. 1.14.13.& 1.4.18

22 But when a stronger than he commeth upon him, and overcommeth him, he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted and divideth his spoiles. 1.14.18

39 And the Lord said unto him, indeed yee Pharisees make cleane the outside of the cup, and of the Platter, but the inward part is full of ravening and wickednesse. 3.4.36

12.5 Feare him which after hee hath killed, hath power to cast into hell, &c. 1.15.2

10 And whosoever shall speak a word against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiven him: but unto him that shall blaspheme the holy Ghost, it shall never be forgiven. 1.13.15 & 3.3.21.22.& 3.5.7

14 Man, who made me a Iudge, or a divider over you? 4.11.9 & 4.11.11

14.21 Goe out quickly into the places and streetes of the Citie, and bring in hither the poore and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind. 4.16

15.7 I say unto you, that likewise joy shall bee in heaven for one sinner that converteth more than for nintie and nine just men, which need no amendment of life. 1.14.7

20 And when he was yet a great way off his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran and fell on his necke and kissed him. 3. 20 37

16.2 And he called him, and said unto him how is it that I heare this of thee? give an account of thy stewardship, for thou maiest be no longer Steward. 3.10.5

9 And I say unto you, make you friends with the riches of iniquitie, that when you shall want, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. 3.18.6

15 Yee are they which justifie your selves before men, but God knoweth your hearts, &c. 3.11.3.& 3.12.2

16 The law and the Prophets endured until Iohn, and since that time the kingdome of God is preached, and every man presseth into it. 2.7.16

22 And it was so, that the begger died, and was carried by the Angels into Abrahams bosome, &c. 1.14.7. & 1.15.2.& 3.25.6

17.3 If thy brother trespasse against thee, rebuke him: and if he repent, forgive him 3.7.6

4 And the Apostles said unto the Lord, increase our faith. 4.14.7

7 Who is it also of you, that having a servant plowing or feeding cattell, would say unto him by and by, when hee were come from the field, &c. 3.14.15

10 So likewise yee, when yee have done all these things which are commanded you, say, we are unprofitable servants, we have done that which was our dutie to doe. 3.14 14.& 3.15.3.

14 And when hee saw them, hee said unto them, goe shew your selves to the Priests. And it came to passe, that as they went, they were cleansed. 3.4.4

29 And when he was demanded of the Pharisees, when the Kingdome of God should come, he answered them and said the kingdome of God commeth not with observation. 2.15.4

18.1 And he spake also a parable unto them to this end, that they ought alwaies to pray, and not to wax faint. 3.20.7

13 But the Publican standing afarre off, would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven, but smote his breast, saying: O God, bee mercifull to mee a sinner. 3.4.18.& 3. 12.7

14 I tell you, this man departed to his house justified, rather than the other: for every man that exalteth himselfe, shal be brought low, and he that humbleth himselfe shall be exalted. 3.4.35.and 3.11.3

42 And Iesus said unto him receive thy sight, thy faith hath saved thee. 4.19.12

10.17 And hee said unto him, well, good servant, because thou hast bin faithfull in a very little thing, take thou authoritie over ten Cities. 2.3.11.& 3.15.4

26 Unto all them that have it shall be given, and from him that hath not even that hee hath shall bee taken from him. 2. 3. 11.& 3.15.4
20.27. Then came to him certaine of the Sadducees, which denie that there is any resurrection,&c. 2.10.23.& 3.25.5
37 And that the dead shall rise againe even Moses shewed it beside the Bush, when he said, the Lord is the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. 2.10.9
38 For he is not the God of the dead, but of them which live. 4.16.3
21.15 For I will give you a mouth and wisedome, where-against all your adversaries shall not be able to speake or resist. 4.3.12
28 And when these things begin to come to passe, then looke up and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth neere. 3.9.5
22.17 And hee tooke the Cup, and gave thankes, and said, take this and part it among you. 4.17.20.& 4.17.43.& 4.18.8
19 And he tooke bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave to them, saying, this is my body which is given for you : doe this in the remembrance of mee. 4.3.6.& 4.15.20.& 4.16.30.& 4 17.1.20.37
20 Likewise also after supper hee tooke the cup, saying, this cup is the new Testament in my blood, which is shed for you. 2.11.4. & 2.17.4.& 4.17.6.20
25 The kings of the Gentiles raigne over them, and they that beare rule over them : are called gracious Lords. 4.11.8.9.& 4.20.7
26 But yee shall not be so : but let the greatest among you, be as the least : and the chiefest as he that serveth. 4.11.8
32 But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith faile not,&c. 3.24.6.& 4.7.27.28
43 And there appeared an Angell unto him from heaven, comforting him. 1.14.6.& 2. 16.12
44 And his sweat was like drops of blood, trickling downe to the ground. 2.16.12.& 3.8.9
61 Then the Lord turned backe and looked upon Peter : and Peter remembred the word of the Lord, how hee had said unto him, before the Cocke crow, thou shalt denie me thrice. 3.4.35
62 And Peter went forth, and wept bitterly. 3.3.4
23.42 And he said unto Iesus, Lord remember mee, when thou commest into thy kingdome. 3.24.1.& 4.16.31
43 Then Iesus said unto him, verily I say unto thee, to day shalt thou bee with me in Paradise. 3.25.6
46 And Iesus cryed with a loud voice, and said, Father into thy hands I commend my spirit,&c. 1.15.2.& 3.25.6
24.5. They said unto them why seeke yee him that liveth among the dead? 1.14.6
6 He is not here, but is risen : remember how he spake unto you when hee was yet in Galile. 3.25.3
11 But their words seemed unto them a fained thing, neither beleeved they them. 3. 2.4
12 Then arose Peter, and ran unto the sepulchre, and looked in, and saw the linnen clothes laid by themselves : and departed wondring in himselfe at that which was come to passe, 3.2.4
16 But their eyes were holden, that they could not know him. 4.17.29
26 Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory? 2.17.6 & 3.18.7.& 4.17.32
27 And hee began at Moses, and at all the Prophets, and interpreted unto them in all the Scriptures the things that were written of him. 1.9.3.& 3.2.34
31 But hee was taken out of their sight. 4.17. 29
39 Behold mine hands and my feet : for it is my selfe : handle mee and see : for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see mee have. 2.14.2.& 3.25.3.& 4.17.29
44 All must be fulfilled which are written of mee in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes. 3.5.8
45 Then opened hee their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures. 3.2.34
46 Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise againe from the dead the third day. 2.12.4.& 3.3.19
47 And that repentance and remission of sins should bee preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. 2.12.4.& 3.3.1.& 3.3.19
49 But tarry yee in the Citie of Ierusalem, untill yee bee endued with power from on high. 4.3.12
51 And it came to passe, that as hee blessed them, he departed from them, and was carried up into heaven. 4.17.27

IOHN.

1.1 IN the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and that word was God. 1.13.6. & 13.11. & 1.13.22

3 All things were made by it, &c. 1.13.7 1.13.17.

4 In it was life, and the life was the light of men. 1.13.13. & 1.15.4. & 2.2.19. & 2.6.1. & 4.17.8

5 And the light shineth in the darknesse, and the darknesse comprehendeth it not. 2.2.12

9 That was the true light which lighteneth every man that commeth into the world, 2.12.4

10 Hee was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. 2.12.4

12 But as many as receive him, to them hee gave power to be the sonnes of God, even to them that beleeve in his name. 2.6.1. & 3.1.4. & 3.20.36. & 3.22.10

13 Which are borne not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. 2.2.19. & 2.13.2 & 3.1.4

14 And the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we saw the glorie thereof, as the glory of the onely begotten sonne of the father, full of grace and truth. 1.13.11. & 2.12.4. & 2.14.1. & 2.14.8

16 And of his fulnesse have all we received, and grace for grace. 2.13.1. & 2.15.5. & 3.11.9. & 3.20.1

17 For the law was given by Moses, but Grace and truth came by Iesus Christ, 2.7.16.

18 No man hath seene God at any time: the onely begotten sonne, which is in the bosome of the father, hee hath declared him. 1.13.17. & 2.2.20. & 2.9.1. & 4.17.30

23 I am the voice of him that cryeth in the wildernesse, make straight the way of the Lord, as said the Prophet Esaias. 2.9.5

29 Behold the Lambe of God which taketh away the sinnes of the world. 2.14.3. & 2.16.5. & 2.17.4. & 3.4.26. & 4.15.7

32 So Iohn beare witnesse saying, I saw the spirit come downe from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. 2.15.5. & 4.19.20

33 And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptise with water, hee said unto mee, upon whom thou shalt see the spirit come downe and tarry still on him, that is hee which baptiseth with the holy Ghost. 2.15.5

36 Behold the Lamb of God. 2.9.5

40 Andrew, Simon Peters brother, was one of the two which had heard it of Iohn, and that followed him. 4.6.5

42 And he brought them to Iesus, &c. 4.6.5

51 Hereafter shall yee see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the sonne of man. 1.14.12. & 2.9.3

2.2 And Iesus was called also, and his disciples unto the marriage. 4.13.3.

9 Now when the governour of the feast had tasted of the water that was made wine &c. 4.13.3

15 Then he made a scourge of small cords, and drave them all out of the Temple with the sheepe and oxen, and powred out the changers money, and overthrew the tables. 4.19.23

19 Iesus answered and said unto them, destroy this temple, and in three dayes I will raise it up againe. 2.14.4. & 3.25.7

21 But hee spake of the Temple of his body. 2.14.4. & 3.25.7

23 Now when he was at Ierusalem, at the Passeover in the feast, many beleeved in his name, when they saw the miracles which he did. 4.2.5

24 But Iesus did not commit himselfe unto them, because he knew them all. 3.2.12

3.3 Verily, Verily, I say unto thee except a man bee borne againe, hee cannot see the kingdome of God. 3.3.1. & 4.16.17.

5 Except that a man be borne of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdome of God. 4.16.15

6 That which is borne of the flesh, is flesh and that which is borne of the spirit, is spirit: 2.1.6. & 2.3.1

13 For no man ascendeth up to heaven, but he that hath descended from heaven, even the sonne of man which is in heaven. 2.14.2. & 4.17.30

14 And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wildernesse, so must the sonne of man be lift up. 2.14.4. & 4.18.20

16 For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten sonne, that whosoever beleeveth in him, should not perish, but have life everlasting. 2.12.4. & 3.16.4. & 2.17.1. & 3.14.17. & 3.24.5. & 3.24.7

23 And Iohn also baptised in Enon beside Salem, &c. 4.15.6

27 Man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven. 2.2.20

33 He that hath received his testimony hath sealed that God is true. 3.2.8

34 For hee whom God hath sent, speaketh the word of God: for God giveth him not the spirit by measure. 2.15.1.& 2.15.5
36 He that beleeveth in the Son, hath everlasting life: and hee that obeyeth not the Sonne, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. 4.16.31
4.1 Now when the Lord knew, that the Pharises had heard, that Iesus made and baptised moe disciples than Iohn. 4.15.6
14 But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shal never be more a thirst: but the water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water, springing out into everlasting life. 3.1.3
22 Yee worship that which yee knew not: we worship that which we know: for salvation is of the Iewes. 1.5.12.& 1.6.4.& 2.6.1
23 But the houre commeth, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth, &c. 3.20.30 & 4.10.14
24 God is a spirit, &c. 1.13.24
25 I know well that Messias shall come, which is called Christ: when he is come he will tell us all things. 2.15.1.& 4.8.7
35 Behold, I say unto you, lift up your eyes, and looke on the regions, for they are white already unto harvest. 4.16.31
42 And they said unto the woman, now wee beleeve not because of thy saying: for wee have heard him our selves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, that Saviour of the world. 3.2.5
53 Then the Father knew that it was the same houre in the which Iesus had said unto him, thy sonne liveth. And he beleeved and all his houshold. 3.2.5
5.8 Iesus said unto him, rise: take up thy bed, and walke. 4.19.29
17 My father worketh hitherto, and I work. 1.13.7.& 1.13.12.& 1.16.4.& 2.14.2
38 Therefore the Iewes sought the more to kill him: not onely because hee had broken the Sabbath: but said also that God was his father, and made himselfe equall with God. 1.13.12.
21 For like as the father raiseth up the dead, and quickneth them, so the sonne quickneth whom he will. 2.14.3
22 For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgement to the Sonne. 2 14.3.& 2.16.18
23 Because that all men should honour the Sonne, as they honour the Father: he that honoureth not the Sonne, the same honoureth not the Father, which hath sent him. 2.6.2.& 2.14.3
34 He that heareth my Word, and beleeveth in him that sent me, hath everlasting life: and shall not come into condemnation, but hath passed from death to life. 2.9.3.& 3.15.6 & 3.25.1,& 3.24.5.& 4.16.26
25 The houre shall come, and now is, when the dead shall heare the voice of the Sonne of God, and they that heare it, shall live. 2.5.19.& 2.12.4.& 3.14.5
26 For as the Father hath life in himselfe, so likewise hath he given to the Son, to have life in himselfe. 4.17.9
28 Marvell not at this, for the houre shall come in the which all that are in the graves shall heare his voyce. 3.25.4.& 3.25.7
29 And they shall come forth that have done good unto the resurrection of life: but they that have done evill, unto the resurrection of condemnation. 3.17.1
32 There is another that heareth witnesse of me, &c. 1.13.17
35 Hee was a burning, and a shining candle: and yee would for a season have rejoyced in his light. 2.9.5
36 For the worke which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I doe, beare witnesse of mee, that the Father sent me. 1.13.13
44 How can you beleeve, which receive honour one of another, and seeke not the honour that commeth of God alone? 3.11.9
46 For had ye beleeved Moses, ye would have beleeved me: for he wrote of me. 2.9.1
6.27 Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat that endureth unto everlasting life, which the Sonne of man shall give unto you, &c. 3.18.1.& 4.14.25
29 This is the worke of God, that yee beleeve in him whom he hath sent. 3.19.10
35 I am the bread of life: hee that commeth to mee shall not hunger, and hee that beleeveth in me shall never thirst. 3.24.5.& 4 17.4
37 All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me, and him that commeth to me, I cast not away. 3.22.7.& 3.24.6
38 For I came downe from heaven, not to doe mine owne will, but his will which sent me. 2.14.2
39 And this is the Fathers will, which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up againe at the last day. 3.22.7.& 3.22.10. & 3.24.6.& 3.24.7.& 3.25.8

40 And this is the will of him that sent me, that every man which seeth the Sonne, and beleeveth in him, should have everlasting life, &c. 3.20.10.& 3.24 6
44 No man can come unto me, except the Father which sent me draw him, and I will raise him at the last day. 2.2.20.& 2.5.5. & 3.2.34.& 3.22.7.& 3.24.1.
45 It is written in the Prophets, and they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father commeth unto mee. 1.3.10.& 2.2. 20.& 2.3.7.& 2.5.5.& 3.2.34.& 3.24. 1.& 3.24.14
46 Not that any man hath seene the Father, save he which is of God, hee hath seene the Father. 2.2.34.& 3.22.10.& 3.24.1
47 He that beleeveth in me hath everlasting life. 1.13.13
48 I am the bread of life. 3.11.9.& 4.17.4 & 4.15.8.
49 Your Fathers did eat Manna in the wilderneſſe, and are dead. 2.10 6.
50 This is the bread which commeth downe from heaven, that hee which eateth of it, should not die. 2.10.6.& 4.17.34
51 I am the living bread which came downe from heaven: if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. 3.11.8. & 4.17.5.& 4.17.14.
53 Then Iesus said unto them, verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Sonne of man, and drinke his blood, ye have no life in you. 3.11.9.& 4 17.6
54 Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternall life, and I will raise him up at the last day. 3.11.9.& 4.17.34
55 For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drinke indeed. 2.17.5.& 4.17.8
56 Hee that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him. 4 17.33
57 As the living Father hath sent me, so live I by the father, and he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. 2.17.5
65 Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto mee except it bee given unto him of my Father: 3.23.13
70 Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devill. 3.21.7.& 3.24.9
7.16 My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. 2.8.26 & 48. 4
37 Now in the last and great day of the feast, Iesus stood, and cryed saying: if any man thirst, let him come unto mee and drinke. 2.16.14.& 3.1.2.& 3.1.3.& 4.19.6
38 For the holy Ghost was not yet given because that Iesus was not yet glorified. 4.17.2
8.12. Then spake Iesus againe unto them, saying, I am the light of the world, he that followeth mee, shall not walke in darkneſſe, but shall have the light of life. 2.15.3.& 3 2.1.& 3.11.12.& 4.19.23
16 For I am not alone, but I and the Father, &c. 1.13.17.
29 But he that sent me, is true: and the things that I have heard of him, those speake I to the world. 2.8.26
30 As he spake these things, many beleeved in him. 3.2.5
31 Then said Iesus to the Iewes which beleeved in him: if yee continue in my Word, ye are verily my disciples. 3.2.12
34 Verily, verily, I say unto you, that whosoever committeth sinne, is the servant of sinne. 2.2.27
44 Yee are of your father the devill, &c. 1.14 15. he hath beene a murtherer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him: when he speaketh a lie, then speaketh he of his owne: for he is a liar, and the Father thereof. 1.14.16.& 1.14.18.& 1.14.19
47 Hee that is of God, heareth Gods words, yee therefore heare them not because yee are not of God. 4.2.4
50 And I seeke not mine owne praise, but there is one that seeketh it and judgeth. 2.14.2
56 Your father Abraham rejoyced to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad. 2.9.1 & 2.10.4
58 Iesus said unto them, verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I am. 2.14.2.
9.3 Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the workes of God should be shewed on him. 1.17.1.
5 As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world. 2.14.3
6 As soone as hee had thus spoken hee spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and annoynted the eyes of the blinde with the clay. 4.19.18
7 And said unto him, goe wash thee in the poole of Siloam (which is by interpretation, sent) hee went his way therefore, and washed, and came againe seeing. 4.19.19.
24 And said unto him: give glory unto God, &c. 2.8.24
31 Now wee know that God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God,

God, and doth his will him heareth hee. 3 20.7.& 3.20.10
10.3 To him the porter openeth, and the sheepe heare his voyce, and hee calleth his owne sheepe by name, and leadeth them out. 3.24 6
4 And when hee hath sent forth his owne sheepe hee goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice. 3.22 10.& 4.2.4
5 And they will not follow a stranger, but they flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers. 3.22.10
7 Then said Iesus unto them againe, verily, verily I say unto you, I am the doore of the sheep, 4.19.13
9 I am the doore: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in, and go out, and find pasture. 2.14.3
11 I am the good shepheard, the good shepheard giveth his life for his sheepe. 2.14.3 & 4.19.14
14 I am the good shepheard, and know mine &c. 4.2.4
15 As the father knoweth me, so know I the father, and I lay downe my life for my sheep. 2.16.5
16 Other sheepe I have also, which are not of this fold: them also, must I bring, &c. 3.24.6
17 Therefore doth my father love me, because I lay downe my life that I might take it againe. 2.12.4
18 No man taketh it from me, but I lay it downe of my selfe: I have power to lay it downe, and I have power to take it againe: this commandement have I received of my father. 2.12.4.& 2.16.5
26 But yee beleeve not, for yee are not of my sheepe, &c. 3.22.10
27 My sheepe heare my voice, and I know them, &c. 2.24 6
28 And I give unto them eternall life, and they shall never perish, neither shal any pluck them out of my hand. 3.15.5.& 3.21.1 & 3.22.7.& 3.24 6
29 My Father which gave them me is greater then all, and none is able to take them out of my hand. 3.22.10
30 I and my father are one. 2.8.26
34 Is it not written in your law, I said, yee are gods? 4.26.13.
35 If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God was given, and the Scripture cannot be broken. 4.20.4
37 If I doe not the workes of the Father beleeve me not. 1.13.13
11.25 I am the resurrection and the life; he that beleeveth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live. 1.13.11.& 2.12.4.& 3 25.9.& 4.16.17
41 Father I thanke thee, because thou hast heard me. 3.13.13
43 As he had spoken these things, he cried with a lowd voice: Lazarus, come forth. 4.19.29
44 Then he that was dead, came forth, bound hand and foot with bands, and his face was bound with a napkin. Iesus said unto them loose him, and let him goe. 3.4.5
47 Then gathered the high priests, and the pharisees a councell, and said: what shall we doe? &c. 4.9.7
12.27 Father, save me from this houre: but therefore came I unto this houre. 2.12.4 & 2.16.12
28 Father glorifie thy name, &c. 2.12.4
31 Now is the judgement of this world: now shall the prince of this world bee cast out. 1. 14.13
32 And I, if I were lift up from the earth will draw all mine unto me. 3.25.6
39 Therefore could they not beleeve because that Esaias saith againe. 3.24.13
41 These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory and spake of him. 1.13.11 & 1. 13.23.
43 For they loved the praise of men, more than the praise of God. 3.11.9
49 For I have not spoken of my selfe, &c. 4 8.13.
13.4 He riseth from supper, and laieth aside his upper garment, and tooke a towel, and gird himselfe. 4.19.23.
15 For I have given you an example that ye should do, even as I have done to you. 3.16.
18 I speake not of you all: I know him whom I have chosen, &c. 3.22.7.& 3.24.9
34 A new commandement give I unto you, that ye love one another as I have loved you, that even so yee love one another. 3 16.2
14.1 Yee beleeve in God, beleeve also in me 1.13.13.& 2.6.4
5 Thomas said unto him: Lord wee know not whether thou goest how can wee then know the way? 4.17.23
6 I am the way, and the truth and the life, &c. 1.13.17.&.2.6.1. & 3.20.21. & 4 16.17.
8 And Philip said unto him: Lord shew us the father, and it sufficeth us. 4.17.13
10 Beleevest thou not, that I am in the Father, ther, and the Father in me? the words which I ſpake unto you, I ſpake not of my ſelfe, but the Father that dwelleth in mee, he doth the workes. 2.14.2.& 4.8.23

11 Beleeve me that I am in the Father, and the Father in mee: at the leaſt beleeve mee for the very workes ſake. 2.13.13

13 And whatſoever yee aske in my name, that will I doe, that the Father may bee glorified in the Sonne.

16 And I will pray the Father, and hee ſhall give you another comforter, &c. 1.13.17 & 4 8.11

17 Even the ſpirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, becauſe it ſeeth him not, neither knoweth him, but yee know him, for he dwelleth with you, and ſhall be in you. 3.1.4.& 3.2.39

26 But the comforter, which is the holy Ghoſt whom the Father will ſend in my name, hee ſhall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, which I have told you. 2.2.1.& 3.1.4.& 4.8.8.& 4.8.13

28 For my Father is greater than I. 1.13.26

30 Hereafter will I not ſpeake many things, unto you: for the prince of this world commeth, and he hath nought in me. 1.14.18

15.1 I am the true Vine, and my father is an husbandman: every branch that beareth not fruit in me, he taketh away: and every one that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more. 2.3.9.& 2.14.3. & 4.19.34

3 Now are yee cleane through the word, which I have ſpoken unto you. 3.6.3

5 I am the Vine, ye are the branches; he that abideth in me, and I in him, the ſame bringeth forth much fruit; for without mee, &c. 2.2.8.& 2.3.9.& 2.5.4.& 4.19.34

10 If yee ſhall keepe my commandements yee ſhall abide in my love, even as I have kept my fathers commandements, and abide in his love. 3.16.2

16 But I have choſen you, and ordained you, that yee goe and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit remaine, &c. 3.22.3.& 3.22.8 & 4.1.6

19 If yee were of the world, the world would love his owne; but becauſe yee are not of the world, but I have choſen you out of the world, therfore the world hateth you. 3.22.7

26 Even the ſpirit of truth, which proceedeth of the father, &c. 1.13.17

16.2 They ſhall excommunicate you, &c. 4.2.6

7 It is expedient for you, that I goe away &c. 1.13.26. and 2.16.14. and 3.25.3. and 4.17.26

11 Of judgement, becauſe the prince of this world is judged. 1.14.13

12 I have yet many things to ſay unto you, but you cannot beare them away. 3.21.2 & 4.8.14

13 When hee is come which is the ſpirit of truth, he will lead you into all truth: for he ſhall not ſpeake of himſelfe, but whatſoever he ſhall heare, that he ſhall ſpeake, &c. 1.9 1.& 3.2.34.& 4.8.8.& 4.8.13

20 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, that ye ſhall weepe and lamewt, and the world ſhall rejoyce: and yee ſhall ſorrow, but your ſorrow ſhall be turned into joy. 3.8.9

24 Hitherto have you asked nothing in my name: aske and ye ſhall receive, that your joy may be full. 3.10.17

26 In that day ſhall ye aske in my name, &c. 3.20.18

28 I am come out from my father, and came into the world: againe, I leave the world, and goe to my father. 4.17.26

17.3 And this is life eternall, that they know thee to bee the onely very God, and whom thou haſt ſent Ieſus Chriſt. 1.13.26.& 2 6.1 & 3.2.3

5 And now glorifie thou me, thou father with thine owne ſelfe, with the glory which I had with thee, before the world was. 1.13.8.& 1.13.22.& 2.14.2

6 I have declared thy name unto the men which thou gaveſt mee out of the world: thine they were, and thou gaveſt them me. 3.24.1.& 3.24.6.

9 I pray for them: I pray not for the world but for them which thou haſt given me, for they are thine. 3.22.7

12 While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name: thoſe that thou gaveſt me, I kept, and none of them is loſt, but the child of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled. 3.22.7.& 3.24.6 7.9

15 I pray not that thou ſhouldeſt take them out of the world: but that thou keepe them from evill. 2.5.11

19 And for their ſakes ſanctifie I my ſelfe, that they alſo may be ſanctified through thy truth. 2.13.14.& 2.15.6.& 2.17.6 & 3.11.12

beleeve, that thou hast sent me. 3.2.24

18.4 Then Iesus knowing all things that should come unto him: went forth, and said unto them; whom seeke yee? 2.16.5

36 Iesus answered: my kingdome is not of this world, if my kingdome were of this world, my servants would surely fight, that I should not be delivered to the Iewes: but now is not my kingdome from hence. 2.15.3.

37 Every one that is of truth, heareth my voice. 4.2.4

38 Pilate said unto him, what is truth? and when he had said that, he went out againe unto the Iewes, and said unto them, I find in him no cause at all. 2.16.5

19.30 Now when Iesus had received of the vineger, he said, it is finished, &c. 4.18.3.11

34 But one of the souldiers, with a speare, pearced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water. 4.14.22

36 Not a bone of him shall be broken. 1.16.9

20.8 Then went in also the other disciple, which came first to the sepulchre, and hee saw it and beleeved. 3.2.4

17 Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my father, &c. 2.12.2.& 4.17.29

19 The same day then at night, which was the first day of the weeke, and when the doores were shut where the disciples were assembled for feare of the Iewes, came Iesus and stood in the middest. &c. 4.17.29

22 And when he had said that, hee breathed on them, and said unto them; receive the holy Ghost. 4.19.7.29

23 Whosoever sinnes yee remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoevers sinnes yee retaine, they are retained, 3.4.10.& 4.1.22.& 4.2.10.& 4.6.3.& 4.6.4.& 4.8.4.& 4.11.1.& 4.12.4

28 Thou art my Lord, and my God. 1.13.11

31 But these things are written, that yee might beleeve, that Iesus is Christ the Son of God, and that in beleeving, yee might have life, &c. 3.2.6

21.15 Simon sonne of Iona, loveſt thou me more than these? he said unto him, yea Lord, thou knowest that I love thee: he said unto him, feed my lambes. 4.6.3.& 4.11.1.& 19.28

8 When thou wast young, thou girdest thy selfe, and walkedst whether thou wouldest, but when thou shalt be olde, &c. 3.8.10

Acts.

1.3 To whom also he presented himselfe alive after that he had suffered by many infallible tokens being seene of them by the space of fortie dayes, and speaking of those things which appertained to the kingdome of God, 2.16.14.& 3.25.3.& 4.17.17

5 For Iohn indeed baptised with water, but yee shall bee baptised with the holy Ghost within these few dayes. 4.15.18

8 But yee shall receive power of the holy Ghost, when he shall come on you; and ye shall bee witnesses unto mee both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth. 4.3.12.& 4.19.28

9 And when hee had spoken these things while they beheld, hee was taken up, for a cloud tooke him out of their sight. 2.16.14 & 3.25.1.& 4.17.17.& 4.17.27

10 Behold two men stood by them in white apparell. 1.14.6

11 This Iesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come, as yee have seene him goe into heaven. 1.14.6.& 2.16.17.& 4.17.24.27

15 And in those dayes Peter stood up in the middes of the disciples, and said (now the number of names that were in one place, were about an hundred and twentie). 4.3.15

23 And they presented two, Joseph called Barsabas, whose surname was Justus, and Matthias. 4.3.13.& 4.3.14

26 Then they gave forth their lots, and the lot fell on Matthias, and he was by a common consent counted with the eleven Apostles. 4.3.15

2.3 And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like fire, and it sate upon each of them. 4.15.8

4 And they were all filled with the holy Ghost, and began to speake with other tongues. 4.19.8

21 Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved. 1.13.20

23 Him, I say, have ye taken by the hands of the wicked, being delivered by the determinate counsell and foreknowledge of God, and have crucified and slaine. 1.18.1.& 3.22.6

24 Whom God hath raised up, and loosed the sorrowes of death, because it was impossible, possible, that he should be holden of it. 2.26

11. & 2.16.12
33 Since then that hee by the right hand of God hath beene exalted, and hath received of his father the promise of the holy Ghost, hee hath shed forth this which yee now see and heare. 2.16.15
37 Men and brethren, what shall wee doe? 3.3.4. & 4.16.23
38 Amend your lives and bee baptised every one of you in the name of Iesus Christ, for the remission of sinnes, and yee shall receive the gift of the holy Ghost. 4.15.7. & 4.16
23
39 For the promise is made unto you, and your children, and to all that are afarre off even as many as the Lord our God shal cal. 4.16.15
41 Then they that gladly received his word were baptised, and the same day there were added to the Church about three thousand soules. 4.15.7. & 4.17.6
42 And they continued in the Apostles doctrine, and fellowship, and breaking of bread and prayers. 4.17.25. & 4.17.35. & 4.17
44
3.6 Then said Peter: Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee, in the name of Iesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walke. 1.13.29. & 4.19.18
15 And yee killed the Lord of life whom God hath raised from the dead, whereof we are witnesse. 2.17.1
18 But those things which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his Prophets, that Christ should suffer. &c. 1.18.1
19 Amend your lives therefore, and turne that your sinnes may be put away, &c. 3.3.
20
21 Whom the heaven must contain until the time that all things be restored, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Prophets, since the world began. 2.16.15
& 4.17.29
25 Yee are the children of the Prophets, and of the covenant, which God hath made unto our Fathers, &c. 2.10.23. & 4.16.15
26 Unto you God hath raised up his Sonne Iesus, and him he hath sent to blesse you, in turning every one of you from your iniquities. 3.3.20
4.12 Neither is there salvation in any other, for among men there is given none other name under heaven, whereby we must be saved. 2.16.2
28 To doe whatsoever thine hand and thy counsell had determined before to bee done 1.18.1. & 1.18.3
32 And the multitude of them that beleeved, were of one heart, and of one soule: &c. 4.1.3
34 Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God. 2.13.15.
36 There came also a multitude out of the Cities round about unto Ierusalem, bringing sicke folke, and them which were vexed with uncleane spirits, who were all healed. 4.19.18
29 We ought rather to obey God than men. 3.3.19
31 Him hath God lift up with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and forgivenesse of sinnes. 33.19
41 So they departed from the counsell, rejoycing that they were counted worthy to suffer rebuke for his name. 3 8.7
6.1 And in those dayes, as the number of the Disciples grew, there arose a murmuring of the Grecians towards the Hebrewes, because that their widdowes were neglected in the daylie ministring. 3.2.6
2 Then the twelve called the multitude of the Disciples together, and said: It is not meet that we should leave the word of God to serve the tables. 3. 2. 6. & 4.3.15. & 4.
11.9
3 Wherefore brethren, looke you out among you seven men of honest report, &c. 4.3.9
6 And they prayed and laid their hands on them. 4.3.16
7 And the word of God increased, and the number of the Disciples was multiplyed in Ierusalem greatly, &c. 3.2.6
10 But they were not able to resist the wisedome, and the Spirit by the which he spake. 3.3.22
7.5 And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not the breadth of a foote, &c. 2.10.
1.3
28 Wilt thou kill me, as thou diddest the Egyptian yesterday? 4.20.10
44 Our fathers had the tabernacle of witnesse in the wildernesse, as he had appointed speaking unto Moses, that hee should make it according to the fashion that hee had seene. 2.7.1
48 The most high dwelleth not in Temples made with hands, &c. 3.20.30. & 4.1.5
53 Which have received the law by the ordinance of Angels, and have not kept it. 1.
14.9
55 But

55 But hee being full of the holy Ghost, looked stedfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Iesus standing at the right hand of God. 3.25.3. & 4.17.17.& 4.17.29

56 And said: behold, I see the heavens open and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God. 2.16.15. & 4.17.29

59 And they stoned Steven, who called on God, and said, Lord Iesus receive, &c. 1. 13.1.& 2.15.2. & 3.25.6

8.13 Then Simon himselfe beleeved also, and was baptised, and continued with Philip, and wondred when he saw the signes, &c. 3.2.10

14 They sent unto them Peter and Iohn, 4. 6.7.& 4.15.8

15 which when they were come downe prayed for them that they might receive the holy Ghost. 4.16.6

16 For as yet hee was come downe on none of them, but they were baptised onely in the name of the Lord Iesus. 4.15.6.& & 4.19.31

17 Then laid they their handes on them, and they received the holy Ghost. 4.15.8 & 4.19.31

18 And when Simon saw, that through laying on of the Apostles hands, the holy Ghost was given, hee offered them money. 3.2.10

22 Repent therefore of this thy wickednesse, and pray God that if it bee possible, the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee 4.1.26

27 And he arose, and went on, and behold, a certaine Eunuch of Ethiopia, Candaces Queene of the Ethiopians chiefe Governor, who had the rule of all her treasure, and came to Ierusalem to worship. 3.2.32

31 And hee said how can I, except I had a guide? &c. 3.2.32

37 And Philip said unto him, if thou beleevest with all thy heart, thou maist, &c. 4.14.8.& 4.16.23

38 And they went downe both of them into the water, both Philip and the Eunuch, and hee baptised him. 4.16. 22. & 4.18.31

9.1 And Saul, yet breathing out threatnings, and slaughter against the Disciples of the Lord, &c. 3.2.6

3 Now as hee journeyed it came to passe that as hee was come neere to Damascus, suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven. 4.17.17

4 And he fell on the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me. 3.25.3.& 4.17.29

6 Arise and goe into the citie, and it shall be told thee what thou shalt doe. 4.19.3

10 And there was a certaine Disciple at Damascus named Ananias, and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias, and he said, behold, I am here Lord. 3.2.6

13 Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy Saints at Ierusalem. 1.18.13

14 Moreover here hee hath authoritie of the high Priests, to bind all that call upon thy name. 3.3.8

15 Hee is a chosen vessell unto me, &c. 3.3

17 Then Ananias went his way, and entered into the house, and put his hands on him, and said, brother Saul, the Lord hath sent mee (even Iesus that appeared unto thee in the way, as thou camest) that thou mightest receive thy sight, &c. 4.19.10

19 So was Saul certaine dayes with the Disciples which were at Damascus. 3. 2.6

25 Then the Disciples took him by night, and put him over the wall, and let him downe in a basket. 3.2.6

36 There was also at Ioppa, a certaine woman a Disciple named Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas. this was full of good works and almes which shee did 3.2.6

38 Now forasmuch as Lidda was neere to Ioppa, and the Disciples had heard that Peter was there, they sent unto him two men, &c. 3.2.6

40 But Peter put them all forth, and kneeled downe and prayed, &c. 4.19.2

10.2 A devout man, and one that feared God with all his houshold, which gave much almes to the people &c. 3.24.10

3 He saw in a vision evidently (about the ninth houre of the day) an Angell of God comming unto him, &c. 4.3.3

25 And it came to passe as Peter came in, that Cornelius met him, and fell downe at his feete, and worshipped him. 1.10.3

31 And said, Cornelius thy prayer is heard and thy almes are had in remembrance in the sight of God. 3.2.32

34 Of a truth I perceive, that God is no accepter of persons. 3.17.4.& 3.23.10

42 And he commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testifie that it is hee that that is ordained of God a Iudge of quicke and dead. 2.16.17.

43 To him also gave all the Prophets witnesse, that through his name all that beleeve in him shall receiue remission of sinnes. 3.4.25. & 3.5.2.
44 While Peter yet spake these words, the holy Ghost fell on them which heard the word. 4.16.31.
48 So he commanded them to bee baptised in the name of the Lord, &c. 4.15.15.
11.3 Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and hast eaten with them. 4.6.7.
4 Then Peter began, and expounded the thing in order to them. 4.6.7.
15 Then I remembred the word of the Lord, how hee said, John baptised with water, but you shall bee baptised with the holy Ghost. 4.15.18.
18 When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles, granted repentance unto life. 3.3.21.
26 Insomuch, that the Disciples were first called Christians in Antiochia. 3.2.6. & 4.16.31.
29 Then the Disciples every man according to his ability, purposed to send succour, &c. 3.2.6.
12.15 Then said they, It is his Angel. 1.14.7
13.2. Separate me Barnabas, and Saul, for the worke whereunto I have called them. 4.3.14.
3 Then fasted they and prayed, and laid their hands on them, and let them goe. 4.3.15. & 4.12.14. & 4.12.16.
36 Howbeit, David after hee had served his time, by the counsell of God hee slept, and was laid with his father, and saw corruption. 3.20.23.
38 Be it knowne unto you therefore men and brethren, that through this Man is preached unto you the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes. 3.11.3. & 3.11.22.
39 And from all things from which yee could not bee justified by the law of Moses, by him every one that beleeveth, is justified. 2.17.5. & 3.11.1.
43 Which spake to them and exhorted them to continue in the grace of God. 2.5.8.
48 And when the Gentiles heard it, they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord: and as many as were ordained unto eternall life beleeved. 1.2.11. & 3.14.2.13
52 And the Disciples were filled with joy, and with the holy Ghost. 3.2.6.
14.16 Who in times past suffered all the Gentiles to walke in their owne waies. 1.5.13. & 2.11.11.
20 Howbeit, as the Disciples stood round about him, hee arose up, and came into the citie, &c. 3.2.6.
22 We must through many afflictions enter in to the kingdome of God. 3.8.1. & 3.18.7. & 3.2.8.
23 And when they had ordained them elders by election in every Church, and prayed, and fasted: they commended them to the Lord, in whom they beleeved. 4.3.7.12. 15. & 4.12.16.
15.7 And when there had been great disputation, Peter rose up, and said unto them: Ye men and brethren, ye know that a good while ago, among us God chose out mee, &c. 4.6.7.
9 And he put no difference betweene us and them, after that by faith hee had purged, &c. 3.14.8. & 4.14.4.
10 Now therefore why tempt ye God, and lay a yoke on the disciples necks, &c. 3.2.6.
11 But wee beleeve through the grace of the Lord Iesus Christ, to be saved even as they doe. 3.5.4.
20 But that wee write unto them, that they abstain themselves from filthinesse of idols, and fornication, and that that is strangled, &c. 4.10.17.21.
29 That is, that yee abstaine from things offered to idols, &c. 4.10.17.
15.1 Then came hee to Derbe and to Lystra: and behold, a certaine disciple was there, named Timotheus, a womans sonne, which was a Iewesse & beleeved, &c. 3.2.6.
3 Therefore Paul would that hee should goe forth with him, and he tooke and circumcised him, because of the Iewes which were in those quarters, &c. 3.19.12.
14 And a certaine woman named Lydia, a seller of purple, of the citie of the Thyatirians, which worshipped God, &c. 3.24.13.
15 And when she was baptised, and her household, &c. 4.16.8.
33 And was baptised with all that belonged unto him straight way. 4.16.8.
37 Then said Paul unto them, after that they have beaten us openly uncondemned, which are Romanes, they have cast us into prison: and now would they put us out privily? nay verely: but let them come and bring us out. 4.20.29.
17.27. That they should seeke the Lord, if so be they might have groped after him, and found him, though doubtlesse hee be not far from every one of us. 1.5.3.8,13.

28 For in him wee live, and move, and have our being, as also certaine of your owne poets have said, for wee are also his generation. 1.15.5. & 1.16.1.4.
Forasmuch then as wee are the generation of God, wee ought not to thinke, that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and the invention of man. 1.11.2.
30 And the time of this ignorance God regarded not, but now hee admonisheth all men everywhere to repent. 3.3.7.
32 Now when they heard of the resurrection from the dead, some mocked, &c. 3.25.7
18.18 After that hee had shorne his head in Cenchrea: for he had a vow. 4.19.26.
23 Strengthening all the disciples. 3.2.6.
19.1 And found certaine disciples, and said unto them, &c. 3.2.6.
3 Unto what were ye baptised? and they said unto Iohns baptisme. 4.15.8 18.
4 John verely baptised with the baptisme of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should beleeve in him which should come after him, &c. 4.15.7
5 So when they heard it, they were baptised in the name of the Lord Iesus. 4.15.6. 8.18.
9 And Paul laid his hands upon them, and the holy Ghost came upon them, and they spake with tongues, and prophesied. 4.3.15.
12 So that from his body were brought unto the sicke kerchifes or handkerchifes, and the diseases departed from them, and the evill spirits went out of them. 4.19.18.
13 Then certaine of the vagabond Iewes, exercists, tooke in hand to name over them which had evill spirits, the name of the Lord Iesus, saying: we adjure thee by the Iesus, whom Paul preacheth. 4.10.24.
20.1. Now after the tumult was ceased, Paul called the disciples unto him, and embraced them, &c. 3.2.6.
10 But Paul went downe, and laid himselfe upon him, and embraced him, saying: trouble not your selves, for his life is in him. 4.19.19
17 Wherefore from Miletum hee sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the Church. 4.3.8.
18 Ye know from the first day that I came to Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons. 4.3.7.
20 And how I kept backe nothing that was profitable, but have shewed you, and taught you openly, and throughout every house. 4. 1.22. & 4.3.6. & 4.12.2.
21 Witnessing both to the Iewes and to the Gracians, the repentance toward God, and faith towards our Lord Iesus Christ. 3.2.1. & 3.3.2.5.
26 Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men. 4. 4.3. & 4.12.1.
28 Take heed therefore unto your selves, and to all the flocke, whereof the holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feede the Church of God which hee hath purchased with his owne blood. 2.14.2. & 3.5.2. & 3.11.8. & 3.13.11. & 4.3.8. & 4.5.8.
29 For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flocke. 4.9.4.
30 Moreover of your owne selves shall men arise speaking perverse things to draw disciples after them. 4.9.4.
31 Therefore watch, and remember that by the space of three yeares I ceased not to warne every one night and day with teares. 4.3.6.
36 And when he had thus spoken, he kneeled downe and praied with them all. 4.19.2.
21.4 And when we had found Disciples, we tarried there seven dayes. 3.2.6.
22.1 Ye men, brethren, and Fathers, heare my defence now towards you. 3.20.19.
16 Arise and be baptised, and wash away thy sinnes, in calling on the name of the Lord. 4. 15.15.
18 And I saw him saying unto mee: Make haste and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem, for they will not receive thy witnesse concerning me. 4.17.17.29.
25 And as they bound him with thongs, Paul said unto the Centurion that stood by, Is it lawfull for you to scourge one that is a Romane, and not condemned? 4.20.19.
23.1 And Paul beheld earnestly the Counsell, and said, Men and brethren, I have in all good conscience served God until this day. 3.17.14.
8 For the Sadduces said, that there is no Resurrection, neither Angell, nor Spirit, &c. 1.14.9. & 1.15.2. & 2.10.22. & 3. 25.5.
12 And when the day was come, certaine of the Iewes made an assembly, and bound themselves with an oath, saying, that they would neither eat nor drinke, till they had killed Paul. 4.13.3.

24.12 And they neither found mee in the Temple disputing with any man, neither making uproare among the people, neither in the Synagogues, nor in the Citie. 4.20.19.

15 And have hope towards God, that the resurrection of the dead which they themselves looke for also, shall be both of just and unjust. 3.15.9.

16 And herein I endevour my selfe to have alway a cleare conscience towards God, and towards men. 3.19.16. & 4.10.4.

25.10 Then said Paul: I stand at Cæsars judgment seat, where I ought to be judged: To the Iewes I have done no wrong, as thou very well knowest. 4.20.19.

11 For if I have done wrong, or committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there bee none of these things whereof they accuse mee, no man can deliver me unto them: I appeale unto Cæsar. 4.20.19.

26.17 Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee. 3.2.1.

18 To open their eyes that they may turne from darknesse to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgivenesse of sinnes, and inheritance among them, which are sanctified by faith in mee. 3.2.1.

20 But shewed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and thorowout all the coast of Judea, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent, and returne to God, and doe works worthy amendment of life. 3.3.5.

28.15 And from thence when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us. 4.6.17.

16 So when we came to Rome, the Centurion delivered the prisoners to the Generall Captaine, &c. 4.6.15.

25 Well spake the holy Ghost by Esaias the Prophet, unto our Fathers. 1.13.15.

ROMANES.

1. PAul, a servant of Iesus Christ, called to be an Apostle, put a part to preach the Gospell of God. 2.14.6. & 4.3.10

2 Which he had promised before by his Prophets in the holy Scriptures. 2.10.3

3 Concerning his Sonne Iesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David, according to the flesh. 2.13.1.3. & 2.14.6.

4 And declared mightily to be the Sonne of God, touching the spirit of sanctification by the resurrection from the dead. 2.16.13. & 4.19.28.

5 By whom we have received grace and apostleship, that obedience might be given unto the faith in his name among all the Gentiles. 3.2.6. & 3.2.8. & 3.2.29.

7 Grace be with you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Iesus Christ. 1.13.13.

9 For God is my witnesse, whom I serve in my Spirit in the Gospell of his Sonne, that without ceasing I make mention of you. 2.8.27.

16 For I am not ashamed of the Gospell of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Grecian. 2.9.4. & 2.10.3. & 3.2.29. & 4.1.5.

17 For by it the righteousnesse of God is revealed, from faith to faith: as it is written, the just shall live by faith. 3.2.29.32. & 3.11.19.

19 For as much as that which may be known of God, is manifest in them: for God hath shewed it unto them. 1.5.1.23.

21 Because that when they knew God, they glorified him not as a God, neither were thankfull, but became vaine in their imaginations, &c. 1.5.12.

22 When they professed themselves to be wise, they became fooles. 1.4.1.

28 For as they regarded not to know God, even so God delivered them up into a reprobate minde, to doe those things which are not convenient. 1.18.2.

2.6 Who will render every man according to his works. 3.16.3. & 3.18.1.

11 For there is no respect of persons with God. 3.23.10.

12 For as many as have sinned without the Law, shall perish also without the Law, and as many as have sinned in the Law, shall be judged by the Law. 2.2.22.

13 For the hearers of the Law are not righteous before God: but the doers of the Law shall be justified 3.11.15. & 3.17.3.

14 For when the Gentiles which have not the Law, doe by nature the things contained in the Law, they having not the Law, &c. 2.2.22.

15 Which shew the effect of the Law written in their hearts, their consciences also bearing them witnesse, and thoughts accusing one another, &c. 3.19.15. & 4.10.3.

25 If thou bee a transgressor of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. 4.14.24

3.4 Yea, let God bee true, and every man a lier.&c. 4.15.17

9 What then? are wee more excellent? no, in no wise, for we have already prooved, that all, both Iewes and Gentiles are under sin. 3.4.6.

10 As it is written: there is none righteous, no not one. 2.1.9.& 2.3.2.& 2.5.3.

12 There is none that doth good, no not one. 2.3.3.

15 Their feete are swift to shed bloud, &c. 2.3.3.

19 Now wee know, that whatsoever the law saith, it saith it to them that bee under the law, that every mouth may bee stopped, and all the world be culpable before God. 2.7.8.& 2.10.3.& 3.4.6.

20 Therefore by the works of the Law shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law commeth the knowledge of sinne. 2.5.6.& 2.7.7.& 3.11.19.

21 But now is the righteousnesse of God made manifest without the law, having witnesse of the law, and of the Prophets. 2.9.4& 2.10.3.& 3.11.18,19.

24 And are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Iesus. 2.5.3.& 2.16.5.& 2.17.5.& 3.4.30.& 3.11.4,19.& 3.15.6.& 3.20.45.

25 Whom God hath set forth to be a reconciliation through faith in his bloud, to declar his righteousnesse, by the forgivenesse of the sinnes that are passed through the patience of God. 4.15.3

26 To shew at this time his righteousnesse, that hee might be just, and a justifier of him which is of the faith of Iesus. 3.11.12.& 3.13.1.& 3.13.2.& 3.14.17.

27 Where is then thy rejoycing? It is excluded. By what law? of works? nay? but by the law of faith. 3.11.13.& 3.13.2.

4.2 For if Abraham were justified by works, hee hath wherein to rejoyce, but not with God. 3.11.13.& 3.11.18.

3 Abraham beleeved God, and it was counted to him for righteousnesse. 3.17.8,10, 4 Now to him that worketh, the wages is not counted by favour, but by debt. 3.11.20.

5 But to him that worketh not, but beleeveth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousnesse. 3.11.3,6.

6 Even as David declareth the blessednesse of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousnesse without works, saying. 2.17.5.& 3.11.4,20.22.

7 Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, whose sinnes are covered. 3.11.11.

10 How was it then imputed? when he was circumcised, or uncircumcised? &c. 4.16.3.

11 After he received the signe of circumcision, as the seale of the righteousnesse of the faith which he had, when he was uncircumcised, &c. 4.14.5,21,23.& 4.16.20.

12 And the father of circumcision, not unto them onely which are of the circumcision, &c. 4.16.12.

13 For the promise that hee should bee the heire of the world, was not given to Abraham, or to his seede, through the law, but through the righteousnesse of faith. 3.14.11.

14 For if they which are of the law, be heires, faith is made void, and the promise is made of none effect. 3.11.11.& 3.13.3

15 For the law causeth wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression. 2.7.7.& 3.11.19.

17 As it is written: I have made thee a father of many nations, even before God whom he beleeved, who quickneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. 2.10.11.& 3.2.15.& 3.14.5.

11 And being full certified that what he had promised he was able also to performe. 3.2.31.

25 Who was delivered to death for our sinnes, and is risen againe for our justification. 2.16.5.& 2.16.13.& 2.17.5.

5.1 Then being justified by faith, wee have peace toward God through our Lord Iesus Christ. 3.2.16.& 3.13.5.

3 Knowing that tribulation bringeth foorth patience, &c. 3.8.3.

5 And hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the holy Ghost, which is given unto us, 3.1.2.& 3.2.12.

8 But God setteth out his love towards us, seeing that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. 2.12.4.& 2.16.4.& 3.4.25.

9 Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. 2.16.5.

10 For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Sonne, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life. 2.16.2.4,5.& 2.17.6.& 3.11.21.& 3.14.6.

12 As by one man sinne entred into the world, and death by sinne, and so death went over all men, forasmuch as all men have sinned. 2.1.6,8. & 2.13.4.

15 But yet the gift is not so, as is the offence: for if through the offence of one, many bee dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which by one man Iesus Christ, &c. 3.5.4.

16 Neither is the gift so, as that which entred in by one that sinned: for the fault came of one offence to condemnation, but the gift is of many offences to justification. 2.17.3.

19 For as by one mans disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many also be made righteous. 2.1.4. & 2.16.5. & 2.17.3. & 3.11.4.9,12. 23. & 4.14.21.

20 Moreover, the law entred thereupon, that the offence should abound: nevertheless, where sinne abounded, there grace abounded much more. 2.5.6. & 2.7.7.

6.3 Know ye not, that all we which have been baptised into Iesus Christ have been baptised into his death? 4.15.5.

4 Wee are buried then with him in baptisme into his death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glorie of the Father, so we also should walke in newnesse of life. 2.8.31. & 2.16.7,13. & 3.3.5. & 4.15.16,21. & 4.19.8.

6 Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sinne might be destroyed, that henceforth wee should not serve sinne. 3.3.9,11.

12 Let no sinne therefore reigne in your mortall body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. 3.3.13.

14 For sin shall not have dominion over you: for yee are not under the law, but under grace. 3.19.6. & 4.15.12.

18 Being then made free from sinne, yee are made the servants of righteousnesse. 3.6.3. & 3.16.2.

19 I speake after the manner of men, because of the infirmitie of your flesh, for as ye have given your members servants to uncleanesse, and to iniquitie, to commit iniquitie, &c. 3.24.10. & 3.25.8.

23 For the wages of sinne is death: but the gift of God is eternall life through Iesus Christ our Lord. 2.8.58,59. & 3.4.28. & 3.14.31.

7.1 Know yee not brethren, for I speake to them that know the law, that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? 4.15.12.

7 What shall we say then? is the law sinne? God forbid. Nay I knew not sinne, but by the law: &c. 2.5.6. & 2.7.6.

12 Wherefore the law is holie, and the commandement is holie, and just, and good 3.9.4.

14 For wee know that the law is spirituall, &c. 2.8.6.

15 For I allow not that which I doe: for what I would that doe I not, but what I hate, that doe I. 2.2.27.

18 For I know, that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me, &c. 2.1.9.

19 For I do not the good thing which I would, but the evill, which I would not, that doe I 2.2.27. & 3.3.11.

20 Now if I doe that I would not, it is no more I that doe it, but the sinne that dwelleth in me. 2.2.27.

23 But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my minde, and leading mee captive into the law of sinne, which is in my members. 3.3.14.

24 O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? 3.9. 4. & 3.11.11. & 4.15.12.

8.1 Now then there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Iesus, which walke not after the flesh, but after the spirit. 3.4. 28. & 4.15.12.

3 For that that was impossible to the law, in as much as it was weake because of the flesh God sending his owne Sonne, in the similitude of sinfull flesh, and for sinne, condemned sinne in the flesh. 2.7.5. & 2.12.4. & 2.13.1,4. & 2.16.6. & 3.2.32. & 3.4. 27. & 3.11.23.

6 For the wisdome of the flesh is death: but the wisdome of the spirit is life and peace. 2.3.1.

7 Because the wisdome of the flesh is enmitie against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. 2.19. & 3.3.8. & 3.20.24.

9 Now ye are not in the flesh but in the spirit, because the spirit of God dwelleth in you: but if any man hath not the spirit of Christ, the same is not his. 3.1.2. & 3.2.39. & 4. 17.12.

10 And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sinne: but the spirit is life for righteousnesse sake. 2.1.6. & 3.1.3. & 3.2. 24. & 3.25.3. & 4.17.12.

11 But if the spirit of him that raised up Iesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortall bodies, because that his spirit dwelleth in you. 1.13.18. & 3.1.2. & 3.2.39. & 3.25.3,8. & 4.17.12.

14 For as many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sonnes of God. 3.2.39.

15 For ye have not received the spirit of bondage, to feare againe: but ye have received the spirit of adoption, &c 2.11.9. & 2.14.5. & 3.1.3. & 3.2.11. & 3.13.5. & 3.20.1. & 3.24.1. & 4.19.22.

16 The same spirit beareth witnesse with our spirit, that we are the children of God. 3.2.39.

17 If we be children, we are also heires, even the heires of God, and heires annexed with Christ, &c. 2.12.2.

19 For the fervent desire of the creature, waiteth when the sonnes of God shall be revealed. 3.9.5. & 3.25.2.

20 Because the creature is subject to vanitie not of it owne will, &c. 2.1.5.

22 For we know that every creature groneth with us also, and travelleth in paine together unto this present. 2.1.5. & 3.25.2.

23 And not onely the creature, but wee also which have the first fruits of the spirit, even we doe sigh in our selves, waiting for the adoption, even the redemption of our body. 3.18.3.3. & 3.25.11.

24 For we are saved by hope, but hope that is seene, is no hope, &c. 2.9.3.

25 But if we hope for that we see not, we doe with patience abide for it. 3.2.41,42. & 3.25.1.

26 Likewise the spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what to pray as we ought, &c. 3.20.5.

27 But he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the meaning of the spirit, for he maketh request for the Saints, &c. 3.20.5,34.

29 For those which hee knew before, hee also predestinate to be made like to the image of his Sonne, that hee might be the first borne among many brethren. 2.13.2. & 3.1.1, 3. & 3.8.1. & 3.15.8. & 3.18.7. & 3.24.1.

30 Moreover, whom hee did predestinate, them also he called: And whom he called, them also he justified: And whom he justified, &c. 2.5.2. & 3.14.21. & 3.18.4. & 3.24.4.

32 Who spared not his owne Sonne, but gave him for us all to death, how shall he not with him give us all things also? 2.14.7. & 2.17.6. & 3.24.5.

33 Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods chosen? it is God that justifieth. 3.11.3.6.11.

34 Who shall condemne? it is Christ that is dead, yea or rather which is risen againe; who is also at the right hand of God, &c. 2.16.13. & 2.16.16. & 2.16.18. & 3.20.20

35 Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakednesse, or perill, or sword? 3.13.5. & 3.2.28.

36 For thy sake are wee killed all the day long, we are counted as sheepe for the slaughter. 3.9.6. & 3.25.3. & 3.14.19.

38 For I am perswaded, that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come. 3.2.16. & 3.2.40. & 3.15.8. & 3.24.6.

39 Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall bee able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Iesus our Lord. 3.2.16.28.40.

9.3 For I would wish my selfe to bee separated from Christ, for my brethren that are my kinsmen according to the flesh. 3.20.35.

5 Of whom are the Fathers, and of whom concerning the flesh Christ came, who is God over all, blessed for ever, Amen. 1.13.11. & 2.13.1.3. & 2.14.6.

6 For all they are not Israelites, which are of Israel. 3.22.4. & 4.2.3.

7 Neither are they all children, because they are the seed of Abraham: But in Isaac shall thy seed be called. 3.21.7. & 4.16.14.

8 That is, they which are the children of the flesh, are not the children of God, but the children of the promise are accounted for the seed. 3.21.7.

11 For ere the children were borne, and when they had done neither good nor evill, that the purpose of God might remain according to the election, not by works, but by him that calleth. 3.22.4.

12 It was said unto her, the elder shall serve the younger. 3.22.5, 13 As it is written, I have loved Jacob, and have hated Esau. 3.21.7. & 3.20.11.

14 What shall we say then? is there unrighteousnesse with God? God forbid. 3.22.8.

15 I will have mercy on him to whom I will shew mercy: and I will have compassion on him on whom I will have compassion. 3.22.6

16 So then it is not in him that willeth, nor in him that runneth, but in God that sheweth mercy. 2.5.4.17. and 3.24.1.
17 For this same purpose have I stirred thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, &c. 3.24.14.
18 Therefore he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardneth. 1.18.2. & 3.12.11.
20 But, O man, who art thou that pleadest against God? &c. 3.23.14. & 3.24.16
21 Hath not the potter power of the clay to make of the same lumpe &c. 3.17.5.
22 What and if God would, to shew his wrath and to make his power knowne, suffer with long patience the vessels of wrath? &c. 1. 14.18. & 3.23.1.
24 Even us, whom hee hath called, not of the Iewes only, but also of the Gentiles. 13.24. 16
32 For they have stumbled at the stumbling stone. 1.13.23.
33 Behold, I lay in Sion, a stumbling stone, and a rocke of offence. 1.10.11. And whosoever beleeveth on him, shall not bee confounded. 1.13.13
10,3 For they being ignorant of the righteousnesse of God, and going about to establish their owne righteousnesse, &c. 3.11.13.
4 For Christ is the end of the law, for righteousnesse unto every one that beleeveth. 1. 6.2. & 2.6.4. & 2.7.2. & 3.2.6. & 4.8. 13.
5 That the man that doth these things shall live thereby. 3.11.14.17. & 3.17.3.
6 But the righteousnesse of Faith speaketh on this wise: Say not in thine heart, who shall ascend into heaven: &c. 1.17.2.
7 Or, who shall discend into the deepe? that is, to bring Christ againe from the dead. 1.17.2.
8 This is the word of faith which wee preach 2.5.12, & 3.2.29.30. and 4.14.14.
9 For if thou shalt confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, and shalt beleeve in &c. 3. 11.14.
10 For with the heart man beleeveth unto righteousnesse, and with the mouth man confesseth to salvation. 3.2.2.8.
11 Whosoever beleeveth in him, shall not bee ashamed. 1 13.13
14 But how shall they call on him, in whom they have not beleeved, &c. 3.20.1.11.
17 Then Faith is by hearing, and hearing &c. 3.20.27 & 4.1.5. & 4.6.31. & 4.8.9. & 4.16.19.
11.2 God hath not cast away his people which he knew before, &c. 3.2.26.
4 But what saith the answer of God to him? I have reserved unto my selfe seven thousand men, which have not bowed the knee to Baal. 4.1.2.
5 Even so then at this present time, is there a remnant, through the election of grace. 3.21.1.
6 And if it be of grace, it is no more of works: or else were grace no more grace, &c. 3.14. 5.
16 For if the first fruits bee holy, so is the whole lumpe, and if the roote be holy, so are the branches. 4.16.15.
17 And though some of the branches be broken off, and thou being a wilde Olive tree, wast graft in for them, and made partaker of the roote and fatnesse of the Olive tree. 3.1.1.
20 Well, through unbeleefe they are broken off, and thou standest by faith, be not high minded but feare. 2.3.22. & 3.24.6.
26 And so all Israel shall bee saved, as it is written: The deliverer shall come out of Sion, and shall turne away the ungodlinesse from Iacob. 3.3.2.
29 For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. 4.16.14.
32 For God hath shut up all in unbeleefe, that he might have mercy on all. 2.7.8. & 3.23 11. & 3.24.16.
33 O the deepnesse of the riches both of the wisdome and knowledge of God: how unsearchable are his iudgments and his waies past finding out? 1.17.2. & 3.23.5
34 For who hath knowne the minde of the Lord? or who was his counsellour? &c. 3. 2.34 & 4.18.19. & 4.19.2.
35 Or who hath given unto him first and hee shall be recompenced? 3.14.3. & 3.22.3. & 3.23.11.
36 For of him, and through him, and for him are all things, &c. 2.8.13.
12.1 I beseech you therefore brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye give up your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God which is your reasonable serving of God 3.7.1. & 3.16.3. & 4.18.16.
2 And fashion not your selves like unto this world, but bee yee changed by the renewing of your minde, that ye may prove what is, the will of God, good and acceptable, and perfect. 2.1.9. & 4.16.4.
3 As God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith. 4.13.3. & 4.16.4. & 4.17.32.

4 For as wee have many members in one bodie, and all members have not one office. 3,16.2

6 Whether we have prophecie, let us prophecie according to the proportion of our faith. 4.16.4. & 4.17.32.

7 Or an office, let us wait on the office, or hee that teacheth, on teaching. 4.3.8.

8 Or hee that exhorteth, on exhortation; he that distributeth, let him doe it with simplicitie; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerefulnesse. 4.3.8. 9. & 4.11.1. & 4.20.4.

10 Bee affectioned to love one another with brotherly love: in giving honour, goe one before another. 3.7.4.

14 Blesse them that persecute you: blesse, I say, and curse not. 4.20.20.

19 Dearely beloved, avenge not your selves, but give place unto wrath: for it is written: Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord. 4.20.19.

21 Bee not overcome of evill, but overcome evill with goodnesse. 4.20.20.

13.1 Let every soule be subject unto the higher powers: for there is no power but of God: and the powers that bee, are ordained of God. 3.19.15. & 4.10.3.5. & 4. 20.4.7.23.

4 For hee is the minister of God for thy wealth: but if thou doe evill, feare: for hee beareth not the sword for nought for he is the minister of God to take vengeance on him that doth evill. 4.20.10. & 4.20.17. & 4 20.19.

5 Wherefore ye must be subject, not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake. 3.19.15. & 4.10.3. 4.29.22.

6 For, for this cause ye pay also tribute: for they are Gods ministers, applying themselves for the same thing. 4.20.13.

8 Owe nothing to any man, but to love one another: for hee that loveth another, hath fulfilled the law. 2.8.53.

8 For this, thou shalt not commit adulterie, thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not steale, thou shalt not beare false witnesse, thou shalt not covet: and if there be any other commandement, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. 2.8.57.

14 But put ye on the Lord Iesus Christ, and take no thought for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts of it. 3.1.1. & 3.10.3.

14.1 Him that is weake in the faith, receive unto you, but not for controversies of disputations sake. 3.19.11.

5 This man esteemeth one day above another day, and another man counteth every day alike: let every man be fully perswaded in his minde. 2.8.33.

10 For we shall all appeare before the judgement seat of Christ. 1.13.11. & 3.5.8.

11 For it is written I live, saith the Lord: And every knee shall bow to me, and all tongues shall confesse unto God. 1.13.11. 23. & 3.25.7.

13 Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but use our judgement rather in this, that no man put an occasion to fall, or a stumbling block before his brother. 3.19 11

14 I know and am perswaded through the Lord Iesus, that there is nothing uncleane of it selfe; but unto him that judgeth any thing to be uncleane, to him it is uncleane. 3.19.8.

17 For the kingdome of God is not meat and drinke: but righteousnesse and peace, and joy in the holy Ghost. 2.15.4.

22 Hast thou faith? have it with thy selfe before God; blessed is hee that condemneth not himselfe in that thing which hee alloweth. 3.19.8.

23 For he that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: and whatsoever is not of faith is sinne. 3.5.10. & 3.15.6. & 4.13.17. & 4.15.22.

15.1 Wee which are strong, ought to beare the infirmities of the weak and not to please our selves. 3.19.11.

5 Now the God of patience and consolation, grant that you bee like minded one towards another, according to Christ Iesus. 4.2.5.

6 That yee with one mind, and with one mouth may praise God, even the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ. 3.20.29,31.

8 Now I say that Iesus Christ was a Minister of the circumcision, for the truth of God, to confirme the promises made unto the Fathers. 3.2.32. & 4.16.15.

12 There shall be a roote of Iesse, and he that shall rise to reigne over the Gentiles, in him shall the Gentiles trust. 1.13.13.

19 So that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have caused to abound the Gospell of Christ. 4.3.4.

20 Yea, so I enforced my selfe to preach the Gospell, not where Christ was named, &c. 4.3.4.

25 But now goe I to Jerusalem, to minister unto the Saints. 4.6.14.

30 Also brethren, I beseech you for our Lord Iesus his sake, and for the love of the Spirit that ye would strive with me by prayers to God for me. 3.20.20 16.3 Greete Prisilla and Aquila, my fellow helpers in Christ Iesus. 4.6.14.

7 Salute Andronicus and Iunia my cousins and fellow prisoners which are notable among the Apostles, and were in Christ before me. 4.3.5.

20 The God of peace shall tread Satan under your feete shortly. 1.14.18.& 3.15.5

25 By the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began. 2.9.4

26 But now is opened, and published among all nations by the Scriptures of the Prophets &c. 2.9.4

I. Corinthians.

1.1 Paul called to bee an Apostle of Iesus Christ, through the will of God and our brother Sosthenes. 4.3.10.

3 Grace be with you and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, 1.13.13

9 God is faithfull by whom yee are called unto the fellowship of his Sonne Iesus Christ, &c. 3.5.5

11 For it hath beene declared unto mee my brethren, of you by them that are of the house of Cloe, that there are contentions among you. 4.1.14.

12 Now this I say, that every one of you saith I am Paules, &c. 4.13.14

13 Is Christ devided? was Paul crucified for you? Either were ye baptised into the name of Paul? 2.5,2.& 4.15.13

20 Where is the wise? where is the Scribe? where is the disputer of this world? &c. 2.2.20.

21 For seeing the world by wisdome knew not God in the wisdome of God, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preaching to save them that beleeve. 2.6.1

23 But wee preach Christ crucified, unto the Iewes, even a stumbling blocke, unto the Grecians foolishnesse. 3.24.14.

26 For brethren, you see your calling how that not many wise men after the flesh, not manie mighty, not many noble are called. 3 23.10

30 But yee are of him in Christ Iesus who of God is made unto us wisedome and righteousnesse, and sanctification, &c. 2.15.2.& 2.16.19.& 3.3.19.& 3.4,30.& 3.11.6 12.& 3.14.27.& 15.5.& 3.16.1.

2.2 For I esteeme not to know any thing amongst you, save Iesus Christ, and him crucified. 1.13.13.& 2.12.4,5.& 2.15.2.& 3.2.1

4 Neither stood my word and my preaching in the entising speech of mans wisedome, but in plaine evidence of the spirit. 1.8.1.& 4. 1.6.& 4.14.11

5 That our faith should not be in the wisdome of men, but in the power of God. 3.2. 35

8 Which none of the Princes of this world hath knowne, for had they knowne. &c. 1.5 12.& 2.14.2.& 4.17.30

10 But God hath revealed them unto us by the spirit: for the spiris searcheth all things yea the deepe things of God. 1.13.14.& 3.2.34

11 For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him, even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the spirit of God. 3.2.34

12 Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are given to us of God. 3.2.39.& 4.8.11

13 Comparing things spiritual with spirituall things. 4.16.31

14 But the naturall man perceiveth not the things of the spirit of God, for they are foolishnesse unto him; neither can hee know them, because they are spiritually descerned. 2.2.20.& 3.2.34

16 For who hath knowne the minde of the Lord, that he might instruct him? but wee have the minde of Christ. 1.13.14.& 3.13. 4.

3.2 I gave you milke to drinke, and not meat. for yee were not able to beare it, neither yet now are yee able. 3.19.13.

3 For whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are yee not carnall and walke as men? 2.5.4.& 4.1.14

4 For when one saith, I am Paules, another I am Apollos, are yee not carnall? 4.4. 2.& 4.13.14

6 I have planted, Apollo watered but God gave the increase. 4.14.11.

7 So then neither is hee that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth but God that giveth the increase. 2,5.4.33.14.& 4.1.6.

8 And every man shall receive his wages, according to his labour. 3.16.3.& 3.18. 1.

9 For wee together are Gods labourers, yee are are Gods husbandry, and Gods building. 2.5.16.& 4.1.6

11 For other foundation can no man lay, than that which is laid, which is Iesus Christ. 3.15.3.& 4.6.6.

12 And if any man build on this foundation, gold, silver, or precious stones, timber, hay, or stubble. 3.5.9.

13 Every mans worke shall bee made manifest, for the day shall declare it because it shall be revealed by the fire, &c. 3.5.9.

14 If any mans worke that he hath built upon, abide, he shall receive wages. 3.5.9.

15 If any mans worke burne, hee shall loose, but he shall be safe himselfe, nevertheless yet as it were by the fire. 3.5.9

16 Know ye not that ye are the temples of God and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? 1.3.15.& 3.6.3.& 3.16.2.& 3.25.7.& 4.3.1.

19 For the wisdome of this world is foolishnesse with God, for it is written, He catcheth the wise in their owne craftinesse. 2.5.7.& 2.2.20.

21 Therefore let no man reioyce in men, for all things are yours. 4.19.1

4.1 Let a man so thinke of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and disposers of the secrets of God. 4.3.6.& 4.8.1

4 For I know nothing by my selfe, yet am I not thereby iustified, but he that iudgeth me is the Lord. 3.12.2.& 2.17.14.

5 Therefore iudge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who will lighten things that are hid in darkenesse, and make the counsels of the heart manifest, &c. 3.2.4

7 For who separateth thee? and what hast thou, that thou hast not received? if thou hast received it, why reioycest thou as though thou hast not received it? 2.5.2.& 3.7.4.& 3.24.12.

15 For in Christ Iesus I have begotten you through the Gospel. 4.1.6.

5.1 It is heard certainely that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not once named among the Gentiles, &c. 4.1.14.

2 And yee are puffed up and have not rather sorrowed, that he which hath done this deed, might bee put from among you. 4.1.15.

4 When yee are gathered together, and my Spirit, in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ, that such a one I say, by the power of the Lord Iesus Christ. 4.11.5.& 4.12.4.

7 Be delivered unto Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Iesus. 4.12.5.6.

6 Know yee not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lumpe? 4.12.5.

7 For Christ our passeover is sacrificed for us. 4.12.13.& 4.18.3.

11 If any that is called a brother, be a fornicater, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such a one to eate not. 4.1.15.& 4.12.5.

12 For what have I to doe, to iudge them also, which are without? doe ye not iudge them that are within? 4.11.5.

6.6 But a brother goeth to law with a brother and that under the infidels. 4.20.21.

7 Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because yee goe to law, one with another. 4.1.14.

9 Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdome of God, &c. 3.4.21.& 3.24.10.

10 Be not deceived, neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor wantons, nor buggerers, not theeves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor railers, nor extortioners shal inherite the kingdome of God. 3.4.21

11 But ye are iustified in the name of the Lord Iesus, and by the spirit of our God. 1.13.14 & 3.1.1.& 3.6.3.& 3.14.6.& 3.24.10.

13 Meates are ordained for the belly, and the belly for the meates: but God shall destroy both it and them, &c. 3.25.8.& 4.13.9.& 4.19.7.

15 Know yee not, that your bodies are members of Christ, &c. 3.6.3.& 3.25.8.& 4.17.9.

19 Know yee not, that your body is the temple of the holy Ghost which is in you, whom you have of God. &c. 1.13 15.& 3.3.9.& 3.25.7.& 3.25.8.& 4.3.1.

20 For ye are bought for a price: therefore glorifie God in your body, and in your spirit for they are Gods. 2.17.5.& 3.25.7.

7.2 Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his wife, and let every woman have her owne husband. 2.8.43

3 Let the husband give unto the wife due benevolence, and likewise also the wife unto the husband. 4.12.16.

5 Defraud not one another, except it bee with consent for a time, that ye may give your selves to fasting, and prayer and againe come together that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency. 4.12.16

9 I would that all men were even as I my selfe am: but every man hath his proper gift of God one after this maner, and another after that. 2.8.42.
9 But if they cannot abstaine, let them marrie: for it is better to marry than to burne. 2.8.43. & 4.13.17.
14 For the unbeleeving husband is sanctified by the wife, & the unbeleeving wife is sanctified by the husband, else were your children uncleane: but now are they holy. 2.1. 7. & 4.16.6. & 4.16.15. & 4.16.31.
19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing: but the keeping of the commandements of God. 4.14.24.
21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but yet if thou mayest be free, use it rather. 4.20.1.
23 Ye are bought with a price: bee not servants of men. 4.20.32.
31 And they that use this world, as though they used it not: for the fashion of this world goeth away. 3.10.1.4. & 4.19.7.
34 The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that shee may bee holie both in body and in spirit, &c. 3.10.1.4. & 4.19.7.
35 And this I speake for your owne commodities, not to tangle you in a snare. 4.10.2.
8.1 And as touching things sacrificed unto idols, wee know that wee have knowledge, &c. 4.10.22.
4 For though there bee that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, &c. 1.13.11
6 Yet unto us there is but one God, which is the father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord Iesus Christ, &c. 1.13. 11. & 2.3.6. & 2.14.3. & 2.15.5.
9 But take heede least by any meanes this power of yours bee an occasion of falling to them that are weake. 3.19.11. & 4.10.22.
9.1 Am I not an Apostle? am I not free? have I not seene Iesus Christ our Lord? are yee not my worke in the Lord? 3.14.15. & 4. 1.14. & 17.17. & 4.17.29.
2 For ye are the seale of my Apostleship in the Lord. 4.1.6.
5 Or have we not power to leade about a wife being a sister, as well as the rest of the Apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas. 4.12.25.
12 Nevertheless we have not used this power, but suffer all things, that we should not hinder the Gospell of Christ. 3.4.15.
16 And woe is unto mee, if I preach not the Gospell. 4.5.6.
19 For though I bee free from all men, yet have I made my selfe servant to all men, that I might win the more. 3.19.12.
20 And unto the Iewes I became as a Iew, that I might win the Iewes, &c. 4.19.29.
22 To the weake I become as weake, that I may win the weake: I am made all things to all men, that I might by all meanes save some. 3.19.12.
10.1 Moreover, brethren I would not that ye should be ignorant, that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the Sea. 2.10.5.
2 And were all baptised unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea. 4.15.9.
3 And did all eat the same spirituall meat. 4.14.23. & 4.18.20.
4 And did all drinke the same spirituall drink, for they dranke of the spirituall rocke that followed them: and the rocke was Christ. 1.13.10. & 2.9.1. & 4.14.26. & 17.15. 21.22.
5 But with many of them God was not pleased, for they were overthowne in the wilderneſſe. 4.14.24.
11 And all these things came unto them for examples, and were written to admonish us, upon whom the ends of the world are come. 2.10.5. & 3.2.22.
12 Wherefore let him that thinketh hee standeth, take heed lest he fall. 3.2.40. & 3. 24.6.
13 There hath no tentation taken you but such as appertaineth to man, &c. 3.20.40.
16 The cup of blessing which wee bleſſe, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? the bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? 4.17.10. & 4.17.15. & 4.17.22. & 4.17.38. & 4. 18.8.
17 For wee that are many are one bread and one body, because wee all are partakers of one bread. 4.17.14.
23 All things are lawfull for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawfull for me, but all things edifie not. 3.19.12.
25 Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, eat ye, and aske no question for conscience sake. 3.19.11.
28 But if any man say unto you, this is sacrificed unto idols, eat it not because of him that shewed it, and for thy conscience, &c. 3.19 6. & 4.10.4.
29 And the conscience I say not thine but of that other, &c. 3.19.11. & 4.10.4.
31 Whether therefore yee eate or drinke, or whatsoever ye doe, doe all to the glory of God 3.20.44.

32 Give none offence, neither to the Iewes nor to the Grecians, nor to the Church of God. 3.19.11.

11.4 Every man praying or prophecying having any thing on his head, dishonoreth his head. 4.19.26.

5 But every woman that prayeth or prophecieth bare headed, dishonoureth her head. 4.10.29.

7 For a man ought not to cover his head: forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man. 1. 15.4.

16 But if any man lust to be contentious, wee have no such custome, neither the Churches of God. 4.10.31.

20 When yee come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lords Supper. 4.18.12.

22 Have yee not houses to eat and drinke in? despise ye the Church of God? &c. 4.10.29.

23 For I have received of the Lord that which I also delivered unto you, &c. 4.17. 35.50.

24 And when he had given thanks, hee brake it, and said, take eat, this is my body, which is broken for you: this doe you in remembrance of me. 4.17.1. & 4.17.20.

25 After the same manner also hee tooke the cup, when he had supped, saying, this is the new Testament in my blood, &c. 4.17.37.

26 For as often as ye shall eat this bread and drinke this cup, yee shew the Lords death untill he come. 4.16.30. & 4.17.20.

28 Let a man therefore examine himselfe, and so let him eat of this bread, and drinke of this cup. 4.1.15. & 4.16.30. & 4.17.40

29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh his owne damnation, because hee discerneth not the Lords body. 4.1.15. & 4.16.30. & 4.17.33. 34.40.

31 For if wee would judge our selves wee should not be judged. 3.3.18.

32 But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, because we should not bee condemned with the world. 3.4 33. & 3.8.6, 12.3 Wherefore I declare unto you, that no man speaking by the spirit of God, calleth Iesus execrable, &c. 2.2.20.

6 And there are diversities of operations, but God is the same, which worketh all in all. 2.3.6.9.

8 For to one is given by the spirit, the word of wisdome, and to another the word of knowledge by the same spirit. 4.3.11.

10 And to another diversities of tongues, and to another the interpretation of tongues. 1. 13.14. & 3.2.9

11 And all these things worketh even the selfe same spirit, distributing to every man severally as he will. 1.13.14. & 4.13.3.

12 For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of the body which is one, though they be many, yet are but one body: even so is Christ. 1.13.16. & 3.7.5. & 3.16.2 & 4.17.22.

13 For by one spirit are wee all baptised into one body, whether we are Iewes or Grecians, &c. 4.24.7. & 4.15.15. and 4.16. 22.

25 Lest there should bee any division in the body; but that the members should have the same care one of another. 3.20.20.

28 And God hath ordained some in the church, as first Apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly, teachers, then them that doe miracles, after that the gift of healing, helpers, &c. 4.3,8. & 4.11.1. & 4.20.4.

31 But desire you the best gifts, and I will yet shew you a more excellent way. 3.2.9.

13.1. Though I speake with tongues of men and Angels, and have not love, I am as sounding brasse, or a tinneling Cymball. 2.5.4.

2 If I had all faith, so that I could remoove mountaines, and had not love, I were nothing. 3.18.8.

3 And though I feed the poore with all my goods, and though I give my body that I be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing. 4.13.13.

4 Love suffereth long, it is bountifull, love envieth not, love doth not boast it selfe, it is not puffed up. 3.7.5.6.

9 For we know in part, and wee prophecie in part. 3.2.20.

10 But when that which is perfect, is come, then that which is in part, shall bee abolished. 3.2.13.

12 For now we see through a glasse darkely, but then shall we see face to face, &c. 3.22. 11. & 4.18.20.

13 And now abideth faith, hope and love, even these three: but the chiefest of these is love. 3.18.8.

14.15 What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, but I will pray with the understanding also, &c. 3.10.5. & 3.20.32.

16 Else, when thou blessest with the spirit, how how shall hee that occupieth the roome of the unlearned, say Amen at thy giving of thanks, &c. 3.20.33

29 Let the Prophets speake two or three, and let the other iudge. 4.8.9. and 4.9.13
30 And if any thing be reuealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace. 4.1.13
34 Let your women keepe silence in the Churches, for it is not permitted vnto them to speake, &c. 4.10.29
40 Let all things be done honestly and by order. 2.8.32. and 3.20.29. and 4.3.10. and 4.10.27.30
15.6 After that he was seene of more than five hundred brethren at once, &c. 2.23.3
10 But I laboured more abundantly than they all, yet not I, but the grace of God which is in me. 2.3.11. and 4.1.6
12 Now, if it be preached, that Christ is risen from the dead, how say some among you, that there is no resurrection of the dead? 3.25.7. and 4.1.14
13 For if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen. 3.25.3
14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching in vaine, and your faith is also in vaine. 3.25.3
16 For if the dead be not raised, then is Christ not raised. 2.23.2
17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vaine, &c. 2.13.2. and 2.16.13
19 If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable. 3.9.6. and 3.18.4
20 But now is Christ risen from the dead, and is made the first fruites of them that slept. 2.16.13
21 For sith by man came death, by man came also the Resurrection of the dead. 2.1.6
22 For, as in Adam all men die, euen so in Christ shall all be made aliue. 4.16.17
25 For he must reigne till he hath put all his enemies vnder his feete. 2.16.16
28 And when all things shall be subdued vnto him, then shall the Sonne also himselfe be subiect vnto him, &c. 1.13.26. and 28. 30. and 2.14.3. and 2.15.5. and 3.20. 42. and 3.25.12
36 Thou foole, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die. 3.25.4
39 All flesh is not the same flesh, but there is one flesh of men, &c. 3.25.8
41 There is another glory of the Sonne, another glory of the Moone, another glory of the starres: for one starre differeth from another Starre in glory. 4.29.14
45 The first Adam Adam was made a liuing Soule: and the last Adam was made a quickning Spirit. 1.15.4. and 2.12.2
46 Howbeit that was not first made, which is spirituall, but that which is naturall, and afterward that which is spirituall. 4.16.32
47 The first man is of the earth, earthly: the second man is the Lord from heauen. 2.12.7. and 2.13.2. and 2.14.3. and 4.27.25
50 Flesh and blood cannot inherite the Kingdome of God, &c. 4.16.17
51 Behold, I shew you a secret thing, we shall not all sleepe, but we shall all be changed. 2.16.17. and 3.15.8.
52 In a moment, in the twinckling of an eye, at the last trumpet: for the trumpet shall blow, and the dead shall be raised vp incorruptible, and we shall be changed. 2.16.17
53 For this corruption must put on incorruption, &c. 3.25.7
54 So when this corruptible hath put on incorruptible, and this mortall hath put on immortality, &c. 3.25.10
16.2 Every first day of the weeke, let euery one of you put aside by himselfe, and lay vp as God hath prospered him, &c. 2.8.33
7 For I will not see you now in my passage: but I trust to abide a while with you, if the Lord permit. 2.27.11

II. CORINTHIANS.

1.2 GRace be with you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Iesus Christ. 2.13.13
3 The Father of mercy, and the God of all comfort. 3.20.37
6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and saluation which is wrought in the indoring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and saluation. 3.5.4
12 For our reioycing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly pureneſſe, and not in fleshly wisedome, &c. 3.2.41. and 3.17.14
19 For the Sonne of God, Iesus Christ who was preached among you by us, &c. 4.17.30
20 For all the promises of God in him are yea, and are in him Amen, &c. 2.9.2. and 3.2.32. and 3.20.17. and 4.14.20
22 Who hath also sealed us, and hath given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts. 1.7.4. and 3.1.3. and 3.2.36. and 3.24.1

23 Now, I call God for a record unto my Soule, that to spare you, I came not as yet to Corinthus. 2.8.24. and 2.8.27

24 Not that we have dominion over your Faith, but that we are helpers of your joy, &c. 4.8.9

2.6 It is sufficient unto the same man that he was rebuked of many. 3.4.13

7 So that now contrariwise, yee ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest the same should be swallowed up with overmuch heavinesse. 4.1.29. and 4.12.8

8 Wherefore, I pray you, that you would confirme your love towards him. 4.12.9

16 To the one wee are the savour of death, unto death: and to the other the savour of life unto life, &c. 2.5.5

3.3 In that yee are manifest to be the Epistle of Christ, ministred by us, and written not with yncke, &c. 2.8.57

5 Not that wee are sufficient of our selves to thinke any thing, as of our selves, &c. 2.2. 15, 27. and 2.3.6

6 Who also hath made us able Ministers of the new Testament, not of the letter, but of the Spirit: for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life. 1.9.3. & 2.7.2. and 3. 1.4. and 4.1.16. and 4.14.11

7 If then the ministration of death written with letters, and engraven in stones was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not behold the face, &c. 2.7.7

8 How shall not the ministration of the spirit be more glorious? 1.9.3

9 For if the ministery of condemnation was glorious, much more doth the ministration of Righteousnesse exceede in glory. 4. 3.3

14 Therefore their mindes are hardened: for until this day remaineth the same covering untaken away in the reading of the old Testament, which vaile in Christ is put away. 2.10.13

15 But even unto this day when Moses is read, the vaile is laid over their hearts. 2. 10.23

17 Now the Lord is the Spirit, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. 2.2.8

18 But we all behold as in a mirror, the glory of the Lord with open face, and are changed into the same image, &c. 1.15.4. and 1. 15.5. and 3.2.20. and 3.3.9

4.4 In whom the god of this world hath blinded the mindes, that is, of the Infidells, that the light of the glorious Gospell of Christ, which is the image of God, &c. 1.14.13 and 1.14.18. and 1.13.2. and 2.4.1

6 For God that commanded the light to shine out of the darknesse, is he which hath shined in our hearts, &c. 2.9.1. and 3.2.1 and 4.1.5. and 4.3.3

7 But wee have this treasure in earthen vessells, that the excellency of that power might be of God, and not of us. 4.1.5. and 4.3.1

8 Wee are afflicted on every side, yet are wee not in distresse: in poverty, but not overcome of poverty. 3.8.9. and 3.15.8

9 Wee are persecuted, but not forsaken: cast downe, but we perish not. 3.15.8

10 Every where we beare about in our body, the dying of the Lord Iesus, that the life of Iesus also might be made manifest in our mortall flesh. 3.15.5. and. 3.15.8. and 3. 18.7. and 3.25.3. and 3.25.7

13 And because we have the same spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken, &c. 3.2.35

5.1 For we know, that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be destroyed, wee have a building given of God, &c. 3.25.6

2 For therefore wee sigh, desiring to be clothed with our house, which is from Heaven. 3.9.5

4 Because wee would not be unclothed, but would be clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. 1.15.2. and 3.9.5

5 Who also hath given unto us the earnest of the spirit. 2.9.3. and 3.2.36

6 Therefore we are alwaies bold, though wee know, that whiles we are at home in this body, we are absent from the Lord. 1.15.2. & 3.2.14. and 3.9.4. & 3.25.1. & 3.25.6

7 For we walke by Faith, and not by sight. 3. 2.14

8 Nevertheless, wee are bold, and love rather to remove out of the body, and to dwell with the Lord. 1.15.2

10 For we must all appeare before the judgement seat of Christ, &c. 1.13.11. and 1. 15.2. and 3.18.1. and 3.25.7

18 And all things are of God, which hath reconciled us unto himselfe by Iesus Christ, &c. 3.2.29. and 3.5.5. and 3.11.4. and 4.6.3.

19 For God was in Christ, and reconciled the world to himselfe, not imputing their sinnes unto them, &c. 2.12.4. and 2.17.2. and 3.2.32. and 3.4.25. and 3.11.22. and 3. 14.11. and 4.1.22.

20 Now then are wee Embassadours for Christ:

Christs as though God did beseech you through us, &c. 3.4.27. and 4.1.22. and 4.3.1

21 For hee hath made him to be sinne for us, which knew no sinne, that wee should be made the righteousnesse of God in him. 2.16.5 and 2.16.6. & 2.17.2. and 3.5.2. and 3.11.11. and 3.11.22. and 3.11.23

6.8 By honour and dishonour, by evill report and good report, &c. 3.8.8

16 For yee are the Temple of the living God, &c. 1.13.15. and 3.6.3. and 3.16.2

7.1 Seeing then that we have these promises, dearely beloved, let us cleanse our selves from all filthinesse of the flesh and the spirit, &c. 1.15.2. and 2.5.11. and 2.9.3. and 3.16.2. and 3.25.7

10 For godly sorrow causeth repentance unto salvation not to be repented off: but the worldly sorrow causeth death, 3.3.7. and 3.4.2

11 For behold, this thing, that yee have been godly sory, what great care it hath wrought in you, &c. 3.3.15

8.11 Now therefore performe to doe it also, that as there was a readinesse to will, even so yee may performe it of that which yee have. 3.5.8

16 And thanks be unto God, which hath put in the heart of Titus the same care for you. 2.5.8

17 Because hee accepted the exhortation, &c. 2.5.8

9.6 That hee which soweth sparingly, shall reape also sparingly, and he that soweth liberally, shall reape also liberally. 3.18.6

7 As every man wisheth in his heart, so let him give, not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerefull giver. 3.16.3

12 For the ministration of this service, not onely supplieth the necessity of the Saints, &c. 3.7.5

10.4 For the weapons of our warfare are not carnall, but mighty through God, to cast, &c. 4.8.9. and 4.11.5. and 4.11.10

6 And having ready the vengeance against all disobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled. 4.6.3

8 For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, &c. 4.8.1

11.14 And no marvell: for Satan himselfe is transformed into an Angel of light. 1.9.2. and 4.12.12

12.2 I know a man in Christ above fourteen yeares agone (whether he were in the body, I cannot tell, God knoweth) which was taken up into the third heaven. 1.9.1. and 1.14.4. and 4.3.3

4 How that hee was taken up into Paradise, and heard words which cannot be spoken, which are not possible for man to utter. 1.14.4

7 And lest I should be exalted out of measure, though the abundance of revelations, there was given unto mee a pricke in the flesh, the messenger of Satan, &c. 1.14.18. and 3.3.14. and 4.17.34

8 For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from mee. 1.13.20 9 And he said unto mee, my grace is sufficient for thee? &c. that the power of Christ may dwell in me. 1.3.13 & 1.13.20. and 3.3.14.

21 I feare lest when I come againe, my God debase me, among you, and I shall bewaile many, &c. 3.3.18. and 4.1.27

13.4 For though he was crucified concerning his infirmity, yet liveth hee through the power of God. And we no doubt are weake in him, &c. 2.13.2. and 2.14.6. and 2.16.13

5 Prove your selves, whether yee are in the Faith: examine your selves: know yee not your owne selves, how that Iesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? 3.2.39

10 According to the power which the Lord hath given mee, to edification, and not to destruction. 4.8.1

13 The grace of our Lord Iesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the holy Ghost, &c. 3.1.2

Galathians.

1.1 PAul an Apostle not of men, neither by man, but of Iesus Christ. 4.3.13. and 4.3.14

2 And all the brethren that are with mee, unto the Churches of Galatia. 4.1.14

3 Grace be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Iesus Christ. 1.13.13

6 I marvell that yee are so soone removed away unto another Gospell, from him that hath called you in the grace of Christ. 4.1.27

8. But though that wee, or an Angell from Heaven preach unto you otherwise than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. 4.9.12

16 To reveale his Sonne in mee, that I should preach him among the Gentiles, &c. 3.22.7

18 Then after three yeeres I came againe to Ierusalem to visit Peter, and abode with him fifteene daies. 4.6.7. and 4.6.14

2.1 Then foureteene yeers after, I went up againe to Ierusalem with Barnabas, and tooke with me Titus also. 4.6.14

3 But neither yet Titus which was with me, though he were a Grecian, was compelled to be circumcised. 3.19.12

6 God accepteth no mans person, &c. 3. 23.10

7 When they saw the Gospell of the uncircumcision was committed unto mee, as the Gospell of the circumcision was unto Peter. 4.6.7.

8 For hee that was mighty by Peter in the Apostleship over the circumcision, was also mighty by me towards the Gentiles. 4.1. 6. and 4.6.7

9 And when Iames, and Cephas, and Iohn knew of the grace that was given unto mee, &c. 4.6.13

14 But when I saw, that they went not the right way to the truth of the Gospell, I said unto Peter before all men, if thou, &c. 4.12.3

16 Know that a man is not iustified by the workes of the Law, but by the faith of Iesus Christ, &c. 3.17.2

19 For I through the Law am dead to the Law, and that I might live unto God, &c. 2.16.7

20 Thus I live yet, not I now, but Christ liveth in me, &c. 4.19.35

3.1 O foolish Galathians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, &c. 1.11.7. and 4.1.27. and 4.18.11

2 Received yee the Spirit by the works of the Law, or by the hearing of the Faith preached? 3.2.33. and 4.1.6

6 Yea, rather as Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousnesse. 3.17.8

8 For the Scriptures foreseeing, that God would iustifie the Gentiles through faith, preached before the Gospell unto Abraham, &c. 3.11.3

10 For as many as are of the workes of the Law, are under the curse: for it is written, cursed is every man that continueth not in all things, &c. 2.7.5. and 2.7.17. and 2.16.2. and 3.11.19

12 And the Law is not of Faith: but the Man that shall doe these things shall live in them. 3.11.18. and 3.11.19

13 Christ hath redeemed us from the curse, &c. 2.7.15. and 2.8.57. and 2.16.2. and 2.16.6. and 2.16.19. and 2.17.4. and 3.4.27. and 3.11.12. and 3.19.3. and 4.13.21

16 Now, to Abraham and to his seede were the promises made, &c. 2.6.2. and 2.13.3. and 4.14.21

17 And this I say, that the Law which was foure hundred and thirty yeeres after, cannot disannull the Covenant that was confirmed afore of God in respect of Christ, that it should make the promises of no effect. 3.11.20

18 For if the inheritance be of the Law, it is no more by the promise, but God gave it unto Abraham by promise. 3.11.17

19 Wherefore then serveth the Law? it was added because of the transgression, &c. 1. 14.9. and 2.5.6. and 2.7.2

21 Is the Law then against the promises of God? God forbid, &c. 3.11.19. & 3.4.6

22 But the Scripture hath concluded all under sinne, that the promise by the faith of Iesus Christ should be given to them that beleeve 3.4.6

24 Wherefore the Law was a Schoolemaster to bring us to Christ, that wee might be made righteous by faith. 2.7.2. and 2.7. 11. and 2.11.5

27 For all yee that are baptised into Christ, have put on Christ. 2.1.3. & 3.1.3. & 4. 14.7. & 4.15.6. & 4.16.21. & 4.19.8

28 There is neither Iew nor Grecian: there is neither bond nor free: there is neither male nor female: for yee are all one in Christ Iesu. 2.11.11. and 4.20.1

4.1 Then this I say, that the heire as long as he is a childe, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be Lord of all, 2.11.2. and 2.11.5. and 2.11.13

2 But is under Tutors and Governors, until the time appointed of the Father. 4.10.14

3 Even so wee, when we were children, were in bondage under the rudiments of the world. 4.10.14

4 But when the fulnesse of time was come, God sent forth his Sonne, borne of a woman, &c. 2.16.5. and 2.7.15. and 2.11. 11. and 2.12.7. and 2.13.1. and 2.13. 3. and 2.17.5. and 4.20.15

5 That hee might redeeme them which were under the Law, that we might receive the adoption, &c. 2.7.15. and 3.19.2.

6 And because yee are the Sonnes, God hath hath sent forth the Spirit of his Sonne into your hearts, which cryeth, Abba, that is, Father. 2.14.5. & 3.1.3. & 3.2.11. & 3. 12.5. & 3.20.37

7 But even then, when ye knew not God, yee did service unto them which by nature are not Gods. 1.4.3. & 1.12.3.

8 But now, seeing yee know God, yee are rather knowne of God, &c. 4.1.27. and 4.10.10 & 4.19.7.

10 Ye observe dayes, and moneths, and times, and yeares. 2.8.33

11 I am in feare of you, least I have bestowed on you labour in vaine. 2.8.33.

12 For it is written that Abraham had two Sonnes, one by a Servant, another by a free woman. 2.11.9. & 4.8.3

24 By the which things, another thing is meant: for these Mothers, are the two Testaments, &c. 2.11.9.

25 For Agar or Sina is a Mountaine in Arabia, and it answereth to Jerusalem that now is, &c. 3.2.6

26 But Jerusalem, which is above, is free: and is the Mother of us all. 4.1.1.

28 We are after the manner of Isaac, children of the promise. 4.16.12

30 Put out the servant and her sonne. &c. 3. 18.3

5.1 Stand fast in the liberty therefore, wherewith Christ hath made us free, &c. 3.19.3 3.19.14. & 4.10.8. & 4.10.9. & 4.20. 1.

4 Whosoever are justified by the Law, yee are fallen from grace. 3.19.14.

5 For we through the spirit, wait for the hope of righteousnesse through faith. 3.2.42.

6 In Christ Iesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, &c. 3. 11.20.

13 For brethren, yee have beene called unto liberty; onely use not your liberty, &c. 3.19. 11.

14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, which is, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. 2.8.53

17 For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh, &c. 2.7.3. & 2.2 27.

19 Moreover the workes of the flesh are manifest, which are adultrie, fornication, uncleannesse, wantonnesse. 2.1.8. & 3.14.1. & 4.15.10

6.10 While we have therefore time, let us doe good unto all men, &c. 3.7.6. & 3.20.38.

14 But God forbid that I should reioyce, but in the crosse of our Lord Iesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world. 2.16.7

15 For in Christ Iesus, neither circumcision, availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, &c. 4.14.24

17 From henceforth let no man put me to businesse, for I beare in my body the markes, &c. 3.18.7. & 3.25.8.

Ephesians.

1.2 Grace be with you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Iesus Christ. 1.13.13

3 Which hath blessed us with all spirituall blessing in heavenly things in Christ. 3.22. 10

4 As hee hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that wee should bee holy, &c. 2.3.8. & 2.8.51. & 2.12 5. & 2.16 4. & 3.15.5. & 3.17.15. & 3.19.2. & 3. 22. 1. 3. 23. 12 & 3.24.3. & 3. 24.5.

5 Who hath predestinate us to bee adopted through Iesus Christ unto himselfe. 2.12. 5. & 3.11.4. & 3.18.2.

6 To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherewith hee hath made us accepted in his beloved. 2.17.2. & 3.1.32. & 3.11.4.

7 By whom we have redemption through his blood, &c. 3.4.30

9 And hath opened unto us the mysterie of his will, according to his good pleasure, &c. 4. 14.2. & 4.19.36

10 That in the dispensation of the fulnesse of the times, hee might gather together in one all things, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth, even in Christ. 2.12.5. & 3.20.21

13 In whom also yee have trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, even the Gospell of our salvation. &c. 1.7.4. & 2.2.3. & 2. 10.3. & 3.1.4. & 3.2.36. & 3.24.1. & 3. 24.8.

14 Which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption, &c. 3.24.8

17 That the God of our Lord Iesus Christ, the Father of glory, might give unto you the Spirit of wisedome, &c. 2.2.21.

18 That yee may know, what the hope of his calling, and what the riches of his glorious inheritance is in the Saints. 3.2.16. & 4.8.11

20 Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, &c. 2.16.15.

21 Farre above all principality and power, and might, and domination, and every name that is named, &c. 1.14.5. and 2.15.3. and 2.16.15

22 And he hath appointed him over all things to be the head to the Church. 2.15.5. and 4.6.9
23 Which is his body, even the fulnesse of him that filleth all in all things. 2.15.5. and 3.20.38. and 4.1.10. and 4.17.9
2. 1 That were dead in trespasses, and sinnes, &c. 3.24.10
2 Wherein in time past ye walked, according to the course of this world, and after the Prince that ruleth in the ayre, &c. 1.14.13. and 1.14.18. and 2.4.1. and 3.24.10
3 Among w om we also had our conversation in time past, in the lusts of our flesh, in fulfilling the will of the flesh, and of the mind, &c. 2.1.6. and 2.1.11. and 4.16.17
4 But God which is rich in love, through his great love wherewith he loved us. 3.14.5
5 Even when wee were dead by sinnes hee quickned us, &c. 3.5.19
6 And hath raised us up together, and made us to sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus. 2.16.16. and 3.15.6. and 3.25.1
8 For by grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of your selves: it is the gift of God. 3.13.2. and 3.14.18
9 Not of works, least any man should boast himselfe. 3.13.2
10 For wee are his workemanship created in Christ Iesus unto good works, &c. 2.3.6. and 3.3.21. and 3.14.5. and 3.15.7. and 3.23.13
11 Wherefore remember that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, and called uncircumcision, &c. 4.14.12. & 4.16.15
12 That ye were, I say, at that time without Christ, and were alienates from the commonwealth of Israel, &c. 1.4.3. and 1.5.12. and 2.6.1. and 3.24.10. and 4.14.12. and 4.16.3. and 4.16.24
14 For he is our peace, which hath made of both one, &c. 2.7.17. and 2.11.11. and 3.2.28 and 3.2.32. and 3.13.4. and 4.16.13
16 And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the Crosse, &c. 3.17.2
19 Now therefore, yee are no more strangers and forreiners but Citizens, &c. 3.25.1
20 And are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, &c. 1.7.2. and 4.2.1. and 4.2.4. and 4.6.5
21 In whom all the building coupled together, groweth unto an holy Temple in the Lord. 3.15.5. & 3.16.2
3. 2 If yee have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God, which is given me to you ward. 4.14.2
7 Whereof I am made a minister by the gift of the grace of God, &c. 3.22.7
10 To the intent, that now unto principalities, and powers in heavenly places, &c. 1.18.3. & 2.11.12. & 3.24.16
12 By whom we have boldnesse and entrance by confidence, &c. 3.2.15. & 3.13.5. & 3.20.12
14 For this cause, I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ. 3.2.15
15 Of whom is named the whole family in heaven and in earth. 2.14.7
16 That hee might grant you according to the riches of his glory, that ye may be strengthened, &c. 3.12.5.
17 That Christ may dwell in your hearts by Faith, &c. 2.9.3. & 2.12.5. & 4.17.5
18 That ye being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all Saints, &c. 2.12.5. & 3.2.14. & 3.14.19 19 And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, &c. 2.12.5.
4.2 With long suffering supporting one another through love. 4.12.11. & 4.12.13
3 Indevouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. 4.12.11. & 4.12.13
4 There is one body, and one Spirit, &c. 4.1.3. & 4.3.1. & 4.6.10
5 There is one Lord, one Faith, and one baptisme. 1.13.16 & 4.7.5
7 But unto every one of us is given grace, &c. 3.15.5. & 3.1.2. & 3.6.10
8 When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, &c. 1.13.11. & 2.16.16
10 He that descended, is even the same that ascended far above all heavens, &c. 2.16.14. & 4.3.2. & 4.6.10
12 He also therefore gave some to be Apostles, and some to be Prophets &c. 4.1, 1.5. & 4.3.4. & 4.6.10. & 4.8.12
12 For the gathering together of the Saints, that for the workes of the ministerie, &c. 4.1.5
13 Till we all meete together, in the unity of Faith, &c. 4.14.8
14 That we be no more henceforth children, waxing & caried away with every wind of doctrine, &c. 4.3.1
15 But let us follow the truth in love, and in all things grow up into him, &c. 2.16.15. and

1.15.& 3.1.1.& 3,1.3.& 4.3.2.& 4.6.9,
& 4.17.9
16 By whom all the body being coupled and knit together by every joynt, &c. 2.13.1
& 4.6.9
17 This I say therfore, and testifie in the Lord that ye henceforth walke not, &c. 2.3.1
18 Having their cogitation darkned, and being strangers, &c. 2.3.1.
20 But ye have not so learned Christ, 3.2.6
& 3.6 4
22 That is, that ye cast off concerning the conversation in times past, the old man, &c 3.3.8.& 3.6.4
23 And be renued in the spirit of your minde. 2.1.9.& 2.3.1.& 3.3.8.& 3.7.1
24 And put on the new man, which after God is created, &c. 1.15.4
25 Neither give place to the devill. 1.14.18
28 Let him that stoll, steale no more, but let him rather labour, &c. 3.24.10
30 And grieve not the holy spirit of God by whom, &c. 2.5.8
5.1 Be yee therefore followers of God as deare children. 3.6.3
2 And walke in love, even as Christ hath loved us, and hath given himselfe, &c. 2,17
5.& 4.19.23.
6 Let no man deceive you with vaine words, for such things, &c. 3.2.27
8 For ye were once darkenes, but are now light in the Lord. &c. 3.16.2.& 3.24.10.
14 Awake thou that sleepest, and stand up from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. 2.5.19.
23 For the husband is the wives head, even as Christ is the head of the Church, &c. 3.6.3.& 4.6.9
25 And gave himselfef or it. 4.1.17.& 4.8. 12.
26 That he might sanctifie it, and cleanse, &c 3.3.11. & 3.6.3.& 4.1.13.& 4.15.2.& 4.16.22
27 That he might make it unto himselfe a glorious Church, not having, &c. 3.3.11 & 4.1.10
28 So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies, &c. 4.19.35
29 For no man ever yet hated his owne flesh, but nourisheth it, and cherisheth it, even as the Lord doth the Church. 4.19.35.
30 For wee are members of his body, of his flesh, &c. 2.12.2.& 2.12,7 & 3.1.3.& 4.17.9
32 This is a great mystery, but I speake concerning Christ, and concerning the Church. 4.19.24
6.1 Children obey your parents in the Lord &c. 2.8.36.& 2.8.38.& 4.20.29.
4 And ye Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, &c. 4.20.29.
9 Neither is there respect of persons with him. 3.13.10.
10 Finally my brethren be strong in the Lord, &c. 2.5.8
12 For we wrestle not against flesh and blood &c. 1.14.13.& 1.17 8
13 For this cause take unto you the whole armour of God, &c. 1.14.13.& 2.5.11.
16 Above all take the shield of Faith, wherewith ye may quench all. &c. 3.2.21.& 3.20 21.
18 And pray alway with all manner of prayer supplication in the spirit, &c. 3.20.5.& 2. 20.7.& 3.20.12
19 And for mee, that utterance may bee given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, &c. 3.20.20

PHILIPPIANS.

1.1 PAul and Timothy the servants of Iesus Christ, &c. 4.3.7.& 4.3.8
4 Alwaies in all my prayers for all you. &c. 2. 2.25
6 I am perswaded of this same thing, that he that hath begun this same good worke in you, &c. 2.3.6.& 3.18.1.& 3.24.6
20 As I heartily looke for, and hope that in nothing I shall bee ashamed, but that with all confidence, &c. 3,24.3
23 For I am greatly in doubt on both sides, desiring to be loosed and to bee with Christ. &c. 3.9.4
29 For unto you it is given for Christ, that not only ye should beleeve in him, &c. 2.17 5.
2.1 Fulfill my joy, that ye be like minded, having the same love, &c. 4.2.5
3 That nothing be done through contention, or vaine glory, but that in meekenesse, &c. 3.7.4
5 Let the same minde be in you, that was even in Christ Iesus. 4.2.5
6 Who being in the forme of God, thought it no robbery, &c. 1.13.11. & 1.13.14.
7 But he made himselfe of no reputation, and tooke on him the forme of a servant, and was made like unto men, &c. 1.13.24. & 2. 13.2.& 2.16.5.& 4.17.25.

8 He humbled himselfe, and became obedient unto the death, &c. 2.13.2. & 2.14.3 & 3. 15.8. & 4.14.12.
9 Wherefore God hath also highly exalted him, and given him a name, &c. 2.11.12. & 2.13.2. & 2.15.5. & 2.16.15. & 2.17. 6.
10 That at the name of Iesus should every knee bow, &c. 1.13.14. & 2.11.11. & 2. 14.3. & 3.5.8
12 Wherefore my beloved, as yee have alwaies obeyed, not as in my presence, &c. 2 5.11 3.2.23. & 3.18.1
13 For it is God that worketh in you both the will and the deede, &c. 2.2.27. & 2.3.6. & 2.3.11. & 2.5.11. & 3.2.23. & 3. 11.12
15 That they may be blamelesse, and pure, and the sonnes of God without rebuke, &c. 3.17. 15.
17 Yea and though I bee offered up upon the sacrifice, and service of your faith, I am glad and rejoyce with you all. 3.2.6
20 For I have no man like minded, who will faithfully care for your matters. 4.6.15
21 For all seeke their owne, and not that which is Iesus Christs. 4.6.15.
3.5 An Ebrew of the Ebrewes, by the law a Pharisee. 3.14.10
6 Concerning zeale, I persecuted the Church &c. 3.24.10
8 Yea doubtlesse I thinke all things but losse, for the excellent knowledge sake of Christ Iesus my Lord, &c. 3.11.13. & 3.25.2
10 That I may know him, and the vertue of his resurrection, &c. 2.16.13. & 3.8.2. & 3.15.8. & 3.25.2
12 Not as though I had already attained to it, either were already perfect, but, &c. 4.8. 11.
13 But one thing I doe: I forget that which is behinde, &c. 3.14.13. & 3.25.1
15 Let us therefore as many as bee perfect, bee thus minded, and if yee be otherwise minded &c. 3.2.4. & 4.1.12
20 But our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we looke for the Saviour, &c. 3.25.2. & 4.17.27. & 4.17.29.
21 Who shall change our vile body, &c. 3. 25 4. & 3.25.8. & 4.17.29.
4.3 Yea, and I beseech thee, faithfull yoke fellow, helpe those women that laboured with me in the Gospell, &c. 3.24.9
6 Bee nothing carefull, but in all things let your requests be shewed to God in prayer and supplication, &c. 3.20.28. & 3.26.40.
12 And I can be abased, and I can bound every where in all things I am instructed, &c. 3.10.5. & 3.19.9.
18 I was even filled, after that I had received of Epiphroditus, &c. 4.18.16.

COLOSSIANS.

1.4 SInce we heard of your faith in Christ Iesus, and of your love toward all Saints. 2 10.3. & 3183
5 For the hopes sake, which is laid up for you in heaven, &c. 3.18.3. & 3.25.1
9 For this cause wee also, since the day wee heard of it, cease not to pray for you, &c. 2.2.25
10 And increasing in the knowledge of God. 2.2.25
12 Giving thanks unto the father which hath made us. &c. 3.22.1
13 Who hath delivered us from the power of darkenesse, &c. 4.15.6
14 In whom we have redemption through his bl. bloud, &c. 2.17.5. & 3.4.30. & 3.15. 5.
15 Who is the image of the invisible God, the first borne of every creature 2.2.20. & 2.6 4. & 2.12.4. & 2.12.7. & 2.14.1. & 2.14 5.
16 For by him were all things created, which are in heaven, and which are in earth, things visible and invisible, &c. 1.14.10. & 2.12.7
18 And hee is the head of the body of the Church, &c. 2.12.7. & 4.6.9.
20 And by him to reconcile all things unto himselfe, &c. 1.14.10. & 2.17.2. & 3.4.27 & 3.15.5
21 And you which were in times past strangers and enemies, because your mindes, &c. 2.16.2. & 3.14.6
22 Hath he now also reconciled, in the body of his flesh, &c. 2.16.2
24 Now rejoyce I in my sufferings for you, &c 3.5.2. & 3.5.4. & 4.12.5
26 Which is the mystery hid since the world began: and from all ages, but now is made manifest unto his Saints. 2.7.17 & 2.11. 12. & 3.2.14. & 4.14.2
2.2 That their hearts might bee comforted, and they knit together in love, &c. 3.2.14
3 In whom are hid all the treasures of wisedome and knowledge. 2.12.4. & 2.15.2. & 3.2.13. & 2.11.5. & 3.11.12. & 4.8.7. & 4.10.8. & 4.18.20.
8 Beware lest there bee any man that spoile

you through Philosophy. 14.10,8.& 4.10,24

9 For in him dwelleth all the fulnes of the Godhead bodily. 1.13,13.& 3.11,5

10 And ye are compleate in him, which is the head of all principality and power. 1.14,5.& 4.6,9

11 In whom also ye are circumcised with circumcision made without hands. 4.14,24.& 4.16,11

12 In that ye are buried with him in Baptisme. 3.25,8.& 4.15,5.& 4.16,21

13 And ye which were dead in sins, and in the uncircumcision of your flesh. 2.7,17

14 And putting out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us. 2.7,17 & 2.17,5.& 3.4,5

15 And hath spoiled the principalities and powers, and hath made a shew of them openly. 2.16,6

16 Let no man therefore condemne you of meate and drinke, or in respect of an holy day. 2.8,33

17 Which are but a shadow of things to come: but the body is in Christ. 2.7,16 & 2.8,31.& 4.14,22.& 14.25

19 And holdeth not the head, whereof all the body is furnished, and knit together by joints. 2.15,1

20 Wherefore if you be dead with Christ from the ordinances of the world. 4.10,9.& 4.10,13.& 4.19,7

21 Touch not, nor taste not, &c. 4.10,13

23 Which things have indeed a shew of wisedome, in voluntary religion. 4.10,9 & 4.10,24.& 4.13,2

3.1 If then you be risen with Christ, seeke those things which are above 3.6,3.& 4.17,36

2 Set your affections on things which are above, and not on things which are on the earth. 4.17,36

3 For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. 2.16,7.& 2.16,13.& 3.25,1

5 Mortifie therefore your members which are on the earth, fornication, uncircumcision, &c. 2.16,13,6

6 For the which things sake the wrath of God commeth on the children of disobedience. 3.2,27

9 Lie not one to another, seeing that yee have put off the old man. 3.3,8

10 And have put on the new, which is renewed, &c. 1,15,4.& 2.12,9.& 3.3,9

11 Where is neither Grecian nor Iew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, &c. 14.20,1

14 And above all these things put on love, 2.8,5 1.& 3.18,8.& 4.13,13

16 Teaching and admonishing your owne selves, in Psalmes and Hymnes. 3.20,32

20 Children, obey your parents 2.8,36

24 Knowing that of the Lord, ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance. 3.18,2

25 Neither is there any respect of persons. 3.23,10

4.3 Praying also for us that Gods may open unto us the doore of utterance. 3.20,20

17 And say to Archippus, take heed to the ministery that thou hast received. 4.3,7

I. Thessalonians.

2.18 Therefore we would have come unto you (I Paul) &c. 1.17,11

19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crowne of rejoycing? 3.25,10

3.5 Even for this cause, when I could no longer forbeare, I sent him that I might know of your faith. 3.20,46.& 4.1,6

12 And the Lord increase you, & make you abound in love one toward another. 2.5,6

13 To make your hearts stable, and unblamable in holinesse before God. 3.17,15

4.3 For this is the will of God, even your sanctification. 3.16,2

7 For God hath not called us unto uncleanesse, but unto holinesse. 3.16,2.& 3.19 2.& 3.23,11

15 For this say we unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which live, and are remaining in the comming of the Lord, shall not prevent those which sleepe. 3.25,8

16 For the Lord himselfe shal descend from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of the Archangell, and with the trumpet of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise. 1.14,8. and 2 16,17

17 Then shall we which live and remaine, be caught up with them also in the clouds to meet the Lord in the aire: and so shall we be ever with the Lord. 2.16,17

5.2 For you your selves know perfectly, that the day of the Lord shall come even as a theefe in the night. 4.19,34

9 For God hath not appoint us unto wrath, but to obtaine salvation by the meanes of our Lord Iesus Christ. 3.16,2

17 Pray continually. 3.20,7.& 3.20,28

18 In al things give thanks, for this is the wil of God in Christ Iesus toward you. 3.20,28

19 Quench

19 Quench not the spirit. 1.9,3. & 2.5,11
20 Despise not prophecying. 1.9,3
23 Now the very God of peace sanctify you throughout: and I pray God that your whole spirit soule and body, may be kept blameleſſe unto the comming of our Lord Ieſus Christ. 3.6,3. & 3.17,15. & 3. 25,7

II. Thessalonians.

1.4 SO that we our ſelves rejoyce of you in the Churches of God, becauſe of your patience and faith in all your perſecutions and tribulations that ye ſuffer. 3.2,11
5 Which is a token of the righteous judgement of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdome of God, for the which ye alſo ſuffer. 3.2,11. & 3.18.7
6 For it is a righteous thing with God, to recompenſe tribulatiō to them that trouble you. 3.9,6. & 3.18,7. & 3.25,4
7 And to you which are troubled, reſt with us when the Lord Ieſus ſhall ſhew himſelfe from heaven with his mighty Angels: 3.18,7
9 Which ſhall bee puniſhed with everlaſting perdition, from the preſence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. 3. 25.12
10 When he ſhall come to be glorified in his Saints, and to be made marvellous in all them that beleeve (becauſe our teſtimony toward you was beleeved) in that day. 3.25,10
11 Wherefore, we alſo pray alwayes for you that our God may make you worthy of his calling, and fulfill all the good pleaſure of his goodneſſe, and the worke of faith with power. 2.5,8. & 3.2,35
2.3 Let no man deceive you by any meanes for that day ſhall not come except there come a departing firſt, and that that man of ſin be diſcloſed, even the ſonne of perdition. 4.9.7
4 And exalteth himſelfe againſt all that is called God, or that is worſhipped, ſo that he doth ſit as God in the temple of God, &c. 4.2,12. & 4.7,25. & 4.7,29. & 4.9,4
9 Even him whoſe comming is by the working of Satan with all power and ſignes, and lying wonders. 1.14,17
11 And therefore God ſhal ſend them ſtrong delusion, that they ſhould beleeve lyes. 1 14,17. & 1.18,2. & 2.4,5
12 That all they might be damned, which beleeve not the truth, but had pleaſure in unrighteouſneſſe. 1.18.2. & 2.4,5
13 But wee ought alwayes to give thankes to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, becauſe he hath choſen you from the beginning to ſalvation, through ſanctification of the ſpirit, and beleefe of the truth. 3.1,2
14 Wherevnto he called you by our Goſpell, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Ieſus Christ. 2.10,3
3.6 We doe command you brethren, in the name of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, that yee withdraw your ſelves from every brother that walketh inordinately, &c. 4.1,26
10 For even when we were with you, this we warned you off, that if there were any that would not worke, that he ſhould not eate. 4.16,29
12 Thoſe that be ſuch manner of perſons, we command, and beſeech for our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, that they worke with quietneſſe, and eate their owne bread. 3.1,26
14 And if there be any that follow not our counſell, note him by a letter, and have no company with him, that he may bee aſhamed. 4.12,5 15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admoniſh him as a brother. 4.12,10

I. Timothie.

1.5 THe end of the Law, is love out of a pure heart, and good conſcience, of faith unfained. 2.5,6. & 2.8,5 1. & 3. 2,12. & 3.19,16. & 4.10,4
9 Knowing that the law is not put for juſt men, but for the lawleſſe and diſobedient, and for thoſe that will not be ruled, for the wicked, &c. 2.7,10
13 I, I ſay which was firſt a blaſphemer, & a perſecuter, and a doer of wrong: but he had mercy of me, for I did it ignorantly, not beleeving. 3.3,12
15 Chriſt Ieſus came into the world to ſave ſinners, of which I am chiefeſt. 2.12,5
17 To the king eternall, immortall, inviſible, the only wiſe God, be honour and glory, &c. 1.13,11,24
19 Having faith and a good conſciene, the which being put away, ſome have made ſhipwracke of faith. 3.2,12
2.1 I exhort therefore, that firſt of all prayer, ſupplications, interceſſions, and giving of thankes be made for all men: 3. 20,19. & 4.20,23

2 For kings and for al that are in authority, that we may leade a quiet and peaceable life in all holinesse & honesty. 4.20,5,27
4 Who would have all men be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth. 3,.14. 15
5 One God and one Mediatour betweene God and man, the man Christ Iesus. 2.12 1. & 2.17,5. & 3,20,17,20. & 4.12,25
6 Who gave himselfe a ransome for al men, I say Christ, that testimony ordained in due time. 2.17,5. & 3.4,30
8 I will therefore that the men pray every where, lifting up pure hands without wrath or doubting. 3.20,29. & 3.25,7. & 4.19,2
3.2 A Bishop ought to be unblameable, the husband of one wife, watchfull, sober, setled, harborous, apt to teach. 4.3,12. & 4. 4,7,10. & 4.5,2. & 4.2,23,24
9 Holding the mystery of the faith with a pure conscience. 3.2,13. & 4.19,36
15 Which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of all Truth. 4.1, 10, & 4.2,1,10. & 4.8,21
16 And without controversie great is the mystery of godlinesse, God was made manifest in the flesh. 1.13,11. & 4.14,2
4.1 The spirit speaketh evidently, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, and shall give heed to spirits of error, and to doctrine of divels. 4.19.4
2 Teaching lyes through hypocrisie, whose conscience is marked with a hot yron. 4. 9.14
3 Forbidding marriage, and commanding to abstaine from meat, which God hath created to be received with thankesgiving of the faithfull and of them that have knowne the truth. 4.9,14. & 4.12,23
4 For whatsoever God hath created is good, nor nothing is to be refused if it bee taken with thankesgiving. 3.19,8
5 For it is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer. 3.19,8. & 3.20.28
6 Being nourished up in the words of faith, and in good doctrine which thou hast continually followed. 3.2,13
8 But godlinesse is profitable which hath promise of this life, and of the life to come. 2.9,3. & 3.2,28. & 3.20,44
10 Therfore we labour and are reproached, because we hope in the living God, which is the Saviour of all men, but most chiefely of the faithfull. 3.8,8 13 Attend unto reading, exhortation and doctrine untill I come. 1.9,1.
14 Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee to prophecy, with laying on of the hands of the Elders. 4.3, 16. & 4.19,28
5.9 Let not a widow be taken into the number that is yonger than 60. yeeres old, that hath been the wife of one husband. 4.3,9
12 Therefore to be condemned, because they have forsaken their first faith. 4.13,18
17 The Elders that rule well, are worthy of double honor, but most chiefely those that doe labour in the word and doctrine. 2.8, 3?,4,11,1 20 Those that offend, reprove openly, that the rest may feare. 4.12,3
21 I charge thee before God and our Lord Iesus Christ, and the elect Angels, that thou keepe these things without preferring one before another, and doe nothing partially. 1.14,9,16. & 3.23,4
22 Lay hands suddenly upon no man, neither be partaker of other mens. 4.3,12,15
6.4 He is puffed up and knoweth nothing, but doteth about questions and strife of words, of which there riseth envy, strife raylings, and evill surmising. 1.3,13
10 For the roote of all evill is the love of money, the which whilest some lusted after, they have erred from the faith, and pearced themselves through with many sorrowes. 3.2,13
16 Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light that none can attain unto, whom never man saw, neither yet can see, unto whom be honour and power everlasting. Amen. 1.6,3. & 1.18,3. & 2.2,1
17 Charge those that be rich in this world, that they be not high minded, and that they put no trust in uncertaine riches, but in the living God, who giveth all things abundantly to enjoy. 3.18,6 20 O Timothy, keepe that that is committed unto thee, and avoid profane and vaine bablings, and oppositions of science falsely so called. 1.16,8

II. Timothie.

1.1 PAul the Apostle of Iesus Christ, by the will of God, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Iesus. 2. 9.3
6 I do put thee in remembrance that thou stirre up the gift of God which is in thee, by the laying on of my hands. 4.3,16
9 Who

9 Who hath saved you and hath called you with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his owne purpose and grace, &c. 2.12,5. & 3.14,5. & 3. 22,3. & 4.1,26.
10 But now is made manifest by the appearing of our Lord Iesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospell. 2.9,2. & 3.25,1.
12 For the which cause also I suffer these things, neither am I ashamed: I know whom I have beleeved, and I am perswaded, he is able to keepe that I have cõmited unto him against that day. 3.2,31, & 3.25,4.
14 That worthy thing that was committed unto thee, keepe through the holy Ghost which is in us. 3.2,33.
18 The Lord grant him that hee may finde mercy with the Lord in that day. 3.25,10
2.10 Therefore I suffer all things for the Elects sake, that they might also obtaine the salvation that is in Christ Iesu, with eternall glory. 3.5,4.
12 If we be dead with him, we shal also live with him, and if we suffer, we shall also reigne with him. 3.15,8.
13 If we beleeve not, yet abideth he faithful he cannot deny himselfe. 1.4,2. & 3.20,36
16 Stay prophane babling about vaine things; for they will proceed to more ungodlines. 3.2,13.
19 The foundation of God standeth sure having this seale, The Lord knoweth who be his, &c. 3.22,6. & 4.1,2,8.
20 In a great house there be not only golden and silver vessels, but also of wood and of earth, and some of them be to honour, and some to dishonour. 3.15,8.
25 Instruct them with meekenesse that are contrary minded, if that God will give them at any time repentance that they may know the truth. 1.14,18. & 3.3, 21. & 3.24,15.
26 And that they which bee taken in the snare of the Divell, in the which they be held captive, may, &c. 1.14,18. & 3.3,21
3.6 Ever learning, but they can never come to the knowledge of the truth. 3.2,5.
8 And as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so they withstand the truth, men corrupt in minde, and reprobate touching the faith. 3.2,13
16 The whole Scripture is giuẽ by inspiration of God, and is profitable to teach, to reprove, & to correct, &c. 1.9,1. & 2.7,14
17 That the man of God may be perfect, being perfectly instructed to every good worke. 1.9,1
4.1 I charge thee therfore before God, and before the Lord Iesus Christ, who shall judge the quicke & the dead at his glorious comming in his kingdome. 2.16,17
8 It remaineth that there is a crowne layd up for me, which the Lord that righteous judge shal give unto me in that day. 3. 18,5. & 3.25,4 16 At my first answering no man assisted me, but all forsooke me. 4.6,15

Titvs.

1.1 PAul a servant of God, and an Apostle of Iesus Christ according to the faith of the Elect of God, and knowledge of the truth, which is according to holinesse. 3.2,12. & 3.22,10
5 For this cause I left thee in Creta, that thou shouldest goe forwards to amend those things that remaine, and that thou shouldest appoint every where Elders, as I have commanded thee. 4.3,7,8,15
6 If any be blamelesse, let him be the husband of one wife, having children that bee faithfull, &c. 4.3,12 & 4.12,23
7 A Bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God, &c. not greedie of filthy lucre. 4.5,19
9 A holder of that faithfull word which serveth to teach, so that hee may exhort by sound doctrine, and confute them that speake there-against. 4.3,6
13 This witnesse is true: wherefore reprove them earnestly, that they may bee sound in faith. 3.2,13
15 All things are pure to the pure: but to the defiled and faithlesse, nothing is pure, &c. 3.19,9. & 4.13,9. & 4.17,40
2.2 That old men bee sober, shewing themselves worthy to be reverenced, and temperate, sound in faith, love, and patience. 3.2,13
11 For the grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men hath appeared. 2.12,4. & 3.7,2. & 3.162,. & 4.1,26
12 Teaching us, that wickednes being forsaken, and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and holily in this present life. 3.16,2. & 3.25,1 13 Looking for that blessed hope, and for that glorious comming of the glory of that great great God our Saviour, even Christ Jesus. 3.9.5. & 3.26.2.

32. Put them in minde that they be subject to principalities, and obey powers, that they be prepared to every good worke. 4.20.23.
4. But when the bountifulnesse and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared. 2.5.17. & 3.14.5. & 4.1.26.
5. Not by the works of righteousnesse that we had done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, &c. 1.13.14. & 2.5.17. & 3.4.25. & 4.15. 2.3. & 4.16.20. & 4.17.22.
7. That being justified by his grace, wee should be made heires according to the hope of eternall life. 3.15.6.
9. But stay foolish questions and genealogies, and contentions, and brawlings about the law, for they are unprofitable and vaine. 2.12.5.

HEBREWES.

1.1. GOd many times and diversly spake to the Fathers by the Prophets. 2.9.1. & 2.15.1. & 4.8.7.
2. In these latter dayes he spake to us by his Sonne. 1.13.7. & 4.8.7. & 4.18.20.
3. Who being the brightnesse of his glory, and the engraven forme of his person, and beareth up all things by his mighty Word, hath by himselfe purged our sinnes, &c. 1.13. 2.12. & 1.16.4. & 2.2.20. & 2.14.3.
4. Being made so much more excellent than Angels, by how much he hath obtained a more excellent name. 1.14.9.
6. Let the Angels of God worship him. 1.13. 11. & 1.13.23. & 1.14.9.
10. And thou O Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens be the works of thy hands. 1.13. 11. & 1.13.23. & 1.13.26.
14. Be they not all ministring spirits sent forth to minister for their sakes that shall be heires of salvation. 1.14.9. & 3.20.23.
2.5. He hath not put in subjection to the Angels, the world to come, of which we speak. 1.14.9.
9. But we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour, which was made a little inferiour to Angels, by reason of suffering death, that by Gods grace he might taste of death for all men. 1.13.26. & 2.16.7.
11. For he that sanctifieth, and those that are sanctified, are all of one: wherefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. 2.13.2.
14. That he might destroy through death, him that had the Empire and power of death, that is the Devill, &c. 1.14.18. & 2.13.1.2. & 3.11.12.
15. And that he might deliver all them which for feare of death were all their life time subject to bondage. 2.16.7.
16. For in no wise he tooke the Angels, but he tooke the seed of Abraham. 1.14.9. & 2.13.1.2.
17. In all things it became him to be made like to his brethren, that he might be mercifull, and a faithful high Priest in all things concerning God. 2.13.1. & 2.16.2.19.
3.14. We be made partakers of Christ, if we keepe sure unto the end that beginning wherewith we are upholden. 3.2.16.
4.9. There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. 2.8.29.
14. Having therefore a great high Priest, that hath entred into heaven, even Jesus the Sonne of God, let us hold this profession. 2.7.2. & 4.4.21.
15. We have not a high Priest that cannot be touched with the infirmity of our flesh, but but was in all things tempted in like sort, yet without sinne. 2.12.1.7. & 2.13.1. & 2. 16.12. & 4.17.24.
16. Let us approach therefore with boldnesse unto the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy, and finde grace to helpe at time of need. 3.20.12.17.
5.1. Every high Priest is taken from among men, and is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifice for sinnes. 2.12.4.
4. Neither doth any man take this honour to himselfe, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. 4.3.10. & 4.15.22. & 4.18. 9.14.
5. And so Christ tooke not to himselfe this honour, to be made high Priest, &c. 4.14. 21. & 4.18.2.
6. Thou art a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec. 4.19.28.
7. Which in the daies of his flesh did offer up prayers & supplications with strong crying and teares unto him, that was able to save him from death, and was also heard in that which he feared. 2.16.11.
8. Although he were the sonne, notwithstanding he learned obedience by those things that he suffered. 3.8.1.
10. And called of God an high Priest, after the order of Melchisedec. 4.18.2.
6.4. For it cannot be that those which were once lightned, and have tasted of the heavenly gifts, and were made partakers of the holy Ghost. 3.2.11.& 3.3.21.23.

6 If they fall, that they should bee renued againe by repentance, &c. 3.3.21.
10 For God is not unjust, that he should forget your works and labour of love, which ye shewed toward his name, &c. 3.18.7.
13 For when God made the promise to Abraham, when as he could sweare by none greater, he swore by himselfe. 2.8.25.
16 For men verily sweare by him that is greater than themselves, and an oath for confirmation is an end of strife amongst them. 2.8.27.
7.3 Without father, without mother, without kindred, and having neither beginning of his daies, nor end of his life, but is likened to the Sunne of God, and continueth a priest for ever. 4.19.28.
7 But without all controversie, that which is the least is blessed of him that is greater. 4.18.2.
11 If there had beene a full perfection by the Leviticall priesthood, &c. 2.11.4.
12 The priesthood therefore being changed, it must needs bee, that there bee a change of the law. 3.4.4.& 4.6.2.
17 Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedech. 4.18.2.
19 The law sanctified nothing, but the bringing in of a better hope did it by the which we come neere to God. 2.7.17.& 2.11.4.
21 But this, he is made with an oath by him that said unto him, The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a Priest for ever, &c. 4.18.2.
22 Iesus is made so much greater surety of a better testament. 4.18.2.
24 And he, because he abideth for ever, hath an everlasting priesthood. 2.15.6.
25 Whereby hee is able to save those which come unto God by him. 2.16.16.
8.1 But this is the summe of that which we have spoken: that wee have such an high priest, that sitteth on the right hand of the throne of majesty in heaven. 2.16.15.
5 See, quoth hee that thou make all things according to the patterne that was shewed thee in the mountaine. 2.7.1.
6 But now our high priest hath obtained a more excellent office, in as much as he is the Mediator of a better testament. 2.16.12.
9.1 The first Testament had also ordinances of religion, and a worldly sanctuary, 4. 14.21.
7 But into the second went the high priest alone once every yeare, not without bloud which hee offered for himselfe and for the people. 2.7.17.& 2.15.6.
8 Whereby the holy Ghost this signified, that the way into the holiest of all, was not yet opened, whilest as yet the first tabernacle was standing. 2.7.17.& 2.15.6.
9 Wherein were offered gifts and sacrifices that could not make holy, concerning the conscience of him that did service. 2.7.17. 2.11.14.& 4.14.25.
11 But Christ being come a high priest of good things to come. 2.16.16.& 4.14.21. & 4.18.2.
12 Neither by the bloud of goats and calves but by his owne bloud entred hee once into the holy place. 2.17.4.& 4.18.3.
13 For if the bloud of buls and goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling them that are uncleane, sanctifieth as touching the purification of the flesh. 2.17.4.
14 How much more shall the bloud of Christ which through the eternall spirit offered himselfe without spot to God, &c. 2. 16.6.& 3.16.2.& 4.14.11.
15 And for this cause hee is the Mediator of a new testament, that through death, &c. 2.7.17.& 4.17.4.
16 For where a testament is, there must bee the death of him that made the testament 4.18.5.
22 And all things almost according to the law was purified by bloud, and without sheading of bloud there was no remission. 2.15. 6.& 2.17.4.
26 But now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sinne by the sacrifice of himselfe. 4.18.3.
27 And as it is ordained for men that they shall once dye, and after that commeth the judgement. 2.16.17.& 3.25.8.
28 So Christ was once offered to take away the sins of many, and unto them that looke for him, shall hee appeare the second time without sin unto salvation. 3.26.2.
10.1 For the Law having the shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offer yearely, sanctifie the comers thereto. 2.7.16.17.& 2.11.4.& 4. 14.23.
2 For would they not then have ceased to have beene offered because the offerers once purged, should have had no more conscience of sinne. 3.19.15.& 4.10.3.& 4. 14.25.

4 For the blond of buls and goats cannot take away sinne. 4.14.25.
7 Then I said, lo, I come in the beginning of the book it is written of me) that I should doe O God thy Will. 2.16.5.
8 Above, when he said, sacrifice and offerings, and burnt offerings, and sin offerings, thou wouldest not have, neither hast thou pleasure therein which are offred by the law, &c. 2.16.5.
10 By the which Will we are sanctified, even by the offering of the body of Christ once made. 3.6.3.& 4.18.3.
14 For with once offering he hath consecrated for ever, those that are sanctified. 3.5.2.& 4.18.3.
19 Wherefore brethren, seeing we have liberty to enter the holy place through the blond of Jesus. 3.20.20.
20 By the new and living way which he hath prepared for us through the vaile, that is, his flesh. 3.20.18.
26 If we sinne willingly after that wee have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinne. 3.3.21.23.& 4.18.3.
27 But a fearefull looking for of judgement, and violent fire which shall devour the adversaries. 3.25.12.
29 Of how much more sorer punishment thinke ye, shall he be worthy, which treadeth under foote the Sonne of God, and counteth the blond of the testament as an holy thing, wherewith he was sanctified, and doth despise the spirit of grace. 3.3.21
36 Ye have neede of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, yee might receive the promises. 3.2.37.
11.1 Now faith is the ground of things that are hoped for, and the evidence of things that are not seene. 3.2.41.& 3.25.1.
3 By faith we understand, that the world was made by the word of God, in such sort, that the things that wee see, were not made of things that did appeare. 1.5.13.& 1.6.1.& 1.16.1.
6 Without faith it is unpossible to please him, for hee that commeth to God must beleeve that God is, and that he doth reward them that seeke him. 3.11.15.& 3.14.4.& 3.20.40.
7 By faith wee being warned of God of the things which were as yet not seene, &c. 3.26.30.
9 By faith hee abode in the land of promise as a stranger, &c. 3.10.13.
17 By faith Abraham offered up Isaac when he was tryed, and he that had received the promises, offered his onely begotten sonne. 3.19.6.
21 He worshipped God leaning upon his staffe. 1.11.15.
12.3 Consider him therefore that indured such speaking against of sinners lest yee should be wearied and faint in your minds. 3.3.15.
5 And you have forgotten the exhortation, which speaketh unto you as unto children: My sonne, despise not the chastening of the Lord, neither faint in thy minde when thou art reproved of him. 3.4.32.
8 For if you bee without correction, whereof all are partakers, then are yee bastards and not sonnes. 3.8.6.
9 Moreover, wee have had the fathers of our bodies which corrected us, and wee gave them reverence, should we not much rather be in subjection unto the father of spirits, that we might live? 1.15.2.
17 For ye know how that afterward when he would have inherited the blessing, hee was rejected, for he found no place to repent, although hee sought the blessing with teares. 3.3.24.
18 For ye came not to the mount that might bee touched, nor unto burning fire, nor to blackenesse, and darkenesse, &c. 2.11.9.
22 But yee came to the mount Sion, and to the city of the living God, the celestiall Jerusalem, and to the company of innumerable angels. 1.14.9.
23 To the congregation of the first borne which are written in heaven, and to God the judge of all. 3.25.6.
13.4 Marriage is honourable amongst all men and the bed undefiled: but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. 4.9.14.& 4.12.25.& 4.13.3.
8 Iesus Christ the same yesterday, and to day, and also for ever. 2.10.4.
15 By him therefore let us daily offer up to God the sacrifice of praise, that is, the fruit of the lips, which confesse his name. 3.20.28.& 4.18.16.17.
16 To doe good, and to distribute forget not: for with such sacrifices God is pleased 3.4.36.& 3.7.5.& 3.15.4.& 4.18.17.
17 Obey your guides and bee ruled by them, for they watch for the health of your soules, as such that shall give account therefore. 1.15.2.

Iames.

1.2 MY brethren, count it for an exceeding joy, so often as you fall into temptations. 3.20 46.

12 Blessed is the man that suffereth temptation, for when he shall be tryed, he shall receive the crowne of life. 3.17.10.

13 Let no man when he is tempted say, that he is tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted with evill, neither doth hee tempt any man, 3.20.46.

14 But each one is tempted when he is drawne away by his owne concupiscence, and is intised. 3.20.46.

15 Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin, and sinne when it is finished bringeth forth death. 3.3.13.

17 Every good gift and every perfect gift commeth from above from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variablenesse, neither shadow by turning. 1.13.8.& 2.2.21 & 4.14.10.

21 Wherefore lay apart all filthinesse and superfluity of maliciousnesse, and receive with meekenesse the word that is ingrafted in you which is able to save your soules. 4. 17.25.

2.5 Hath not God chosen the poore of this world, that they should be rich in faith, and heires of the kingdome which he promised to those of whom he is beloved. 3.23.10

10 For whosoever shall keepe the whole law, and yet faileth in one point, he is guilty of all. 3.14.10.& 3.18.10

14 What availeth it him my brethren, though a man say hee hath faith, when hee hath no workes, can the faith save him? 3.2.9.12.

19 Thou beleevest there is one God, thou doest well, and the devils beleeve and tremble. 3. 2.10.

21 Was not Abraham our father justified thorow works, when hee offered Isaac his sonne upon the altar? 3.17.11.

4.3 You aske and you receive not, because you aske amisse, that yee might consume it on your lusts. 3.20.7.

6 But the Scripture offereth more grace, and therefore saith, God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. 2.2.10.& 3. 12.5.

8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you: cleanse your hands yee sinners, and purge your hearts ye wavering minded. 3. 3.16.

11 He that speaketh evill of his brother speaketh against the law and condemneth it, but if thou condemne the law, &c. 4.10.7.

12 There is one law-giver that is able to save and to destroy. 4.10.7.

14 Who can tell what shall bee the next day, for what is your life? it is even a vapour, &c. 3.20.28.

15 For that yee ought to say, if the Lord will and if we live, we will doe this or that. 3. 20.28.

5.12 Before all things, my brethren sweare not neither by heaven, neither by earth, neither any other oath, but let your yea be yea, and your nay nay, &c. 2.8.26.

13 Is any man afflicted amongst you? let him pray: is any man merry? let him sing Psalms. 3.20.7.

14 Is any sicke amongst you? let him send for the Elders of the Church, and let them pray for him &c. 4.19.18,21.

15 And the prayer of faith shall save the sicke, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if hee have committed sinne, it shall be forgiven him. 3,20.11, 16 Acknowledge your faults one to another and pray one for another, that yee may bee healed: for the prayer of a righteous man availeth much if it be fervent. 3.4.6,12.& 3.20.27.

17 Elias was a man subject to those things that we be, and hee prayed earnestly that it might not raine, and it reigned not on the earth for the space of three yeares and sixe moneths. 3.20.26.

IPeter.

1.2 TO the elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father unto sanctification of the spirit through obedience and sprinkling of the bloud of Iesus Christ, grace and peace be multiplyed unto you. 3. 3.1.& 3.14.6.& 3.21.6.& 4.15.2

3 Blessed be God the Father of our Lord Iesu Christ, who of his great mercy hath begot us againe into a lively hope, by the resurrection of Christ Iesu from death. 2.16.13.

5 Who are kept by the power of God through faith to salvation, which is prepared to be declared in the last day. 3.2.24.& 3.18.3.
7 That the tryall of your faith, being much more precious then gold which perisheth although it be tryed by fire. 3.8.4
9 Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of our soules. 1.15.2.& 3.18.3. & 3.25. 1.
11 Searching when or what time the spirit which testified before of Christ which was in them, should declare the suffering that should come unto Christ, &c. 1.13.18.& 2.9.1
12 Vnto whom it was revealed, that they should not minister unto themselves, but unto us the things which are now shewed unto you by them. 2.9.1.& 2.11 6.
15 But as hee which hath called you is holy so be you holy in all manner of conversation. 3.6.3.
16 Be you holy, for I am holy. 3.6.2.
18 Knowing that yee were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold from your vaine conversation, received by the traditions of the fathers. 2.17.5.
19 But with the precious bloud of Christ, as of a lambe undefiled and without spot. 2. 7 5.& 3.6 3.
20 Which was ordained before the foundation of the world, but was declared in the last times for your sakes. 3.22.6.& 4.18. 20.
21 Which by his meanes doe beleeve in God that raised him up from the dead and gave him glory, that your faith and hope might be in God. 2.16.13 & 3.2.1.43.
22 Seeing your soules are purified by obeying the truth through the spirit unto brotherly love without fayning. 1.15.2.& 2.5.11.
23 Being borne againe, not of mortall seed, but of immortall, by the word of the living God, who liveth and endureth for ever. 2.10.7. & 4.1.6.& 4.16.18.31.
2.5 And ye as lively stones, be made a spirituall house, &c. 4.6.5.& 4.15.16.
9 But yee are a chosen generation, a kingly priesthood, a holy nation, a people that God hath challenged to himselfe, that you should shew forth the vertues of him which hath called you from darkenesse, into his wonderfull light. 2.7.1.& 3.13.2.& 4.18.17.& 4.19.25.
11 Behold, I pray you as pilgrimes and strangers, and that you abstaine from the lusts of the flesh, which strive against the soule. 1.15.2.
13 Be you subject unto every ordinance of man for the Lords sake, whether it be to the King, as to the superiour. 4.20.23.
17 Honour all men, Love brotherlinesse, feare God, honour the King. 4.20 7.
21 Christ hath suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps. 3. 16.2.
24 Who bore our sinnes upon his body on the crosse, that we being dead to sin, might live to righteousnesse: by whose stripes ye are healed. 2.16.6.& 2.17.4. & 3.4.26.& 3.4 27.& 3 4.30.& 4.14.21
22 You were as strayed sheepe, but now yee be turned to your shepheard and bishop of your soules. 1.15.2.& 3 25.6.
3.7 Likewise ye husbands, use your selves as it becommeth men of knowledge, giving honour to the woman as to the weaker vessel, &c. 4.20.29.
18 For Christ suffered once for sinnes, the just for the unjust, that hee might bring us to God, and was put to death concerning the flesh, but lived according to the spirit. 2.13 2 19 By the which he also went, and preached to the spirits that were in prison. 2.16.9.
21 To the which also the figure that now saveth us, even baptisme agreeth (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience maketh request to God) by the resurrection of Iesus Christ. 3.19.15. & 4.10.3.& 4.14.4.& 4.14.24.& 4.15 2.& 4.16.21.
4.3 It is enough for us that in the forepart of our life, we have lived according to the lust of the Gentiles, when we walked in, &c 3. 15 8.& 3. 24.11.
8 Before all things have fervent love amongst you, for love covereth the multitude of sin. 3. 4.31.& 3.4.36.
10 Let every man as he hath received the gift, minister the same one to another, as good disposers of the manifull graces of God. 3. 7 5.
11 If any man speake, let him speake as the words of God. 3.8.8.& 4.8.9.
17 For the time is come, that judgement must begin at the house of God, if so bee it begin first with us, what shall be the end? &c. 3. 4.34.
5.1 The elders which bee amongst you, I beseech also that am an elder, &c, 4.6.7.
2 Feede the flocke of God, which dependeth upon you. 4.6.3.& 4.10.17.
3 Not as though yee were lords over Gods heritage. 4.4.9.& 4.10.7.

5 God resisteth the proud and, giveth grace to the humble. 3.12.5.
6 Humble your selves under the mighty hand of God, that hee may exalt you in due time. 3.2.40.
7 Having all your care cast upon him: for he careth for you. 1.17.6.
8 Be yee sober and watch, for your adversary the Devill, as a roaring lion walking about seeketh whom he may devour. 1.4.18.& 1. 14.13.& 3.20.46
10 And the God of all grace, which hath called us unto his eternall glory in Christ Iesus, after ye have suffered a little, make you perfect, &c. 3.20.46.

II. Peter.

1.4 WHereby most great and precious promises bee given us that by them we should be partakers of the godly nature, &c. 3.11.10.& 25.10.
5 Therefore give even all diligence thereunto joyne moreover vertue to your faith and with vertue knowledge. 2.5.11.
10 Wherfore brethren, give rather diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if you doe these things, you shall never fall. 3.13.8
14 Seeing I know the time is at hand, that I must lay downe this my tabernacle, as the Lord Iesus declared unto me. 3.25.6.
19 We have also a most sure word of the Prophets, to the which ye doe well that you take heede, as unto a light that shineth in a darke place vntill the day dawne, &c. 1.9.2.
21 For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the holy Ghost. 1.13. 7.& 1.13.18.
2.1. There were false Prophets amongst the people, as amongst you there shall bee false teachers, &c. 4.9.4.
4 If God spared not the Angels that sinned, but cast them downe into hell, and delivered downe into the chaines of darkenesse, &c. 1. 14.16.& 1.14.19.
9 The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations. 3.20.46.
19 Of whomsoever a man is overcome, even of the same hee is brought into bondage. 2. 2.8.
3.4 Where is the promise of his comming? for since the fathers died, all things continue alike from the beginning, &c. 3.24.2.
8 Dearely beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand yeeres, and a thousand yeares as one day. 3.2.42.
9 And would have no man to perish, but would have all men to come to repentance. 3.24.15.

I. Iohn.

1.1 THat which was from the beginning that we have heard, that we have seene with our eies, that we have beheld, and that our hands have handled of the word of life. 2.14.2.& 2.14 7.& 4.17.8.
7 That if we walke in the light as he is in the light, we have mutuall fellowship, and the blood of his sonne Iesu Christ purgeth us from all sinne, &c. 2.17.4.& 3.5.2.& 4. 14.21.
9 If we confesse our sinnes, he is faithfull and just, so that he will forgive us our sins, &c. 3.4.9.& 3.29.
10 If we say we have no sinne, we make him a lier, &c. 3.20.45.
2.1 If any man have sinned, wee have an advocate with the father Iesus Christ the righteous. 3.4.26.& 3.20.17
2 He is the propitiation for our sinnes, and not for ours onely, but for the sinnes of the whole world, 2.17.2.& 3.4.26.& 3. 20.20.
12 I write unto you little children, because your sinnes be forgiven you for his names sake 2.17.5.& 3.4.26.
18 Little children it is the last time: and as you have heard, Antichrist shall come. 4. 18.20.
19 They went out from us, but they were not of us, for if they had beene of us, they would have continued with us, &c. 3.3.23.& 3. 24.6.7.
20 But ye have annointment from him that is holy, and you know all things. 3.1.3.
23 Whosoever denieth the Sonne, the same hath not the father. 2.6.4.
27 But the ointment that you have received of him, abideth in you, neither need you that any man teach you, but as the same ointment teacheth you, &c. 3.1.3

3.1. Beho

3.1 Behold, what love the father hath shewed on us, that we should be called the sonnes of God, for this cause the world knoweth you not, because it knoweth not him. 3.6.3. & 3.20.36.

2 Dearely beloved, wee are now the sonnes of God, but yet it doth not appeare what we shall be: and we know, that when hee shall appeare, wee shall belike him: for we shall see him as he is, &c. 2.9.3. & 3.2.14. & 3.11.10. & 3.25.10. & 4.18.20.
